They are accused of using the Open Russia foundation, a charitable organization that Mr. Khodorkovsky founded, for transferring a fraction of the money, his lawyers said. Open Russia has also been under investigation, and its accounts frozen, since last year.

The lawyers said that the entire premise for the charges was absurd, and that Yukos's financial statements, prepared by auditors from PricewaterhouseCoopers L.L.P., could account for all of Yukos's oil production and sales.

Before Mr. Khodorkovsky's arrest at gunpoint late in 2003, Yukos was Russia's top oil producer and Mr. Khodorkovsky's wealth was vast and his influence extensive.

He had close relations with senior Russian officials, founded Open Russia, underwrote civil-society organizations and spoke of opening Russia to the West and to Western business practices. Fortune magazine declared him Russia's richest man and said he had $15 billion in personal wealth.

His business empire and stature were crushed by President Vladimir V. Putin's Kremlin, which has defended his arrest and presided over a parallel tax investigation that has brought the company to a forced sale under Russian bankruptcy proceedings.

Mr. Khodorkovsky's critics labeled him a cynic and a fraud, saying that he controlled a faction in Parliament by purchasing legislators' votes, and that his fortunes were accumulated and secured by insider deals and crime. The Kremlin has sought to portray Yukos as Russia's Enron, a company that ruined its own image with extensive fraud and accounting schemes.

Since his arrest and the case against him and his company, Mr. Khodorkovsky has become an occasional point of contention between Russia and the West.

But his cause and his public relations efforts have not attracted widespread support in Russia, where resentment lingers against a class of profiteers who amassed almost instant fortunes after the Soviet Union's collapse.

His lawyers have framed his case in ways that remain germane outside of Russia's often murky and bruising business circles: as an example of government persecution that underscores Russia's spotty record on human rights and respect for the rule of law.

They said it appeared that the next trial, for which no date has been set, would be held at the remote detention center in Chita, the closest city to the place where Mr. Khodorkovsky had been imprisoned, under conditions that would make it difficult for lawyers to meet with their clients or for public scrutiny of the proceedings.

Criminal Case Likely To Put All Of Yukos In State Hands (NYT)

By Andrew E. Kramer

New York Times, February 6, 2007

MOSCOW, Feb. 5 — New criminal charges filed Monday against former leaders of the Yukos oil company, once Russia's largest private energy concern, are likely to ease what remains of the company into state hands, strengthening the Kremlin's control over the industry, analysts and company officials said.

In this sense, the Yukos affair is ending as it began — in an opaque mixture of criminal prosecution and Russian energy nationalism, where it is far from clear where one ends and the other begins.

"It comes at a time when we're moving into the final chapter of Yukos," Chris Weafer, chief analyst at Alfa Bank and a former adviser to the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, said Monday. "They want a change in how people view the Yukos affair. It is important that they shake off the image of the asset grab."

State-owned companies already control a third of the oil production in Russia, one of the world's largest producing nations.

Now, both of Russia's large state energy companies are expressing interest in buying Yukos oil fields and refineries, assets that critics say were expropriated by the government but that could look more like the spinoff from a corporate tax and accounting scandal if the new charges stick, as expected.

Authorities in Chita, a city near the Chinese border, charged Yukos's former chief, Mikhail B. Khodorkovsky, and his business partner, Platon A. Lebedev, with embezzlement and money laundering.

Charles Krause, a lawyer for Mr. Khodorkovsky, said in a conference call from Washington that prosecutors were accusing Mr. Khodorkovsky of having embezzled money from oil trades executed between Yukos company subsidiaries, in a practice known as transfer pricing.

Under this maneuver, which the company acknowledges existed, a trading arm of Yukos paid lower than world prices for oil bought from other company subsidiaries, in what was presented as a legal tax-minimization strategy. The transfer-pricing operations that formed the basis of the new charges were also the source of the Russian government tax claims that bankrupted Yukos.

Russian authorities say they may also prosecute Yukos's auditor, PricewaterhouseCoopers. In a statement, PricewaterhouseCoopers denied any wrongdoing.

The remaining Yukos assets, roughly $22 billion, are to be auctioned within months. Though diminished after the loss of its largest pumping asset in 2004, Yukos remains a valuable company. At stake are 2.3 billion barrels of oil reserves and 400,000 barrels a day in production, five refineries, a network of gas stations and Moscow real estate.

Yukos, though bankrupt, owns valuable minority stakes in both major state energy companies — 9.5 percent of Rosneft and 20 percent of Gazprom's oil subsidiary, Gazprom Neft. Gazprom has said it would like to buy back the shares in the oil subsidiary. Rosneft is expected to bid for the pumping assets and at least some of the refineries.

Yukos is administered by a court-appointed receiver, Eduard K. Rebgun, who in a telephone interview Monday sought to minimize any connections between the criminal charges and the bankruptcy process. He said that Yukos's finances were threadbare even before the tax charges were filed in 2003, and that asset and revenue stripping were most likely the cause — a message that dovetailed with the new criminal case. "It's clear they were already stripping assets and revenue," Mr. Rebgun said, adding that in 2003, Yukos reported a loss of $1 million.

The new charges could have a bearing in a separate court process in the Netherlands, where ownership of more than $1.5 billion in Yukos's European assets are being contested by Mr. Rebgun. Yukos International, which is still independent of the Russian bankruptcy process, holds $1.49 billion in a Dutch bank account from the sale of a Lithuanian refinery, 49 percent of a Slovak pipeline network, and a Swiss engineering company valued around $25 million.

New Pipeline to Bypass Belarus

Transneft, Russia's oil pipeline monopoly, is planning to bypass neighboring Belarus by building a pipeline to a Baltic port, Primorsk.

"Of course this is very, very expensive," Transneft's president, Semyon Vainshtok, said on state television yesterday. "If we didn't have such risks from neighboring states, it wouldn't be necessary to spend so much money."

Transneft cut supplies to Belarus for three days last month after Belarus demanded a transit fee for crude oil moving through its pipeline, causing shortages at refineries in Eastern Europe. The Interfax news agency reported yesterday that Belarus was planning to increase fees by 35 percent, starting Feb. 15.

Transneft's new route will run from the Belarus border to Primorsk, Mr. Vainshtok said. It will have to be able to pump 50 million tons of crude oil annually, about two-thirds of Primorsk's capacity now.

Bienvenidos To Mexican Avocados (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 6, 2007

FREE TRADE has never tasted so good. After 93 years, the last U.S. barrier to avocados imported from Mexico has been lifted. As of Feb. 1, Californians, Hawaiians and Floridians can now join their fellow Americans in enjoying the fruits of a competitive market for party-dip ingredients.

The ban on avocados from south of the border dates to 1914, when U.S. agricultural officials barred them because they found that some avocados from Mexico carried fruit flies that could infest U.S. avocado orchards. Outraged Mexican officials maintained that it was all a yanqui plot to corner the guacamole futures market (which had yet to grow to Super Bowl-sized proportions), but Mexican farmers switched to growing Hass avocados, which are less hospitable to fruit flies. Still, the ban persisted.

Many decades later, however, the competition was back on. The North American Free Trade Agreement took effect in 1994, and in 1997, the U.S. agreed to allow the importation of Mexican avocados in a few states if Mexico agreed to take some U.S. cherries, which Mexico had banned in 1992 because (of course) they carried pests. By 2005, people in 47 states were dicing, mashing or simply peeling and eating (yes, it happens) avocados from Mexico. In California, Florida and Hawaii, which are allowed to protect their own avocado farmers, the ban persisted until 2007.

DOJ_NMG_0128583

It expired Thursday — and just in time. The Super Bowl was Sunday, which meant lots of eating, and last month's cold snap did serious damage to the state's avocado crop. The California Avocado Commission, a trade group, estimates farmers will lose about 25% of their crop this year.

And the commission, despite its name, welcomes the aguacates. Apparently, Americans' addiction to avocados is so strong it overpowers the principles of economics. When avocados are involved, supply and demand mean nothing, says the commission: No matter how many avocados there are, we eat them. Avocado consumption nationwide has ballooned 300 million pounds in the last three years, to a billion, but despite the flood of avocados on the market, the price varied only by 1% per avocado.

Mexican President Felipe Calderon noted that Mexico would rather send its avocados to the U.S. than send its avocado farmers. So it's good news for everyone — not just football fans, who, after all, have only one meaningless game left to watch. Pass the chips, please.

DOJ_NMG_0128584

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Wednesday, February 07, 2007 8:21 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Wednesday, February 07, 2007
Attachments:	agnb070207.pdf; agnb070207.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

US Refuses To Join Accord On Secret Detentions 3
DOJ Seeks To Halt Contempt Hearing In Maine NSA Case 3
Proposed Funding Boost For Defending Against Detainee Challenges Questioned 4
Lawyer Says Detained Saudis Are Democracy Activists, Not Terrorists 4

Homeland Response:

Walker, Skinner Say Lawyers Hamper Investigations At DHS ...4
McConnell To Change Rules That Limit Hiring Of First-Generation Arab Americans 4
New Orleans Sees No "Big Comeback" From Katrina 5

War News:

Senate GOP Worried It Is Losing PR War Over Iraq Resolution 5
House To Take Up Anti-Surge Resolution Next Week 8
Gates Says Troop "Surge" Not Final Chance For Iraq Success 8
House Panel Questions Bremer Over Use Of Iraq Reconstruction Funds 10
US To Pay $5.8 Billion To Expand Iraqi Security Forces 10
Iran Accuses US Of Role In Diplomat's Kidnapping 11
Maliki Acknowledges Iraqi Government Errors 12
US Probes Iraqi Lawmaker's Connection To 1983 Embassy Bombings 12
Terror Casts Pall Over Baghdad Markets, Vendors 12
US To Reexamine Iraqi Refugee Policy 12
Video Shows Friendly-Fire Incident Involving British Soldier ..13
Trial Date Set For Abu Ghraib Accused 13
"Coalition Forces" Capture Al Qaeda Suspects In Afghanistan 13
Gates Says NATO Must Increase Contributions In Afghanistan 13
Marine Vehicle Remains Costly Failure 14
NNSA Wants Funding To Plan, Produce Next Generation Nuclear Warhead 14

DOJ:

McNulty Denies Political Motives In US Attorney Dismissals ..14

Corporate Scandals:

Lengthy AOL Trial Ends With Acquittals Of Three 18
Oil Drilling Firms To Pay $26 Million In Nigeria Bribery Case18
US Subpoenas Allied Capital Records In Pretexting Probe 19
SEC Sues Former Engineered Support Officials Over Options Scheme 20
Former Qwest CEO Seeks Trial Delay 20
SEC Ratchets Up Probe Of Wall Street Trading Leaks 21
Decline In Class-Action Securities Fraud Litigation Examined 21

Criminal Law:

Libby Told Grand Jury Cheney "Upset," "Disturbed" By Wilson Claims 22
Pennsylvania State Senator Indicted On 139 Corruption Counts 23
DOJ Probing Loudoun County Land Deals 24
Man, Company Charged With Bribery In "Operation Big Coon Dog." 24
FBI Arrests Reputed Bonanno Underboss, 18 Alleged Mob Associates 24
House Republicans Unveil Anti-Crime Agenda 25
Three Plead Guilty To Katrina Cleanup Billing Fraud 25
Connecticut Bank Officer Sentenced To Prison For Embezzlement 26
Florida Man Pleads Guilty To $2.5 Million Medicare Fraud Scheme 26
Three Convicted In Texas Bank Robbery Scheme 26
US Seeks To Keep Convicted Ex-Coca-Cola Secretary In Jail 27
Cunningham Probe Exposes Secret Iraq Water Contracts 27

At Least Six States Consider Broadening Death Penalty.....27
Six Baltimore Police Officers Suspended In Overtime Pay Probe 28

Civil Law:

Victims' Families Sue FBI Over Shootings During New Jersey Drug Sting 28
Fatal Illinois Air Crash Blamed On Lack Of Radar 28
Founder Of AmeriDebt Accused Of Hiding Assets From Debtors.....29
Two New York Hospitals Bring RICO Suit Against UnitedHealth 29
Judge Orders More Mediation In Virginia Jet-Noise Suits.....29

Civil Rights:

Review Finds Vermont State Hospital Lagging In DOJ-Mandated Improvements.....30
DOJ-Funded Human Trafficking Task Force Launched In Las Vegas 30
Border Patrol Agent Beaten By Fellow Prison Inmates.....30
9th Circuit Rules Wal-Mart Class-Action Bias Suit Must Go To Trial 31
Ninth Teen Sentenced In California Halloween Hate Crime.32
Dallas Must Fix Jail Problems Within Three Months.....32
WPost Urges Democrats To Act On DC Voting Rights.....32

Antitrust:

Monsanto's Delta Bid Raises Antitrust Concerns 33
Senate Committee Probing Possible Natural-Gas Price Manipulation 33
Samsung Settles State Price-Fixing Claims For $90 Million.33
Bush Visits Firm Once Accused Of Price-Fixing.....34
Apple's Jobs Calls For Dumping Online Copyright Protection34
Shareholders To Vote Today On Equity Office Sale.....35
MGIC To Purchase Radian In $4.9 Billion Stock Deal 36
Midwest Management Resists AirTran's $345 Million Offer..36

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Groups Reopen Suit Against EPA Over Pesticide Ban 36
Gore Says Bush Administration Paying Scientists To Dispute Global Warming 37
Legacy Of Radiation Illness Stirs Opposition To Divine Strake.....37
EPA Chief Under Fire At Senate Hearing 37
Energy Department Seeks To End Funding For Geothermal Power.....38
Conservation Easements Give Tax Incentives To Landowners.....38
House Committee Approves Bill Allowing Indian Tribes To Receive Anti-Meth Grants.....38

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

US, Latin American Authorities Gather For Anti-Gang Summit 38
23 Indicted On Drug Charges In "Operation Polar Express." .39
Former Los Angeles "Drug Boss" Gets Life Sentence 39
Authorities Link Gambling Losses To San Diego Charger Safety's Cough Syrup Case 39
Connecticut Cocaine Ring Investigation Nets 3 More Guilty Pleas 39
North Dakota Issues Industrial Hemp Licenses To 2 Farmers 40
Lawmakers Seek New Tactics In Afghanistan, Say DEA, Other Agencies Aren't Working Together 40
Bush's Proposed Budget Eliminates $2.2 Million In Counter-Drug Aid For Venezuela.....40

Immigration:

LATimes Criticizes Bush Provision On Aid For Incarcerating Illegals.....41
WPost Blasts Virginia GOP Stance On Illegal Immigration 41

Tax:

Court Bars Minnesota Tax Preparer.....41
Employees Face Deadline To Drain Flex Accounts.....41

Congress-Administration:

Bush Promotes Budget, Defends Tax Cuts.....42
Rangel Open To Adding Some Tax Breaks To Minimum Wage Bill 45
Unions Press Democrats To Oppose Fast Track 45
Senate Maneuvering Could Snarl Fiscal Year 2007 Funding Bill.....45
House Democrats Prepare Rollout Of Long Term Agenda....45
Lawmakers Press Agencies To Fund Priorities Without Earmarks.....46
White House Agrees To Pelosi Military Aircraft Request.....46
Kucinich Effort To Create Peace Department Has Rocky Start.....46
Bush Commemorates Anniversary Of Reagan's Birth 46
Bush Credited For Pursuing Healthcare Reform 46
Hollywood Seeks Congressional Support For Taxes, Fighting Piracy.....47
Burton Missed 19 House Votes For Golf Tournament.....47
NYTimes Decries Bush Administration's Reliance On Contractors 47

DOJ_NMG_0128587

Other News:

Bernanke Says Education, Training Key To Addressing Economic Inequality....47
Stocks Up Slightly....48
GOP Insiders Said To View Clinton 2008 Victory As Inevitable....48
Giuliani's Favorability In New Hampshire Far Outpaces McCain, Romney....49
Morris Predicts Clinton And Giuliani May Sew Up Nominations By Labor Day....50
Edwards Bloggers Said To Have Made Anti-Catholic Comments....50
Romney To Announce His Candidacy In Michigan Next Week....50
Huckabee Seen As Evangelical Alternative To Top Three GOP Candidates....50
New Technology Among Factors Driving Up Primary Spending....51
Obama Considered Overly Abstract....51
Dowd Praises Biden, Says He's Not "Pandering."....51
Perry's Lottery Plan Would Fund Education, Insurance For Poor....51
Washington Press Club Honors Thomas....51
WSJournal Notes Banks Do Not Benefit From Home Foreclosures....52
WSJournal Celebrates Move Toward Vouchers In Utah And South Carolina....52
Bush Budget Contains "Ambitious" Foreign Policy Goals....52
Lebanese PM Blames US For Nation's Instability....52
Rice Sets Meeting With Abbas, Olmert....52
Palestinian Factions Begin Unity Talks In Mecca....53
US Will Create Single Africa Command....53
Washington Prepared To Renew Relations With Pyongyang 53
Bush Approves Plan To Pressure Sudan On Darfur....54
Bomber Killed In Thwarted Attack At Pakistani Airport....54
Russian Tycoon May Cooperate With Police In Poison Probe....54
Investigators Won't Charge Former Blair Advisor....54
Mugabe Losing Support As Zimbabwe Economy Plunges....55
Global Pathogen Surveillance System Proposed To Fight Bird Flu....55

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages....55

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington....56

TERRORISM NEWS:

US Refuses To Join Accord On Secret Detentions. The Washington Post (2/7, A14, Moore, 690K) reports the US Tuesday "declined to endorse" a "long-negotiated treaty" signed by 57 countries "prohibiting governments from holding people in secret detention," saying "its text did not meet US expectations." Louise Arbour, the U.N. high commissioner for human rights, said the treaty was "a message to all modern-day authorities committed to the fight against terrorism" that some practices are "not acceptable." In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack declined to comment, except to say that the final wording "did not meet our expectations."

DOJ Seeks To Halt Contempt Hearing In Maine NSA Case. The AP (2/7) reports from Augusta, ME, "The Justice Department asked a judge Tuesday to bar the Maine Public Utilities Commission from proceeding with a contempt hearing for Verizon that stems from telephone customer complaints related to allegations about domestic surveillance by the National Security Agency." The AP continues, "A multi-customer complaint filed with the Maine PUC last May effectively seeks to force Verizon to say whether it provided telephone call records to the government without a warrant. … The PUC has challenged the adequacy of Verizon responses to date and set a hearing for Friday." The AP adds, "In a federal court filing Tuesday, the Justice Department said PUC officials had been put on notice months ago that the federal government believes the information being sought about an alleged involvement of Verizon with the NSA 'cannot be disclosed.' … The Justice Department requested a judicial order to keep the Maine PUC from moving forward until a court decides 'what is clearly a federal question without the immediate threat of disclosure of the very information that is at issue in this case -- information that, if disclosed, might reveal or tend to reveal highly significant federal classified intelligence activities.' … In addition to seeking to block PUC action, the Justice Department said the order it was requesting would bar Verizon from responding to PUC demands 'because of the substantial risk of direct or inadvertent disclosure of information that would tend to confirm or deny the existence of foreign intelligence activities.' … Justice Department lawyer Alexander Haas said he had no comment. Department spokesman Charles Miller confirmed that the request for a court order was aimed at Friday´s scheduled PUC hearing."

DOJ_NMG_0128588

Proposed Funding Boost For Defending Against Detainee Challenges Questioned. ABC News (2/7, Rood) reports, "A line item buried in the president's budget reveals the Bush administration is gearing up for emboldened legal challenges from Gitmo detainees." ABC continues, "A brief paragraph in President Bush's 2008 budget request shows he plans to hire nearly two dozen new Justice Department lawyers to fight suits brought by Guantanamo detainees challenging their imprisonment. … The boost is planned despite a new law that should prevent detainees' claims from ever reaching a U.S. court, suggesting the White House may believe that law will be quickly reversed." ABC adds, "The increase in lawyers 'signals real concern on the administration's part,' said Vincent Warren, president of the New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights, that the new law is unconstitutional and will be struck down. His organization represents over 200 Guantanamo detainees and has helped lawyers representing hundreds of others." ABC notes, "The controversial bill passed through Congress late last year at the urging of President Bush. The Military Commissions Act (MCA), as it's known, stripped Guantanamo detainees of their right to challenge their captivity. President Bush signed the measure into law, despite critics calling the measure unconstitutional. … Currently, just seven Justice Department attorneys defend the government against Gitmo detainees' suits. By removing the threat of such lawsuits, the MCA should theoretically reduce or even eliminate the need for those attorneys -- but instead the White House wants to add 23 lawyers starting this October and arm the group with a $5.5 million budget. This year, the office's budget was $2.3 million. … Military legal expert Eugene Fidell agreed with Warren's analysis. The request 'presupposes that Congress will overturn the MCA...or tweak it,' or the act could be affected by a Supreme Court ruling, said Fidell, president of the National Institute of Military Justice. 'Or both,' he added. … But Justice Department spokesman Eric Ablin disagreed. 'I don't think you can read into [the request] in any way whatsoever," he said. "I think it's reflective of the expense of those Guantanamo cases.'"

Lawyer Says Detained Saudis Are Democracy Activists, Not Terrorists. The Washington Post (2/7, A13, Ambah, 690K) reports police in Saudi Arabia "have arrested 10 men and accused them of collecting donations to fund terrorist acts outside the kingdom, the Interior Ministry said. But a lawyer and a prominent dissident said that at least seven of the men were Saudi democracy activists whose arrest was a government attempt to abort their civic rights work." Matrouk al-Faleh, "who was jailed in 2004 for calling for more democracy in the kingdom," said the seven men, most of them lawyers and professors, had been "waiting for government approval to set up a civic rights group." They also had planned "to present authorities this week with a list of more than 40 prisoners without legal representation whom they intended to defend." According to Faleh, "The terrorist allegation is a coverup."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Walker, Skinner Say Lawyers Hamper Investigations At DHS. The AP (2/6, Limpkin) reported GAO head David Walker and DHS Inspector General Richard Skinner told a House subcommittee Tuesday that lawyers, particularly in the general counsel's office, "have hampered investigations into waste and fraud" at DHS. Agency spokesman Russ Knocke "denied the allegations, terming them inaccurate and unfair." Walker told the panel that "the department's general counsel wants to 'sit in on every interview,' which he deemed inappropriate." Skinner said he agreed "wholeheartedly," adding that the process is "'not a denial of information, but it's very cumbersome to obtain information.'" The two said "that 'the tone is set from the top' and that Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff himself needs to address the situation." The Washington Post/AP (2/7, A10) runs a brief article focusing on the charges of hampered investigations.

McConnell To Change Rules That Limit Hiring Of First-Generation Arab Americans. The Washington Post (2/7, A15, Pincus, 690K) reports the incoming national intelligence director, retired Navy Vice Adm. John M. McConnell said Friday that he "plans to change security rules to make it easier for intelligence agencies to hire first-generation Arab Americans for highly sensitive jobs." Speaking during his confirmation hearing before the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, McConnell said the rules "limit intelligence agencies' ability to employ first-generation Americans 'who might have native language capabilities from serving in some of these very sensitive positions in the intelligence community' and hinder efforts to deal with radical Islam." McConnell said he wants to change the rules "because they constitute 'one of the areas that needs probably the greatest deal of attention and improvement . . . using people who speak the native language, understand the culture and the tribal conditions.'"

DOJ_NMG_0128589

New Orleans Sees No "Big Comeback" From Katrina. NBC Nightly News (2/6, lead story, Williams, 9.87M) reported from New Orleans' Lakeview neighborhood, where, "like so much of this city, the recovery…is spotty. There is good news next to bad. Some houses rebuilt. Others demolished."

NBC devoted no less than 11 minutes to New Orleans' progress, "or lack of it in some cases," reporting (2/6, story 4, 4:30, Williams) that "a new analysis done by the Associated Press finds more evidence of what we've reported on this broadcast: That FEMA dolled out hundreds of millions of dollars in aid to households that either didn't exist or people who took the money and ran with it. FEMA says it was under pressure back then and unable to verify all the addresses of the people who originally asked for help. And there are still lots of people here, make no mistake, who are legitimately hurting and asking for help." NBC (Savidge) added, "Here it is, a year and a half later, and the big comeback that many people had hoped to see post-Katrina just simply has not happened." Savidge continued that the city is at half its pre-Katrina population, and a recent University of New Orleans study found that "more than 30% of those who have come back are considering calling it quits. One of the reasons predates Katrina -- crime." Meanwhile, the Army Corps of Engineers claim that the city's levees "are as good now as they were before Katrina hardly eases the minds of those considering rebuilding." NBC (Savidge) also cited the Road Home program, for which 105,000 people have applied. "Only 506 have received money. Because of all those reasons we've mentioned and the many others, there are a lot of people who are looking at 2007 and New Orleans as possibly a make-it or even break-it year."

NBC (2/6, story 5, 3:50, Williams) reported on New Orleans' fire department, which "has never recovered from Katrina" and is "badly in need. There are 150 job openings. And there is no money - city, state or federal - to rebuild this firehouse."

NBC (2/6, story 9, 2:40, Williams) ended its broadcast with "a special look at the children. By one estimate as many as 35,000 children across this entire region are suffering from some sort of emotional problem and they're not all, of course, getting help for it." NBC focused on one eight-year-old boy who is one "among many learning to play again in New Orleans with resilience and hope."

Budget Plan Said To Provide Opportunity To Create "New FEMA." Under the headline "New FEMA Emerges From The Wreckage Of Past Disasters," the Washington Post (2/7, D4, Barr, 690K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "On paper, the coming year should be turnaround time for FEMA." Restructured funding for the agency in President Bush's fiscal 2008 will give Director R. David Paulison "his first opportunity to lay claim to money that can be used to restore FEMA's luster and professionalism." The Post adds that Paulison has used public appearances to make "the pitch that FEMA is on the rebound." After storms and tornadoes hit central Florida Friday, Paulison's "promise of relief supplies came a day after storms devastated four counties, a sign of 'the new FEMA,' he said. If money and staffing come together as Paulison hopes, the new FEMA will put an end to what the Government Accountability Office calls 'considerable flux' and 'near-constant organizational change' at FEMA since 2001."

WAR NEWS:

Senate GOP Worried It Is Losing PR War Over Iraq Resolution. The day after Senate Republicans effectively blocked debate on the anti-"surge" resolution authored by Sen. John Warner, some in the GOP caucus are growing increasingly concerned that they are losing the public relations battle over the Senate debate. The Los Angeles Times (2/7, Levey, Hook, 850K) reports "Senate Republicans continued to insist Tuesday that they simply want a fair debate on the floor of the Senate," but "Democrats hammered Republicans on Monday for ducking a formal debate on the war. And by Tuesday morning, some Republicans worried the public would misunderstand their stance." Sen. John McCain said, "It's very unfortunate that we appear to be blocking. … I hope we can make the American people aware that we're just asking for votes on our amendment, which is the way the Senate works."

DOJ_NMG_0128590

Roll Call (2/7, Stanton, Billings) reports "Senate Republican leaders struggled Tuesday to shift their focus away from complaints about parliamentary procedure and onto which party is best supporting the troops as Republicans and Democrats continued their high-stakes game of political chicken over the Iraq War." Republicans "found themselves on the losing end of the public relations fight as they woke up to headlines across the country pinning the blame squarely on them. 'It doesn't matter what's going on the floor. It's all about media,' one senior GOP aide said Tuesday." Roll Call adds, "Privately, Republican leadership sources acknowledged they failed to effectively spin the Iraq debate and suffered at the hands of this week's headlines. GOP Senators were scrambling Monday night into Tuesday to troubleshoot their message, which many feared had become mired in procedural detail and esoteric arguments over fairness." Sen. John Cornyn, the GOP Conference vice chairman, "said despite a day of bad press, Republicans are not going 'to get excited about headlines and a handful of papers that got it wrong.' … '[Democrats] may enjoy today's headlines and a handful of papers that got it wrong, but they're not going to be able to enjoy that forever,' Cornyn said."

The Washington Times (2/7, Hurt, 88K) reports Republican leader Sen. Mitch McConnell "has said he won't allow a vote on the resolution of no confidence unless a similar vote is allowed on two other resolutions." One, authored by Sen. McCain, "would endorse the 'surge' plan but set benchmarks for Iraqi self-governance." Another GOP-backed resolution, sponsored by Sen. Judd Gregg, "would promise not to cut funding for the war." Late yesterday, McConnell "offered to allow the resolution to go forward in exchange for a vote on the 'no funding cutoff' resolution only." Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid "declined." Likewise, USA Today (2/7, Kiely, 2.27M) notes Reid "declared 'negotiations are over.'"

WSJV-TV South Bend (2/6, 10:22 pm) reported Republicans "say they couldn't get amendments considered on their own terms." The newscast showed Sen. Cornyn saying, "We want a debate, but we want it to be a fair debate." A number of other local broadcasts in various parts of the country showed this same quote. Among the stations featuring the Cornyn quote: WFXW-TV Terre Haute (2/6, 10:06 pm), KSFX-TV Springfield, MO (2/6, 9:37 pm), KXRM-TV Colorado Springs (2/6, 9:30 pm), WLUK-TV Green Bay (2/6, 5:36 pm), WBRC-TV Birmingham (2/6, 5:31 pm), and KENS-TV San Antonio (2/6, 5:12 pm).

Chris Matthews, on MSNBC's Hardball (2/6) reported, "The long awaited showdown in the Senate over the war in Iraq was shut down yesterday when almost every Republican voted to stop the Senate from considering a bipartisan resolution opposing the president's plan to escalate the war. Is this political gamesmanship for 2008? Public pressure on Congress to take action on the war couldn't be higher. But where was the courage of senators` convictions?"

The CBS Evening News (2/6, story 4, :20, Couric, 7.66M) noted "the Senate plans to be the first to debate the new strategy fell apart last night." And Fox News' Special Report (2/6, Hume) reported, "Republicans offered Democrats a deal to get the debate on the Iraq war restarted, but Democrats turned it down which left both parties claiming that the other did not want a real debate. … Senate Democrats label the GOP move a distraction from the debate they find more politically advantageous." Fox added, "Democrats appeared content with another story line -- Republicans blocking debate on the new Iraq plan."

In a front-page analysis piece, the New York Times (2/7, Hulse, 1.16M) reports, "Given the influence that voter frustration with Iraq had on the November elections, the national unease with the mounting human and financial costs, and the raw passion on all sides, even some lawmakers say they are astounded that the buildup to the Senate fight over Mr. Bush's proposed troop increase has produced such a letdown." The Times adds, "The fact that that Democrats could pull together only 49 of the 60 votes needed to break a procedural impasse on the resolution opposing Mr. Bush's plan was a product of many competing agendas. There was the Democratic desire to avoid getting tied up on any vote that could be perceived as undercutting United States troops or endorsing Mr. Bush's plan. At the same time, a surprising number of Republicans showed they were not yet ready to abandon the president even though many blame him for their November election losses and worry he will hurt them again next year."

The Wall Street Journal (2/7, A6, Rogers, 2.04M) reports, "Anticipating fights over Iraq spending next month, Senate Republicans are pressing for an early vote now to get members on record against withholding funds for the war." The strategy, "which has the quiet backing of the White House, has evolved over a nonbinding resolution sponsored by…Gregg." Gregg "said the administration had no part in drafting his resolution but acknowledged it has 'taken on a life of its own' and he wasn't surprised the White House saw it as useful in protecting…Bush's $93.4 billion emergency supplemental for the war, which could become a target for the many congressional critics of his Iraq policies."

DOJ_NMG_0128591

GOP Sen. Kit Bond, on MSNBC's Hardball (2/6), contended that Republicans "have tried to debate the issue, and we believe that, to be fair, as the Senate always does, that we ought not to be shut out from offering our resolutions, either the Lieberman-McCain or the Gregg amendment. But right now, they intend to shut us out. We want to debate it. … They think that setting it up this way, they can gain political advantage. …. It's a P.R. stunt. This is not changing policy. This is Democrats trying to get enough votes to question the military implementation of a strategy."

Democratic Sen. Ken Salazar, also on MSNBC's Hardball (2/6), said, "The fact of the matter is that we should have a vote on whether or not there is a support for the president's plan to escalate the war by sending in 21,500 additional troops. Senator Reid has been eminently fair with the Republican Party by allowing two Republican resolutions to go forward, the McCain resolution as well as the Warner resolution. And so at the end of the day, this is simply whether or not the Republican majority wants to block a vote on the most basic question facing America."

MoveOn To Start Running Ads Against Republicans Who Backed Filibuster. The Politico (2/7) reports, "MoveOn.org will begin airing attack ads as early as Wednesday against eight Republican senators who blocked debate on the Bush administration's plan for a troop surge in Iraq. The liberal organization has already scripted and is now producing the ads to run on CNN. As of Tuesday afternoon, airtime also had been purchased on local television stations in Kansas, New Hampshire, Oregon and Virginia." The ads "specifically target those states' senators: Sam Brownback, John Sununu, Gordon Smith, and John Warner, respectively. Sununu, Smith and Warner face re-election in 2008; Brownback, a presidential candidate, is up again in 2010." The ads also "take aim at Sens. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, John Voinovich of Ohio, Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina and Mitch McConnell of Kentucky. Dole and McConnell both face 2008 challenges."

NYTimes Blames Democrats For Senate Impasse. The New York Times (2/7, 1.16M) editorializes, "It is not an inspiring sight to watch the United States Senate turn the most important issue facing America into a political football, and then fumble it. Yet that is what now seems to have come from a once-promising bipartisan effort to finally have the debate about the Iraq war that Americans have been denied for four years." The Democrats' "ultimate goal was to express the Senate's opposition to President Bush's latest escalation. But the Democrats' leaders have made that more difficult — allowing the Republicans to maneuver them into the embarrassing position of blocking a vote on a counterproposal that they feared too many Democrats might vote for. We oppose that resolution, which is essentially a promise never to cut off funds for this or any future military operation Mr. Bush might undertake in Iraq." But "the right way for the Senate to debate Iraq is to debate Iraq, not to bar proposals from the floor because they might be passed. The majority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, needs to call a timeout and regroup. By changing the issue from Iraq to partisan parliamentary tactics, his leadership team threatens to muddy the message of any anti-escalation resolution the Senate may eventually pass."

Reid May Use Anti-Terror Bill As Vehicle For New Surge Resolution. The Hill (2/7, Schor) reports that as Senate Democrats "seek votes on capping troop numbers and funding for Iraq, they may use the pending bill on the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission as a vehicle. That would set up a replay of the debate over funding for troops that this week derailed their leadership-backed non-binding resolution on…Bush's 'surge' proposal." Reid "has vowed to put Republicans on record on the 'surge' plan, which has opened GOP fissures."

Warner, Nelson And Collins Say They Remain In Agreement On Resolution. The Hill (2/7, Marre) reports, "The three senators who crafted the key resolution rejecting President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq said yesterday they are united despite having gone separate ways on a procedural vote Monday evening." Sens. John Warner, Ben Nelson and Susan Collins "all said they were still united, even though Warner in effect supported a filibuster of the resolution they crafted together. Collins was one of two Republicans who voted with the Democrats on the issue."

More Commentary On Iraq Debate. Thomas Friedman writes in today's New York Times (2/7, 1.16M), "Listening, from Moscow, to the debate in Congress about Iraq is troubling: it sounds as if the American people are being offered two routes to a dead end: either follow…Bush and have troops surging into a roiling civil war, or go with one of the Congressional resolutions and denounce the surge, but without any alternative strategy for securing US interests. I believe there is an alternative strategy, but it will take two concrete numbers to implement: a date -- Dec. 1 -- and a price -- $3.50 cents a gallon." Friedman adds, "We have to impose a tax that creates a floor price of $3.50 a gallon for gasoline -- forever. This is also about leverage. It says to all the parties: we are going to conserve enough gasoline and spur enough clean alternatives to fossil fuels that no matter what you all do in the Middle East, we will not depend on you for energy."

DOJ_NMG_0128592

In the Washington Post (2/7, A17, 690K), David Ignatius says "the debate on Iraq is still animated by wishful thinking. The White House talks as if a surge of 20,000 troops is going to stop a civil war. Democrats argue that when America withdraws its troops, Iraqis will finally take responsibility for their own security. But we all need to face the likelihood that this story isn't going to have a happy ending." Ignatius goes on to predict a "catastrophe" in Iraq.

House To Take Up Anti-Surge Resolution Next Week. USA Today (2/7, Kiely, 2.27M) reports, "The intense political maneuvering over how to signal congressional opposition to President Bush's war policy moved Tuesday to the House of Representatives, where Democratic leaders scheduled three days of debate for next week." The House's action "will guarantee that the president's Iraq policy will remain at the top of the national agenda next week, even if procedural disputes prevent the Senate from voting on its own resolution."

Roll Call (2/7, Davis, Yachnin) reports the language of the House measure "is being crafted by House Foreign Affairs Chairman Tom Lantos (D-Calif.) and Armed Services Chairman Ike Skelton (D-Mo.)." The House Democratic Caucus "is scheduled to hold a closed-door meeting Thursday to build consensus for the resolution vote next week and to assuage some Members' concerns that the resolution does not go far enough."

The Washington Post (2/7, A11, Murray, Kane, 690K) reports, "House Democrats had intended to work with the resolution offered by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), which Senate Democrats have rallied behind. Instead, after assessing the morass on the other side of the Capitol, they are now considering a more narrow statement of objection to Bush's proposal." The Washington Post (2/7, A1, Baker, 690K) also reports Bush strategists "have been surprised by how quickly the politics of the war have shifted in the past few weeks, and they have been grappling for a strategy to contain the political damage. The White House privately believes that a statement of opposition by Congress may be inevitable." Some advisers "have been surprised that Bush has not more aggressively accused Democrats of advocating retreat."

The AP (2/7, Espo) reports Pelosi and Majority Leader Steny Hoyer yesterday "reassured lawmakers clamoring for more robust action that the vote would merely be the first attempt to pressure the president to shift course and that future legislation will be binding." Democrats "intend to allow all lawmakers time to speak on the issue across three days of debate beginning next Tuesday." Rep. John Boehner, the House Republican leader, "said in an interview the GOP would prepare an alternative to the Democratic measure. He said it would include a call for a bipartisan committee to oversee the war effort and lay out a series of standards by which officials could judge whether the Iraqi government was living up to its commitments to help end the violence." Said Boehner, "If you're not for victory in Iraq, you're for failure. … The consequences of failure are immense. I think it destabilizes the entire Middle East, encourages Iran and on top of that, it's pretty clear that the terrorists will just follow us home."

Local TV extensively covered the congressional debate, with most stations focusing on House plans to address the subject next week. Some examples: CLTV-TV Chicago (2/6, 11:39 pm) said in its broadcast that while the Senate debate "is stalled, the House is ready to launch its resolution opposing the President's war plan. The debate will start next week." KWTV-TV Oklahoma City (2/6, 10:00 pm) led off its 10 o'clock newscast by saying, "Democratic Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi says the nonbinding resolution opposes the buildup. Republican House members say they won't block the vote but want an alternative considered."

Gates Says Troop "Surge" Not Final Chance For Iraq Success. The Los Angeles Times (2/7, Neuman, 850K) reports Defense Secretary Robert Gates, "in testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee today, rejected the widely held view in Washington that the Bush administration's decision to send additional troops to Iraq is the last chance to succeed in that troubled country." Gate said, "I would be irresponsible if I weren't thinking about what the alternatives might be." The Times added that as Gates "defended the administration's fiscal 2008 budget request of $481.4 billion -- along with a projected $141.7 billion in supplemental funding in 2008 for Iraq and Afghanistan -- senators expressed doubt about the war." Pressed by lawmakers "on equipment shortages for troops in the field, Gates said that a dearth of armored vehicles in one phase of operations will be remedied by July."

DOJ_NMG_0128593

ABC and CBS also reported on Gates' testimony, with both noting that the Secretary said reductions in troop levels were possible if President Bush's plan works. ABC World News (2/6, story 3, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported Secretary Gates "told Senators today that the US might be able to begin withdrawing troops from Iraq later this year if the President's troop buildup reduces the violence in Baghdad. But Gates said the US would have to maintain a military presence in Iraq for years to come."

The CBS Evening News (2/6, story 6, :15, Couric, 7.66M) reported Gates "insisted today that the troop buildup in Iraq is not the last chance to succeed there. And he said that US forces might be able to start leaving Iraq by the end of the year if those additional troops work."

Senate Armed Services Committee Approves Fallon And Casey. Fox News' Special Report (2/6, Hume) reported, "The Senate Armed Services Committee today approved the nominations of Admiral William Fallon as head of US Central Command and Army General George Casey as Army Chief of Staff, bringing to three the number of top officers who say that the troop surge in Iraq can work that have been approved by Democratically controlled oversight committees studying Iraq policy."

Republicans Enlisted Petraeus To Stall Criticism Of Iraq Surge. The Washington Post (2/7, A1, Baker, 690K) reports in a front page story that before Gen. David Petraeus left for Iraq, he "conducted one last counterinsurgency mission here on the home front -- this one on Capitol Hill." Senators were "approached on the floor and urged to meet with" Petraeus in Minority Leader Mitch McConnell's office. At a time "when the president and most of his top surrogates have lost credibility even among many Republicans in Congress, the administration has turned to the chiseled, widely respected Petraeus to win the day. His name has become the rallying cry for Bush and his allies as they argue that it would be wrong for lawmakers to confirm the four-star general unanimously one moment and then renounce his strategy the next." Sen. Lindsey Graham said, "He's the General Grant of the surge. He's our last best chance as a military commander to bring about a change on the ground." The Post adds Petraeus "maybe the last best chance for Bush allies to head off a resolution rejecting the troop increase or at least keep many Republicans from supporting it." Yet if "invoking Petraeus has been effective for Graham and others trying to rally Republicans, Democrats remain unpersuaded."

Senior Officers Want More Civilian Assistance In Iraq. The New York Times (2/7, Shanker, Cloud, 1.16M) reports, "Senior military officers, including members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, have told President Bush and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates that the new Iraq strategy could fail unless more civilian agencies step forward quickly to carry out plans for reconstruction and political development." The complaints "reflect fresh tensions between the Pentagon and the State Department over personnel demands that have fallen most heavily on the military. But they also draw on a deeper reservoir of concerns among officers who have warned that a military buildup alone cannot solve Iraq's problems, and who now fear that the military will bear a disproportionate burden if Mr. Bush's strategy falls short." In one example, officers "cited a request from the office of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice that military personnel temporarily fill more than one-third of 350 new State Department jobs in Iraq that are to be created under the new strategy." In his Senate testimony, Secretary Gates "made clear that he shared the officers' concerns, telling senators, 'If you were troubled by the memo, that was mild compared to my reaction when I saw it.'" Gates "also told senators that Mr. Bush himself had addressed his cabinet at the White House on Monday about the need for civilian agencies to 'step up to the task.'" The Times notes, "Tasia Scolinos, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, said in a statement that the agency 'has devoted substantial resources' to training the Iraqi police and creating a justice system. She provided a fact sheet that showed that the Justice Department had 200 employees and contractors in Iraq as of last August. … 'We are committed to working closely with the Defense Department and our law enforcement counterparts in Iraq to assess how we can best continue to support the reconstruction efforts in Iraq,' she said."

French Prime Minister Calls Troop Surge "Absurd." In an interview with the Financial Times (2/7, Arnold, Thornhill), French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin warned that "violence in Iraq will continue to worsen until all foreign troops are pulled out," dismissing as "absurd" the idea that an enlarged US force could bring stability and peace to the country. He also "indirectly criticised the decision by US President George W. Bush to boost his country's military presence in Iraq." De Villepin said an occupying force was the "founding stone of the crisis" and a clear timetable had to be set for its withdrawal. He told the Times, ""The idea of saying that foreign troops will leave when Iraq is democratic and pacific is absurd. … We need a clear horizon for the departure of foreign troops and the return of full sovereignty to Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0128594

Term "Granularity" Gains Popularity In Descriptions Of Iraq Policy. The Washington Post (2/7, C1, Weeks, 690K) reports "granularity" is a "mouthful of a term used by guys like Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the top U.S. commander in Iraq; retired Gen. Barry McCaffrey; and White House press secretary Tony Snow." Responding "recently to a question about potential sectarian violence in Iraq if U.S. forces withdraw, Petraeus told the Senate Armed Services Committee, 'It's hard from this distance . . . to get a real feel, or the real granularity of what's going on.'" Lately, "people have been invoking the word to mean specificity. Certain things, such as the administration's vision for the future of Iraq, lack granularity." In other words, "'granularity' is a popular word for the 'nitty-gritty.' But it's not so nitty, not quite as gritty. It's about texture. Concreteness. The word has migrated from science to business and now to politics and popular parlance."

House Panel Questions Bremer Over Use Of Iraq Reconstruction Funds. The New York Times (2/7, A8, Shenon, 1.16M) reports a House committee report Tuesday "questioned whether some of the billions of dollars in cash shipped to Iraq after the American invasion -- mostly in huge, shrink-wrapped stacks of $100 bills -- might have ended up with the insurgent groups now battling American troops." Democrats "sharply questioned" former administrator in Iraq, Paul Bremer, "about lax management of the nearly $12 billion in cash shipped to Iraq between May 2003 and June 2004." Bremer "defended his performance…noting that the United States had to bring tons of American dollars into Iraq because the country had no functioning banking system."

The CBS Evening News (2/6, story 7, 2:05, Couric, 7.66M) called Bremer "a punching bag for Democrats demanding" answers to what ABC World News (2/6, story 2, 2:05, Gibson, 8.78M) said is "one of the great mysteries in Iraq. … You might call it…the case of the missing $12 billion. That much money in cash, mountains of money, got shipped to Iraq just after the invasion. Congress is asking where it went."

But in a Washington Post column (2/7, A2) titled "Rusty Democrats Unable To Pin Anything On Bremer," Dana Milbank says Bremer "had lost none of his swagger" during what was seen as "the grudge match Democrats waited years for." But Bremer "proved unexpectedly agile at shifting blame: to administration planners ('The planning before the war was inadequate'), his superiors in the Bush administration ('We never had sufficient support'), and the Iraqi people ('The country was in chaos -- socially, politically and economically')." However, Democrats, "after 12 years in the minority, were out of practice." USA Today (2/7, 5A, Kelley, 2.27M) reports Bremer testified that "he and the Bush administration made mistakes, including inadequate planning. … 'I acknowledge I made mistakes,' Bremer said. 'But on the whole, I believe we made great progress under some of the most difficult conditions imaginable.'"

The Wall Street Journal (2/7, A3, Paltrow, 2.04M) reports under the headline "Unspent Iraqi Funds Undercut Bush's Push For More," the Bush administration "faces a new obstacle in its quest to get more funds for reconstruction in Iraq: questions about why the Iraqi government has so much unspent money on hand." One "source of frustration" for the White House and many members of Congress "has been the Iraqi government's difficulty spending money it has on hand from oil and gas revenue." Committee chairman Henry Waxman "faulted the State Department for not making available Timothy Carney, recently named to the newly created position of coordinator of Iraq reconstruction," who the department "said he had to depart earlier than expected for Iraq." The Financial Times (2/7, Kirchgaessner) says Waxman "also hinted that he might subpoena" Carney. The Washington Post (2/7, A11, Chandrasekaran, 690K) reports Waxman said yesterday the State Department "offered several reasons Carney would not be able to appear, the last of which was insurmountable: He left for Baghdad on Friday."

The AP (2/7, Margasak) reports Democrats "are planning dozens of investigations, many of them in Waxman's committee, which scheduled further hearings this week on homeland security contracts and drug prices." McClatchy (2/7, Schoof), Washington Times (2/7, Miller, 88K) and New York Times (2/7, Shenon, 1.16M) run similar reports.

US To Pay $5.8 Billion To Expand Iraqi Security Forces. The AP (2/7, Burns) reports, "The US government will pay $5.8 billion to help Iraq expand further its army and police force, which are deemed too small for its security needs, senior Pentagon officials said Tuesday." The expansion, "announced Monday as part of President Bush's 2008 budget plan, would increase the Iraqi security forces from 328,000, which was the goal set several years ago and reached last December, to 362,000." Tina Jonas, "the Pentagon budget chief, told a small group of reporters that Bush's 2008 budget proposal includes $3.8 billion for the expansion and that the other $2 billion is contained in his request for an additional $93.4 billion to cover overall war costs for the remainder of the current budget year, which ends Sept. 30."

DOJ_NMG_0128595

Iran Accuses US Of Role In Diplomat's Kidnapping. The CBS Evening News (2/6, story 5, 1:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Tensions are escalating between the US and Iran over the disappearance of an Iranian diplomat." CBS (Logan) added, "The US military…denied any involvement, and the Iraqi official spokesman said they were investigating whether" the diplomat, Jalal Sharafi, "was kidnapped or arrested." But CBS News reported that "unnamed Iraqi officials claimed commandos from" an "elite Iraqi unit, controlled by US forces, had taken the diplomat, but they offered no proof." Meanwhile, in an interview with ABC World News (2/6, story 5, 0:30, Gibson, 8.78M), "Iran's ambassador to Iraq said Iran is holding the US responsible for the diplomat's safety."

The Financial Times (2/7, Negus) warns the incident may "inflame the already tense relations between Washington and Tehran." Hasan Kazemi-Qomi, Tehran's ambassador to Baghdad, said on Iranian television the kidnappers had "used US vehicles" and that the abduction took place "within the framework of the US president's order to step up encounters with Iranians."

The Washington Post (2/7, A13, Partlow, Londono, 690K) adds, Iraqi officials declined to comment Tuesday on the Iranian allegations, "but Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari scheduled a news conference for Wednesday at which he was expected to address the issue."

The Los Angeles Times (2/7, Susman, 850K) says the "diplomatic snarling has put Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki in an awkward position as he tries to cultivate close relations with Iran while trying to convince American officials that he is serious about quelling violence."

Blair Warns Global Opinion Hardening Against Tehran. The AP (2/7, Wagner) reports Prime Minister Tony Blair "told lawmakers Tuesday that no military action is planned against Iran, but that international opinion is hardening against Tehran's nuclear ambitions and what he described as its interference in conflicts across the Middle East." Iran "is trying to prevent reconciliation across the region, and I think that is very shortsighted and very foolish," Blair told the House of Commons' Liaison Committee. While conceding that "you can't take any option off the table," Blair stressed that "nobody is talking or planning military intervention."

Merkel Says Talks With Iran Still Possible. AFP (2/7) reports German Chancellor Angela Merkel "said that the door remains open for negotiations between Iran and the international community" over its nuclear program. In a joint press conference with Kuwait's Prime Minister Sheikh Nasser Mohammad al-Ahmad al-Sabah, Merkel said, "Even if the United Nations has decided on sanctions, the door for negotiations remains open." For his part, Sabah also stressed the importance of negotiations, saying, "It is important now to have unconditional negotiations."

Israel Seeking To Increase Pressure On Iran To Abandon Nuclear Program. The Los Angeles Times (2/7, Bordeaux, 850K) reports, "The specter of a nuclear-armed Iran has rattled Israel's self-confidence. Its politicians and generals warn of a "second Holocaust" if, as in the 1930s, the world stands by while a heavily armed nation declares war against the Jews." In response, Israeli officials have begun "an unusually open campaign to muster international political and economic pressures against Iran," warning that "time is growing short and hint that they will resort to force if those pressures fail to prevent Iran's development of an atomic weapon."

Iranian Economy Deteriorating Under Western Isolation. USA Today (2/7, 8A, Slavin, 2.27M) reports Western pressure on Iran "is squeezing its economy, feeding the inflation and joblessness that have swelled under" President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Trade figures and other data "have begun to reflect deepening economic isolation taking place as a result of US-led efforts to penalize Tehran for what the United States alleges is the pursuit of nuclear weapons and sponsorship of terrorist groups." Stuart Levey, US Treasury undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence, told the newspaper, "People who want to pursue legitimate commerce with the West will see that the policies

DOJ_NMG_0128596

Ahmadinejad is pursuing are leading to isolation and painting a more bleak economic future for the country."

Iran Cracks Down On Women's Legal Campaign. Editorial board member Maura Casey writes in the New York Times (2/7, 1.16M) about Shirin Ebadi, the Iranian lawyer and 2003 Nobel Peace Prize winner "whose relentless campaign against discrimination has enraged the mullahs for more than 25 years." Ebadi's latest campaign "is to help collect the signatures of one million Iranian women on a petition protesting their lack of legal rights." Casey says the movement "is doing on a grand scale what Ms. Ebadi has done for her entire adult life," and the Iranian government "certainly understands the implications." Casey reports that "just a few weeks ago, it blocked access to the campaign's Web site. But within hours the women had another Web site up and running."

Maliki Acknowledges Iraqi Government Errors. The New York Times (2/7, Santora, 1.16M) reports Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki "acknowledged for the first time on Tuesday that his government had stumbled in its efforts to carry out a new security plan in Baghdad and that the delays and mounting violence were hurting its credibility with the Iraqi people." Speaking to senior military commanders in an address "that was broadcast live on Iraqi national television," Maliki said, "I feel that we are late. This delay is giving a negative impression and has led some people to say that we have already failed." The Times adds, "Pressure is increasing on the Maliki government to show signs of progress on the security plan that was announced more than a month ago, especially after three weeks of bloody violence that has killed 3,000 civilians." Maliki "made it clear to the commanders that they needed to show results soon. 'I call on you to quickly finish the preparations so that we don't disappoint people,' he said." The Times adds Maliki "offered no reasons for the delay, but Iraqi military officials have expressed frustration over the slow pace and have cited several problems, including the failure of Iraqi troops from other parts of the country to arrive on schedule in Baghdad, the capital."

US Probes Iraqi Lawmaker's Connection To 1983 Embassy Bombings. The New York Times (2/7, A8, Glanz, Santora, 1.16M) reports a sitting member of the Iraqi Parliament "was convicted more than two decades ago of planning the attacks on the American and French Embassies in Kuwait that left five Americans dead in 1983," Iraqi and American officials said Tuesday. The Parliament member, Jamal Jafaar Mohammed Ali Ebrahimi, was sentenced to death in absentia by a court in Kuwait for the 1983 attacks and was later elected to Parliament in 2005. Lou Fintor, spokesman for the American Embassy in Baghdad, said, "We are actively investigating these serious allegations and continue to be in contact with the government of Iraq to pursue this case." The Times says it was "unclear when American officials first raised the issue with" Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Kamal al-Maliki, "but one official said there have been discussions for at least several months."

Terror Casts Pall Over Baghdad Markets, Vendors. The Washington Times (2/7, Palmer, 88K) reports from a Baghdad market, "Such marketplaces have become favorite targets for sectarian attacks, including a horrific suicide truck bombing Saturday that killed at least 135 persons -- the deadliest single assault in the 46 months of the war. ... Yesterday, merchants at Abu Shujaa complained that the deteriorating security had hurt their sales, even as their costs continue to climb. ... The one sector that appears to be thriving in the market is the pharmaceutical industry. Akram Najy, 69, a pharmacist here for four decades, said prescriptions for sedatives remain steady, and demand for cold medications at this time of year is as high as ever. The shoppers, for their part, grumble that rising prices are forcing them to limit their purchases to essential items, and the constant threat of car bombs and mortars deters them from lingering in one place."

US To Reexamine Iraqi Refugee Policy. As reported elsewhere Tuesday, the Washington Times (2/7, A1, Kralev, 88K) notes on its front page the announcement this week by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice that the State Department has established a task force to "reexamine US policy on the admission of Iraqi refugees" that will "likely leading to a sharp increase in the number it admits each year." The task force also will "try to resettle in the United States some Iraqi employees of the US Embassy in Baghdad, whose lives are in danger because of their work for Americans."

Author Urges Creation Of Iraqi Refugee Fund. Behzad Yaghmaian, author of "Embracing the Infidel: Stories of Muslim Migrants on the Journey West," writes in a USA Today (2/7, 11A, 2.27M) op-ed, "The United States and its allies again have caused a refugee crisis in Iraq… But this time, CNN's cameras are missing." In order to solve the problem, Yaghmaian says it is "critical that Western nations finance a special Iraqi Refugee Fund that would let the U.N. process an increasing number of Iraqi applicants seeking resettlement." In addition, "A part of the fund could be given to Syria and Jordan to help them provide temporary housing, health care, education and other basic needs to refugees. Western nations should increase the number of Iraqis they accept for temporary or permanent resettlement." Helping to solve the current crisis, he writes, "is a moral obligation of those who contributed to its creation."

DOJ_NMG_0128597

Video Shows Friendly-Fire Incident Involving British Soldier. ABC World News (2/6, story 4, 2:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "A dramatic cockpit video from an American fighter jet surfaced today." The video, "obtained and released by a British newspaper, captures the moment when two US pilots came to a sickening realization that they had mistakenly killed a British soldier on the ground." ABC added, "On the tape, the pilots seem genuinely horrified. But there are not in jail. A US military investigation, with British participation, cleared them of any wrongdoing and called the incident a 'tragic and unfortunate accident.'"

The New York Times (2/7, Lyall, 1.16M) reports the recording of 2003's accidental US airstrike on British soldiers in Iraq "became public on Tuesday when the newspaper The Sun published a leaked transcript" of a cockpit conversation between two US pilots involved in the attack. The newspaper also posted video of the attack on its website. The Times adds that as a result of the publication, the "American military announced…it would permit the videotape to be shown to the British coroner's court investigating the circumstances surrounding the death of the soldier who had been killed in the incident, Lance Cpl. Matty Hull, a member of the Household Cavalry Regiment."

The Washington Post (2/7, A12, Jordan, 690K) reports the friendly-fire incident occurred on March 28, 2003, but the US government "had declined to declassify it" until yesterday. Recently, however, "a British coroner investigating the corporal's death demanded that the recording, a cockpit video, be presented as evidence, suspending his proceedings until it was produced." The Post adds, "British officials say the mistaken attack near Basra targeted a convoy of five reconnaissance tanks and wounded four soldiers in addition to killing Hull."

Trial Date Set For Abu Ghraib Accused. The Washington Times/AP (2/7, Dishneau) reports, "The only U.S. military officer charged with crimes in the Abu Ghraib prison-abuse scandal would stand trial in July, under a tentative schedule set at a hearing yesterday. Army Lt. Col. Steven L. Jordan, former director of an interrogation center at the prison in Iraq, would be tried from July 9 to July 20 at Fort Meade in Maryland, according to the schedule set by the judge, Army Col. Stephen R Henley. ... He is accused of failing to exert his authority as prisoners were stripped naked, photographed in humiliating poses and intimidated by military dogs. He also is accused of lying to investigators about abuses he is said to have witnessed."

"Coalition Forces" Capture Al Qaeda Suspects In Afghanistan. The AP (2/7) reports, "Coalition forces captured two suspected al-Qaida members during an early morning raid in eastern Afghanistan on Wednesday, a military statement said. Afghan officials said soldiers captured six men and killed one person during the raid. The raid near the town of Hakimabad in Nangarhar province was conducted based on information provided 'about an al-Qaida member known to pass correspondence for al-Qaida senior leaders,' the U.S.-led coalition said in a statement." The AP continues, "The military did not say who executed the raid, but U.S. Special Forces soldiers operate under the banner of 'coalition forces' in Afghanistan."

Taliban Still Controls Town It Overran. The AP (2/7, Abrashi) reports, "Taliban militants remain in control of a southern Afghan town nearly a week after capturing it, but NATO expects the Afghan government to soon reassert its authority there, an alliance spokesman said Wednesday." NATO spokesman Col. Tom Collins "said NATO troops stand ready to help the government again take control of the town but that there 'is no need to rush to action here.'"

Gates Says NATO Must Increase Contributions In Afghanistan. The AP (2/7, Baldor) reports Defense Secretary Robert Gates "said Tuesday that NATO allies must provide the troops and equipment needed to battle an expected increase in violence by Taliban insurgents in Afghanistan this spring." Gates, "who will meet with other NATO defense ministers Thursday in Seville, Spain, is expected to outline whether the U.S. plans to adjust its troop levels in Afghanistan or extend the deployment of any units already there, said a senior defense official." At a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing Tuesday, Gates "said the U.S. will hold the NATO countries to promises they offered during a summit in Riga, Latvia, last November, particularly for more trainers."

DOJ_NMG_0128598

House GOP Wants Better Coordination To Fight Afghan Insurgency, Drugs. The Los Angeles Times (2/7, Meyer, 850K) reports four ranking Republican lawmakers "on a committee with oversight of U.S. policy in Afghanistan are calling on the Pentagon and State Department to dramatically change their tactics in that country to better contain its growing insurgency and flow of opium to the rest of the world." In a letter "dated today, the GOP House members are urging the Bush administration to act quickly to counter a host of problems in Afghanistan that they say are being made worse by mismanagement and misplaced priorities. They are calling for the appointment of a special coordinator of overall narco-terrorism policy for Afghanistan to prevent losing the fight against insurgents and drug traffickers." The letter "describes in detail how various U.S. agencies such as the Pentagon, State Department and Drug Enforcement Administration are not working together and essentially are fighting separate wars against insurgents and drugs even though they believe that the booming heroin trade is fueling the insurgency and financing terrorist attacks."

Italian FM Protests US Ambassador's Letter. The Washington Times (2/7, Phillips, 88K) reports Italian Foreign Minister Massimo D'Alema yesterday "protested an open letter to a Rome newspaper from US Ambassador Ronald P. Spogli and five other envoys urging Italy to maintain its troop deployment in Afghanistan." D'Alema called the letter -- which was also signed by the ambassadors of Australia, Britain, Canada, the Netherlands and Romania -- an "irregular" departure from normal diplomatic procedures. D'Alema told reports, "There are more appropriate bodies in which to discuss Italy's commitment in Afghanistan rather than through open letters from ambassadors to daily newspapers." In Washington, the State Department said the letter was "a praiseworthy initiative" by the US envoy.

Marine Vehicle Remains Costly Failure. The Washington Post (2/7, Merle, 690K) reports in a highly critical front page article, "After 10 years and $1.7 billion, this is what the Marines Corps got for its investment in a new amphibious vehicle: A craft that breaks down about an average of once every 4 1/2 hours, leaks and sometimes veers off course. And for that, the contractor, General Dynamics of Falls Church, received $80 million in bonuses. ... The Expeditionary Fighting Vehicle is one of the Pentagon's largest weapons programs and exemplifies the agency's struggle to afford a cadre of new mega-systems that are larger and more complex, but also more trouble, than their predecessors."

NNSA Wants Funding To Plan, Produce Next Generation Nuclear Warhead. Under the headline, "Nuclear Officials Seek Approval For Warhead; Design Would Require No Live Testing," the Washington Post (2/7, A6, Pincus, 690K) reports that National Nuclear Security Administration officials "said yesterday that they hope to receive administration and congressional authorization by the end of 2008 for the development and production of a warhead that could be deployed on submarine-launched intercontinental ballistic missiles." The Post adds that the NNSA wants "$88 million in the fiscal 2008 Energy Department budget" to "complete detailed planning with the Navy based on a design produced in December by the nation's two nuclear weapons laboratories. The new funds would support design concept testing and could lead to production of the warhead for the Navy's D5 missile, 24 of which are carried on each US Trident submarine. A key aspect of the Reliable Replacement Warhead program is that the warhead could be certified to enter the US nuclear stockpile without testing, acting NNSA Administrator Thomas D'Agostino and other officials said during a session with reporters." The Post adds that the request comes "as the Bush administration is attempting to stop Iran and North Korea from developing nuclear weapons and trying to keep other countries, such as India and Pakistan, from expanding their stockpiles."

DOJ:

McNulty Denies Political Motives In US Attorney Dismissals. USA Today (2/7, Johnson) reports, "The Justice Department acknowledged Tuesday that it fired the U.S. government's chief prosecutor in Little Rock for no reason except to replace him with a lawyer who had been an aide to Karl Rove, the Bush administration's chief political strategist. … However, in an appearance before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty rejected criticism that the forced resignations of Bud Cummins and six other U.S. attorneys last year were politically inspired, or amounted to retaliation for the attorneys' involvement in controversial investigations and prosecutions." USA adds, "McNulty's testimony before the panel, which is investigating the firings of the prosecutors, was part of an exchange with Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y. Schumer said the White House's appointment process for prosecutors was 'corrupted with political, rather than prudent, considerations.' … 'What happened here doesn't sound like business as usual; it appears more reminiscent of a different sort of Saturday night massacre,' Schumer said, referring to Watergate-era firings at Justice that were ordered by President Nixon. … 'When I hear you talk about a politicization of the (Justice) Department, it is like a knife in my back,' McNulty responded."

DOJ_NMG_0128599

The New York Times (2/7, Johnston) reports, "One disputed case involves H. E. Cummins III, a United States attorney in Arkansas who was asked to step down last summer although his office had increased drug and firearms prosecutions and he had helped organize a multiagency counterterrorism council. … To temporarily replace Mr. Cummins, the Justice Department named J. Timothy Griffin, a former military and civilian prosecutor who was a political director for the Republican National Committee and who once worked as a deputy to Karl Rove, the senior White House political adviser." The Times continues, "At the hearing, Mr. McNulty was asked by Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, whether it was accurate to say that Mr. Cummins had not done anything wrong to justify his removal. Mr. McNulty replied, 'I do not dispute that characterization.' … Had Mr. Cummins ever received a poor performance evaluation, Mr. Schumer asked. … Mr. McNulty answered, 'I'm not aware of anything negative.' … Mr. McNulty said that because the attorneys are presidential appointees, they can be replaced at any time without a specific reason. He said about half of the 93 prosecutors appointed to their jobs by Mr. Bush in his first term had already left voluntarily. Mr. McNulty said the appointment of Mr. Griffin was a chance for 'a fresh start with a new person.'"

The Washington Post (2/7, A3, Eggen) reports, "In often contentious testimony…McNulty also disputed Democrats' allegations that the firings appeared to be aimed at rewarding Republican allies and at avoiding the Senate's role in confirming U.S. attorney appointments. … 'The attorney general's appointment authority has not and will not be used to circumvent the confirmation process,' McNulty said. 'All accusations in this regard are contrary to the clear factual record.'" The Post adds, "McNulty's remarks did little to calm the growing political storm over the recent U.S. attorney firings. Top Democrats have condemned the firings, which have led to proposed legislation that would limit the attorney general's powers to appoint interim prosecutors. … McNulty acknowledged that six U.S. attorneys in the West and Southwest were notified in December that they would be asked to step aside, including the lead prosecutor in San Diego, whose office oversaw the bribery conviction of a former Republican congressman. … A seventh former U.S. attorney, Ed Cummins of Little Rock, has said that he was asked to leave last year to open the job for J. Timothy Griffin, who previously worked for Rove and for the Republican National Committee. McNulty did not dispute that characterization yesterday."

The AP (2/7, Kellman) reports, "McNulty reminded the panel that federal prosecutors serve at the pleasure of the president. And he repeated Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' promise to submit the name of every replacement to the Senate for confirmation. … McNulty spoke after weeks of Democrats' accusations that the forced resignations of prosecutors in Arkansas and California in particular were moves to reward Republican allies."

The Los Angeles Times (2/7, Schreck) reports, "McNulty also expressed strong opposition to a plan by Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) to strip the Justice Department of authority it received last year to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for indefinite periods without Senate confirmation. … That power, added to the USA Patriot Act when it was reauthorized in March, has worried some lawmakers. At issue is the amount of oversight that Congress — now in the hands of Democrats — has over the appointment of federal prosecutors." The Times notes, "Some legal experts have said that the moves, while legal, are unorthodox and could have harmful repercussions. … 'There's at least a strong perception by those in and outside of the United States attorney's office that this is not business as usual,' said Loyola Law School professor Laurie Levenson during her testimony Tuesday."

McClatchy Newspapers (2/7, Taylor) reports that McNulty "denied that politics played any role in the firings of other U.S. attorneys, including Carol Lam, who was asked to step down in San Diego. In 2005, Lam's office won a bribery conviction against then-Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, R-Calif. That investigation is continuing. … McNulty said his department had been 'proud' of the Cunningham prosecution, but he declined to elaborate on Lam's or any other U.S. attorney's firing during the hearing. He agreed instead to brief senators privately on the matter." McClatchy notes, "Last month, McClatchy Newspapers analyzed many of those interim appointments and found that Gonzales had been appointing conservative loyalists from the Bush administration's inner circle to fill the vacancies. … The new U.S. attorneys all have impressive legal credentials, but most of them have few ties to the communities they've been appointed to serve, and some have little experience as prosecutors."

DOJ_NMG_0128600

The Chicago Tribune (2/7, Demirjian) reports, "A year ago, Carol Lam, the U.S. attorney in San Diego, was fielding accolades for her successful prosecution of Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, the California congressman who pleaded guilty to tax evasion and corruption and was sent to prison for more than eight years. … Now, however, she is one of seven federal prosecutors that the Bush administration has removed from office in recent weeks, most for unspecified reasons, as was the case with Lam. The dismissals are unusual and that has prompted several Democratic senators to accuse the White House of taking undue aim at U.S. prosecutors, either to make way for up-and-coming Republicans or even to punish those who aggressively prosecuted friends of the administration." The Tribune continues, "McNulty defended the firings Tuesday at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing, saying, 'U.S. attorneys serve at the pleasure of the President -- they come and go for lots of reasons…. We don't really believe we are obligated to set forth a reason or cause.'" The Tribune notes, "McNulty told the committee that the administration is still consulting senators to identify the best candidates in their respective states and fully intends to send the prosecutors' replacements to the Senate for confirmation. But suspicious Judiciary Committee members said they plan to vote Thursday to rescind the Patriot Act provision that allows the administration to appoint interim U.S. attorneys indefinitely without Senate confirmation."

The San Diego Union-Tribune/Copley News Service (2/7, Cantlupe) reports, "Several members of Congress sent letters complaining about the job performance of U.S. Attorney Carol Lam, who announced her resignation last month. Her final day is Feb. 15, after 4½ years as the top federal prosecutor in the San Diego district. … McNulty repeatedly declined to spell out what Lam's performance shortcomings were, other than to note the complaints. … 'What about Carol Lam? Why was she terminated?' committee member Rep. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., asked McNulty. … 'I respectfully decline to go into specific reasons,' McNulty said. … 'I think the committee needs to know why she was terminated,' Specter responded. … But all McNulty would say is that 'the phone calls made in December were performance-related.' He was referring to calls made to Lam and five other prosecutors demanding their resignations. A seventh U.S. attorney, based in Arkansas, was dismissed earlier last year to make way for a former aide to White House adviser Karl Rove, McNulty said."

The Financial Times (2/7, Masters) reports, "Mr McNulty said Ms Lam's departure was unrelated to the bribery case but he said she was among the group removed for performance-related reasons. … 'In this administration, US attorneys are never, repeat, never, removed in an effort to retaliate against them,' Mr McNulty testified. He also said Timothy Griffin, Mr Cummins' replacement in Arkansas, was well qualified for his new position."

Roll Call (2/7, Van Dongen) reports, "Turning up the heat on the Bush administration on an increasingly touchy issue, Republican and Democratic members of the Senate Judiciary Committee grilled… McNulty… over why and how as many as seven U.S. attorneys around the country were dismissed from their posts since June." Roll Call continues, "Schumer repeatedly pressed McNulty, a former chief Hill counsel during former President Bill Clinton's impeachment proceedings and ex-House ethics committee lawyer, to provide documentation, such as written evaluations of each U.S. attorney's job performance, that would substantiate why the attorneys were fired. If that information is not provided quickly, the Democrat threatened to subpoena that information from Justice. 'For six years, there has been little or no oversight of the Department of Justice. Those days are over,' Schumer vowed." Roll Call notes, "In a strong opening statement putting Justice on the defensive, Schumer's comments were echoed by the panel's ranking member, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), a former Pennsylvania assistant attorney general. … 'If a U.S. attorney general was fired in retaliation for what was done on the prosecution of former Congressman Cunningham, that's wrong,' Specter stated. 'And that's wrong even though the president has the power to terminate U.S. attorneys. U.S. attorneys can't function if they're going to be afraid of the consequences of a vigorous prosecution.'" Roll Call adds, "McNulty strenuously denied any political motivation for the dismissal of the prosecutors, explaining that it was part of normal staff turnover. … McNulty, however, did not dispute Schumer's assertion that (Cummins) was dismissed without any specific cause. Democrats allege that Cummins was asked to step aside in order to install Tim Griffin, a former aide to White House adviser Karl Rove."

The Memphis Commercial Appeal (2/7, Sullivan) reports, "Sen. Mark Pryor, D-Ark., told the committee that 49 days after (Cummins) 'was ousted without cause,' and replaced by interim U.S. Attorney J. Timothy Griffin, he still doesn't know the grounds for the removal. Griffin, a protégé of presidential advisor Karl Rove and a former Republican Party opposition researcher, has not been nominated by the president and has therefore not been subject to the Senate's advise and consent oversight. … 'The failure to acknowledge that Bud Cummins was told to leave for a purely political reason is a great disservice to someone who was loyal to the Administration and who performed his work admirably,' Pryor testified." The Appeal notes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has said that Cummins and six other U.S. attorneys…were not removed for political reasons. … 'I think I would never, ever, make a change in a United States Attorney position for political reasons or if it would in any way jeopardize an ongoing, serious investigation,' Gonzales said last month."

The Northwest Arkansas Morning News (2/7, Sadler) reports that McNulty told the committee "that Cummins was informed in a June phone call that he was being asked to resign without cause. At that point, Griffin had already been identified as an interim successor, he said. … Sen. Mark Pryor, D-Ark., said the Justice Department changed its story regarding Cummins' departure. … 'First they said that initially Bud Cummins decided to leave on his own,' Pryor said. 'It's taken many weeks to get here, but today the Justice Department admitted he was told to leave.'" The News adds, "Cummins said in a telephone interview Tuesday that he appreciated Pryor's defense of his service, but that he remained a Bush loyalist who had considered leaving his post regardless. … 'In my case, it's fair to say it was handled poorly, because they could just have easily called me and said "You haven't done anything wrong. You're a champ. You've been a great performer for the president, and we'd like you to cooperate with us and give this other guy a job for two years,"' Cummins said."

Lam Departure Reminds Some Of 1982 DOJ Scandal. U.S. News and World Report (2/7, Ragavan) reports, "To some veteran former Justice Department officials, the departure of Lam before the Cunningham probe is completed harks back to a similar case involving a CIA asset more than 25 years ago, in which the U.S. attorney was fired because of pressure from the agency. In 1982, the feds arrested the former chief of the Federal Security Directorate (Mexico's secret police), Miguel Nazar Haro, after he was indicted by a federal grand jury in San Diego for his involvement in an $8 million car-theft ring that had smuggled about 600 stolen American luxury cars and vans from Southern California to Mexico. … The U.S. attorney in San Diego, William Kennedy, had uncovered the car-theft ring and pushed the Justice Department to indict Haro. Kennedy charged that the CIA was blocking the indictment because Haro was a CIA asset in Mexico City and that the Justice Department was dragging its feet. Kennedy was reprimanded in no uncertain terms–President Ronald Reagan fired the prosecutor, a former Justice official says, after the CIA brought pressure to bear. But Haro–who was forced to resign as the secret police chief because of the car-smuggling allegations– was subsequently indicted and arrested. He posted $200,000 bail and fled, becoming a fugitive. And so he remained, until he was again arrested in February 2004, this time on charges that he had kidnapped a leftist leader nearly three decades earlier during Mexico's 'dirty war,' against the left. … After Kennedy was fired, Justice sources say, CIA officials used it as a 'warning' to other Justice officials not to challenge the agency. Kennedy later became a superior court judge in San Diego."

More Commentary. The New York Times (2/7) editorializes, "United States attorneys, the federal prosecutors who work in the states, are supposed to be respected, independent members of the bar. They have extraordinary power: they can file criminal charges and conduct investigations that can destroy reputations. They are supposed to be confirmed by the Senate, and there is a long tradition that they are not removed during the term of the president who appointed them, except for serious cause. .. At a Judiciary Committee hearing yesterday on the dismissals, the deputy attorney general who represented the Bush administration failed to explain convincingly why the United States attorneys had been removed, or to dispel the suspicion that politics was the driving force. Mr. Schumer says he may subpoena the dismissed federal attorneys' performance evaluations if he doesn't get a better explanation. The Senate should keep pushing for answers — and for nonpartisan prosecutors to be placed and kept in these important positions."

DOJ_NMG_0128602

In an op-ed for the Baltimore Sun (2/7), George W. Liebmann, a Baltimore lawyer, executive director of the Calvert Institute for Policy Research, and the author of 'The Common Law Tradition: A Collective Portrait of Five Legal Scholars.', writes, "The news that the Bush administration has replaced seven U.S. attorneys, none charged with or guilty of wrongdoing, with people fairly describable as Washington apparatchiks should give pause to all those concerned with America's working Constitution. … The office of U.S. attorney is far more powerful than it was at the time of the ratification of the Constitution. Its functions are no longer limited to federal specialties such as customs and revenue offenses, but extend to virtually the entire range of criminal offenses. Stringent federal sentencing guidelines have rendered federal prosecutions the prosecutions of first resort, even for certain street crimes. During the tenures of Attorneys General Janet Reno, John Ashcroft and Alberto R. Gonzales, the number of federal prosecutors has greatly increased." Liebmann adds, "As the sweep of federal criminal jurisdiction widens, it is imperative that Congress thoroughly review the provisions for appointment and removal of all important federal law enforcement officials - not merely U.S. attorneys. The dispersion of police and prosecutorial power is the bedrock of American civil liberty. In all but two or three states, prosecutors are elected for short terms. … We do not want prosecutors to be laws unto themselves, and we do not want an elective dictatorship. Geographic dispersion of prosecutorial power, of which Congress has lately grown careless with its expansions of federal jurisdiction, has historically been the American answer to this problem. The growth of the central office of the Justice Department renders it imperative that old controls be reinstated and new ones devised."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Lengthy AOL Trial Ends With Acquittals Of Three. The Washington Post (2/7, D1, Johnson) reports, "An Alexandria jury acquitted two former AOL executives on all the conspiracy and fraud charges against them yesterday, dealing a blow to prosecutors and marking a decisive end to one of the longest trials in the federal courthouse." The Post continues, "Jurors spent slightly more than three full days in deliberation before clearing Kent D. Wakeford and John P. Tuli of charges that they helped a Las Vegas software client post fictitious revenue in early 2001. As the court clerk read the verdict, Tuli wept while his mother and his wife gasped with delight. Wakeford trembled, clapped his hands twice and hugged his lawyers. … The six-man, six-woman jury also acquitted Christopher J. Benyo, a former vice president at the Las Vegas company, PurchasePro.com. Defense lawyer Terrance Reed last week appealed to the jury to 'set yourselves and Mr. Benyo free' from a case that stretched into a fourth month, a rarity in a courthouse known for dispensing speedy justice. … 'You're free to go, gentlemen,' U.S. District Judge Walter D. Kelley Jr. told the jubilant defendants. Wakeford and Tuli clasped in a tearful embrace as prosecutors filed out of the eighth-floor courtroom without a word to spectators or opponents." The Post notes, "The case marks the second defeat for the government in its five-year-old investigation into accounting misdeeds at PurchasePro and AOL in the early days of the Internet bust. The same judge acquitted a former top lawyer for PurchasePro in December 2005 after a two-week trial. Once the focus of intense government scrutiny, high-ranking AOL sales and marketing officials ultimately avoided criminal charges, an issue that defense lawyers for their subordinates seized on as scapegoating during the trial. … Chuck Rosenberg, the U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia who joined the office last year, issued a statement praising the government team and concluding: 'Sometimes, jurors see things in a different way. We respect their decision.'" The AP (2/7, Barakat) also reports on the verdict.

Oil Drilling Firms To Pay $26 Million In Nigeria Bribery Case. The AP (2/7, Lozano) reports, "Three oil drilling companies - subsidiaries of a British firm - have agreed to pay a $26 million fine for bribing Nigerian officials in order to get preferential customs treatment, Justice Department officials announced Tuesday." The AP continues, "The fine by the companies, subsidiaries of London-based Vetco International Ltd., is the largest criminal settlement of foreign corruption charges, said Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty. … 'This case ... confirms our commitment to root out corruption,' McNulty said. 'The Department of Justice will continue its efforts to assure a level playing field for businesses operating abroad.'" The AP adds, "During a closed hearing in a Houston federal court Tuesday, the companies - Vetco Gray UK Ltd., Vetco Gray Controls Inc., and Vetco Gray Controls Ltd. - pleaded guilty to violating the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. … Vetco Gray Controls Inc. agreed to pay a $6 million fine; Vetco Gray Controls Ltd., $8 million; and Vetco Gray UK Ltd., $12 million. … A fourth subsidiary, Aibel Group Ltd., agreed to accept responsibility for similar conduct by its employees."

DOJ_NMG_0128603

The Houston Chronicle (2/7, Fowler) reports, "This is the second time in three years a Vetco-related firm has paid fines for bribery. In July 2004 Vetco Gray of Houston and Vetco Gray of Aberdeen, Scotland, each agreed to pay fines of $5.25 million. At the time the companies were owned by ABB of Switzerland. … Last month General Electric Co. said it would pay $1.9 billion to acquire Vetco Gray." The Chronicle adds, "At a closed hearing this morning before U.S. District Judge Lynn Hughes in Houston, the companies pleaded guilty to violations of the anti-bribery provisions of the FCPA, as well as conspiracy to violate the federal law. … Aibel Group Ltd., another wholly owned subsidiary of Vetco International, also entered into a deferred prosecution agreement with the Justice Department . … According to the government from September 2002 through April 2005 each of the companies used an international freight forwarding and customs clearing company to make at least 378 payments totaling approximately $2.1 million to Nigerian Customs Service officials. The payments were aimed at getting customers officials to give Vetco preferential treatment."

US Subpoenas Allied Capital Records In Pretexting Probe. The New York Times (2/7, Creswell) reports, "Federal prosecutors have subpoenaed records of Allied Capital, a business development company that provides financing to smaller firms, in an effort to discover how private investigators it hired may have obtained the phone records of one of its leading critics." The Times continues, "Allied, which had previously denied any involvement, said yesterday in a statement that it has since become aware that an agent of the company obtained the telephone records of David Einhorn, a hedge fund manager, as well as records of calls from his fund, Greenlight Capital, during 2005." The Times adds, "Allied, which is based in Washington, said that it had received a subpoena from the United States attorney in Washington in December. … The statement added that Allied's management had not authorized the obtaining of the telephone records and that the company was cooperating with prosecutors." The Times notes, "In November, The New York Times reported accusations by Mr. Einhorn and other Allied critics that they had been the victims of pretexting — improperly impersonating an individual to obtain confidential information. … California's attorney general has filed criminal charges against one of Hewlett-Packard's former senior lawyers as well as its former chairwoman, Patricia C. Dunn, and two private detectives. All have pleaded not guilty."

The Washington Post (2/7, D1, Nakashima, Cho) reports, "Until yesterday's disclosures, the firm and its board had denied allegations by Einhorn and other Allied critics that the firm had engaged in a practice known as pretexting, which involves posing as a person or family member of that person to trick a phone company into giving out phone records. … 'In the course of gathering documents responsive to the subpoena, Allied Capital has become aware that an agent of the company obtained what were represented to be telephone records of David Einhorn and which purport to be records of calls from Greenlight Capital during a period of time in 2005,' the firm said." The Post adds, "Allied also said that while gathering the documents for investigators, 'allegations were made' that management had authorized the acquisition of its critics' phone records and that it had been 'subsequently advised that these records had been obtained.' … 'The management of Allied Capital states that these allegations are not true,' the statement said. 'Allied Capital is cooperating fully with the inquiry by the United States attorney's office and will have no further comment concerning this matter until that inquiry has been conducted.' The company said its board had established a committee to review the matter."

Survey Finds Most Firms Slow In Developing Pretexting Rules. The National Law Journal (2/7, Qualters) reports, "A Deloitte & Touche poll revealed that most companies have not crafted policies to ban pretexting, which exposes them to potential criminal liability if their employees or investigators use deception to gather information in a probe." The Journal continues, "In an online poll of 230 executives during a Webcast conducted by Deloitte Financial Advisory Services late last year, 42 percent said their companies had no written pretexting guidelines, and 45 percent said they didn't know if their company had such policies. … Only 8 percent have guidelines they are satisfied with, while 5 percent believe they have unsatisfactory rules on the books." The Journal adds, "This lack of corporate attention on pretexting is especially alarming in light of a new federal law that creates criminal penalties for illicitly obtaining or disclosing telephone records. … President George W.

DOJ_NMG_0128604

Bush signed the bill in January, following civil and criminal charges against individuals involved in a Hewlett-Packard Co. scheme to fraudulently obtain phone records in an effort to discover which board members were leaking stories to the media. … Several detectives and the former chairwoman of the Palo Alto, Calif.-based technology company face criminal charges, and the company paid $14.5 million in civil fines." The Journal notes, "Beyond prohibiting tactics that are clearly illegal, such as obtaining bank or telephone records under false pretenses, companies need to consider what kinds of information-gathering techniques -- pretexting as well as other methods -- are acceptable at their firms, said Ernie Brod, director of Forensic & Dispute Services for Deloitte's financial advisory services arm. … The problem is that some individuals may see nothing wrong with surveillance, for example, but 'others may be appalled,' he said."

SEC Sues Former Engineered Support Officials Over Options Scheme. The AP (2/7, Gordon) reports, "Two former top executives of defense contractor Engineered Support Systems Inc. enriched themselves and others in a five-year-long scheme to manipulate the timing of stock option grants, federal regulators charged Tuesday." The AP continues, "The Securities and Exchange Commission filed a civil lawsuit in federal court in St. Louis against Gary Gerhardt, former chief financial officer of the company, and Steven Landmann, the former controller, over the alleged options backdating scheme. Employees and directors of Engineered Support received some $20 million in unauthorized compensation as a result of the backdating, while Gerhardt and Landmann reaped $1.9 million and $518,972, respectively, according to the SEC." The AP adds, "Landmann agreed in a settlement with the agency to pay a $259,486 civil fine and $627,071 in restitution plus interest. He also was barred from serving as an officer or director of, or as an accountant for, any public company. Landmann neither admitted nor denied the SEC's allegations under the accord. … The SEC's case against Gerhardt is still pending. … It was the third case by the agency since last summer involving alleged options backdating, in a scandal in which more than 100 public companies are under investigation by the SEC and the Justice Department, more than $5 billion in profit has been erased by restatements and 18 CEOs have been swept out of office." The AP notes, "Federal prosecutors issued a subpoena last June in the matter to Engineered Support, a St. Louis-based company that supplies electronics for the military and some government agencies. The SEC also began its investigation around that time."

The Wall Street Journal (2/7, A4, Forelle, Bandler) reports, "Yesterday's civil charges by the Securities and Exchange Commission come as the pace of governmental investigations into the backdating matter appeared to be quickening. Criminal charges in other cases are likely to be filed in coming weeks or months, according to people familiar with the matter." The Journal adds, "Federal prosecutors in St. Louis also are investigating Engineered Support's options practices. People familiar with the matter say prosecutors are looking closely at Messrs. Gerhardt and Landmann, and former chief executive, Michael F. Shanahan Sr. and his son, Michael Shanahan Jr., who had been a director."

Former Qwest CEO Seeks Trial Delay. The AP (2/7, Shore) reports, "Former Quest chief Joe Nacchio's attorneys asked a federal judge Tuesday to delay his insider trading trial, saying prosecutors have been so slow in turning over evidence that his rights could be jeopardized if the trial starts March 19 as scheduled." The AP continues, "Attorney Herbert Stern sought a 60-day postponement to evaluate documents prosecutors have provided in recent weeks, including six CD-ROMs of material that Stern said he was made aware of Monday evening. … He said prosecutors advised if his team wanted to use any of the classified material, they would have to submit them to the court as required by federal law. … 'The government has chosen on the eve of trial to place a heavy burden on the defendant - to review voluminous materials and then make applications to the court and we do not even know the full extent of that burden,' Stern wrote in a brief filed in U.S. District Court." The AP adds, "Stern said the documents may support Nacchio's contention that he had hope for Qwest's future because he knew about the Denver-based phone company's classified business dealings with the government. … 'This request is not of our making, but if not granted will prejudice our ability to mount a full defense as required by the Sixth Amendment,' Stern wrote." The AP notes, "Nacchio's attorneys have complained previously about government attorneys being slow to provide evidence, prompting U.S. District Judge Edward Nottingham last week to order prosecutors to step up efforts to turn over such material. At issue are witness interviews and other documents that Nacchio's attorneys say may help his defense, a contention prosecutors have disputed. … Prosecutors have told the judge that the evidence exchange has been hampered because some documents fall under the Classified Information Procedures Act, which sets guidelines for viewing secret government material such as business contracts."

DOJ_NMG_0128605

SEC Ratchets Up Probe Of Wall Street Trading Leaks. The Wall Street Journal (2/7, C15, Scannell, Smith) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission has asked nearly a dozen brokerage firms for trading and other data in an effort to determine whether there is a leak of inside information across Wall Street." The Journal continues, "The inquiry is being driven in part by complaints from mutual funds and others who worry market participants are trading ahead of their trades before they are executed. … The request is an expansion of the agency's continuing 'street sweep' investigation of potential insider trading, which has mainly focused on the passing of inside information within a brokerage firm. Now, the agency is expanding the probe to look at information being exchanged between firms in hopes of avoiding detection, according to a top agency official." The Journal adds, "The SEC is looking at the 'passage of information from one firm to another,' said Lori Richards, director of the SEC's office of compliance, inspections and examinations. 'It's just fact-finding at this point.' … The data request, reported in yesterday's New York Times, was sent by the SEC three weeks ago. The request seeks information on all stock and option orders in the firms' order management system for a 12-day period in late September, as well as a list of customers that use the firms' prime brokerage systems, which are used by hedge funds." The Journal notes, "The agency hopes that once it examines the data, it will be able to determine if the concerns are valid and if there is a tipping chain from firm to firm. The sweep is in the information gathering stages and not all examinations result in enforcement actions. … The new take on potential leaking on Wall Street was spurred partly from other enforcement cases. The SEC and Justice Department have cracked down on instances of traders passing information about large pending trades before they are public across the firm's information boxes, known as squawk boxes."

The New York Times (2/6, Anderson) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission has begun a broad examination into whether Wall Street bank employees are leaking information about big trades to favored clients, like hedge funds, in an effort to curry favor with those clients, executives at Wall Street banks said." The Times continues, "The inquiry, these people said, seems aimed at determining how pervasive insider trading, or the illegal use of market-moving nonpublic information, may be on Wall Street. Knowledge about a large trade, like the sale of a big block of stock by the mutual fund giant Fidelity, would tell a trader which way the stock would move." The Times adds, "Trading ahead of client orders, or front-running, has long been an issue on Wall Street. Large mutual fund companies have often complained in the past that Wall Street brokerage firms were front-running their trades, using information about the funds' plans to buy or sell to make a risk-free bet on a stock's direction. … But the latest S.E.C. investigation appears to have a new twist: Rather than examine whether a bank is trading ahead of its own client by using knowledge of the customer's trade, the scope of the investigation will allow regulators to see if banks tip their valued customers who then go trade at another bank, making the paper trail harder to detect."

USA Today (2/7, 5B, Farrell) reports, "According to people with direct knowledge of the probe, who don't want to be identified because the investigation is ongoing, the banks being examined include but are not limited to: Merrill Lynch, Credit Suisse, Morgan Stanley, Deutsche Bank and UBS. None of those banks would comment on the matter." USA notes, "For years, mutual fund executives have complained that financial intermediaries have used sensitive information about their buy and sell orders to disadvantage them in the marketplace. … Representatives of the mutual fund industry applauded the SEC's decision to conduct the examination. 'This issue is of paramount importance to mutual fund shareholders,' says Edward Giltenan, a spokesman for the Investment Company Institute, a trade organization for funds."

Decline In Class-Action Securities Fraud Litigation Examined. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (2/7, A15), Joseph A. Grundfest, a professor of law and business and codirector of the Rock Center on Corporate Governance, at Stanford University, writes, "Litigation is booming in the U.S. Courts complain of burgeoning dockets. Lawyers collect record fees. Legislators, regulators and academics either grouse that litigation is driving business offshore and should be contained, or that economic injustice still pervades our economy and that the courthouse doors must be kept wide open to help right wrongs. … But few policy makers or scholars seem aware that a highly controversial component of the litigation market -- the class-action securities fraud litigation business -- is shrinking faster than a polar icecap. The interesting question is why this decline has occurred and what it means for the future of U.S. securities regulation." Grundfest continues, "According to data collected by Stanford Law School and Cornerstone Research, the number of companies sued in plain vanilla class-action fraud claims has averaged about 193 per year from 1996 through 2005, not much different from pre-reform levels. But halfway through 2005 filing activity took a sharp drop, and in 2006 only 110 companies were named as defendants in securities-fraud class actions. … A closer look at the data suggests that the decline is even more remarkable because 20 of these lawsuits allege options backdating activity. Backdating is a one-time event, and if we subtract these 20 cases we arrive at a 'core' litigation rate of 90 companies per year." Grundfest adds, "Why have these declines occurred? … Perhaps fewer companies are being sued for fraud because there is less fraud. Under this theory, the government's aggressive criminal and civil enforcement strategy following the Enron and WorldCom frauds has caused corporate boards and management to 'get religion' when it comes to complying with the securities laws. Executives are acutely aware that a major accounting or disclosure fraud is more likely than ever to leave them fired or indicted. They respond to this new regime like rational economic actors: If you increase the penalties for engaging in fraud then you reduce the incentive to commit fraud. Nothing complicated here at all. … As long as the government's enforcement activities remain sufficiently vigorous, the private class-action securities fraud lawsuit can be viewed as an expensive, wasteful and unnecessary sideshow that generates little deterrence and offers questionable levels of compensation. The question then is not why these lawsuits have been shrinking so rapidly in recent months, but when and whether they should exist at all."

DOJ_NMG_0128606

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Told Grand Jury Cheney "Upset," "Disturbed" By Wilson Claims. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/7, Apuzzo) reports, "On grand jury audiotapes played at his trial on Tuesday, former White House aide I. Lewis Libby said he learned about a CIA officer from Vice President Dick Cheney, forgot it, then learned it again from NBC News reporter Tim Russert a month later. … Libby's 2004 grand jury testimony…conflicts with testimony at his trial by a former White House press secretary, a recent vice presidential spokeswoman, a former CIA official, a former State Department undersecretary and reporters from The New York Times and Time magazine." The AP notes, "Meanwhile, the long-anticipated testimony by Cheney as well as Libby himself may not materialize. Libby's lawyers…indicated this week only that Cheney was 'potentially' a witness and that Libby might decide against taking the witness stand."

Under the headline "Court Hears Libby Describe Cheney As 'Upset' At Critic," the Washington Post (2/7, A3, Goldstein, Leonnig, 690K) reports Libby testified to the grand jury that "Vice President Cheney and other senior White House officials regarded" former ambassador Joseph Wilson's "accusations that President Bush misled the nation in going to war in Iraq as an unparalleled political assault and...held daily discussions about how to debunk them." Libby "said Cheney had been 'upset' and 'disturbed' by criticisms from…Wilson," and "Libby said that Karl Rove had been 'animated' by a conversation with Robert D. Novak, in which the conservative columnist told Rove he 'had a bad taste in his mouth' about Wilson and was writing a column about him." The Post notes, "Libby's portrayal of the zeal to discredit Wilson's claims, reaching to the White House's highest echelons, reinforces Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald's assertion that the criticism of war provoked such a political crisis among Bush's top aides that it is unlikely the defendant simply forgot his role in the leak, as defense attorneys contend."

The Los Angeles Times (2/7, Schmitt, 850K) reports that "jurors heard his recorded voice describe how he was instructed to leak intelligence secrets to select reporters, even as other White House officials were expressing concern over the leaks and debating whether the administration should formally declassify intelligence reports on Iraq to combat criticism of the case for war." On the tape, Fitzgerald was heard asking, "Was that unusual for you to have the national security advisor, the director of Central Intelligence, the White House chief of staff among others in the dark as to something that you had done regarding declassification?" Libby replied, "It is not unusual for the vice president to tell me something which I am not allowed to share with others."

The New York Times (2/7, Lewis, 1.16M) notes, "The audiotapes also provided more detail about Mr. Libby's July 8, 2003, meeting with Judith Miller, then a reporter for The New York Times. Mr. Libby told the grand jury that his meeting with Ms. Miller was approved directly by the vice president. Mr. Libby said that in order to convince Ms. Miller that Mr. Wilson's article in The Times was filled with inaccuracies, Mr. Cheney first went to President Bush directly to declassify a National Intelligence Estimate. Mr. Libby said that he used the intelligence estimate in the Miller interview to counter Mr. Wilson's claims that there was no Iraqi effort to obtain uranium from Niger."

DOJ_NMG_0128607

CNN (2/7) reports, "On a tape played at his trial Tuesday Lewis 'Scooter' Libby told investigators he thought President Bush authorized him to give a reporter information about CIA agent Valerie Plame. … 'If the president tells you to talk about a document, it's declassified,' Libby told Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald on March 24, 2003, during testimony before a grand jury that would eventually indict Libby for perjury and obstruction of justice." CNN continues, "The audio recordings, made nearly four years ago, shed light on how Libby handled the controversy over Wilson's allegations. … Libby said White House Counsel David Addington told him the president has the power to declassify material on his own. Libby said he asked Addington, 'Can the president declassify a document just by telling us to talk?' and Addington said he could. … Libby quoted that response to Fitzgerald on the stand." CNN adds, "Fitzgerald asked Libby whether he was present when Vice President Dick Cheney asked Bush to declassify the material, whether anyone else was present, and whether issues were raised about how going public might overrule CIA Director George Tenet. … To each question, Libby answered no. … Libby, who was Cheney's chief of staff at the time, also testified he had no knowledge of when or how Cheney got the okay from President Bush and concluded only the three of them were aware the material could be disclosed to New York Times reporter Judith Miller when Libby met with her for coffee at a Washington hotel."

Pennsylvania State Senator Indicted On 139 Corruption Counts. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/7, Dale) reports, "State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo, one of the most powerful and controversial figures in Pennsylvania politics, was indicted Tuesday on federal charges he used a nonprofit group for personal and political gain and defrauded the state out of $1 million. Many of the 139 charges stem from Fumo's ties to a nonprofit agency in his South Philadelphia district," the Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods. "Prosecutors said he used state employees and the nonprofit group to fulfill his every whim -- including cleaning his 33-room mansion, spying on his ex-wife, and fighting a dune project that might block his view of the ocean." The AP notes, "Fumo is to surrender to the FBI on Wednesday, the U.S. attorney's office said."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/7, McCoy, Shiffman, 385K) reports that "Fumo used taxpayer and charity money to pay for everything from political polls to power tools, from cars to farm equipment, from errands to shopping sprees, a grand jury charged yesterday. … 'Sen. Fumo didn't just step over the line,' U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan said yesterday. 'He completely ignored it.' … The indictment says Fumo once told a confidant that he had an acronym for one goal in his life -- spending 'OPM,' that is, 'other people's money.'" The Inquirer notes, "Fumo is scheduled to surrender to the FBI agents this morning who investigated him, Kathleen McAfee and Vicki Humphreys." Meanwhile, the Philadelphia Inquirer (2/7, Lounsberry, 385K) reported, "The 267-page federal indictment…is a portrait of greed and entitlement that prosecutors hope will be a road map to persuading a jury that one of the state's most resilient political figures engaged in fraud and other crimes. And it was the talk of the legal community yesterday, as lawyers across Philadelphia -- and beyond -- marveled at the level of detail and predicted a raging courtroom battle. … 'It's like the government saying, "We're so confident of our hand, we'll show you our hand,"' said former federal prosecutor Robert E. Goldman."

The Philadelphia Daily News (2/7, Hinkelman, 106K) reports that Fumo "touts his membership in the American Mensa Society, a society for people with very high IQs. But Fumo wasn't smart enough to avoid being charged yesterday with 139 felonies by a federal grand jury. … Ruth Arnao, 50, a longtime aide and former executive director of the Fumo charity, Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, also was indicted. She is charged with 45 counts of conspiracy, mail fraud, wire fraud, obstruction of justice and filing a false tax return." The Daily News notes that the "indictment painted Fumo as a man who 'abused' his power to 'build an empire' of Senate and charity employees who catered to his personal needs…Meehan said. … And, then, when Fumo realized investigators were onto him, he orchestrated a coverup by directing aides to destroy e-mails and other electronic evidence to scuttle the federal investigation, Meehan said."

DOJ_NMG_0128608

Philadelphia Editorials Weigh In On Indictment. The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/7, 385K) editorializes, "Fumo will have his day in court and is entitled to the presumption of innocence, of course. Indeed, he sought to preempt the indictment Monday by declaring in a Senate speech that he had 'not done anything illegal.'" However, the "charges resulting from a four-year probe by U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan paint a portrait of an elected official who let his unofficial title as the prince of Philadelphia politics go to his head." The Inquirer adds that the Citizens' Alliance "did good works," but "funds from a regional utility's ratepayers should have been used to benefit the region, not just one senator's district. And how much more good could this money have done if it were distributed to true, and truly effective, nonprofits -- not one so intent on enhancing the reputation, clout and comfort of one politician?

The Philadelphia Daily News (2/7, 106K) editorializes, "A Harrisburg hand grenade rolled into the room a few weeks ago with the news of $4 million in bonuses paid to legislative aides in the House and Senate. U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan just pulled the pin yesterday, when he released the indictment of state Sen. Vincent Fumo. That explosive 267-page document paints a picture of entitlement, a lack of accountabilty and a stunning disregard for the public trust that, if true, indicts not just a single senator, but an entire culture of arrogance, secretiveness and corruption that must be cleaned up."

DOJ Probing Loudoun County Land Deals. The Washington Post (2/7, A1, Laris, Somashekhar) reports, "Federal prosecutors have launched a far-reaching investigation into potential public corruption in Loudoun County, where officials have overseen billions of dollars' worth of development projects in one of the nation's fastest-growing areas." The Post continues, "Loudoun Commonwealth's Attorney James E. Plowman announced a joint investigation yesterday with the U.S. attorney's office in Alexandria, which will take the leading role. 'It's kind of a waste of resources if we're both independently reviewing the same matters,' Plowman said, adding that the combined federal-local effort 'brings about a greater aspect of neutrality.'" The Post adds, "The announcement follows months of quiet interviewing by FBI agents, who have queried county figures about possible abuses of power by officials, and represents a major escalation of the scrutiny facing Loudoun, the officials with the power to approve lucrative development projects and those in the real estate industry with the most at stake. … It also came shortly before Loudoun's Board of Supervisors passed ethics measures designed to increase government transparency. As part of the reforms, the board voted to discourage supervisors from accepting campaign donations from developers and others with pending projects, and it agreed to disclosure guidelines that could expose potential conflicts of interest." The Post notes, "The investigation and board action come after reports by The Washington Post last month that detailed how major land-use decisions in Loudoun have been dominated by a small network of public officials and their allies in the development industry. Developers, landowners and others profited as they coordinated with public officials to influence land-use decisions in the county, e-mails and other records showed. … Plowman, who last month said his office was focusing on eight or nine areas of inquiry, said in a statement that the joint group 'will be tasked with reviewing any potential issues of public corruption within Loudoun County.' It was unclear which individuals or specific actions are being investigated. … U.S. officials would not discuss their role in the probe. A spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, Jim Rybicki, said, 'Department of Justice policy does not allow us to confirm or deny the existence of an investigation.'"

Man, Company Charged With Bribery In "Operation Big Coon Dog." The Bristol Herald Courier (2/7, Still) reports, "A South Carolina resident and a North Carolina contracting firm were indicted Tuesday on corruption charges stemming from the Operation Big Coon Dog investigation that rocked Buchanan County after a 2002 flood nearly wiped out the Hurley community." James Frederick "Rick" Byrd and Byrd Brothers Inc. "were indicted by a federal grand jury in Abingdon, both on two counts of program fraud and money laundering conspiracy, according to a news release issued by the U.S attorney's office in Roanoke. … The indictment alleges that Rick Byrd is the agent for Byrd Brothers. He is accused of paying two bribes to Ray Blankenship, the former chairman of the Buchanan County Board of Supervisors."

FBI Arrests Reputed Bonanno Underboss, 18 Alleged Mob Associates. WABC-TV New York (2/6) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "The acting underboss and the elderly acting consigliore of the Bonanno crime family were among 19 reputed mobsters busted by federal authorities Tuesday morning, officials said. Authorities say acting underboss Nicholas 'Nicky Mouth' Santora, 73-year-old acting consigliore Anthony 'Fat Anthony' Rabito and 17 others were arrested during the raids. Officials say they will be arraigned in Brooklyn federal court on charges that include racketeering, racketeering conspiracy, conspiracy to commit murder in aid of racketeering, illegal gambling, extortion, extortion conspiracy, loansharking, securities fraud and narcotics distribution. It is reportedly the fifth time since 2003 that FBI agents busted the Bonanno crime family." WNBC-TV New York (2/6) noted, "FBI agents conducted raids and made the arrests Tuesday morning. … Former boss Joseph Massino has cooperated with authorities since his arrest, even having worn a recording device to help build a case against his former associates."

DOJ_NMG_0128609

The New York Times (2/7, 1.16M) reports, "All 19 pleaded not guilty yesterday, prosecutors said." US Attorney Roslynn R. Mauskopf "said that as part of an ongoing investigation, more than 100 Bonanno family members and associates have been prosecuted." Newsday (2/7, DeStefano) notes Santora and Rabito "are considered by the FBI to be the latest patchwork of leaders of a crime family that in the past five years has seen more than 70 of its members…convicted of federal charges. … Untouched by the latest charges is Salvatore Montagna, reportedly the new acting boss of the Bonanno crime family. A snippet of information about Montagna's reputed status came out in a letter submitted by prosecutors to the court Tuesday." The New York Daily News (2/7, Marzulli, 729K) and New York Post (2/7, Cohen) also briefly reported on the arrests.

House Republicans Unveil Anti-Crime Agenda. The Washington Times (2/7, Bellantoni, 88K) reports House Republicans on Tuesday "outlined a legislative package to curb drug crime, gang violence and child pornography -- pushing domestic safety issues they say will help them win back a majority." Republican members of the Judiciary Committee "criticized the Democratic leadership for leaving measures against violent crime off its publicized 'first 100 hours' agenda last month." Rep. Randy Forbes said, "If you listened very carefully, there was a deafening silence when it came to dealing with violent crime." The Times adds the "Republican Law and Order Agenda, formally introduced yesterday, lists nine proposals. Several were passed in the House in previous Congresses but stalled in the Senate." Among the Republican proposals "were bills to make the Internet safer for children, target identity theft and other cyberspace crime, and reduce fraudulent claims with the Federal Emergency Management Agency. They also give law enforcement more tools to crack down on drug trafficking and gang crime."

GOP Bill Would Require ISP Tracking. CNET News (2/7, Mccullagh) reports, "All Internet service providers would have to keep track of what their customers are doing online to aid police in future investigations under legislation introduced Tuesday as part of a Republican 'law and order agenda.'" CNET continues, "Employees of any Internet provider who fail to store that information will face fines and prison terms of up to one year, the bill says. The U.S. Justice Department could order the companies to store those records forever." CNET adds, "Rep. Lamar Smith of Texas, the top Republican on the House Judiciary Committee, called it a necessary anti-cybercrime measure. 'The legislation introduced today will give law enforcement the tools it needs to find and prosecute criminals,' he said in a statement. … A second requirement, also embedded in Smith's so-called Safety Act (click for PDF), requires owners of sexually explicit Web sites to post warning labels on their pages or face imprisonment. This echoes, nearly word for word, an earlier proposal from last year that was approved by a Senate committee but never made it to a floor vote." CNET notes, "Even though both requirements are central to a Republican-led effort, neither data retention nor Web labeling are that partisan. A Senate committee approved a telecommunications bill that included Web labeling by a 15-7 vote in June. And Rep. Diana DeGette, a Colorado Democrat, has been the most vocal proponent of data retention in the entire Congress. … Other bills in the Republicans' 'law and order' agenda are related to terrorism, the death penalty, gangs, computer data breaches and drug trafficking. ISP snooping timeline … The legislative fusillade marks the renewal of a political tussle that began in earnest last April, when Attorney General Alberto Gonzales called on Congress to target Internet providers with new regulations, which have been generally opposed by telecommunications companies and civil liberties organizations. CNET News.com was the first to report that the Bush administration has been pushing for such a rule privately since mid-2005. … Until this week, however, no formal bill had been introduced in the U.S. Congress."

Three Plead Guilty To Katrina Cleanup Billing Fraud. The AP (2/7) reports, "Three people, including a Florida contractor, have pleaded guilty to conspiracy to defraud the government by falsifying records of debris clean up from Hurricane Katrina and billing the federal government $716,677 for the work. Allan Kitto, 24, of Dundee, Fla., whose company was a subcontractor for debris cleanup in Pearl River County; Clinton K. Miller, 28, of Carriere; and Lauren Robertson, 23, of Picayune, entered the pleas Tuesday in Gulfport federal court, U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton said." The AP notes, "The indictment also charges that Kitto, in an effort to conceal the conspiracy, would deposit the funds into a bank account opened in the name of one of his employees and then write a check to an unindicted coconspirator who would then pay Kitto and Miller. Miller would then pay Robertson for completing and signing the false load slips, according to the indictment."

DOJ_NMG_0128610

US Seeks Return Of $309 Million In Katrina Relief Aid. The AP (2/7) reports, "In the neighborhood President George W. Bush visited right after Hurricane Katrina, the U.S. government gave $84.5 million to more than 10,000 households. But official figures show fewer than 8,000 homes existed there at the time. … Now the government wants back a lot of the money it gave out across the region." The AP continues, "The Federal Emergency Management Administration has determined nearly 70,000 households improperly received $309.1 million in grants, and officials acknowledge those numbers are likely to rise." The AP adds, "In the chaotic period after two deadly hurricanes, Katrina and Rita, slammed the Gulf Coast in 2005, federal officials scrambled to provide help to hard-hit areas. … But an Associated Press analysis of government data suggests the government might not have been careful enough with its aid as it gave out nearly $5.3 billion to storm victims. The analysis found the government regularly gave money to more homes in some neighborhoods than the number of homes that actually existed. … The pattern was repeated in nearly 100 neighborhoods damaged by the hurricanes. At least 162,750 homes that did not exist before the storms may have received a total of more than $1 billion in improper or illegal payments, the AP found." The AP notes, "The AP analysis discovered the government made more home grants than the number of homes in one of every five neighborhoods in the wake of Katrina. After Rita roared ashore, there were more home grants than homes in one of every 10 neighborhoods. … The Justice Department so far has prosecuted more than 400 people for storm-related fraud, and $18 million(has been returned to FEMA or the American Red Cross, according to a recent report by the department's Katrina Fraud Task Force."

Connecticut Bank Officer Sentenced To Prison For Embezzlement. The Middletown (CT) Press (2/7, Mill) reports, "A longtime bank official who embezzled more than a half-million dollars from Liberty Bank was sentenced Tuesday to 18 months in federal prison." Mary Kuskey "had worked for Liberty Bank in a variety of positions from 1974 until 2005, when she was fired after the bank uncovered a complex scheme to divert bank funds for her personal use." US Attorney Kevin J. O'Connor said that "she has made restitution of $190,148. However, she still owes Liberty another $410,799 'in order to fulfill her restitution requirement,' O'Connor said." The Press adds, "O'Connor commended Liberty Bank for uncovering the fraud and for what he called the bank's 'valuable assistance' with the subsequent FBI investigation."

Florida Man Pleads Guilty To $2.5 Million Medicare Fraud Scheme. The Miami Herald (2/1, Dorschner, 286K) reported, "Law enforcement announced several major developments over the past several days in its fight against healthcare fraud, reported to be a $1 billion a year business in South Florida alone." US Attorney R. Alexander Acosta's office "announced that Marcelo De Jesus Serrano pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit health care fraud. Serrano admitted to conspiring with others to submit fraudulent claims to Medicare for various services from 2003 to 2005 through the services of two local labs, Biocyte Laboratories and Washington Medical Laboratory, resulting in about $2.5 million in false claims, prosecutors charged. Serrano agreed to forfeit about $1.2 million in fraud proceeds in an Etrade account, the press release said."

Three Convicted In Texas Bank Robbery Scheme. The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (2/7, Okada) reports, "James Edward Geske, Kevin Michael Smith and Alicia Nichole Frazier face up to life in federal prison without parole after a Fort Worth jury found them guilty of plotting to orchestrate three simultaneous bank robberies in downtown Hamilton, including using military explosives to blow up 15 police cars." The Star-Telegram continues, "Geske, 27, was the ringleader of the plot that was planned in great detail during October and November. Smith, 37, and Frazier, 25, played lesser roles, but all are equally guilty of participating in the conspiracy to commit the crimes, the jury found. … All three were arrested on Nov. 8, the same day the bank plan was being finalized. On that day, Geske traded a stash of fake methamphetamine for guns with an undercover federal agent. The plan as a whole was largely brought down by two undercover law enforcement officers. … 'The Arlington Police Department and ATF (Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives) and this jury took three dangerous criminals off the streets, as well as a cache of weapons,' federal prosecutor Bret Helmer said. 'The end result could have been catastrophic for a lot of people in Hamilton, Texas.' … Defense attorneys attempted to portray their clients as small-time street characters who talked big but meant little."

DOJ_NMG_0128611

US Seeks To Keep Convicted Ex-Coca-Cola Secretary In Jail. The AP (2/7, Weber) reports, "The government said in court papers Tuesday it believes a former Coca-Cola secretary convicted of conspiring to steal trade secrets from the beverage giant should be jailed immediately because she poses a flight risk." The AP continues, "In a motion filed in U.S. District Court in Atlanta, Assistant U.S. Attorney Byung J. Pak said clothing, prescription medication, papers and other personal items were found in Joya Williams' Mustang during a search after a fire destroyed her apartment Friday." The AP adds, "The fire, which has been ruled accidental by local officials in Norcross, occurred nearly 90 minutes after the guilty verdict was reached in federal court in Atlanta. … 'With no place to live, with no money, with a significant amount of debt, and with the prospect of a lengthy prison sentence, the defendant poses a serious risk of flight,' Pak argued in the motion. … Pak also indicated that while local fire investigators deemed Friday's fire was caused accidentally by an unattended candle igniting some curtains in a bedroom of Williams' apartment, the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives continues to investigate the incident. … Pak also said that Williams made inconsistent statements to investigators regarding her location and actions during the fire." The AP notes, "The government motion is seeking to force Williams to prove why she should not be remanded to the custody of federal marshals, and if she fails to do that, asks the court to order her jailed immediately. … Williams, who was out on bond during her trial, currently remains free pending sentencing."

Cunningham Probe Exposes Secret Iraq Water Contracts. The AP (2/7, Shrader, Hoffman) reports, "CIA officers operating in northern Iraq bought drinking water from a bottling plant there for years prior to the 2003 invasion that ousted Saddam Hussein." The AP continues, "That changed soon afterward. A CIA officer handling logistics for the Middle East and other regions recommended that an American company provide water and other supplies, according to former government officials. … The U.S. contractor that benefited from the multimillion-dollar deal wasn't just anyone. The company had personal ties to the officer, Kyle 'Dusty' Foggo, who would soon leave his logistics post in Frankfurt, Germany, and move to Washington to become the CIA's third-ranking official." The AP adds, "In at least one written communication, a Baghdad CIA officer complained about the no-bid contract. According to one official, the officer believed the deal was simply unnecessary because safe water was available commercially but he was ignored. … The water contract, while small on the scale of the billions that flowed into Iraq, raises questions about why U.S. taxpayer dollars went to well-connected businessmen rather than Iraqis who could have benefited from a share of postwar reconstruction business. And the case provides a window into the murky world of covert government business arrangements." The AP notes, "Foggo retired from the CIA last year. He is now at the center of a federal investigation, nearing completion, into whether he improperly steered contracts to companies controlled by his best friend, San Diego defense contractor Brent Wilkes. … Federal prosecutors in San Diego are preparing to seek indictments against Foggo and Wilkes on charges of honest services fraud and conspiracy, two government officials familiar with the investigation told The Associated Press last week. … The probe of Foggo and Wilkes stems from a broader federal investigation involving at least five federal agencies into how associates of former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham directed government business to a favored network of national security contractors. Cunningham, a San Diego Republican elected to eight terms in Congress, is currently serving more than eight years in jail for taking at least $2.4 million in bribes. Another defense contractor has pleaded guilty to paying some of them."

At Least Six States Consider Broadening Death Penalty. USA Today (2/7, 1A, Bazar, 2.27M) reports, "At least a half-dozen states are considering broadening the death penalty, countering a national trend toward scaling back its use. Lawmakers have proposed legislation that would increase the range of crimes eligible for execution. In Texas and Tennessee, for example, legislators want to include certain child molesters who did not murder their victims." Virginia "is considering bills that would make accomplices to murder, as well as killers of judges and court witnesses, eligible for the death penalty." Other states "with proposals to expand the death penalty" include Missouri, Georgia and Utah.

DOJ_NMG_0128612

Six Baltimore Police Officers Suspended In Overtime Pay Probe. The Baltimore Sun (2/7, Sentementes) reports, "Six Baltimore police officers were suspended Tuesday as part of an internal affairs investigation into possible 'irregularities' with their overtime pay, a department spokesman said." The Sun continues, "The officers -- two sergeants and four detectives -- worked in criminal investigations in the department's Eastern District when they filed for overtime that is now being reviewed by internal affairs investigators, police said. One of the sergeants was recently transferred to the Northeastern District, police said." The Sun adds, "Matt Jablow, a Police Department spokesman, declined to release the names of the officers or say how much overtime was in question. … He said that questions about their overtime -- which consisted of money paid out for court and investigative time -- arose as part of an internal audit last summer." The Sun notes, "Their law enforcement powers have been suspended, but the officers will continue to work in administrative positions, Jablow said. … According to a document obtained by The Sun, the suspended officers are Sgt. Darryl Massey, Sgt. Raynard H. Jones, and detectives Sandra D. Forsythe, Dave P. Peckoo, Kerry D. Snead and Kevin R. Turner. … The suspensions come amid a push by the department this year to curtail overtime spending."

CIVIL LAW:

Victims' Families Sue FBI Over Shootings During New Jersey Drug Sting. The Bergen Record (2/6, Crouse) reports, "Relatives of three of the four people gunned down in a Paterson after-hours club sued the federal government Monday, claiming the deaths resulted from a bungled FBI sting operation. Three men and a woman were massacred inside the illegal gambling club during an early-morning robbery Dec. 14, 2005. 'The FBI violated their own policies on undercover cases: to make sure that the safety of unrelated civilians is not in jeopardy,' said the families' attorney, Rosemarie Arnold. 'You have a virtual casino operating in a known dangerous neighborhood without any security. That to me is an invitation to robbery.'" The Record noted, "Based on police files, the lawsuit says the FBI set up the sting four months before the shootings to investigate drugs and arms trafficking by the Latin Kings gang. It claims the agency paid a former convict $3,500 a month to run the business…atop a warehouse on Railroad Avenue, but failed to properly train or supervise him."

The AP (2/7) reports that the "mishandled FBI sting…led to a massacre in which four people died, according to a lawsuit filed by some of their families." The AP notes that after the shootings, the club manager "escaped the carnage, called 911, and said he worked for the FBI, according to a transcript of his call obtained by The Record of Bergen County and its sister paper, the Herald News of West Paterson. An FBI spokesman, Special Agent Steven Siegel, on Tuesday declined to comment on the lawsuit or on whether the manager was working for the agency."

Fatal Illinois Air Crash Blamed On Lack Of Radar. The Chicago Tribune (2/7, O'Connor) reports, "An air-traffic controller admitted Tuesday that he had no idea of a Cessna's location when he instructed its pilot to turn, a maneuver that less than two minutes later resulted in a midair collision that killed radio star Bob Collins and two others." The Tribune continues, "Testifying at a federal trial stemming from lawsuits filed by the families of the three victims, air-traffic controller Gregory Fowler said the crash of the two small aircraft would have been prevented if the Waukegan Regional Airport had been equipped with radar at the time. … A radar system was installed at the airfield five months after the February 2000 collision that killed Collins, a passenger in his Moravan Z242L plane and the student pilot at the controls of the Cessna 172P, Fowler said." The Tribune adds, "Fowler's testimony highlighted the first full day of testimony in the bench trial before U.S. District Judge John Darrah. Lawyers for the victims have sued the U.S. government, contending the Federal Aviation Administration was responsible for the crash, even though the Waukegan airport is operated by a private company. Other defendants reached settlements before the trial, which is expected to last about two weeks. … Relatives of two victims also testified, including Ed Hock, who struggled to keep his composure as he spoke about his daughter, Sharon, the student pilot, who he said had a vibrant personality. Evan Luscher, 19, whose father, Herman, died in Collins' plane, said he thinks of his dad every day."

DOJ_NMG_0128613

Founder Of AmeriDebt Accused Of Hiding Assets From Debtors. The AP (2/7, Manning) reports, "The founder of a credit counseling firm accused of cheating thousands of debtors is hiding assets even though he agreed to contribute millions of dollars to help repay the debtors, a court-appointed receiver told a federal judge (in Greenbelt, MD) Tuesday." The AP continues, "The receiver, Robb Evans & Associates, wants Andris Pukke held in contempt of court, alleging the former head of now-defunct AmeriDebt is using friends and families to hide substantial assets - including an online betting venture, a California mansion, a development in Belize and bank accounts in Latvia." The AP adds, 'Hiding the assets would violate the terms of a 2006 settlement with the Federal Trade Commission that set up a restitution fund of up to $35 million. So far, only about $10 million of Pukke's money has been turned over to the FTC, which had sued him and AmeriDebt for allegedly charging customers $172 million in hidden fees. … 'There has been utter lack of cooperation on Mr. Pukke's part,' Gary Caris, an attorney for Rob Evans & Associates, told U.S. District Judge Peter Messitte in a hearing on the contempt request. … But in testimony Tuesday, Pukke claimed the attorney was overstating his control over money, such as the Latvian bank accounts held in his father's name. Pukke also said he no longer had a major stake in the Belize operation despite Caris' efforts to prove Pukke was still a part of the project." The AP notes, "AmeriDebt once was one of the largest U.S. firms meant to help debt-laden customers pay off their loans. But in its lawsuit, the FTC claimed AmeriDebt collected upfront fees that customers thought were going to pay down their debt but instead went to AmeriDebt. Pukke allegedly used that money, collected from about 300,000 people, to fund a lavish lifestyle. … The FTC and Pukke settled in January 2006 before the case was to go to trial. Pukke admitted no wrongdoing but agreed to disclose his assets for the restitution fund. The judge had already frozen Pukke's holdings a year earlier to keep him from hiding money."

Two New York Hospitals Bring RICO Suit Against UnitedHealth. The AP (2/6, Freed) reported that Flushing Hospital Medical Center and Jamaica Hospital Medical Center, both of New York, "said they sued insurer UnitedHealth Group Inc. on Tuesday alleging 'a pattern of racketeering activity.'" Filing suit under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations in federal court, they seek "at least $50 million in punitive damages, along with millions more in actual damages. The same hospitals sued under a similar set of facts last year in state court in New York." The AP continues, "Both lawsuits claim UnitedHealth cost them business by repeatedly telling patients that Flushing was not in its network and that Oxford Health, which was bought by UnitedHealth, did the same thing to patients at Jamaica Hospital. The lawsuit also claims Oxford postponed signing contracts with both hospitals to avoid paying them higher negotiated fees."

Judge Orders More Mediation In Virginia Jet-Noise Suits. The Virginian-Pilot (2/7, White) reports, "A federal judge Tuesday ordered all parties involved in nearly 2,100 jet-noise lawsuits back to mediation." The V-P continues, "Judge Victor J. Wolski of the U.S. Court of Federal Claims in Washington set a tentative date in September for a two-week trial for the first group of lawsuits, should negotiations fail. … Wolski also granted a motion by the Justice Department that the court not review a recently submitted report from plaintiffs' lawyers, which included details of the original settlement agreement." The V-P adds, "Government attorneys argued that the information was improperly disclosed and could potentially sway the court if the lawsuits went to trial. … At stake is a proposed $38 million deal that was tentatively reached in October between the federal government and 2,098 homeowners who live near Oceana Naval Air Station in Virginia Beach and Fentress Naval Auxiliary Landing Field in Chesapeake. The median payment to homeowners who agreed to the deal would have been $5,000." The V-P notes, "Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman with the Justice Department, said the government was pleased with the court's order. … In a statement, Magnuson said 'by granting the government's request to appoint a mediator, the United States remains hopeful that the parties can reach agreement on the terms still in dispute and resolve this case without further litigation.'"

DOJ_NMG_0128614

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Review Finds Vermont State Hospital Lagging In DOJ-Mandated Improvements. The AP (2/7, Rathke) reports, "The (Vermont) state hospital is behind in improving patient treatment, assessment, discharge and planning but has made progress in other areas, as part of a settlement with the U.S. Department of Justice, according to a six-month review." The AP continues, "The report by two out-of-state psychiatrists outlines numerous areas where the psychiatric hospital was not in compliance with the terms of the four-year settlement. … 'This is the first time that we're going through this and we'll be going through this again and every time we should in be greater compliance,' said Michael Hartman, the new deputy commissioner for mental health. 'Obviously if there weren't problems then we wouldn't be in this place in the first place.'" The AP adds, "The 70-page report released Tuesday noted progress in the hospital's reduced use of restraint and seclusion of patients, improvements to the building, creation of a full-time psychiatric team, hiring a staff neurologist, working with the University of Vermont medical school and certain areas of training, Hartman said. … But the report said the hospital needs a more organized system to better integrate documentation, treatment, assessment, use of medicine and therapy." The AP notes, "The Justice Department investigated the hospital in September 2004 after the facility lost its federal certification and millions of dollars in funding following two patient suicides. … The DOJ found the hospital used excessive seclusion and restraints and provided inadequate psychiatric and psychological services."

DOJ-Funded Human Trafficking Task Force Launched In Las Vegas. KLAS-TV Las Vegas (2/6) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "Local agencies announced Tuesday morning a massive task force has been formed, aimed at combating the problem of human trafficking. Dozens of agencies, including Metro, Henderson police, Nevada child seekers, Salvation Army, the AGS office, TSA, and the FBI are working together to identify people who are bring forced to work in the sex industry or as laborers. The federal government says Southern Nevada is one of 17 communities at high risk for human trafficking." KLAS noted, The Department of Justice granted Southern Nevada $370,000 to launch a task force to fight the problem."

Border Patrol Agent Beaten By Fellow Prison Inmates. McClatchy (2/7, Montgomery) reports that "one of two Border Patrol agents who were sentenced to a decade in federal prison for the shooting of a Mexican drug smuggler in Texas was beaten by five fellow inmates at a medium-security prison at Yazoo City, Miss., lawmakers and members of his family said Tuesday." Former agent Ignacio Ramos "told his family that a group of inmates surrounded his bedside…where they were being held and kicked him in the head, face and mouth" supposedly "after inmates watched an episode of 'America's Most Wanted' that featured the shooting case."

The Washington Times (2/7, Seper, 88K) reports that in response to the beating and resulting "minor injuries" of the former US Patrol agent in prison, White House spokesman Tony Snow "said a 'thorough investigation' has been ordered into the incident" while the Bureau of Prisons spokeswoman Traci Billingsley confirmed "that the assault occurred immediately after the airing of a television show that described Ramos' case" and added that "the Bureau of Prisons is vigorously investigating the matter and will pursue all appropriate sanctions against the assailants." Rep. Duncan Hunter, "a California Republican who has been critical of the government's prosecution of the agents, said the incident 'clearly demonstrates the severe risk involved with incorporating Border Patrol agents into general prison populations.'"

Bill O'Reilly on last night's broadcast of Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (2/6) commented that "this is totally unacceptable. We asked the warden of the prison for information but she would not tell us anything. The Justice Department says it is investigating. … There should be an investigation into her tenure at the prison. This is a high profile case. There is no excuse for this assault. … I knew this was going to happen."

The AP (2/7, Caldwell) reports, "Prison officials on Tuesday confirmed assertions by a congressman and relatives of Ignacio Ramos. He was attacked Saturday night after his case was described on the TV show 'America's Most Wanted,' the officials said. … Ramos suffered minor cuts and bruises, U.S. Bureau of Prisons spokeswoman Traci Billingsley said in a statement." The AP adds, "Ramos has been moved to the special housing unit at the medium-and low-security federal prison in Yazoo City, Mississippi, where he is serving his sentence, Billingsley said. … The convictions of Ramos and fellow former agent Jose Alonso Compean sparked outcry from critics who argued that the men were merely doing their job defending the border against criminals. … Republican U.S. Rep. Tom Tancredo of Colorado, a vocal supporter of the agents and opponent of illegal immigration, criticized the Bush administration Tuesday for failing to protect Ramos and demanded a full presidential pardon for the two men."

DOJ_NMG_0128615

Fox News (2/7, Porteus) reports, "Ignacio Ramos, who was transferred to the Yazoo City Federal Correctional Complex in Mississippi last month to begin serving his 12-year sentence for the February 2005 shooting of Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, was placed in a special housing unit after the incident pending an investigation, according to T.J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council. … 'We received verbal confirmation from the prison folks that he was assaulted and went to the infirmary and was treated for injuries,' Rep. Ted Poe, R-Texas, told FOXNews.com, adding that he has requested a written report of the incident." Fox adds, "Prison authorities, in a statement issued Monday, said that Ramos reported to the staff on Saturday around 10:15 p.m. ET that he was assaulted and that he sustained some 'minor' bruises and abrasions, Bonner said. … Some members of Ramos' family claim the assault happened after the airing of an 'America's Most Wanted' segment featuring both Ramos and Compean. They say the attack happened after Ramos fell asleep." Fox notes, "Ramos and Compean were found guilty by a jury of not only shooting Aldrete-Davila, but also of trying to cover up the incident. Supporters say it was wrong for Sutton to go after the border agents and not the drug dealer who was given immunity for testifying against them, and that the Justice Department has been less than forthcoming about certain facts surrounding the case."

9th Circuit Rules Wal-Mart Class-Action Bias Suit Must Go To Trial. The AP (2/7, Kravets) reports, "A federal appeals court ruled Tuesday that Wal-Mart Stores Inc., the world's largest private employer, must face a class-action lawsuit alleging as many as 1.5 million female employees were discriminated against in pay and promotions." The AP continues, "The ruling by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upholds a 2004 federal judge's decision to let the United States' largest class-action employment discrimination lawsuit go to trial, possibly exposing the Bentonville, Arkansas-based retailing powerhouse to billions of dollars in damages. … 'Plaintiff's expert opinions, factual evidence, statistical evidence and anecdotal evidence present significant proof of a corporate policy of discrimination and support plaintiff's contention that female employees nationwide were subjected to a common pattern and practice of discrimination,' the court wrote in a 2-1 decision." The AP adds, "Wal-Mart said it would ask the court to rehear the case with the same three-judge panel or with 15 judges, a move likely to idle the case for months. Tuesday's ruling came 18 months after the case was argued. … Wal-Mart, which currently employs 1.3 million workers, claimed that the conventional rules of class action suits should not apply in the case because its 3,400 stores, including Sam's Club warehouse outlets, operate like independent businesses, and that the company did not have a policy of discriminating against women."

The Washington Post (2/7, D1, Joyce) reports, "Wal-Mart said it will ask the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit in San Francisco to reconsider its decision. Barring that, the company will ask the U.S. Supreme Court to overturn the certification. A lower court originally said the case could proceed as a class action in June 2004, and the company first appealed the decision in August 2005. … 'We think its analysis is much too deferential to plaintiffs and erred in not taking into account Wal-Mart's evidence," said Theodore J. Boutrous Jr., an attorney for Wal-Mart. He said the court's ruling does not address the merits of the plaintiffs' claims, but whether the case meets the technical requirements to move forward as a class action."

The Financial Times (2/7, Waldmeir) reports, "The US Chamber of Commerce condemned the ruling. 'The suit includes a hodgepodge of claims, it's huge, it's unmanageable, and it's difficult if not impossible to defend,' said Robin Conrad of the National Chamber Litigation Center, the chamber's legal arm. 'Class actions like this are almost extortionate.'"

ABC World News (2/6, lead story, 2:40, Gibson) reported, "It is a lawsuit so large in scope and size, that it staggers the imagination. A Federal appeals court ruled today that a gender bias suit against Wal-Mart can proceed in what is known as a class-action suit. That means 1.5 million to 2 million women would be plaintiffs, arguing, as a group or class, that Wal-Mart discriminated against them in providing promotions and in paying them less than male employees." ABC adds, "It's America's biggest store, biggest employer, and now must defend itself against a huge female group of its own employees who claim Wal-Mart is also the biggest discriminator in the country. A Federal appeals courts in California ruled today that there is, 'significant proof of a corporate policy of discrimination' and that 'female employees nationwide were subjected to a common pattern and practice of discrimination.'"

DOJ_NMG_0128616

The CBS Evening News (2/6, story 10, :20, Couric) reported, "A Federal appeals court ruled today that Wal-Mart will face the largest sexual discrimination lawsuit in US history. The class action suit alleges as many as 1.5 million female employees were passed over for promotions and earned less than male coworkers."

NBC Nightly News (2/6, story 6, :30, Williams) reported, We learned today of a huge class action lawsuit and it's against the retailing giant Wal-Mart. A Federal court has ruled that as many as 1.5 million current and former Wal-Mart workers may sue the company for sex discrimination. A suit that could cost Wal-Mart billions of dollars. Still the case for all these women could be delayed more months. Wal-Mart is asking the court to reconsider the ruling."

Ninth Teen Sentenced In California Halloween Hate Crime. The Los Angeles Times (2/7, Abdollah) reports, "A black teenager was sentenced to probation in the Long Beach hate attack today, the last of a group to be punished in the Halloween night incident." The Times continues, "Judge Gibson Lee put Allyson Stone, who is now 18, on probation, ordered 250 hours of community service and racial tolerance training. … The sentence was similar to that given the eight other teenagers convicted in the attack. Most of the youths also received a sentence of house arrest. … One of the 10 defendants was acquitted in the case." The Times adds, "Darrell Goss, the lawyer for Stone, said he has already filed an appeal, the first in what is expected to be continuing legal action from the attack on a street in the Bixby Knolls neighborhood of Long Beach. … Laura Schneider, 19, Loren Hyman, 21, and Michelle Smith, 19 were injured in the attack."

Dallas Must Fix Jail Problems Within Three Months. The Dallas Morning News (2/7, Krause) reports, "Dallas County officials soon may have to shut the doors to their crowded and understaffed jail and pay millions of dollars to send inmates to other counties if they can't get the inmate population under control." The News continues, "The county has three months to meet the state's minimum staffing requirement of one guard per 48 inmates – something it has consistently been unable to do – or the state probably will order the crowded jail not to admit any more prisoners. … If that happens, the county would have to pay to transport and house its prisoners in other jails across the state, at an annual cost of up to $18 million." The News adds, "Such a scenario would result in 'mayhem,' Chief Public Defender Brad Lollar said. Defense attorneys may not have time to visit clients in distant jails, and inmates would have to be bused back and forth to court hearings. … The Texas Commission on Jail Standards summoned county and sheriff's officials to its meeting last Friday for a status update on the troubled jail. The commission staff had been prepared to recommend the remedial order that day to close the jail but reconsidered after hearing about improvements in the works, said Allen Clemson, the Commissioners Court administrator." The News notes, "County officials are now in emergency mode, having given themselves a 30-day deadline to reduce the jail's population of more than 7,000 by 1,000 inmates, which they said will bring them in compliance. … The Dallas County Jail system – the seventh largest in the nation – has failed state inspections three years in a row, primarily because of inadequate staffing. Dallas has the highest incarceration rate among Texas' five largest counties. … The Sheriff's Department spent more than $9 million in overtime in the jails last fiscal year. But a surprise state inspection in October revealed the jail still wasn't meeting the minimum staffing requirement. … 'We are both in agreement that you cannot go on like this forever,' said Adan Munoz, executive director of the Commission on Jail Standards. 'Remedial orders have to be put in place.' … Mr. Munoz said a U.S. Justice Department report on the jail was the main reason he asked Dallas County officials to appear last week before the commission in Austin. The federal investigation concluded in December that the county is violating inmates' civil rights with dangerous and unsanitary jail conditions."

WPost Urges Democrats To Act On DC Voting Rights. In an editorial in the Washington Post (2/7, A16, 690K) asserts that "it's time for the Democrats who control Congress to act on legislation to end the disenfranchisement of citizens living in the nation's capital." The Post calls for not merely support but action to push the languishing DC voting rights bill for approval in Congress. The Post urges Congressional Democrats not to allow "highly remote and partisan concern to stand in the way of their claimed support for fair representation for District residents" because changing the formula of the proposed legislation

DOJ_NMG_0128617

"could doom the bill, and no matter how good the intentions of lawmakers, the District deserves results."

ANTITRUST:

Monsanto's Delta Bid Raises Antitrust Concerns. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (2/7, Melcer) reports, "A pair of biotech agribusinesses wants to go head to head with Monsanto Co. in creating a better cotton seed, but they may never get there." The Post-Dispatch continues, "At issue is Monsanto's proposed $1.5 billion purchase of Delta & Pine Land Co. Swiss firm Syngenta AG and Pioneer Hi-Bred International Inc., a DuPont company, had planned to partner with Delta, combining their genetic traits with D&PL's seed. … The Monsanto deal is pending an antitrust review by the Justice Department. If it goes through, Syngenta and Pioneer will have to turn to rival Monsanto as their cotton seed partner." The Post-Dispatch adds, "All of the companies involved say the plans for partnerships are proceeding until the deal closes. They don't know what the future will hold, though Monsanto promises to work with its competitors. … But many cotton farmers say they were hoping increased competition would bring down prices and result in greater service and product choices. Now, they worry that won't materialize. … Monsanto, the world leader in developing biotech crop traits, said bringing competing technology to market is a common agribusiness practice that it is open to continuing with Syngenta and Pioneer. Monsanto's traits, for example, were planted on nearly 86 percent of U.S. cotton acres last year, yet Monsanto's Stone-ville brand of seed grew on just 12 percent of those acres, according to the U.S. Agriculture Department."

Senate Committee Probing Possible Natural-Gas Price Manipulation. The Wall Street Journal (2/7, C2, Fialka, Davis, 2.04M) reports, "The Senate Energy Committee is investigating whether futures traders are manipulating markets that set natural-gas prices for consumers, farmers and industries. Sen. Jeff Bingaman, the panel's chairman, has sent letters to two federal market regulators, asking them what they know about unusual price fluctuations that may have taken place, which could have the effect of artificially raising indexes used to establish market prices for natural gas." The "investigation aims to explore how federal agencies monitor such trades, and if possible, to identify the agents and motivations behind the alleged illegal trading."

Samsung Settles State Price-Fixing Claims For $90 Million. Bloomberg (2/7, Gullo) reports, "Samsung Electronics Co., the world's biggest memory chipmaker, agreed to pay $90 million to settle claims by California, New York, Illinois, 38 other states and consumers that it conspired to fix prices on some chips." Bloomberg continues, "The accord resolves claims that the unit of Seoul, South Korea-based Samsung Group and other chipmakers drove up prices, inflating the cost of computers and other electronics for consumers and state governments. Samsung agreed to help state officials pursue claims against other chipmakers." Bloomberg adds, "Samsung, Infineon AG and six other companies were sued by U.S. states in July on claims that the companies added billions of dollars to chip costs by fixing prices of dynamic random access memory, the most commonly used semiconductor memory product. So-called DRAM is used by Dell Inc. and Hewlett-Packard Co. in making personal computers, laptops, printers, mobile phones, digital cameras and digital music players. … 'Consumers, states and localities were the victims of an international conspiracy that artificially raised the price of memory chips,' New York Attorney General Andrew Cuomo said today in a statement. 'This settlement is a major step in recovering the overcharges that Samsung and its co-conspirators illegally foisted on consumers and taxpayers.'"

The Financial Times (2/7, Nuttall) reports, "The class-action suits filed in July last year arose from a justice department investigation begun in 2002. It uncovered one of the largest price-fixing schemes on record. … It led to $730m in fines and guilty pleas by Samsung and three other major manufacturers of dynamic random access memory (Dram) chips – Elpida, Hynix and Infineon. A fifth, Micron, admitted taking part but avoided federal criminal charges through its co-operation with the authorities." The Times adds, "The price-fixing suits had charged that Samsung and others reached secret agreements to inflate the prices of memory chips commonly installed in consumer desktop and notebook PCs."

The AP (2/7, Johnson) reports, "About $80 million of the settlement will go to consumers nationwide while $10 million will cover losses suffered by states and local governments, Cuomo's office said." The AP adds, "The settlement is subject to approval in federal court in San Francisco. New York, California and Illinois were the lead plaintiffs in the case. … The lawsuit was one of several filed following a U.S. Justice Department investigation that began in 2002 into whether computer chip companies conspired to manipulate the number of DRAM chips released to market in a scheme to inflate prices. The investigation resulted in more than $730 million in fines and guilty pleas from four companies - Samsung Electronics Co., Elpida Memory Inc., Infineon Technologies AG and Hynix Semiconductor Inc."

DOJ_NMG_0128618

Bush Visits Firm Once Accused Of Price-Fixing. The AP (2/7) reports, "President Bush preached the virtues of fiscal responsibility today at a company in Manassas, Virginia that recently settled a class-action lawsuit alleging it had engaged in price-fixing and violated antitrust laws." The AP continues, "Bush went to computer chip-maker Micron Technology Incorporated to talk about the budget he unveiled yesterday. He said Congress needs to set priorities in spending taxpayer money." The AP adds, "Micron Technology, based in Boise, Idaho, settled a federal class action lawsuit last month that was filed in 2002 on behalf of computer manufacturers who bought dynamic random-access memory chips, or DRAM from suppliers between April 1999 and June 2002. … The lawsuit is one of several filed after a U-S Justice Department investigation into whether computer chip companies conspired to manipulate the number of DRAM chips on the market to inflate prices. … The Justice Department granted Micron immunity from criminal charges in exchange for its cooperation. But the amnesty did not shield the company from lawsuits."

Apple's Jobs Calls For Dumping Online Copyright Protection. The Financial Times (2/7, Nuttall) reports, "Steve Jobs, Apple chief executive, on Tuesday called on the four major record companies to start selling songs online without the copy protection software known as digital rights management." The Times continues, "Apple has been under pressure in Europe to make its iTunes Music Store compatible with players other than the iPod. Consumer groups and agencies in Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Norway, the Netherlands and Sweden have made antitrust complaints against Apple in recent months. … 'Perhaps those [European countries] unhappy with the current situation should redirect their energies towards persuading the music companies to sell their music DRM – free,' he said in a rare statement published on Apple's website." The Times adds, "The songs sold on the service are protected by Apple's proprietary FairPlay software, which prevents users from making multiple copies for distribution. Mr Jobs said Apple had concluded that if it licenses FairPlay to other companies it could no longer guarantee to protect the music it licenses from the major labels – Vivendi's Universal Music, Sony BMG Music Entertainment, EMI and Warner Music Group. … Instead, he favours abolishing DRM entirely so any MP3 player could play music purchased from any online store."

The Los Angeles Times (2/7, Quinn) reports, "The letter, which can be seen at www.apple.com/hotnews/thoughtsonmusic, walks through the problems of anti-piracy software, also known as digital rights management, that is supposed to prevent consumers from copying digital music. … Jobs lists the problems with the software, which is often hacked and needs updating and prevents consumers from listening to their music wherever they like. He also points out that consumers are already buying compact discs and copying them digitally without facing controls to stop them. … What the letter doesn't spell out is how Apple and Microsoft were advocates for DRM use so that the music they sold through their online stores could only be played on their devices."

The Wall Street Journal (2/7, A1, Wingfield, Smith) reports, "In an 1,800-word online essay, Apple Inc.'s chief executive said the world's major music companies should consider allowing Apple and others to sell songs unfettered by anticopying software that prevents them from being shared or played however a consumer chooses. … Mr. Jobs contends that the recording industry isn't solving piracy with the technology, and could spur the market further if music lovers could buy music online without the restrictions. Many consumers resent the curbs on how they can listen to what they buy from online stores. Songs from one company's catalog, for example, won't work on another company's player -- a gridlock that has frustrated some consumers. Getting rid of the antipiracy software could make downloaded music as widely compatible with digital players in the market as compact discs are with CD players." The Journal adds, "While Mr. Jobs is positioning his proposal as a consumer-friendly step, it isn't clear whether the biggest music companies -- Warner Music Group Corp., EMI Group PLC, Vivendi SA's Universal Music Group, and Sony BMG, the joint venture of Sony Corp. and Bertelsmann AG -- will embrace his recommendation. Allowing online music sales without anticopying software would amount to a radical about-face for the recording industry, which several years ago viewed the technology as a remedy to rampant online piracy through file-sharing networks like the original Napster and Kazaa. Music heavyweights have long required Apple and others to use the technology -- known as digital-rights management, or DRM, software -- if they wish to sell their songs online."

DOJ_NMG_0128619

USA Today (2/7, Maney) reports, "Apple, which dominates the legitimate digital download market, uses DRM called FairPlay. Songs bought at iTunes can play only on PCs using iTunes software or on Apple's iPod. Songs with DRM from other companies such as Microsoft and RealNetworks won't play on iPods. … Apple has been accused of using FairPlay to lock consumers into iTunes. Jobs contests that, noting that just 3% of songs on an average iPod were bought through iTunes and have DRM. Songs copied from CDs and music files in the MP3 format can be played anywhere."

The New York Times (2/7, Markoff) reports, "He dismissed one possible alternative, in which Apple would license its own system, FairPlay, allowing competing digital players to play iTunes songs and letting other stores sell copy-protected music for the iPod. Mr. Jobs said that approach would only complicate enforcement of digital rights management, as myriad companies would have to coordinate software and hardware updates. … Instead, he proposed that labels could shed digital rights management altogether. Mr. Jobs pointed out that only 10 percent of all music sold last year was through an online store and that music is already easily loaded onto digital players from CDs, with no antipiracy features. Attaching digital rights management to music bought online has only limited the number of online music stores, he wrote." The Times notes, "Mr. Jobs's move comes as the music industry appears to be facing a crisis. Sales of its mainstay product — the album — continue to sink, and sales of digital music, including individual songs, have not increased fast enough to offset the decline. … With a paucity of hit releases to start the year, industrywide album sales are already down more than 15 percent from last year, the worst January performance since computerized sales tracking began in 1991."

The Washington Post (2/7, D3, Musgrove) reports, "Phil Leigh, senior analyst and president of Inside Digital Media, said Jobs's comments were legitimate, albeit a bit self-serving. … 'Jobs is trying to show that Apple is not the bad guy when it comes to proprietary formats,' Leigh said, noting that the open letter was an aggressive public-relations tactic by a company that eventually will have to renegotiate with the record companies. 'I think he's taking the offensive here.'" The Post notes, "Chris Castle, a music-industry lawyer who represented the original Napster, said the shift from CDs to digital music has hurt the music industry enough that it might be willing to consider Jobs's points. … 'I think the labels are finally starting to come around to this,' he said. 'There's more willingness to entertain this sort of thing than there ever has been.'"

Shareholders To Vote Today On Equity Office Sale. The Wall Street Journal (2/7, A3, Forsyth, Sender) reports, "With only hours until shareholders of Equity Office Properties Trust are to decide whether to sell the company to private-equity firm Blackstone Group, the outcome was still up in the air last evening." The Journal continues, "If Vornado Realty Trust comes in with a higher offer before the vote at noon EST today, it would likely delay the tally -- at least until the Equity Office board has time to consider whether any new offer resolves its reservations that Vornado's previous bids have had too many uncertainties." The Journal adds, "At stake in this high-noon gunfight is the nation's largest office portfolio and bragging rights to pulling off one of the largest leveraged buyouts in U.S. corporate history -- valued at $23 billion, not including the assumption of Equity Office's $16 billion in debt. But the risk for the eventual winner is considerably higher than when the bidding battle began in November with Blackstone's initial bid. … In addition to the size, the bidding battle involves two longtime kings in the commercial real estate world -- with Equity Office led by chairman Sam Zell and Vornado led by chief executive Steven Roth -- and a relative newcomer in Blackstone. Blackstone has become a huge player in real estate with acquisitions within the last 24 months, reflecting the aggressive strategy of Jonathan Gray, the 37-year-old head of its real estate group."

The New York Times (2/7, Pristin) reports, "Real estate investors waited yesterday to see if Vornado Realty Trust would try to top Blackstone's latest all-cash offer of $55.50 a share, which was approved during the night by Equity Office. … Equity Office shareholders are scheduled to vote today on the $39 billion bid by Blackstone, a private equity company." The Times adds, "If Vornado fails to raise its bid to win the deal, many investors will be surprised. Vornado's chief executive, Steven Roth, has said that buying Equity Office would make his company the dominant real estate investment trust in the office sector, with a strong portfolio of 'irreplaceable assets' in the markets where it is hardest for developers to put up new buildings. In addition to office buildings, the company owns shopping centers and showroom space."

DOJ_NMG_0128620

MGIC To Purchase Radian In $4.9 Billion Stock Deal. The Wall Street Journal (2/7, A4, Barris) reports, "MGIC Investment Corp., a provider of insurance on low-down-payment mortgages, said Tuesday it agreed to acquire Radian Group Inc., a global credit-risk management company, in a stock swap valued at about $4.9 billion." The Journal continues, "Under the agreement, Milwaukee-based MGIC said it will exchange 0.9658 share of its stock for each share of Radian. The terms don't appear to offer Radian shareholders any premium. Radian shares closed Monday down 44 cents at $60.84, while MGIC's offer was valued at $60.78 at Monday's close. … Shares of both companies jumped sharply in early afternoon trading Tuesday. Radian shares were up 9.3% at $66.47, while MGIC shares rose 11% to $69.70." The Journal adds, "The combined company, a mortgage and credit-risk insurer to be called MGIC Radian Financial Group Inc., will have assets of nearly $15 billion and primary mortgage insurance in force of more than $290 billion, the companies said. The combined company will have 'a broad and balanced mix of businesses including domestic mortgage insurance, financial guaranty, financial services and international credit enhancement,' the companies said. … MGIC Chief Executive Curt S. Culver will head the company until 2009, when he will cede the CEO job to Radian Chief Executive S.A. Ibrahim. Mr. Culver will pass the chairman post to Ibrahim in 2010. The board initially will be tilted 6-5 in MGIC's favor, but will add a sixth Radian director soon after the deal closes." The Journal notes, "MGIC is the parent of Mortgage Guaranty Insurance Corp., a provider of private mortgage insurance serving about 5,000 lenders nationwide and in Puerto Rico. MGIC had $176.5 billion in primary insurance in force covering 1.3 million mortgages as of Dec. 31. The company reported last month that its fourth-quarter earnings fell to $121.5 million from $128.1 million a year ago, as revenue slipped 1% to $367.2 million."

Midwest Management Resists AirTran's $345 Million Offer. USA Today (2/7, 3B, Adams) reports, "As the USA's biggest airlines jostle to get bigger and more powerful, little Midwest Airlines is happy to be itself: an anachronism. … But things could soon change for Midwest as a result of an ongoing hostile takeover effort being waged by Orlando-based AirTran Airways, the USA's third-biggest discounter." USA continues, "Milwaukee-based Midwest, which most East and West coast residents have probably never heard of, has no desire to get rich quick, swallow other airlines or be swallowed itself. It flies to cities in America's heartland that the major carriers would just as soon fly over. … Only Midwest, for example, flies non-stop from Omaha to Reagan Washington National, or from Kansas City non-stop to New York LaGuardia. Along the way, flight attendants bake chocolate chip cookies that are served free, still warm and fragrant. It recently completed its first full year of profit since 2000." USA adds, "The airline 'has built up an amazing love affair with its passengers that I've never seen the likes of,' says Midwest's marketing chief, Scott Dickson. If AirTran succeeds, he says, 'There will be no vestige of Midwest Airlines left.'" USA notes, "Over its objections, AirTran has launched a $345 million tender offer to acquire Midwest's shares directly from shareholders in hopes of forcing the board to sell. AirTran undertook the offer after Midwest's management rejected outright an earlier offer to buy the airline. … AirTran, which owns a few hundred Midwest shares, has gone to court to try to get Midwest's full shareholder list and is lobbying Midwest's institutional investors, who own up to half of Midwest's shares. Shareholders' deadline to tender shares is March 8, extended from an earlier deadline of Feb. 8."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Groups Reopen Suit Against EPA Over Pesticide Ban. The AP (2/7, Kim) reports, "Farmworkers and environmental groups have reopened a lawsuit against the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency in an attempt to force it to more quickly phase out a pesticide they say has been poisoning fieldworkers for decades." The AP continues, The federal lawsuit challenges a decision by the EPA last November to set a 2012 timetable for phasing out the pesticide azinphos-methyl, known as guthion or AZM. … 'These pesticides put thousands of workers at risk of serious illness every year,' Erik Nicholson of the United Farm Workers of America said Monday in a news release. 'It is inexcusable for EPA to allow AZM to continue poisoning workers for six more years.' … The pesticide has been used on apples, cherries, pears and other crops since the late 1950s." The AP adds, "The farmworkers and environmental groups, represented by the environmental law firm Earthjustice, sued the EPA in federal court in Seattle in 2004, arguing that the agency was wrong to continue allowing the use of a pesticide that could cause dizziness, vomiting, seizures, paralysis, loss of mental function and even death. The lawsuit was put on hold when the EPA agreed to reconsider the use of AZM and another pesticide, phosmet, which is used on orchard crops and blueberries. … Last November, the EPA decided to end the use of AZM on nursery stocks and Brussels sprouts by Sept. 30, 2007. The phase-out for nuts was extended until Oct. 30, 2009, and for apples, blueberries, cherries, pears and parsley until Sept. 30, 2012. … The EPA decided to lengthen the phase-out time but also progressively limit the amount of AZM that would be available during the period, Enesta Jones, an EPA spokeswoman, said Monday."

DOJ_NMG_0128621

Gore Says Bush Administration Paying Scientists To Dispute Global Warming. CNN.com (2/7) reports, "Former Vice President Al Gore said in an interview on Tuesday the Bush administration is now paying scientists to dispute global warming since the administration can no longer argue against it." He "said, 'they've lost the argument and they don't want to stop dumping all this pollution into the Earth's atmosphere. The only thing they have left is cash and now they're offering cash for so-called skeptics who will try to confuse people about what the science really say. But it's unethical because now the time has come when we have to act.'"

"Insiders Poll" Shows Parties Divided On Global Warming. The National Journal (2/7) provides the results of its "Insiders Poll" of 113 members of Congress on global warming. Asked whether "it's been proven beyond a reasonable doubt that the Earth is warming because of man-made problems," 95% of Democrats and 13% of Republicans said "yes." Asked which actions to reduce global warming they could possibly support, 88% of Democrats and 19% of Republicans said they could support mandatory carbon dioxide emissions.

China: Richer Nations Bear Primary Responsibility To Combat Global Warming. The New York Times (2/7, Yardley, 1.16M) reports, "China said Tuesday that wealthier countries must take the lead in curbing greenhouse gas emissions and refused to say whether it would agree to any mandatory emissions limits that might hamper its booming economy." A Foreign Ministry spokeswoman "said China was willing to contribute to an international effort to combat global warming but placed the primary responsibility on richer, developed nations that have been polluting for much longer." Her "comments, combined with another briefing on Tuesday by the country's leading climate expert, represented China's first official response to a landmark report issued last week by a United Nations panel of scientists that declared global warming is 'unequivocal' and warned that immediate action must be taken to prevent harmful consequences."

Legacy Of Radiation Illness Stirs Opposition To Divine Strake. The Washington Post (2/7, A6, Geis, 690K) reports from St. George, Utah, "The federal government reassured the townspeople they were in no danger as it detonated 952 bombs in Nevada over four decades. But thousands of people who lived downwind of the test site got radiation-related cancer, and the town of 50,000 has its own cancer-treatment center today. So when word got out recently that the government wants to test a huge conventional bomb in Nevada ... people in St. George felt an unwelcome blast from the past. At a series of emotional meetings last month in Las Vegas, St. George, Salt Lake City and the Idaho capital of Boise, people who live downwind of the Nevada Test Site expressed fear that if the government goes ahead with its code-named Divine Strake test, radioactive dust from previous tests will blow their way. ... Like others in southern Nevada, [Rep. Jim Matheson] speaks bitterly of declassified documents that show the government did not detonate nuclear bombs when the wind blew toward Las Vegas. They waited until the wind blew toward St. George."

EPA Chief Under Fire At Senate Hearing. The AP (2/7, Werner) reports, "The head of the Environmental Protection Agency faced down hostile critics Tuesday in his first committee appearance before the Democratic-led Congress, denying accusations that agency decisions last year rolled back environmental safeguards. 'These decisions and actions all accelerate the pace of environmental protection. They all deliver environmental results,' EPA Administrator Stephen Johnson told the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee." The new committee chair, Democratic Sen. Barbara Boxer, replied, "Nobody's fooled by this. … EPA has gone too long without meaningful oversight."

DOJ_NMG_0128622

McClatchy (2/7, Whitney) says Boxer "lambasted" Johnson over "environmental rollbacks," and "detailed six areas where she said the agency's decisions have benefited industries at the expense of public health." Said Boxer, "I want to send a clear signal to EPA and to this administration: We are watching...and no longer will EPA rollbacks quietly escape scrutiny."

Energy Department Seeks To End Funding For Geothermal Power. The Christian Science Monitor (2/7, Clayton, 59K) reports that new geothermal power techniques have the potential to provide "[e]nough power to provide 10 percent of US electricity by 2050 – with near-zero emissions of greenhouse gases. That's the promise of 'enhanced geothermal systems,' or EGS, says a recent report by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology." There "are just two major catches. First, about $800 million in research and development is needed over the next decade to make the drilling technology cost-effective. Second, the Department of Energy is trying to kill the program by ending its funding." On Monday, DOE unveiled a "budget with more funding for nuclear power, alternative fuels, and science programs – but nothing for geo-thermal." Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid wrote in a Feb 1 letter to Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman, "The administration has been surprisingly hostile to geothermal energy research development and deployment." Reid "asked the DOE to restore funding to at least 2006 levels and to assure Congress of continued funding."

Conservation Easements Give Tax Incentives To Landowners. The Wall Street Journal (2/7, D1, Silverman, 2.04M) reports that landowners can be "encouraged by recent tax legislation" that allows tax breaks when owners place a permanent "conservation easement" on their land. This allows landowners to continue to use undeveloped land "for farming and timber but most of it can never be developed." While, "landowners who place conservation easements on their scenic, environmentally sensitive or historic properties have long been able to get tax breaks from the federal government…some states have also begun offering tax incentives. Now, a little-noticed provision…passed last summer has made the federal tax breaks even more generous" which "has spurred a sharp increase in the number of landowners interested in placing easements on their property." Although "the law is designed to encourage easement donations by allowing larger tax deductions," the IRS has become more vigilant in monitoring potential easement abuses resulting in inflated deductions.

House Committee Approves Bill Allowing Indian Tribes To Receive Anti-Meth Grants. The AP (2/7) reports a House subcommittee on Tuesday "took a step toward helping Indian communities battle crisis levels of methamphetamine use. A House Judiciary subcommittee passed legislation sponsored by New Mexico Rep. Tom Udall…that would allow territories and Indian tribes to receive law enforcement grants to battle meth use. Udall said larger meth legislation passed by Congress last year 'unintentionally left out' Indian tribes as possible applicants for some grant programs. This legislation would clarify that law so the tribes would be eligible."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

US, Latin American Authorities Gather For Anti-Gang Summit. The Los Angeles Times (2/7, McGreevy, 850K) reports, "As director general of the El Salvador National Civil Police," Rodrigo Avila-Aviles "is here to talk to the FBI about what can be done about the number of gang members moving back and forth between Central America and the United States. … 'As a general rule, the guys who have more status in the gangs in El Salvador are the ones who have been deported from the United States, who have been in prison here,' Avila-Aviles said Tuesday as he and the heads of police forces for four other Central American nations prepared to discuss the issue today with their U.S. counterparts. … But the traffic goes both ways, with U.S. law enforcement struggling to deal with an influx of gang members from Central America and Mexico." The Times notes, "Cooperative measures announced as part of a four-part plan this week by U. S. Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales include fugitive apprehension, international coordination on deportations, information sharing, and cross-border training and prevention programs. To better identify, track and apprehend gang members, the FBI will accelerate implementation of the Central American Fingerprinting Exploitation system, Gonzales said."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/7, Glazer) reports that in the past, "Los Angeles' pervasive and violent street gangs were seen as a local problem and not part of an international criminal web, even as some gangs such as MS-

DOJ_NMG_0128623

13 and 18th Street, oozed across borders into Mexico, Guatemala, El Salvador and Honduras. The three-day summit beginning Wednesday in Los Angeles reflects a recent shift in that philosophy. It features top officials from several Central American and local U.S. police departments, along with the FBI." The AP notes, "Robert B. Loosle, who oversees the FBI's gang investigations in Los Angeles, said crimes committed by gangs in Central America serve as a bellwether for potential criminal enterprises in the U.S. Particularly noteworthy, Loosle said, was a spike in extortion rackets committed by gangs in El Salvador. … 'Since members of gangs travel freely across borders, we need to pay attention to new trends they bring with them,' Loosle said."

The Los Angeles Daily News (2/7, Uranga) also notes, "Local police are afraid some of the more brazen tactics Central American gangs use will emerge in Los Angeles. 'Their tactics are a lot more vicious than other gangs, they are more violent and they are everywhere,' said Robert Loofle, the FBI agent overseeing Los Angeles' criminal division. 'They use intimidation to get what they want, they will commit a vicious homicide to show their power and the force, then easily cross the border. We have to clamp down now so they don't evolve into something stronger and more vicious.'" BBC World Service (2/7, Willis) also is reporting this morning on the Los Angeles summit.

23 Indicted On Drug Charges In "Operation Polar Express." The Boston Globe (2/3, Murphy, Radin, 413K) reports, "They worked out of nondescript little storefronts around Dorchester and Quincy: a flower shop, nail salon, grocery store, and wood floor finishing business," but "law enforcement officials said the unidentified businesses were covers for members of Vietnamese drug rings who had been smuggling ecstasy and marijuana from Canada over the past two years and peddling it throughout Greater Boston. Four indictments handed down by a federal grand jury Thursday…charged 23 people, ranging in age from 22 to 56, with conspiring to sell ecstasy or marijuana, and in some cases both. Three of them were also charged with money laundering." The Globe noted, "A task force of federal agents, state troopers, and local police tapped telephones, sifted through trash, made undercover drug buys, and conducted exhaustive surveillance during a 15-month probe dubbed Operation Polar Express that led to the four indictments, according to law enforcement officials."

The Newton (MA) Daily Tribune (2/3, Roy) added, "'Complete cooperation among federal, state, and local law enforcement partners made it possible to dismantle this drug-dealing organization,' said U.S. Attorney Michael J. Sullivan. … June W. Stansbury, DEA special agent in charge, said the drugs were marketed using images such as Superman, a bat, a kangaroo and even the Statue of Liberty."

Former Los Angeles "Drug Boss" Gets Life Sentence. The Dayton (OH) Daily News (2/6) reported an "ex-Los Angeles drug boss was sentenced Monday in federal court to life in prison for supplying hundreds of pounds of cocaine to the Dayton area. A jury in September convicted Ronald Taylor, 47, on charges accusing him of operating a continuing criminal enterprise and conspiracy to distribute and possess more than 300 pounds of cocaine." Prosecutors said the operation "funneled cocaine from L.A. to Dayton, Columbus, New York City, Buffalo, Milwaukee, Detroit, Nashville and Washington, D.C., between September 1999 and July 2001."

Authorities Link Gambling Losses To San Diego Charger Safety's Cough Syrup Case. The San Diego Union-Tribune (2/7) reports authorities said frequent gambling losses at area casinos "apparently led Chargers safety Terrence Kiel to seek other means of income, including the shipping of codeine-based cough syrup that got him arrested last year. … Kiel, 26, is due in court today for a trial readiness hearing on five felony charges related to the cough syrup matter. Kiel's attorney, Bob Grimes, said he hoped to reach a deal with prosecutors and the judge, and that it could include Kiel's addressing of the gambling issue. … Kiel was arrested in September after Drug Enforcement Administration agents intercepted two express mail packages containing 18 pint bottles full of the drug. Authorities said Kiel admitted to shipping the cough syrup to his native Texas, where it can sell for up to $325 on the street and where it is mixed with soft drinks."

Connecticut Cocaine Ring Investigation Nets 3 More Guilty Pleas. The Connecticut Post (2/7) reports the front for a cocaine distribution ring "was an auto dealership. The carriers were often cars packed with cocaine and driven [to Bridgeport] from New York. … That is, until the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's High Intensity Drug Task Force wiretapped telephones at East End

DOJ_NMG_0128624

Auto…and videotaped drug deals. … Three more ring members…pleaded guilty this week, just before the scheduled start of their trial on cocaine-trafficking charges." The three guilty pleas "bring to 13 the number of ring members who have admitted their roles in the operation." The Post says all three pleaded guilty to "conspiring to possess with the intent to distribute cocaine."

North Dakota Issues Industrial Hemp Licenses To 2 Farmers. There are more than 100 media references to North Dakota issuing what the AP says are the nation's first licenses to grow industrial hemp.

The AP (2/6, Nicholson) reported North Dakota "issued the nation's first licenses to grow industrial hemp Tuesday to two farmers who still must meet federal requirements before they can plant the crop. The farmers must get approval from the Drug Enforcement Administration, which treats hemp much the way it does marijuana and has not allowed commercial hemp production but has said it would consider applications to grow it. … The state issued permits Tuesday to Wayne Hauge and Dave Monson, who is also a legislator." The state Agriculture Department "is processing 16 other hemp applications," according to state Agriculture Commissioner Roger Johnson.

In a separate story, the AP (2/6) reports the first two North Dakota farmers licensed to "grow industrial hemp have different plans for their future crops, assuming the federal government allows them to be cultivated." Hauge "said he wants to grow and sell registered hemp seed to other farmers." Monson "wants to sell both hemp seed and fiber." A version of the AP story was used by ABC News, CBS News, FOX News, WLS-TV in Chicago, the New York Times, Washington Post, Los Angeles Times, San Francisco Chronicle, San Diego Union-Tribune, Miami Herald, Houston Chronicle, Boston Globe, Kansas City Star, and North Dakota's Bismarck Tribune.

Lawmakers Seek New Tactics In Afghanistan, Say DEA, Other Agencies Aren't Working Together. The Los Angeles Times (2/7) reports four Republican lawmakers on a committee with oversight of U.S. policy in Afghanistan "are calling on the Pentagon and State Department to dramatically change their tactics in that country to better contain its growing insurgency and flow of opium to the rest of the world. In a letter dated today, the GOP House members are urging the Bush administration to act quickly to counter a host of problems in Afghanistan that they say are being made worse by mismanagement and misplaced priorities. … The letter describes in detail how various U.S. agencies such as the Pentagon, State Department and Drug Enforcement Administration are not working together and essentially are fighting separate wars against insurgents and drugs even though they believe that the booming heroin trade is fueling the insurgency and financing terrorist attacks." The Times says the letter was written by Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.), Mike Pence (R-Ind.), Elton Gallegly (R-Simi Valley) and Dana Rohrabacher (R-Huntington Beach), all members of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Bush's Proposed Budget Eliminates $2.2 Million In Counter-Drug Aid For Venezuela. The AP (2/7) reports Venezuela's foreign minister on Tuesday "dismissed the U.S. government's decision to cut anti-drug aid to the South American nation, saying it does not need money from 'the devil.' Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said Monday that President Bush's proposed 2007-2008 budget eliminated $2.2 million in counter-drug aid originally requested for Venezuela." President Hugo Chavez "broke off cooperation with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration in August 2005 accusing its agents of espionage, and has refused to draw up a new agreement since. … Venezuelan officials say they are fighting drug trafficking with increasing success, but Washington claims that because of corruption and a weak judicial system the amount of drugs smuggled through Venezuela is increasing."

The AP (2/6) also reports the U.S. military's lone outpost in South America is "allowed no more than eight planes at a time. But these surveillance planes play a vital role in keeping Andean cocaine and heroin from reaching the United States and are responsible for about 60 percent of drug interdiction in the eastern Pacific. That matters little to newly inaugurated President Rafael Correa, whose rejection of a U.S. military presence in Ecuador reflects widespread resentment over Washington's foreign policy in a region where President Bush's administration now has few reliable allies. 'We've said clearly that in 2009 the agreement will not be renewed because we believe that sovereignty consists of not having foreign soldiers on our home soil,' Correa said recently." The AP adds, "The State Department has recommended eliminating all drug interdiction aid for Venezuela, which got

DOJ_NMG_0128625

$2.2 million in the current fiscal year, and slashing overall aid to Ecuador some 30 percent to $20 million."

Ecuador Criticizes Proposed Cutback In Aid. The Financial Times (2/7) reports Ecuador "criticized Washington on Tuesday for proposing a 40-percent cut in anti-drug aid to the Andean region over the next two years, a move that will be seen as retaliation for the election of leftwing nationalistic governments hostile to the U.S. … In the budget he presented on Monday, President…Bush proposed a cut in the Andean counter-drug initiative from $722m last year to $570m this year and $443m in 2008. … The cuts will be seen in the region as a response to the election of hostile governments in Ecuador and Bolivia, and the failure of others to cooperate fully in the 'war on drugs.'"

IMMIGRATION:

LATimes Criticizes Bush Provision On Aid For Incarcerating Illegals. The Los Angeles Times (2/7, 850K), in an editorial, writes that President Bush "has talked a consistently good game about the federal government's responsibility to take a lead role in dealing with the unique challenges of immigration. But when budget time comes around, he's all talk, and California is once again left holding the bill. In what has become an annual ritual, Bush is seeking to place the entire burden of jailing criminal illegal immigrants on individual states. His new budget would eliminate the State Criminal Alien Assistance Program, which has provided meager federal assistance to states that house a disproportionate share of the non-federal population of illegal immigrant inmates. … The Bush administration should be honest about the real costs of illegal immigration."

WPost Blasts Virginia GOP Stance On Illegal Immigration. The Washington Post (2/7, A16, 690K), in an editorial, writes, "Republican state lawmakers in Virginia have advanced a grab bag of legislation designed to hound, harass and hassle illegal immigrants. The idea, as expressed by the author of one such bill, Del. Jackson H. Miller of Manassas, is 'to make Virginia an unwelcome place if you are in this country illegally.' Translation: Drive the immigrants out of the state. In this the bills are overwhelmingly likely to fail, since most immigrants are likely to remain near jobs despite official persecution. But the bills do threaten to push undocumented immigrants further underground, forcing them to live in fear, draw their curtains and keep their children indoors even as they fill a niche in the local economy.'

TAX:

Court Bars Minnesota Tax Preparer. The AP (2/7) reports, "A St. Paul (MN) tax preparer accused of filing false tax returns that overstated deductions for recent immigrants is now barred from preparing federal tax returns for others." The AP continues, "The Department of Justice said a federal court in Minnesota issued the permanent injunction order against Nash Sonibare, who operated Liberty Financial Group in St. Paul." The AP adds, "The Justice Department lawsuit alleged that the Nigerian immigrant repeatedly prepared returns for his customers containing false or inflated credits and deductions. The complaint alleged that many of Sonibare's customers were from various African countries and had limited English-language skills."

Employees Face Deadline To Drain Flex Accounts. In his "Tax Report" column for the Wall Street Journal (2/7, D5), Tom Herman writes, "Time is running out for many employees to drain their flexible spending accounts for 2006. … More companies are offering these accounts, which let you use pretax dollars to pay for health-care and dependent-care expenses. But there is an important catch: Under what is known as the use-it-or-lose-it rule, you must spend every penny you set aside before the deadline or lose the balance." Herman adds, "The deadline varies among employers. Many have set a cutoff date of March 15 -- only about five weeks from now. That represents a big change from just two years ago, when the deadline typically was Dec. 31. After congressional pressure, the Treasury changed its rules in 2005 and allowed employers to give employees a grace period of as much as 2½ months into the following year. … Initially, many employers were undecided about whether to offer the grace period. Health-care specialists now say most large employers they work with offer the additional time." Herman notes, "Separately, a new law may offer additional relief for some FSA participants. Individuals can now make a one-time transfer to a health savings account, which is for people with high-deductible health-insurance plans, from a health-care flexible-spending account or from a health reimbursement plan. Health reimbursement plans allow employees to use employer contributions to pay for medical bills. … This provision is part of a tax bill signed by President Bush Dec. 20."

DOJ_NMG_0128626

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Promotes Budget, Defends Tax Cuts.

Fox News' Special Report (2/6, Hume) reported President Bush "argued today that the best way to ensure a strong economy is to keep taxes low and encourage businesses to grow. … Promoting his new budget in Virginia, President Bush urged Congress to be fiscally responsible and to spur more economic growth by making his tax cuts permanent." Bush was shown saying, "Cutting taxes created the incentives to save, invest and consume which cause the economy to grow. As economy grows, the pie gets bigger, the tax revenues increase. That is what happens."

The New York Times (2/7, Weisman, 1.16M) describes Bush as "combative in defending the budget," and quotes him saying it "can work if Congress resists the temptation to raise your taxes." Bush also "called on Democrats to do more than criticize. 'Now's the time for members of the Congress in both parties to bring their best ideas to the table as to how to solve the problems involved with entitlement programs,' Mr. Bush said, referring to Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid."

Bloomberg (2/7, Murray) says "Bush's budget for the fiscal year that begins October 1 would increase federal spending 4.2% over the current year, even as funding for agencies outside defense and homeland security would rise an average of 1% in each of the next four years. That effectively is a cut because it is less than the rate of inflation, which was 2.5% in 2006." The Senate Budget Committee chairman, Senator Conrad, a Democrat of North Dakota, "said yesterday that the president's spending plan is 'filled with debt and deception.'"

This morning, NPR (2/7) reports Bush "stuck around to talk at Micron Technologies for only 20 minutes or so. He told workers that his new $2.9 trillion budget is set up like a family's budget, or a company's budget – setting priorities, making tough choices and eliminating what's not needed. The President said his proposals, if Congress enacts them, would balance the Federal budget by 2012, a few years after he's out of the White House. On Capitol Hill, Democrats said the President and his staff are lowballing future costs for the war in Iraq, while trying to extend tax cuts for the wealthy. The White House said lawmakers who declare the budget dead on arrival before looking closely are not being responsible with taxpayer money."

The Washington Post (2/7, D4, Kang, 690K) reports, "Micron Technology's plant in Manassas makes some of the most sophisticated memory chips in the world, semiconductors made from wafers of silicon 300 millimeters thin that run MP3 players, smart phones and satellite navigation systems. But the finer details of the 650,000-square-foot plant's operations may have escaped the company's most esteemed visitor yesterday." In his remarks, Bush said they "tried to explain all the big machines that were there to a history major. I played like I understood." Bush "nevertheless praised the company for its growth, exports and creation of high-skill jobs -- a model, he said, for the nation's economic growth." The President also "promised to balance the federal budget by 2012 by 'keeping taxes low and being wise about how we spend your money,'" and "said his hallmark economic policies -- the promotion of trade and tax cuts -- have helped companies like Micron grow."

The Phoenix Business Journal (2/7, Clabaugh) notes "Micron began investing in its memory chip plant on Godwin Drive in 2005. The plant has undergone a $3.5 billion upgrade, and the expansion has created about 1,000 new jobs. The plant manufactures both DRAM memory and NAND flash memory chips, demand for which has surged with the popularity of MP3 players and cell phones with cameras. " Micron "actually downsized the facility when it bought the plant from Toshiba in 2002, slashing 560 of its then 1,200 jobs, part of company-wide cost-cutting. The plant now employees 4,000, according to Micron spokesman Dan Francisco, who describes them as well-paid jobs held by highly-trained technology workers."

But the AP (2/7, Feller) says Bush "preached the virtues of fiscal responsibility Tuesday at a company that recently settled a class-action lawsuit alleging it had engaged in price-fixing and violated antitrust laws." Micron Technology "settled a class-action lawsuit last month that was filed in 2002 in US District Court in San Francisco on behalf of customers, generally computer manufacturers and others, who bought dynamic random-access memory chips, or DRAM, directly from suppliers between April 1, 1999, and June 30, 2002." The White House "knew about the lawsuit when it scheduled Bush's appearance, deputy press secretary Dana Perino said." The lawsuit "is one of several filed following a US Justice Department investigation into whether computer-chip companies conspired to manipulate the number of DRAM chips released to market in a scheme to inflate prices." The Los Angeles Times (2/7, Gerstenzang, 850K) runs a similar story, noting Bush "promoted his newly released federal budget Tuesday at a company that recently settled a class-action lawsuit over alleged price-fixing and antitrust violations." Bush, adds the Times, "called Micron an 'innovative company' that is made up of 'smart people back there making the products that people want.'" Bush "made no reference to the lawsuit."

DOJ_NMG_0128627

Bush Officials Defend Budget Plan From Fierce Democratic Criticism. The AP (2/7, Crutsinger) reports Bush's "$2.9 trillion budget plan on Capitol Hill got a predictably cool reception from congressional Democrats Tuesday, while Bush's GOP allies said it's up to the new majority to come up with an alternative that balances the budget without raising taxes." House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Range "said he saw Bush's budget -- which appeals to anti-tax GOP conservatives while curbing Democratic priorities -- as a missed opportunity for Bush to reach out to Democrats, who for the first time in Bush's presidency control both the House and Senate." House Budget Committee Chairman John Spratt Jr. "said the Bush plan shortchanges domestic programs such as heating subsidies for the poor, education and the State Children's Health Insurance Program." White House budget director Rob Portman "disputed contentions by Democrats that the budget achieves its projected $61 billion surplus in 2012 by adopting overly optimistic economic assumptions." And US Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson said "the reductions in the new budget in spending on Medicare and Medicaid would lay the foundation for more comprehensive reform of the benefit programs."

The Washington Post (2/7, A4, Montgomery, Lee, 690K) reports Administration officials "dispatched to Capitol Hill to defend…Bush's budget received a frosty reception yesterday from congressional Democrats, who argued that the president's proposal to target health care, education and other Democratic priorities suggests a White House more interested in scoring political points than in genuine compromise." The $2.9 trillion "budget blueprint contains little to appeal to, but much to infuriate, the Democratic majority, Democrats said. In a series of hearings, they rattled off a list of their objections: More than $100 billion to be sliced from projected Medicare and Medicaid spending. Further restrictions on the federal food-stamp program. Insufficient cash to maintain health coverage for millions of children. And deep cuts proposed for a range of programs that help communities put police on the street and fund community projects."

Chances For Bipartisan Compromise Examined. The Christian Science Monitor (2/7, Chaddock, 59K) reports "behind the tough talk" over the reception of President Bush's budget on Capitol Hill, "conditions exist for a potential compromise in this year's budget negotiations." Democratic congressional leaders "are convinced that to keep that control after 2008 – and even to take back the White House – they need to show that they can govern. That means avoiding a budget train wreck and completing spending bills for the next fiscal year." Meanwhile, "an unpopular president is looking to leave a domestic legacy." Robert Bixby, executive director of the Concord Coalition, said, "There's an opportunity for compromise this year, because if Bush wants to get anything done in the last two years, he's going to have to work with the Democratic Congress to do it." Bixby added, "If Democrats come across as just being obstructionist or tax-and-spend, the public could take offense. Presuming that they both want to accomplish something, there's an opportunity."

In an opposing view, the AP (2/7, Taylor) says in an analysis article, "Rather than improve prospects of agreement with Democrats, President Bush's proposal for next year seems to have left the budget kitchen in turmoil. Bush's budget appeals to anti-tax GOP conservatives and advocates of private accounts within Social Security while slighting Democratic priorities like health insurance coverage for children in low-income families." House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel said, "I don't think that I can tell the president what to put on the table and not to put on the table, but I can tell him, 'don't pick a damn fight.'"

Lieberman Calls For "War On Terror Tax." The Washington Times (2/7, Dinan, 88K) says Democrats "are left with few good alternatives other than tax increases if they hope to boost spending and match the president's goal of balancing the budget by 2012. It took an independent, Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, who called for a new 'war on terrorism tax,' to broach the issue of tax increases." Said Lieberman, "People keep saying that we're not asking sacrifice of anybody but our military in this war, and some civilians who are working on it. … When you put together the [Department of Defense] budgets with Homeland Security budgets, we need to ask people to help us in a way that they know when they pay more it will go for their security."

DOJ_NMG_0128628

Bush Budget Raises $81 Billion Through Higher "User Fees." McClatchy (2/7, Hall) reports the Bush Administration "may be squarely against new taxes, but its proposed fiscal 2008 budget seeks to raise almost $81 billion in new revenue over the next five years by hiking user fees and other charges on taxpayers and businesses." While "technically, changes to these fees aren't taxes," for "anyone who must pay them - everyone from recreational hikers to war veterans - it's a question of semantics." Bush would "raise more than $15 billion through 2012 by allowing the Defense Department to raise enrollment fees and deductibles for medical care provided to military retirees under age 65. It would also raise retail pharmacy co-payments for all military retirees." The president "also seeks to limit the growth in health care subsidies for high-income beneficiaries of Medicare, the federal health-insurance program for the elderly. His budget estimates collecting $5.5 billion over five years through 'reduced subsidies for certain high-income beneficiaries.'"

Bush Plan Said To Achieve Balance Through "Stealth Tax." In her Washington Post column (2/7, A17), Ruth Marcus says, "The only way the administration achieves its balance" by 2012 "is by assuming that it will continue to rake in billions of dollars in revenue from the alternative minimum tax. More than billions, actually: CBO estimates that if left unchanged, the AMT would bring in an extra $1 trillion through 2017." So "the president achieves balance only with a stealth tax increase in the form of the AMT. If he means, as he says and nearly everyone agrees, to fix the AMT, that revenue has to come from somewhere else." Figures "compiled by the Urban Institute-Brookings Institution Tax Policy Center demonstrate the AMT's dramatic effect. If nothing is done to fix the AMT and the Bush tax cuts are extended as he wants, 89 percent of married families with two or more children and incomes between $75,000 and $100,000 will be hit by the AMT by 2010 -- compared with less than 1 percent in 2006. By 2017, almost half of all taxpayers -- 53 million -- will owe the AMT. The tax will hit two-thirds of those making between $75,000 and $100,000 and 90 percent of those making $100,000 or more."

Democrats May Buck Bush On Child Health Insurance Funding. The AP (2/7, Evans) reports Democrats "may try to override a decision by President Bush to leave stopgap children's health insurance money out of his 2007 emergency war spending proposal." Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "asked the president last week to propose $745 million in supplemental spending for the State Children's Health Insurance Program, or SCHIP, which primarily covers children in low-income working families." Bush "declined the lawmakers' request in the $93 billion emergency war spending proposal he submitted Monday to cover the remainder of 2007. But Democrats, eager to show policy differences with the White House, are saying they may add the $745 million when the bill comes up in the coming weeks." If "allocated, the new money would keep 14 states with looming shortfalls from having to cut off coverage until Congress renews the program later this year.'

Cancer Treatment Groups Limit Trials Over Funding Worries. The Wall Street Journal (2/7, Marcus, 2.04M) reports the "10 federally funded cancer cooperative groups, which enroll nearly half of the patients in the nation who are participating in cancer trials, have begun to shut down trials and stop studying certain cancers amid funding concerns." Robert L. Comis, "president and chairman of the Coalition of Cancer Cooperative Groups, a nonprofit group comprising cancer centers, hospitals and patient- advocacy groups that work to increase participation in clinical trials, said 3,000 patient spots in clinical trials will be eliminated in 2007 at centers around the U.S. Although the decrease will affect all cancers, among the hardest-hit will be rarer cancers such as sarcoma, rare childhood tumors and head-and-neck cancers, Dr. Comis said; some of the cooperative groups are totally eliminating trials in those diseases."

Critics Say Budget Lacks Funding To Meet President's Fuel Goal. The Wall Street Journal (2/7, A8, Hitt, 2.04M) reports, "In his State of the Union address…Bush set an ambitious goal of cutting U.S. gasoline use 20% in the next 10 years. Now that Mr. Bush has unveiled his blueprint for federal spending, it isn't clear he is putting enough money on the table to accomplish that goal." Bush "is calling for millions of dollars in new spending to boost development of alternative fuels, chief among them ethanol." But "[m]any industry officials and lawmakers found the Bush plan wanting after sifting through the details yesterday. They said much broader federal action will be needed, especially to meet the president's goal to have the country using 35 billion gallons of alternative and renewable fuels by 2017, quadruple the current federal mandate."

Bush Budget Said To Give Airlines "Massive Tax Cut." In a USA Today op-ed (2/7, 10A), Ed Bolen, president of the National Business Aviation Association, says, "The president's budget, released Monday, is a sweetheart deal for the airlines. It would give them a massive tax cut, to be paid for largely by a 'general aviation' industry that serves many of the nation's small and mid-sized businesses and their communities." In "supporting the president's budget, the airlines will likely defend their tax break as an opportunity to provide consumers with cheaper ticket prices. But, if history is a guide, this would be just another empty promise. Twice in the past decade, the airlines' federal taxes lapsed and, according to a 2004 Government Accountability Office report, 'carriers generally raised base airfares.'"

DOJ_NMG_0128629

Rangel Open To Adding Some Tax Breaks To Minimum Wage Bill. The AP (2/7, Kuhnhenn) reports, "The chairman of the House taxwriting committee said Tuesday he would be willing to link tax breaks for small business to a hike in the minimum wage but that the $8 billion tax package adopted by the Senate was unacceptable." The comments by Rep. Charles Rangel, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, "were the first public acknowledgment by a top House Democrat that some tax cuts might be necessary to win approval of an increase in the federal wage floor." But Rangel "left no doubt that he would reject the Senate tax package -- worth $8.3 billion over 10 years. He refused to speculate on what types of tax cuts would be acceptable and placed the burden for lowering the tax package on Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, Max Baucus, D-Mont."

Unions Press Democrats To Oppose Fast Track. The Hill (2/7, Swanson) reports, "The AFL-CIO, United Autoworkers and other groups representing organized labor are pressing Democrats to deny the Bush administration an extension of its authority to send free-trade deals to Congress for up or down votes, partly by reminding lawmakers of the role trade played in Democrats' re-taking of majorities in the House and Senate." Labor groups "already helped organize a letter to House Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) from 39 members of the freshman House Democratic class that said the 'vocal stand against the administration's misguided trade agenda' was vital to their electoral success." AFL-CIO Assistant Director for International Economics Thea Lee "does not completely rule out fast track for the Bush administration, but said the policy would have to be overhauled fundamentally from the existing authority. Noting the letter from freshman Democrats to Rangel, she said last year's elections have placed labor in a strengthened position for battles over trade policy this year."

Senate Maneuvering Could Snarl Fiscal Year 2007 Funding Bill. Roll Call (2/7, Pierce) reports Senate Democrats and Republicans "are headed for a classic game of chicken this week over the nine remaining fiscal 2007 appropriations bills." Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) is "poised to bring up a joint funding resolution for 13 Cabinet agencies, Congress and numerous independent agencies as early as today, but he has said repeatedly that he will not permit any Senators to offer amendments to the measure." Reid's stance has "prompted Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) to threaten a Republican filibuster, and both sides are waiting to see who will blink before a possible government shutdown upon the expiration of the current continuing resolution on Feb. 15." Senate Appropriations ranking member Thad Cochran (R-Miss.) said Republicans "are likely to call Reid's bluff and oppose his expected efforts to cut off debate, or invoke cloture, on the $463 billion measure. Reid would need 60 votes to prevail on cloture and move the funding resolution toward passage." Cochran said, "I don't think they can get cloture. We'll be protesting the process."

House Democrats Prepare Rollout Of Long Term Agenda. Roll Call (2/7, Yachnin) reports, "Preparing to return the House to regular order after an initial legislative sprint full of popular bills and closed rules, Democratic leaders said Tuesday they are finally primed to roll out a long-term agenda." House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) "confirmed Tuesday that Democrats will unveil their new agenda next week, although he declined to provide specific details." Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) "said the plan will not be an itemized blueprint, but rather would feature 'guideposts' and serve as a broad outline of the goals the new majority hopes to complete over the next six months." While Hoyer "stated at a weekly press briefing the House will address health care and education bills in coming weeks — specifically mental health parity, the No Child Left Behind Act and re-authorization of the Head Start pre-kindergarten program — in a later interview he would not discuss which topics will take precedent under the new agenda, asserting that House committees must first be allowed to act on the measures."

DOJ_NMG_0128630

Lawmakers Press Agencies To Fund Priorities Without Earmarks. Roll Call (2/7, Ackley, Stanton) reports even though "most of the appropriations bills for fiscal 2007 got stripped of practically all Congressionally mandated 'earmarks,' Members — and the lobbyists who push for funding of specific projects — have turned their attention to the executive branch agencies doling out chunks of money that otherwise would have gone for earmarks." Members, "especially those on the Appropriations and authorizing committees, can wield considerable behind-the-scenes power to make sure their favored projects get funded by executive-branch agencies." One appropriations lobbyist "said Members and staffers alike have been calling agency officials to protect their 2007 earmarks." The lobbyist said, "I heard Members and staff already made the calls before they put the money in the [omnibus bill]. They would say verbally, 'If we have this group submit an application -- as long as it is complete and accurate and fits within the parameters of the program -- you will honor that, right?' The answer was in the affirmative every time."

White House Agrees To Pelosi Military Aircraft Request. The Washington Times (2/7, Scarborough, Hurt, 88K) reports the Bush Administration has "agreed to provide House Speaker Nancy Pelosi with regular access to an Air Force passenger jet, but the two sides are negotiating whether she will get the big aircraft she wants and who she may take as passengers, according to congressional and administration sources." A congressional source "said that Rep. John P. Murtha, chairman of House Appropriations subcommittee on defense, which controls the Pentagon's spending, has telephoned administration officials to urge them to give the speaker what she wants." The congressional source "said Pentagon officials complained that" Rep. Murtha "is accusing them of sexism for not immediately heeding her request." Meanwhile, Republican Conference Chairman Adam Putnam of Florida "said Mrs. Pelosi's request represents 'an arrogance of office that just defies common sense' and called it 'a major deviation from the previous speaker.'" Minority Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri "called it a 'flying Lincoln Bedroom,' and Rep. Patrick T. McHenry, North Carolina Republican, labeled the speaker's plane 'Pelosi One.'"

Kucinich Effort To Create Peace Department Has Rocky Start. The Hill (2/7, Kaplan) reports Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D) "may need to stage a sit-in on the House floor before a Department of Peace and Nonviolence is created." Kucinich, "newly empowered as chairman of the domestic policy subcommittee on the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, vowed yesterday to hold hearings on legislation lawmakers have discussed since the dawn of the republic: a bill to establish a Department of Peace and Nonviolence." But it "seems that, like the Founding Fathers before him, Kucinich won't get past the talk — even with a bit of Hollywood backing." Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, "whose job is to manage the flow of legislation to the House floor, said that he considers Kucinich a 'thoughtful, substantive guy and a good friend,' but that 'a lot of members have a lot to say about [the bill] and we're going to give them a lot of time to say it.'" Despite the "logistical hurdles and legislative roadblocks, Kucinich made history when he said he would hold hearings on H.R. 808, which has 52 cosponsors, including centrist Democratic Reps. Ellen Tauscher (Calif.) and Albert Wynn (Md.)."

Bush Commemorates Anniversary Of Reagan's Birth. The Los Angeles Times/AP (2/7) reports that yesterday would have been former President Ronald Reagan's 96th birthday. Former Attorney General Edwin Meese III and Col. James B. Seaton III, commanding officer of the Marine Corps' Camp Pendleton, "placed a wreath of white roses on behalf of President Bush at Reagan's grave at the Ronald Reagan Presidential Museum. Bush said in a proclamation that the wreath and military honors were sent 'in tribute to his distinguished service to a grateful nation.'" Tonight, Mrs. Reagan planned to present former President Bush with the 2007 Ronald Reagan Freedom Award during a gala at the Beverly Hilton Hotel. … 'George was not only my husband's dedicated vice president, but he was also Ronnie's loyal friend,' Mrs. Reagan said in a statement. 'Working closely with Ronald Reagan was one of the great joys of my life, and receiving this prestigious Reagan Freedom Award is something I will treasure always,' former President Bush said in a statement."

Bush Credited For Pursuing Healthcare Reform. The Wall Street Journal's Holman Jenkins (2/7) writes President Bush "makes peace with the tax code's bias toward health spending in order to do battle with the particular vice of our overreliance on third-party payment. He does so by equalizing the tax treatment of health dollars whether they flow directly from a consumer pocket (the vehicle here is health savings accounts) or through a third-party laundromat. He would do so by equalizing the treatment of health insurance whether you buy it yourself or your employer buys it for you (his latest plan). No, hosannas will not be sung to him by left or right. … There's a lesson in presidential leadership here. Mr. Clinton lost interest in health care after a few months when he discovered health care wouldn't result in a monument to his presidency. In a very pre-postmodern approach, Mr. Bush identified the same basic problem and has worked steadily away at it, showing that a president can accomplish something as long as he's willing not to receive any credit."

DOJ_NMG_0128631

Recent Healthcare Reform Proposals Seen As Insufficiently Radical. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (2/7, 690K) Ezekiel J. Emanuel, chairman of the Department of Clinical Bioethics at the National Institutes of Health Clinical Center, Victor R. Fuchs former president of the American Economics Association, write, "It seems everyone has ideas for health-care reform. … This profusion of proposals means that health care is getting more attention, and this makes reform more likely. But these proposals are like band-aids and fall far short of what our sick health-care system needs. They build on what everyone agrees is a broken system. Ultimately, they prop up the sagging employment-based insurance system. … By building on the existing health-care system, these reform proposals entrench the perverse incentives."

Hollywood Seeks Congressional Support For Taxes, Fighting Piracy. The New York Times (2/7, Halbfinger, 1.16M) reports that Hollywood's movie industry is encouraged by the new Democratic majority Congress and "hopes to press its agenda of fighting piracy, obtaining new tax advantages and reining in…production from going abroad. So the Motion Picture Association of America put on a daylong show for lawmakers, lobbyists and Capitol Hill aides, armed with some A-list talent…and a new study showing that film and TV production accounts for $30 billion in wages, $10 billion in taxes, more than 400,000 jobs and a trade surplus of $9.5 billion." In an attempt "to drum up sympathy for an industry symbolized by its highly paid stars," the MPAA event stressed "that the movie business is really made up of middle-class guild and union members." Industry leaders stressed anti-piracy efforts overseas and called for stricter laws to enforce intellectual property laws.

Burton Missed 19 House Votes For Golf Tournament. Roll Call (2/7, Ben Pershing) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "It had been one of the best little puzzles of the 110th Congress so far: Why did Rep. Dan Burton (R-Ind.) miss 19 House votes over four days in mid-January? Where was he? Burton's office hadn't returned several calls from HOH over the past couple of weeks on this subject, nor did it respond to inquiries from the local press. No one in the Republican leadership seemed to know, either. Now, when HOH finally learned Tuesday where Burton had been -- courtesy of a report in The Indianapolis Star -- he kicked himself for not figuring it out earlier. As anyone who has followed Burton over the years should have known, he was playing golf." Roll Call adds, "Specifically, Burton was at the Bob Hope Chrysler Classic in lovely Palm Springs, Calif., where he played in the pro-am event at four local golf courses over four days."

NYTimes Decries Bush Administration's Reliance On Contractors. The New York Times (2/7, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "The United States is quickly becoming a government of the contractors, by the contractors and for the contractors. While the private security personnel in Iraq have attracted the most attention, many day-to-day operations are no longer in the hands of federal employees. … The problem is that the explosion of government outsourcing under the Bush administration has not been accompanied by a sufficient increase in civil service personnel to oversee it and ensure that the work is done properly and without squandering taxpayer dollars."

OTHER NEWS:

Bernanke Says Education, Training Key To Addressing Economic Inequality. Fox News' Special Report (2/6, Hume) reported Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke "said the best way to narrow the gap between high income and low wage workers in the US would be to strengthen education and training programs. He told an Omaha Chamber of Commerce that erecting trade barriers would do far more harm than good. Today's comments are the most extensive remarks he has made on economic inequality."

The Wall Street Journal (2/7, A6, Wessel, 2.04M) reports the Fed Chairman "warned politicians to avoid responses that would make labor markets less flexible or create barriers to international trade and investment." In "an unusual speech for a central banker," Bernanke "said a wiser approach to the problem would be to improve education and training and to cushion dislocations caused by technology and globalization. He cited such steps as making health and pension benefits more portable and offering retraining and job-search assistance to displaced workers."

DOJ_NMG_0128632

The Washington Times (2/7, Hill, 88K) reports Bernanke noted "studies have documented that globalization -- including both trade and immigration -- puts pressure on the wages of low- and middle-income earners who compete with foreign workers even while trade and labor flows overall increase jobs and economic growth." But "by far the largest factor causing inequality has been the skills gap."

USA Today (2/7, 5B, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) says Bernanke's remarks "come as Democrats, who now control Congress, are building an agenda around inequality and middle-class economic concerns. Their initiatives include raising the minimum wage, limiting CEO pay, boosting college aid, making it easier to form unions and addressing labor and trade concerns." President Bush "acknowledged recently that income inequality is a problem, but Democrats differ with his economic remedies, which include a focus on tax cuts."

Stocks Up Slightly. NBC Nightly News (2/6, story 7, :15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today, stocks showed little change on the day. The Dow was up more than 4 points [to close at 12,666.31]. NASDAQ gained just under one point [to close at 2,471.49] in the days trading." USA Today (2/7, 6B, 2.27M) notes "the Standard & Poor's 500 index added 1.01 points to 1448.00." The Wall Street Journal (2/7, 2.04M), among other newspapers, also reports the stock numbers.

GOP Insiders Said To View Clinton 2008 Victory As Inevitable. The Politico (2/7, Sheffield, VandeHei), in an article tiled, "GOP Views Clinton As Virtually Unbeatable," reports, "What many conservatives regard as the nightmare scenario -- President Hillary Rodham Clinton -- is increasingly seen by veteran Republican politicians and strategists as virtual inevitability. In GOP circles, the Democratic front-runner is seen as so strong, and the political climate for Republicans so hostile, that many influential voices -- including current and former lawmakers, and veterans of President Bush's campaigns -- have grown despairing." Former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay is quoted as saying, "If the conservative movement and Republicans don't understand how massive the Clinton coalition is, she will be the next president." Rep. Steve King said, "At this point, short an inspirational Republican nominee, then I would agree that it's going to be very difficult to beat Hillary if she wins the nomination." According to The Politico, "Even some well-connected outside advisers to Bush said in interviews they essentially accept this analysis." Despite the headline, the Republicans quoted in the piece tend to focus on the weakness of the GOP rather than specific calculations which might provide evidence of Sen. Clinton's strength.

The Politico's Roger Simon (2/7) writes, "consider this from a Republican: 'I don't want to contribute to my own party's demoralization and it doesn't necessarily mean there will be a Democratic landslide, but I think there is a thumb on their side of the scale that's not going to come off until after the next election,' said Vin Weber, a former Republican congressman, who is backing Mitt Romney."

Clinton Leading Among New Hampshire Democrats By 14 Points. The AP (2/7, Pickler) reports that among New Hampshire Democrats surveyed for a University of New Hampshire poll, former Sen. John Edwards and Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama "had net favorability ratings ranging from 61 percent to 55 percent, too close to be statistically significant. When asked for whom they would vote, 35 percent of likely Democratic voters picked Clinton, 21 percent Obama and 15 percent Edwards. Eight percent chose former Vice President Al Gore, who is not running. The Democratic portion of the phone poll reached 353 likely voters and had an error margin of plus or minus 5.2 percentage points."

Upcoming Events Likely To Boost Clinton's Fundraising Lead. The Wall Street Journal (2/7, A7, Cummings, 2.04M) reports that "in a show of financial muscle," Clinton "today kicks off a fund-raising effort of volunteers working to direct donations from $25,000 to $1 million to her presidential campaign. … Though party caucuses and primaries are still a year off, the money race begins in earnest this month, as candidates try to generate big numbers for the first quarterly financial disclosure report due on March 31. Advisers to Mrs. Clinton and Republicans Mitt Romney and Rudy Giuliani have said their campaigns are shooting for about $30 million in that first report." Jonathan Mantz, the campaign's finance director, "recently declined to specify his fund-raising target: 'It's a huge number. I've seen a lot of different figures, whether it's $80 or $100 [million], it's a huge number.'

DOJ_NMG_0128633

The Washington Post (2/7, A8, Birnbaum, Mosk, 690K) reports Clinton "is playing hostess to billionaire Hollywood moguls, millionaire lawyers and venture capitalists here this week as she pushes to raise a record sum for her presidential campaign. Last night, the New York Democrat invited about 70 top fundraisers from around the country to a reception at her Washington home. … The high-dollar rainmakers committed to collect at least $250,000 each during the presidential campaign for Clinton, and many have pledged $1 million, participants said. In addition, each agreed to raise $50,000 by the end of this month to bolster the campaign's first-quarter report due at the end of March."

Clinton Raised At Least $15 Million For Other Democrats In 2006. The Hill (2/7, Bolton) reports Clinton "collected at least $15 million for Democratic candidates by participating in more than 100 fundraising events during the 2006 election cycle, thereby cementing relationships with party leaders and colleagues in advance of her presidential campaign. A rough tally of her campaign's fundraising records show that while her rival for the nomination, Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) gave more money to candidates through his leadership PAC, Clinton appears to have surpassed his total by donating millions from her personal reelection account and attending scores of fundraisers.

Clinton To Appear At Nevada Forum. The AP (2/7, Pickler) reports Clinton "has agreed to attend a Nevada forum for Democratic presidential candidates later this month, state party officials said Tuesday. Clinton joins five other presidential hopefuls already confirmed for the Feb. 21 event in Carson City: Sens. Joe Biden of Delaware and Chris Dodd of Connecticut, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson and former Alaska Sen. Mike Gravel. … Representatives for Clinton, Sen. Barack Obama and 2004 vice presidential nominee John Edwards complained last week to national party officials about the number and early timing of forums and debates scheduled in Nevada and other key states."

Giuliani's Favorability In New Hampshire Far Outpaces McCain, Romney. The AP (2/7, Pickler) reports that according to a University of New Hampshire poll, "New Hampshire residents likely to vote in the Republican presidential primary…think more highly of former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani than any of his rivals. … Giuliani's net favorability rating — the proportion of people viewing him favorably minus the proportion viewing him unfavorably — was 56 percent, well ahead of Sen. John McCain, 32 percent, and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, 26 percent." The AP notes, "This long before an election, political professionals pay more attention to favorability than voters' choices if they had to vote today. McCain and Giuliani were essentially tied at about 27 percent on that question among likely GOP primary voters, followed by Romney at 13 percent and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich at 9 percent. The GOP portion of the telephone poll reached 311 likely voters from Thursday to Monday and had an error margin of plus or minus 5.6 percentage points."

Giuliani's Support For Abortion, Gun Control And Gay Rights Draws Scrutiny. Fox News' Special Report (2/6, Hume) reported that "as a pro-choice Republican" Giuiani "is trying to quell conservatives' doubts about his social views. He opposed a ban on partial birth abortion in 2000, saying, "I would vote to preserve the option for women." . Now he says that because the current law banning partial-birth abortion contains an exception to save the mother's life, he supports it. … When it comes to abortion and the Supreme Court, Giuliani told Republicans in South Carolina recently that he would tap 'strict constructionists' such as Samuel Alito and John Roberts to interpret the constitution not make new law. Still conservatives worry that this comment from the socially liberal Rudy Giuliani just a year and a half ago raises concerns." Giuliani was shown saying, "Presidents going back to the beginning of the republic generally appoint people to the Supreme Court that they believe agree with them." Fox went on to note that Giuliani "wanted all gun lovers to be licensed for pistols and rifles. In addition he said, "gun owners should have to pass a written exam that shows they know how to use a gun, that they're intelligent enough and responsible enough to handle a gun." Fox went on to discuss Giuliani's "strong support" for gay rights and noted he "hosted gay pride events."

Giuliani Has Not Yet Said Unequivocally That He Will Be A Candidate. The New York Times (2/7, Chan, 1.16M) reports Giuliani "took two steps closer to a presidential run on Monday, and yet stopped short, once again, of unequivocally throwing himself in the ring. … A few skeptics have wondered whether Mr. Giuliani, who has been crisscrossing the country over the last few months and signaled his interest in the presidency again and again, may ultimately back out — as he did in 2000, when he contemplated a race for the Senate but withdrew." However, "Aides to Mr. Giuliani yesterday dismissed the notion that he was equivocating."

DOJ_NMG_0128634

Giuliani Will Deliver Commencement Address At Citadel. The AP (2/7, Pickler) reports Giuliani "will deliver the commencement address at The Citadel in the pivotal primary state of South Carolina, the military college announced Tuesday."

Coulter Warns GOP Voters Not To Bank On Giuliani's "Electability." Asked on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (2/6) if she would support Giuliani for president, author Anne Coulter said, "I don't want to vote for a pro-choice Republican for president. … I trust Republican primary voters. But the one thing I want to tell Republican primary voters is do not vote for a candidate because you think he's 'electable.' You thought Gerald Ford was electable; you thought Dole was electable. No, you want to vote for the right-wing lunatic who supports your views because that's Ronald Reagan. … I've had it. We've excused enough Republicans who are pro-choice."

Morris Predicts Clinton And Giuliani May Sew Up Nominations By Labor Day. In his column for The Hill (2/7) Dick Morris writes Sen. Hillary Clinton and former NYC mayor Rudy Giuliani "could wrap it up this year." According to Morris, "Hillary re-established the dominance she had back in the spring of 2006 by moving out to a 43 percent vote share among Democrats in the presidential primaries in the Fox News poll of January 30-31." Giuliani "is eclipsing John McCain for front-runner status. In the most recent Fox News poll among GOP voters, Rudy had a convincing 34-22 lead over McCain, with Gingrich in third place at 15 percent. McCain has been hovering in the low 20s all along. … This poll finding — combined with McCain's dismal financial report for the fourth quarter of 2006 ($1.7 million raised and less than $500,000 on hand) — put him in a convincing second place after a year of sharing front-runner status with Giuliani. Do McCain's fundraisers think he is running for Congress or president?" Morris concludes, "Right now, neither Rudy nor Hillary has a front-runner's lock, but they are clearly the man and woman to beat in their respective parties. If they hold their leads through Labor Day, my bet is that it will be all over."

Edwards Bloggers Said To Have Made Anti-Catholic Comments. The AP (2/7, Pickler) reports, "Two bloggers hired recently by Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards were criticized Tuesday by a Catholic group for posts they had written elsewhere on the Internet. Bill Donohue, president of the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights, demanded that Edwards fire Amanda Marcotte and Melissa McEwan. … Donohue cited posts that the women made on blogs in the past several months in which they criticized the pope and the church for its opposition to homosexuality, abortion and contraception, sometimes using profanity."

The New York Times (2/7, Broder, 1.16M) reports Edwards's spokeswoman, Jennifer Palmieri, "said Tuesday night that the campaign was weighing the fate of the two bloggers." Marcotte "has also written sarcastically about the news media coverage of the three Duke lacrosse players accused of sexual assault, saying: 'Can't a few white boys sexually assault a black woman anymore without people getting all wound up about it? So unfair.'"

Romney To Announce His Candidacy In Michigan Next Week. The AP (2/7, Sidoti) reports former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney "will formally announce his candidacy for president next week in Michigan, his native state and an important early test for the GOP nomination, campaign aides said Tuesday." Romney "then will visit Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina -- the first states to hold 2008 contests. He will return to Boston two days later, where he will hold what his campaign is calling 'a unity event' with supporters, aides said."

Huckabee Seen As Evangelical Alternative To Top Three GOP Candidates. The Christian Science Monitor (2/7, Feldmann, 59K) reports former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee "may be most famous for losing 100 pounds and crusading against obesity in America." Huckabee "knows he must rise in the pack by summer's end. 'If by ... September I'm still considered second or third tier, after the Iowa straw poll, then ... I've got a problem,' says the former Baptist minister, who formed a presidential exploratory committee last week. … An evangelical Christian, Huckabee hopes his religiosity will win GOP voters who may have qualms about Senator McCain, who is not overtly religious; former Mayor Giuliani, who is liberal on social issues; and Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0128635

Romney, whose Mormon faith makes some Republicans uneasy."

New Technology Among Factors Driving Up Primary Spending. The Washington Post (2/7, A1, Mosk, 690K), in a front-page story, reports, "Expense reports released last week provide a glimpse at how aspirants have started spending their money. By the end of last year, budding contenders in the Democratic field had already written more than $660,000 in checks from their federal accounts to fund activities in key states -- more than twice what their counterparts spent in 2002 in the run-up to the 2004 presidential contest." The Post goes on to report, "When then-Sen. John Edwards began preparing for his first presidential bid, he made an early investment of nearly $100,000 to build an Internet operation. As he began constructing his 2008 effort, he found the cost to put his stamp on the Web had more than quadrupled, with close to half a million dollars already spent on consultants and technical-support teams." Consultant Ken Strasma, "whose firm developed a microtargeting program that uses vast supplies of marketing data to identify and persuade a candidate's likely supporters, said the powerful targeting programs will be more widely used this cycle. In small states, such as Iowa, a candidate can spend $100,000 to $200,000 to identify every caucus voter within their reach and figure out how best to persuade them. In larger states, those costs will multiply."

Obama Considered Overly Abstract. The Washington Post 's Harold Meyerson (2/7) writes that Obama's "broad indictment of contemporary politics has great appeal, I suspect, to young voters in particular. But the cynicism about government that he rightly condemns didn't waft in from nowhere. … The hope Obama personifies can be a powerful force -- but not when he counterposes it to specifics or to political struggle."

US Electorate Seen As Willing To Elect A Black President. In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/7, 1.16M) Martin Plissner, author of "The Control Room: How Television Calls the Shots in Presidential Elections," writes, "On Nov. 5, 1996, Voter News Service — the organization hired by the TV networks to do exit polling — asked people at the polls, who had just given Bill Clinton 49 percent of the vote, Bob Dole 41 percent and Ross Perot 8 percent, how they would have voted if the Republican candidate had been Gen. Colin L. Powell. In an exit poll sample of 3,697 (three times the size of a standard high-grade public opinion survey), the result was this: Powell: 50 percent. Clinton: 38 percent. Perot: 9 percent. … There is a pretty good, if not quite conclusive, case that America has for some time been ready to elect a black president. The question for Barack Obama is whether this time around it will be ready for this one."

Steinem Praises Both Clinton And Obama. In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/7, 1.16M) Gloria Steinem writes, "Even before Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton threw their exploratory committees into the ring, every reporter seemed to be asking which candidate are Americans more ready for, a white woman or a black man? … I think this is a dumb and destructive question." Steinem concludes, "This time, we could learn from history. We could double our chances by working for one of these candidates, not against the other. For now, I've figured out how to answer reporters when they ask if I'm supporting Hillary Clinton or Barack Obama. I just say yes."

Dowd Praises Biden, Says He's Not "Pandering." The New York Times' Maureen Dowd (2/7) credits Sen. Joseph Biden for not "pandering, like Hillary's telling Iowans she likes ethanol, and John McCain's telling Christian conservatives he likes Christian conservatives."

Perry's Lottery Plan Would Fund Education, Insurance For Poor. The Washington Post/AP (2/7, A7) reports that Texas "Gov. Rick Perry (R) proposed Tuesday that Texas sell its state lottery for at least $14 billion, with the money dedicated to an endowment for residents without health insurance and a trust fund for cancer research." Perry described this plan as "a unique opportunity to address great challenges and build the foundation for a future of unparalleled prosperity" in his State of the State address. "Under Perry's plan, money from the sale would be used to establish three trusts: $8.3 billion to replace most of the public-education revenue lost with the sale of the lottery, $3 billion for cancer research, and $2.7 billion to expand health insurance coverage for the working poor."

Washington Press Club Honors Thomas. The Washington Post (2/7, C1, Vargas, 690K) reports, "On this Tuesday night, there was a party to be had and a journalistic legend -- the indefatigable Helen Thomas -- to be honored. And not even the threat of snow could stop the 63rd annual congressional dinner of the Washington Press Club Foundation."

DOJ_NMG_0128636

WSJournal Notes Banks Do Not Benefit From Home Foreclosures. The Wall Street Journal (2/7, 2.04M) editorializes, "Mortgage delinquencies are rising, subprime lenders are going belly-up -- another company filed for bankruptcy Monday -- and the Senate Banking Committee is holding hearings today on 'predatory lending.' All of this can only mean one thing: Congress is looking for someone to blame now that the housing boom is over. The noted banking expert Jesse Jackson is scheduled to be a featured witness at today's hearing, along with a couple of unfortunate consumers who were sold mortgages they couldn't afford to repay. … No one likes to see anyone lose his home to foreclosure -- and that includes the banks. Banks make money by lending to people who can repay their loans with interest. Lending people money they can't pay back is a lousy business, as the many recent headlines about subprime lenders going bankrupt demonstrate. If rapacious banks really had a goal of lending people more than they could afford to pay back, they wouldn't be swimming in red ink."

WSJournal Celebrates Move Toward Vouchers In Utah And South Carolina. The Wall Street Journal (2/7, 2.04M) writes in an editorial that after a 38-37 vote in the Utah house, "the senate is likely to pass the reform supported by GOP Governor Jon Huntsman Jr." and "Utah may soon become the first state with a universal school choice plan." Now "South Carolina could be next" where the legislature will consider allowing "nearly 200,000 poor students to opt out of failing public schools by giving them up to $4,500 a year to spend on private school tuition." While, "the voucher movement has been declared dead many times,…its promise of better education is keeping hope alive."

Bush Budget Contains "Ambitious" Foreign Policy Goals. The Financial Times (2/7, Dinmore) reports, "Ambitious foreign policy goals set out in the Bush administration's federal budget for 2008 include the end of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, dismantling North Korea's nuclear weapons programme and the start of comprehensive multilateral negotiations with Iran." Other targets listed in the foreign assistance component of the budget "seem more like Soviet-era quotas, for example a projected 10 percent increase over the 2006 figure of 769 interviews given by US officials to Arab and other media outlets in the Middle East." An official involved in drawing up the budget said the targets represented "what we intend to achieve with the resources we ask for." He added: "They are in many cases intangible goals."

Lebanese PM Blames US For Nation's Instability. The Los Angeles Times (2/7, Stack, Daragahi, 850K) reports Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora Tuesday "blamed American support of Israel for an increasingly violent political crisis that has shredded this country's stability." His voice "rising in frustration" during an interview with the Times, Siniora "said the troubles in his nation would subside if US officials were to press Israel to withdraw its soldiers from Shabaa Farms." The lingering occupation "has long been cited by Hezbollah as a justification for its armed guerrilla fighters on Israel's border," but Siniora said "the US has ignored his pleas." Responding to the prime minister's comments, NSC spokesman Gordon Johndroe said, "We understand the enormous pressure Prime Minister Siniora is under from Hezbollah and Syria and others that want to undermine democracy in Lebanon. We will stand by him to make sure democracy in Lebanon is successful, and we will continue to work for greater peace within the Middle East."

Rice Sets Meeting With Abbas, Olmert. AFP (2/7) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "plans a series of three-way meetings with Israeli and Palestinian leaders in a major shift of US efforts to broker a peace deal and establish a Palestinian state," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Tuesday. Rice will hold the first meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian President Mahmud Abbas on February 19. "Our expectations are that this is an initial opportunity for these two leaders to start a discussion about those issues that would concern the framework of a possible Palestinian state," McCormack said, noting that the Secretary "intended to pursue the three-way format in a significant departure from Bush's past practice of remaining aloof from the intricacies of Israeli-Palestinian deal-making."

Palestinian Aid Policies Seen As "Backfiring." The Financial Times (2/7, Morris) reports, "Concern is mounting in the international aid community that policies aimed at isolating the Palestinian Authority's ruling Hamas movement have backfired by further impoverishing the people of Gaza and the West Bank without seriously undermining the Islamists." Oxfam "joins the debate on Wednesday with an appeal for Europe to scrap an emergency aid programme that bypasses Hamas and revert to direct funding of the PA government that it controls." The move follows a report last week by the UK parliament's international development committee that "claimed the policies of Israel and international donors towards Hamas were playing into the hands of its Iranian ally."

DOJ_NMG_0128637

Palestinian Factions Begin Unity Talks In Mecca. The New York Times (2/7, A3, Fattah, 1.16M) reports leaders of Hamas and Fatah Tuesday "began a two-day Saudi-brokered effort to agree on a unity government that could end a wave of violence in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank and resume relations with donor countries." Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and two Hamas leaders -- Ismail Haniya, the Palestinian prime minister, and Khaled Meshal, the Damascus-based militant leader -- "met separately with King Abdullah," however, all three leaders are expected to "meet with other Saudi officials and mediators before deliberations begin in earnest" on Wednesday.

The AP (2/7, Abu-Nasr) says the "Saudi-led push is key to any future peace talks with Israel -- and to Arab efforts to blunt Iran's growing power." The talks, it notes, are "open-ended, a reflection of Saudi Arabia's determination to keep them going until the Palestinians reach a deal for power-sharing in a new coalition government." Meanwhile, the meetings are seen as "a test of US ally Saudi Arabia," which "has taken an assertive new role in trying to resolve the Palestinian conflict, as well as two other Mideast conflicts that threaten to erupt into full-fledged civil wars: Iraq and Lebanon."

Similarly, the Financial Times (2/7, Saleh) says that by hosting the talks Saudi Arabia "has invested its prestige" as Riyadh "tries to counter Iranian influence in the region."

WPost Welcomes Saudi Arabia's Engagement. In an editorial, the Washington Post (2/7, A16, 690K) writes, "One consequence of the Bush administration's recent decision to divide the Middle East between 'extremists' and 'moderates' was to marginalize US diplomacy in the region. The administration refuses to talk to the 'extremists' -- Iran, Syria, Hezbollah and Hamas -- but those governments and groups are at the center of every major conflict from Iraq to the Gaza Strip. Now one of the administration's 'moderate' allies, Saudi Arabia, has stepped into the vacuum. The result has been a revealing demonstration of how talks with adversaries can sometimes be useful -- and a hint of what may be lost by Mr. Bush's inflexible policy." The Post says, "It's good that Saudi Arabia is testing a contrary theory in practice; even better would be some American diplomatic risk-taking."

US Will Create Single Africa Command. The New York Times (2/7, Stout, 1.16M) reports, "The Pentagon will establish a new military command to oversee its operations in Africa, President Bush and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates announced Tuesday. ... Three commands now divide responsibility for operations in Africa: the European Command, which oversees most countries on the continent, except those in the Horn of Africa; the Central Command, which has responsibility for Egypt, Sudan, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Djibouti, Somalia and Kenya; and the Pacific Command, which has responsibility for Madagascar, the Seychelles and the Indian Ocean."

Washington Prepared To Renew Relations With Pyongyang. The Financial Times (2/7, Sevastopulo) reports Washington "would be prepared to start normalising relations with Pyongyang before it completed nuclear disarmament if it helped persuade North Korea to move forward on a previous agreement to denuclearise the Korean peninsula." A senior Bush administration official "said Washington would consider starting the process to remove Pyongyang from the list of state sponsors of terrorism, and to ease restrictions on American companies dealing with the state, if North Korea moved forward on its commitment to dismantle its nuclear programs." The US official said South Korea would "take the lead in providing energy assistance and food aid," and in return, Pyongyang "would agree to freeze its plutonium reactor as the first stage of a process that, from the US perspective, would have to lead to complete disarmament."

The AP (2/7, Freire) reports Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said Wednesday the US expects "hard bargaining" at upcoming six-party talks. Speaking to reporters in Tokyo, Hill said, "The big question is whether the North Koreans are really ready to make some progress." He did, however, note that there were "some good signs in Berlin."

Author Urges China's Support For Deal. Gordon Chang, author of "Nuclear Showdown: North Korea Takes On the World," writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/7, A14, 2.04M) that "if there is a deal" at this week's six-party talks, "it will not be because Chinese diplomats worked behind the scenes. It will be because the Bush administration has made concessions it previously refused to consider -- in particular, releasing frozen North Korean funds, providing aid, and accepting only an interim freeze of the North's production of plutonium." If the US "makes the first moves," Chang says China "will persuade North Korea in the future to completely give up its nuclear arsenal." Beijing "has been able to protect Pyongyang because Seoul is doing the same," but Chang says "stripping Seoul from Beijing should be Washington's most immediate tactical goal."

DOJ_NMG_0128638

Bush Approves Plan To Pressure Sudan On Darfur. The Washington Post (2/7, A12, Kessler, 690K) reports President Bush has approved "a plan for the Treasury Department to aggressively block US commercial bank transactions connected to the government of Sudan, including those involving oil revenues, if Khartoum continues to balk at efforts to bring peace to Sudan's troubled Darfur region," government officials said Tuesday. The Treasury plan is part "of a secret three-tiered package of coercive steps -- labeled 'Plan B' -- that the administration has repeatedly threatened to unleash if Sudan continues to sponsor a campaign of terror" in Darfur. However, the Administration has "held back on any announcement of Plan B, even after setting a Jan. 1 deadline, in hopes of still winning Khartoum's cooperation." According to the Post, the delays have "increased skepticism that the administration is willing to risk potential diplomatic and commercial fallout from targeting Khartoum."

Bomber Killed In Thwarted Attack At Pakistani Airport. The New York Times (2/7, Masood, 1.16M) reports, "A suicide bomber armed with pistols and grenades killed himself and at least one other person after a shootout with security guards at Islamabad's international airport on Tuesday night, in what the police described as a thwarted but brazen terrorist attack." The Times notes that it was the second suicide bombing in Islamabad in less than a week and "appeared intended to inflict major casualties at the airport." Five people were wounded in the attack.

Russian Tycoon May Cooperate With Police In Poison Probe. The New York Times (2/7, Cowell, 1.16M) reports Boris A. Berezovsky, "an exiled Russian tycoon and bitter opponent of the Kremlin," said Monday that he was "prepared to be interviewed by the Russian police" investigating the poisoning in London last November of Alexander V. Litvinenko. However, in what he called his first newspaper interview since the British police "handed a dossier on the case to the Crown Prosecution Service last week," Berezovsky "said that he would talk to Russian investigators only if they met conditions, including being searched for weapons and poisons." Berezovsky spoke in "a wide-ranging, 50-minute interview" in his London offices, "offering some new insights" into the case. Berezovsky "said he believed that Mr. Litvinenko had been the target of two attempts on his life, the first in mid-October. That attempt failed, he said, because too little poison was used." Berezovsky "also disclosed that the prime suspect identified in British news reports had visited him the day before Mr. Litvinenko was poisoned."

WSJournal Says Putin Wants Case To Remain Unsolved. The Wall Street Journal (2/7, 2.04M) editorializes, "The wheels of justice in Vladimir Putin's Russia move strangely, but this week all too transparently. Prosecutors brought fresh charges against Mikhail Khodorkovsky that likely ensure that the former Yukos oil magnate and Putin political opponent won't leave his Siberian prison camp before next year's presidential election." Nothing from his first trial, the Journal says, "suggests the outcome will be any better for Mr. Khodorkovsky once a Russian court in distant Chita, near the Mongolian border, takes up the new money laundering and embezzlement case," which "could add 15 years to his prison term." The Journal concludes, "You don't have to be a conspiracy theorist to surmise that the Kremlin wants Mr. Khodorkovsky to stay in Siberia and the [Anna] Politkovskaya and Litvinenko cases to remain unsolved. And so they are."

Investigators Won't Charge Former Blair Advisor. The Financial Times (2/7, Burns, Blitz, Timmins) reports, "Downing Street on Tuesday won a temporary reprieve in the cash-for-honours affair" when the Crown Prosecution Service announced that there was "insufficient evidence" to press charges against headteacher Des Smith. Smith "was arrested last April after allegedly suggesting to a Sunday newspaper that sponsors of the government's flagship city academies would receive honours." The Times adds that Prime Minister Tony Blair's immediate position in relation to the investigation "was…shored up by two other developments" on Tuesday. First, Cabinet Secretary Sir Gus O'Donnell "denied media reports that there was a secret e-mail system inside Number 10 that the police had not been told about." Second, a new opinion poll "showed that the public is less interested than the media and political worlds in the cash-for-honours affair."

DOJ_NMG_0128639

The Washington Post (2/7, A14, Sullivan, 690K) reports, "Smith, a former government adviser who helped recruit wealthy sponsors for a key Blair education initiative, told reporters he was relieved that the inquiry regarding him was over and called it 'nonsense from the beginning.'" The Post adds that Smith "was the first of four people arrested" and investigation "centering on whether potential political donors have been enticed with promises of appointments to the House of Lords, the upper house of Parliament."

Mugabe Losing Support As Zimbabwe Economy Plunges. On its front page, the New York Times (2/7, A1, Wines, 1.16M) reports, "For close to seven years, Zimbabwe's economy and quality of life have been in slow, uninterrupted decline. They are still declining this year, people there say, with one notable difference: the pace is no longer so slow. Indeed, Zimbabwe's economic descent has picked up so much speed that President Robert G. Mugabe, the nation's leader for 27 years, is starting to lose support from parts of his own party." Meanwhile, Mugabe, "who blames a Western plot against him for Zimbabwe's problems, has rejected all calls for economic reform."

Global Pathogen Surveillance System Proposed To Fight Bird Flu. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (2/7, A15, 2.04M) Peter Zimmerman, former chief scientist of the U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee staff, writes, "The 'deadly' H5N1 avian flu is back on the front pages of newspapers and TV news shows. … It is probably worth stockpiling many millions of doses before H5N1 escapes into the human population. Because none of us has any useful immunity, the virus could migrate around the world with the speed of commercial air travel, not the steamships that powered the Spanish Flu. If H5N1 escapes, and if it becomes as virulent as the Spanish Flu (which killed 1% of those who developed the disease), the pessimistic predictions of millions of people dead within months could come true. Only if vaccine bottles were already on the shelf, ready for instant use, could the virus be contained. … A global pathogen surveillance system -- as Sen. Joseph Biden suggested almost five years ago -- is necessary because the global first line of defense against influenza is not the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, but the public health agencies of China, Vietnam and other nations in that region."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Bookshops' Latest Sad Plot Twist."
"Israel Sounds Alarm On Iran's Nuclear Efforts."
"The Sudden Descent Of A Shuttle Astronaut."
"In San Francisco, Mayor's Troubles Not Just Personal."
"Apple Seeks To Unchain Melodies."
"Pentagon Considering Alternatives For Iraq."

USA Today:

"Attempted Murder Charge, Handcuffs Ground Astronaut."
"Jobs Wants Fewer Download Limits."
"Wider Death Penalty Sought."

New York Times:

"Military Wants More Civilians To Help In Iraq."
"Many Voices, No Debate, As Senate Is Stifled on War."
"Rural Colleges Seek New Edge And Urbanize."
"From Spaceflight to Attempted Murder Charge."
"Army Is Going Wrinkle-Free; Velcro Becomes Norm."
"As Inflation Soars, Zimbabwe Economy Plunges."

Washington Post:

"With Discipline Honed By Training, Police Say, Astronaut Set Out to Kill."
"General Is Front Man For Bush's Iraq Plan."
"Loudoun Land Deals Subject of U.S. Probe."
"Problems Stall Pentagon's New Fighting Vehicle."
"Teddy Bear, Version 2.0."
"In Campaign 2008, Candidates Starting Earlier, Spending More."

Washington Times:

"Pelosi's Push For Jet Remains Up In Air."
"U.S. Mulls Iraq Refugees."
"Barry Aims For Gun-ban Hiatus."
"Waxman Hits 'Waste Abuse' Of Iraq Funds."
"Love Triangle Lands Astronaut In Florida Jail."

DOJ_NMG_0128640

"Alumni Urge Reversal On Cross."

Detroit Free Press:

"Granholm: We Need Tax Boost To Compete."
"Mullay Calls On Taurus' Power."
"Speech Big On Hope Skimpy On Details."
"Money To be Invested In Business, Students."
"Astronaut's Arrest Reveals Down-To-Earth Frailty."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:

"PSC Lets GA. Power Hike Bills Next Month."
"No Rescue For State's Insurance For Kids."
"People Outsmart Plants."
"Passion leads Astronaut To hard Landing."
"CDs Bust Throws media Glare On Town Chief."

Houston Chronicle:

"Gunmen Kill 7, Fuel Acapulco Drug War."
"This is Return Home Will Be A Different Story For Astronaut."
"Is Facility For Detainees Best Place For Children?"
"A 'Perplexed' NASA Navigates New Terrain."
"Doctors Say Perry's Inoculation Mandate Is Premature."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: Wal-Mart Class Action Suit; Congressional Hearings; Senate hearings-Gates; Friendly Fire; Iran Diplomat Kidnapped-Iraq; Astronaut-Attempted Murder Charges; Breast Cancer Test; Winter Weather; The Priest & A Nun; Fun In The Snow.

CBS: Astronaut Arrested; Astronaut Screening; Winter Weather; Congress-Iraq Surge; Iraq-Iranian Diplomat; Iraq-Troop Level; Iraq Corruption; Hospital Infections; FDA-Breast Cancer Test; Wal-Mart-Sex Discrimination Case; Easy Bake Recall; Internet TV.

NBC: Winter Weather-Chicago; Astronaut-Alleged Murder Charges; Breast Cancer Testing; New Orleans Post-Katrina; New Orleans Fire Dept; Wal-Mart Class Action Suit; Stock Market; New NBC CEO; Children Post-Katrina.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:

ABC: US-Cold Weather; Upstate NY-Heavy Snow; FL-NASA Astronaut Arrested; House-Iraq Resolution; Sen. Kerry-Iraq Bill; Las Vegas-Accident On Vegas Strip.

NPR: US-Cold Weather; Iraq-Sri Lankan Migrant Workers Rescued; Bush-VA; Tokyo Stock Exchange; Spain Criticizes British Paper For Interviewing Jailed Eta Member; FL-NASA Astronaut Arrested.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Visits Shenandoah National Park; makes Statement on the National Parks Centennial Challenge, Shenandoah National Park.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: 9:30 a.m. ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Hearing on the FY08 Energy Department budget. Secretary Bodman. Location: Room 366, Dirksen.

9:45 a.m. AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION AND FORESTRY _ Full Committee. Hearing on reauthorization of farm programs. Location: Room 106, Dirksen.

10 a.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation and a hearing on predatory lending and home foreclosures. Rev. Jesse Jackson; Harry Dinham, National Association of Mortgage Brokers; Hilary Shelton, NAACP; Martin Eakes, Self-Help Credit Union and the Center for Responsible Lending; Jean Constantine-Davis, AARP. Location: Room 216, Hart.

10 a.m. BUDGET _ Full Committee. Hearing on the FY08 budget proposal. OMB Director Rob Portman. Location: Room 608, Dirksen.

10 a.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Full Committee. Hearing on climate change research and science. Location: Room 253, Russell.

10 a.m. ENVIRONMENT AND PUBLIC WORKS _ Private Sector and Consumer solutions to Global Warming and Wildlife Protection Subcommittee. Hearing on global warming and wildlife. Location: Room 406, Dirksen.

10 a.m. FINANCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on the proposed FY08 budget for Health and Human Services Department. Secretary Leavitt. Location: Room 215, Dirksen.

10 a.m. RULES AND ADMINISTRATION _ Full Committee. Hearing on improving electronic election systems. California Deputy Secretary of State Lowell Finley; Brit Williams, Kennesaw State University; Dan Wallach, Rice University; Conny McCormack, Registrar-Recorder/County Clerk, Los Angeles County; Warren Stewart, Vote Trust USA; Connie Schmidt, Election Consulting Services; Michael Waldman, NYU School of Law. Location: Room 301, Russell.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Closed. Hearing on Iraq. Location: Room 219, Hart.

DOJ_NMG_0128641

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10 a.m. Meets for legislative business. Highlights: Suspensions (7 bills): 1) H.R. 742 - To amend the Antitrust Modernization Commission Act of 2002, to extend the term of the Antitrust Modernization Commission and to make a technical correction; 2) H.R. 365 - Methamphetamine Remediation Research Act of 2007; 3) H.Res. 72 - Recognizing the work and accomplishments of Mr. Britt ``Max" Mayfield, Director of the National Hurricane Center`s Tropical Prediction Center upon his retirement; 4) H.Res. 99 - Commending the University of Nebraska-Lincoln volleyball team for winning the NCAA Division I Women`s Volleyball Championship; 5) H.Res. 120 - Recognizing the African American spiritual as a national treasure; 6) H.R. 187 - To designate the Federal building and United States courthouse and customhouse located at 515 West First Street in Duluth, Minnesota, as the ``Gerald W. Heaney Federal Building and United States Courthouse and Customhouse;" 7) H.R. 238 - To repeal a prohibition on the use of certain funds for tunneling in certain areas with respect to the Los Angeles to San Fernando Valley Metro Rail project, California.

9:30 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on the FY08 defense budget. Secretary of Defense Gates and Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Homeland Security Subcommittee. Hearings on using risk to determine homeland security investments. William Jenkins, GAO; Henry Willis, Rand Corp. Location: Room 2358, Rayburn.

10 a.m. BUDGET _ Full Committee. Hearing on the Treasury Department's FY08 budget. Secretary Paulson. Location: Room 210, Cannon.

10 a.m. FINANCIAL SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on the Committee on Foreign Investments in the United States. Location: Room 2128, Rayburn.

10 a.m. FOREIGN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the international relations budget for FY08. Secretary of State Rice. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

10 a.m. OVERSIGHT AND GOVENMENT REFORM _ Full Committee. Hearing on wasate, fraud and abuse in the Iraq rebuilding process. Comptroller General David M. Walker, GAO; Stuart W. Bowen Jr., special inspector general for Iraq Reconstruction; William Reed, Defense Contract Audit Agency; Kristal Batalona, daughter of Wesley Batalona, Blackwater employee; Kathryn Helvenston-Wettengel, mother of Stephen Helvenston, Blackwater employee; Rhonda Teague, wife of Michael Teague, Blackwater employee; Donna Zovko, mother of Jerry Zovko, Blackwater employee; Erik Prince, chairman, Blackwater USA; Richard Cousins, chief executive, ESS/Compass Group; Jameel A.E. Al Sane, chairman, Regency Hotel and Hospital Co.; William P. Utt, president and CEO, KBR Inc.; Alan L. Boeckman, chairman and CEO, Fluor Corp.; Tina Ballard, deputy assistant secretary of Army for policy and procurement Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

10 a.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

10:15 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn.

10:30 a.m. EDUCATION AND LABOR _ Full Committee. Hearing on economic solutions to h,elp the middle class. AFL-CIO Secretary-Treasurer Richard Trumka; Judy Feder, Georgetown University; Bill Archey, Advancing the Business of Technology. Location: Room 2175, Rayburn.

11 a.m. NATURAL RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Organizational meeting. Location: Room 1324, Longworth.

1 p.m. HOMELAND SECURITY _ Full Committee. Hearing on issues and challenges facing the Homeland Security Department. Comptroller General David Walker; DHS Inspector General Richard Skinner. Location: Room 311, Cannon.

2 p.m. RULES _ Full Committee. Meeting on rules for floor debate. Location: Room H-313, Capitol.

2 p.m. WAYS AND MEANS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the FY08 budget. OMB Director Rob Portman. Location: Room 1100, Longworth.

Other: INDEPENDENT COLLEGES _ The National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities holds its 2007 meeting, ``Charting Our Course." Highlights: 9:15 a.m. Rep. David Loebsack, D-Iowa. Location: Hyatt Regency on Capitol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW.

RESERVE OFFICERS _ The Reserve officers Association holds its Mid-Winter Conference and Military Exposition. Highlights: 11:30 a.m. Coast Guard Commandant Adm. Thad Allen speaks at the Coaast Guard Affairs Committee meeting. 7 p.m. Banquet honoring Rep. Gene Taylor, R-Miss. Location: Washington Hilton & Towers, 1919 Connecticut Ave. NW

FEDERAL BUDGET-RELATED EVENTS _ Highlights: 9 a.m. Under Secretary for Science Raymond Orbach holds a teleconference to react to the FY'08 budget request. Dial-in 888 529-1867. Conference ID 8480814.

DOJ_NMG_0128642

HOMELAND SECURITY _ American Military University holds a two-day conference, ``Homeland Security: The Ripple Effect." Highlights: 9:30 a.m. Session on lessons learned from Hurricane Katrina, with Lt. Gen. Russel Honore, former Commander of the Joint Task Force-Katrina. 12 p.m. Luncheon speaker - former Sen. Gary Hart. 3:30 p.m. James Gilmore, Chairman, National Council on Readiness and Preparedness. Location: National Press Club.

CUBA AFTER CASTRO _ 8:30 a.m. NDN, a progressive think tank and advocacy organization, hosts a panel discussion, ``After Fidel: A New Day for America's Relations with Cuba and Latin America?" Participants: Congressman William Delahunt, Chairman of the Subcommittee on International Organizations, Human Rights and Oversight; Janice OConnell, Professional Staff Member, Senate Foreign Relations Committee; Julia Sweig, Director for Latin America Studies, Council on Foreign Relations; Miriam Leiva, Cuban Dissident via phone from Cuba; Sergio Bendixen, President, Bendixen & Associates; and Joe Garcia, Senior Vice President, NDN (moderator). Location: Phoenix Park Hotel, 520 North Capitol St. NW.

USTR SEMINAR _ 9 a.m. The Carnegie Endowment holds its 7th annual Former USTR Seminar, with Carla Hills, Mickey Kantor, Clayton Yeutter, Charlene Barshefsky, Bill Eberle and Bill Brock. Location: 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

BALANCED BUDGET _ 9:30 a.m. - 11 a.m. The Brookings Institution hosts a discussion with a panel of experts who will discuss their bipartisan plan of spending cuts and tax increases to balance the budget in the next five years, and set the nation on a sustainable fiscal course for the long run. Participants include G. William Hoagland, former director of budget and appropriations for former Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn.; Charles Stenholm, former Member of Congress from Texas; and Isabel Sawhill, a Brookings senior fellow. David Wessel, deputy bureau chief of the Wall Street Journal, will moderate the panel discussion. Location: Brrooking Institution, Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY _ 11 a.m. Sen. George V. Voinovich, R-Ohio; joins Joe Wiegand, Global Brand Protection Manager, Ford Motor Company; Jody Fledderman, President and CEO, Batesville Tool & Die; and Jeffrey O. Evans, CEO and President, The Will-Burt Company, for a press conference to to introduce the Intellectual Property Rights Enforcement Act, legislation that sponsors say will significantly enhance intellectual property (IP) coordination and protection, both domestically and internationally. Location: Room G-11, Dirksen Senate Office Building.

WAL-MART HEALTHCARE _ 11 a.m. Wal-Mart; the Service Employees International Union; the Center for American Progress; the Howard H. Baker, Jr. Center for Public Policy, Kelly Services; the Communications Workers of America; AT&T: Intel and the Committee for Economic Development hold a news conference to announce a major new campaign with a focus on health care. Participants include: Lee Scott, President and CEO of Wal-Mart Stores, Inc.; Andrew Stern, President of the Service Employees International Union (SEIU); John Podesta, President of the Center for American Progress and former Chief of Staff to President Bill Clinton; Howard Baker, founder of the Howard H. Baker, Jr. Center for Public Policy at the University of Tennessee and former Senate Majority Leader and Chief of Staff to President Ronald Reagan. Location: Hyatt Regency Capitol Hill, Capitol Room B (Lobby Level), 400 New Jersey Ave. NW.

CHAO _ 11:10 a.m. Labor Secretary Elaine Chao speaks to the Women of the World Symposium. Location: U.S. Chamber of Commerce, 1615 H St. NW.

METH LABS _ 11:45 a.m. Congressman Bart Gordon will be joined by new members of Congress at a press conference to discuss legislation under consideration in the House of Representatives that would support efforts to clean up meth labs in communities across the country. H.R. 365, the Methamphetamine Remediation Research Act of 2007 will be voted on in the House of Representatives on Wednesday. Location: Room HC-7, Capitol.

NONPROLIFERATION _ 12 p.m. Reps. Edward Markey and Christopher Shays, co-Chairs of the Bipartisan Task Force on Nonproliferation, host Dr. Pierre Goldschmidt, former IAEA Deputy Director General and Head of the Department of Safeguards, to discuss ways in which current nonproliferation norms are faltering and can be improved. Location: Room 1334, Longworth.

ZINNI _ 12 p.m. Retired Gen. Anthony Zinni participates in a discussion on the frontline vision of America's power and purpose, sponsored by Georgetown University. Location: Bunn Center auditorium, Georgetown University.

AARP-BUDGET _ 12:30 p.m. AARP health care policy expert Kirsten Sloan, National Coordinator - Health and Long-Term Care Issues, holds an audio news conference on the Administration's FY'08 budget proposal that calls for cuts in Medicare and Medicaid. Notes: Audio News Conference call-in is 866-835-8845. Please call 202-434-2560 to confirm participation.

DOJ_NMG_0128643

EGYPT _ 12:30 p.m. - 2 p.m. The Saban Center for Middle East Policy at the Brookings Institution will host Ahmed Aboul Gheit, minister of foreign affairs for the Arab Republic of Egypt, to discuss these crucial issues in the Mideast, as well as the way forward in US-Egyptian relations. The session will be moderated by Martin Indyk, director of the Saban Center for Middle East Policy. Location: Brookings Institution, Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

BUDGET-ENVIRONMENT _ 1 p.m. Environmental and conservation experts hold a telephone briefing on the proposed budget for climate change, public lands and oceans, with Sarah Neiymeyer of the Wilderness Society, Beth Lowell of Oceans, Erich Pica of Friends of the Earth and Peter Raabe of American Rivers. Notes: Accredited media only. Callin number: 800-901-1248; passcode: budget.

COMMUNICATIONS GAP _ 1 p.m. The Joint Commission holds a telephone news conference to propose expert-based solutions to narrow the communications gap between caregivers and patients, and improve patient safety. Notes: Callin number: 800-351-4895; passcode: 13975; conference ID: 34388273.

PENTAGON-AFRICA _ 1 p.m. Principal Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Policy Ryan Henry and Lt. Gen. Walter Sharp, Director, the Joint Staff, hold a press briefing to discuss the establishment of US Africa Command. Location: DOD Briefing Room, Pentagon 2E579.

BUDGET-HEAD START _ 1:30 p.m. Head Start President Sarah Green, others, hold a telephone news conference on cuts in the Head Start program. Notes: Callin number: 800-860-2442; ask for Head Start cuts event.

DEMOCRATS-VETERANS _ 1:50 p.m. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and senior House Democrats hold a photo opportunity with war veterans from VoteVets.org following their meeting. Founded and supported by veterans, VoteVets.org is leading the charge against the President's escalation of the war in Iraq. Location: Room H-230, Capitol.

ONLINE SEXUAL EXPLOITATION _ 2 p.m. Senators John McCain and Chuck Schumer join Representatives Steve Chabot and Nick Lampson for a press conference about the Securing Adolescents From Exploitation-Online Act of 2007. They will be joined by John Walsh, host of ``America's Most Wanted'' and co-founder of NCMEC; Ernie Allen, President of the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children (NCMEC); Sheriff Mike Brown (Bedford County, Virginia); and Miss America 2007. They will discuss their commitment to protecting children from online sexual exploitation. Location: Room S-115, Capitol.

ARMY MODERNIZATION _ 2:30 p.m. The Army holds a two-part media roundtable on Army modernization and on Future Combat Systems modernization, with Maj. Gen. Jeffrey A. Sorenson, Deputy for Acquisition and Systems Management to the Assistant Secretary of the Army and Col. Charles Bush, Army G-8 will discuss Army Modernization beginning at 2:30 p.m. At 3:30 p.m., Maj. Gen. Charles Cartwright, Program Manager, Future Combat Systems Brigade Combat Team and Dennis Muilenburg, Vice President/ General Manager, Boeing Combat Systems and Program Manager Future Combat System will discuss budget-induced changes to the FCS Modernization Program. Location: Army Public Affairs Conference Room, Pentagon Room 1E462.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

US Refuses To Join Accord On Secret Detentions 3
DOJ Seeks To Halt Contempt Hearing In Maine NSA Case..... 3
Proposed Funding Boost For Defending Against Detainee Challenges Questioned 3
Lawyer Says Detained Saudis Are Democracy Activists, Not Terrorists 3

Homeland Response:

Walker, Skinner Say Lawyers Hamper Investigations At DHS..... 4
McConnell To Change Rules That Limit Hiring Of First-Generation Arab Americans 4
New Orleans Sees No "Big Comeback" From Katrina 4

War News:

Senate GOP Worried It Is Losing PR War Over Iraq Resolution .. 5
House To Take Up Anti-Surge Resolution Next Week..... 7
Gates Says Troop "Surge" Not Final Chance For Iraq Success ... 7
House Panel Questions Bremer Over Use Of Iraq Reconstruction Funds 8
US To Pay $5.8 Billion To Expand Iraqi Security Forces 9
Iran Accuses US Of Role In Diplomat's Kidnapping 9
Maliki Acknowledges Iraqi Government Errors..... 10
US Probes Iraqi Lawmaker's Connection To 1983 Embassy Bombings 10
Terror Casts Pall Over Baghdad Markets, Vendors 11
US To Reexamine Iraqi Refugee Policy 11
Video Shows Friendly-Fire Incident Involving British Soldier..... 11
Trial Date Set For Abu Ghraib Accused 11
"Coalition Forces" Capture Al Qaeda Suspects In Afghanistan... 11
Gates Says NATO Must Increase Contributions In Afghanistan. 12
Marine Vehicle Remains Costly Failure 12
NNSA Wants Funding To Plan, Produce Next Generation Nuclear Warhead 12

DOJ:

McNulty Denies Political Motives In US Attorney Dismissals..... 13

Corporate Scandals:

Lengthy AOL Trial Ends With Acquittals Of Three 16
Oil Drilling Firms To Pay $26 Million In Nigeria Bribery Case..... 16
US Subpoenas Allied Capital Records In Pretexting Probe 16
SEC Sues Former Engineered Support Officials Over Options Scheme 17
Former Qwest CEO Seeks Trial Delay 18
SEC Ratchets Up Probe Of Wall Street Trading Leaks 18
Decline In Class-Action Securities Fraud Litigation Examined.... 19

Criminal Law:

Libby Told Grand Jury Cheney "Upset," "Disturbed" By Wilson Claims 19
Pennsylvania State Senator Indicted On 139 Corruption Counts 20
DOJ Probing Loudoun County Land Deals..... 21
Man, Company Charged With Bribery In "Operation Big Coon Dog." 21
FBI Arrests Reputed Bonanno Underboss, 18 Alleged Mob Associates 21
House Republicans Unveil Anti-Crime Agenda 22
Three Plead Guilty To Katrina Cleanup Billing Fraud 22
Connecticut Bank Officer Sentenced To Prison For Embezzlement 23
Florida Man Pleads Guilty To $2.5 Million Medicare Fraud Scheme 23
Three Convicted In Texas Bank Robbery Scheme 23
US Seeks To Keep Convicted Ex-Coca-Cola Secretary In Jail... 23
Cunningham Probe Exposes Secret Iraq Water Contracts 24
At Least Six States Consider Broadening Death Penalty..... 24
Six Baltimore Police Officers Suspended In Overtime Pay Probe24

Civil Law:

Victims' Families Sue FBI Over Shootings During New Jersey Drug Sting 24
Fatal Illinois Air Crash Blamed On Lack Of Radar..... 25
Founder Of AmeriDebt Accused Of Hiding Assets From Debtors25
Two New York Hospitals Bring RICO Suit Against UnitedHealth 25
Judge Orders More Mediation In Virginia Jet-Noise Suits..... 26

Civil Rights:

Review Finds Vermont State Hospital Lagging In DOJ-Mandated Improvements 26
DOJ-Funded Human Trafficking Task Force Launched In Las Vegas 26
Border Patrol Agent Beaten By Fellow Prison Inmates 26
9th Circuit Rules Wal-Mart Class-Action Bias Suit Must Go To Trial 27
Ninth Teen Sentenced In California Halloween Hate Crime..... 28
Dallas Must Fix Jail Problems Within Three Months 28

WPost Urges Democrats To Act On DC Voting Rights 28

Antitrust:

Monsanto's Delta Bid Raises Antitrust Concerns 28
Senate Committee Probing Possible Natural-Gas Price Manipulation 29
Samsung Settles State Price-Fixing Claims For $90 Million 29
Bush Visits Firm Once Accused Of Price-Fixing 29
Apple's Jobs Calls For Dumping Online Copyright Protection 30
Shareholders To Vote Today On Equity Office Sale 31
MGIC To Purchase Radian In $4.9 Billion Stock Deal 31
Midwest Management Resists AirTran's $345 Million Offer 31

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Groups Reopen Suit Against EPA Over Pesticide Ban 32
Gore Says Bush Administration Paying Scientists To Dispute Global Warming 32
Legacy Of Radiation Illness Stirs Opposition To Divine Strake ... 33
EPA Chief Under Fire At Senate Hearing 33
Energy Department Seeks To End Funding For Geothermal Power 33
Conservation Easements Give Tax Incentives To Landowners .. 33
House Committee Approves Bill Allowing Indian Tribes To Receive Anti-Meth Grants 33

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

US, Latin American Authorities Gather For Anti-Gang Summit ... 33
23 Indicted On Drug Charges In "Operation Polar Express." 34
Former Los Angeles "Drug Boss" Gets Life Sentence 34
Authorities Link Gambling Losses To San Diego Charger Safety's Cough Syrup Case 34
Connecticut Cocaine Ring Investigation Nets 3 More Guilty Pleas 35
North Dakota Issues Industrial Hemp Licenses To 2 Farmers 35
Lawmakers Seek New Tactics In Afghanistan, Say DEA, Other Agencies Aren't Working Together 35
Bush's Proposed Budget Eliminates $2.2 Million In Counter-Drug Aid For Venezuela 35

Immigration:

LATimes Criticizes Bush Provision On Aid For Incarcerating Illegals 36
WPost Blasts Virginia GOP Stance On Illegal Immigration 36

Tax:

Court Bars Minnesota Tax Preparer 36
Employees Face Deadline To Drain Flex Accounts 36

Congress-Administration:

Bush Promotes Budget, Defends Tax Cuts 36
Rangel Open To Adding Some Tax Breaks To Minimum Wage Bill 39
Unions Press Democrats To Oppose Fast Track 39
Senate Maneuvering Could Snarl Fiscal Year 2007 Funding Bill 40
House Democrats Prepare Rollout Of Long Term Agenda 40
Lawmakers Press Agencies To Fund Priorities Without Earmarks 40
White House Agrees To Pelosi Military Aircraft Request 40
Kucinich Effort To Create Peace Department Has Rocky Start .. 40
Bush Commemorates Anniversary Of Reagan's Birth 41
Bush Credited For Pursuing Healthcare Reform 41
Hollywood Seeks Congressional Support For Taxes, Fighting Piracy 41
Burton Missed 19 House Votes For Golf Tournament 41
NYTimes Decries Bush Administration's Reliance On Contractors 41

Other News:

Bernanke Says Education, Training Key To Addressing Economic Inequality 42
Stocks Up Slightly 42
GOP Insiders Said To View Clinton 2008 Victory As Inevitable .. 42
Giuliani's Favorability In New Hampshire Far Outpaces McCain, Romney 43
Morris Predicts Clinton And Giuliani May Sew Up Nominations By Labor Day 44
Edwards Bloggers Said To Have Made Anti-Catholic Comments44
Romney To Announce His Candidacy In Michigan Next Week .. 44
Huckabee Seen As Evangelical Alternative To Top Three GOP Candidates 44
New Technology Among Factors Driving Up Primary Spending. 44
Obama Considered Overly Abstract 45
Dowd Praises Biden, Says He's Not "Pandering." 45
Perry's Lottery Plan Would Fund Education, Insurance For Poor45
Washington Press Club Honors Thomas 45
WSJournal Notes Banks Do Not Benefit From Home Foreclosures 45
WSJournal Celebrates Move Toward Vouchers In Utah And South Carolina 45
Bush Budget Contains "Ambitious" Foreign Policy Goals 46
Lebanese PM Blames US For Nation's Instability 46
Rice Sets Meeting With Abbas, Olmert 46
Palestinian Factions Begin Unity Talks In Mecca 46
US Will Create Single Africa Command 47
Washington Prepared To Renew Relations With Pyongyang 47
Bush Approves Plan To Pressure Sudan On Darfur 47
Bomber Killed In Thwarted Attack At Pakistani Airport 47
Russian Tycoon May Cooperate With Police In Poison Probe ... 47
Investigators Won't Charge Former Blair Advisor 48
Mugabe Losing Support As Zimbabwe Economy Plunges 48
Global Pathogen Surveillance System Proposed To Fight Bird Flu 48

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 48

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 49

DOJ_NMG_0128646

TERRORISM NEWS:

US Refuses To Join Accord On Secret Detentions. The Washington Post (2/7, A14, Moore, 690K) reports the US Tuesday "declined to endorse" a "long-negotiated treaty" signed by 57 countries "prohibiting governments from holding people in secret detention," saying "its text did not meet US expectations." Louise Arbour, the U.N. high commissioner for human rights, said the treaty was "a message to all modern-day authorities committed to the fight against terrorism" that some practices are "not acceptable." In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack declined to comment, except to say that the final wording "did not meet our expectations."

DOJ Seeks To Halt Contempt Hearing In Maine NSA Case. The AP (2/7) reports from Augusta, ME, "The Justice Department asked a judge Tuesday to bar the Maine Public Utilities Commission from proceeding with a contempt hearing for Verizon that stems from telephone customer complaints related to allegations about domestic surveillance by the National Security Agency." The AP continues, "A multi-customer complaint filed with the Maine PUC last May effectively seeks to force Verizon to say whether it provided telephone call records to the government without a warrant. … The PUC has challenged the adequacy of Verizon responses to date and set a hearing for Friday." The AP adds, "In a federal court filing Tuesday, the Justice Department said PUC officials had been put on notice months ago that the federal government believes the information being sought about an alleged involvement of Verizon with the NSA 'cannot be disclosed.' … The Justice Department requested a judicial order to keep the Maine PUC from moving forward until a court decides 'what is clearly a federal question without the immediate threat of disclosure of the very information that is at issue in this case -- information that, if disclosed, might reveal or tend to reveal highly significant federal classified intelligence activities.' … In addition to seeking to block PUC action, the Justice Department said the order it was requesting would bar Verizon from responding to PUC demands 'because of the substantial risk of direct or inadvertent disclosure of information that would tend to confirm or deny the existence of foreign intelligence activities.' … Justice Department lawyer Alexander Haas said he had no comment. Department spokesman Charles Miller confirmed that the request for a court order was aimed at Friday´s scheduled PUC hearing."

Proposed Funding Boost For Defending Against Detainee Challenges Questioned. ABC News (2/7, Rood) reports, "A line item buried in the president's budget reveals the Bush administration is gearing up for emboldened legal challenges from Gitmo detainees." ABC continues, "A brief paragraph in President Bush's 2008 budget request shows he plans to hire nearly two dozen new Justice Department lawyers to fight suits brought by Guantanamo detainees challenging their imprisonment. … The boost is planned despite a new law that should prevent detainees' claims from ever reaching a U.S. court, suggesting the White House may believe that law will be quickly reversed." ABC adds, "The increase in lawyers 'signals real concern on the administration's part,' said Vincent Warren, president of the New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights, that the new law is unconstitutional and will be struck down. His organization represents over 200 Guantanamo detainees and has helped lawyers representing hundreds of others." ABC notes, "The controversial bill passed through Congress late last year at the urging of President Bush. The Military Commissions Act (MCA), as it's known, stripped Guantanamo detainees of their right to challenge their captivity. President Bush signed the measure into law, despite critics calling the measure unconstitutional. … Currently, just seven Justice Department attorneys defend the government against Gitmo detainees' suits. By removing the threat of such lawsuits, the MCA should theoretically reduce or even eliminate the need for those attorneys -- but instead the White House wants to add 23 lawyers starting this October and arm the group with a $5.5 million budget. This year, the office's budget was $2.3 million. … Military legal expert Eugene Fidell agreed with Warren's analysis. The request 'presupposes that Congress will overturn the MCA...or tweak it,' or the act could be affected by a Supreme Court ruling, said Fidell, president of the National Institute of Military Justice. 'Or both,' he added. … But Justice Department spokesman Eric Ablin disagreed. 'I don't think you can read into [the request] in any way whatsoever," he said. "I think it's reflective of the expense of those Guantanamo cases.'"

Lawyer Says Detained Saudis Are Democracy Activists, Not Terrorists. The Washington Post (2/7, A13, Ambah, 690K) reports police in Saudi Arabia "have arrested 10 men and accused them of collecting donations to fund terrorist acts outside the kingdom, the Interior Ministry said. But a lawyer and a prominent dissident said that at least seven of the men were Saudi democracy activists whose arrest was a government attempt to abort their civic rights work." Matrouk al-Faleh, "who was jailed in 2004 for calling for more democracy in the kingdom," said the seven men, most of them lawyers and professors, had been "waiting for government approval to set up a civic rights group." They also had planned "to present authorities this week with a list of more than 40 prisoners without legal representation whom they intended to defend." According to Faleh, "The terrorist allegation is a coverup."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Walker, Skinner Say Lawyers Hamper Investigations At DHS. The AP (2/6, Limpkin) reported GAO head David Walker and DHS Inspector General Richard Skinner told a House subcommittee Tuesday that lawyers, particularly in the general counsel's office, "have hampered investigations into waste and fraud" at DHS. Agency spokesman Russ Knocke "denied the allegations, terming them inaccurate and unfair." Walker told the panel that "the department's general counsel wants to 'sit in on every interview,' which he deemed inappropriate." Skinner said he agreed "wholeheartedly," adding that the process is "'not a denial of information, but it's very cumbersome to obtain information.'" The two said "that 'the tone is set from the top' and that Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff himself needs to address the situation." The Washington Post/AP (2/7, A10) runs a brief article focusing on the charges of hampered investigations.

McConnell To Change Rules That Limit Hiring Of First-Generation Arab Americans. The Washington Post (2/7, A15, Pincus, 690K) reports the incoming national intelligence director, retired Navy Vice Adm. John M. McConnell said Friday that he "plans to change security rules to make it easier for intelligence agencies to hire first-generation Arab Americans for highly sensitive jobs." Speaking during his confirmation hearing before the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, McConnell said the rules "limit intelligence agencies' ability to employ first-generation Americans 'who might have native language capabilities from serving in some of these very sensitive positions in the intelligence community' and hinder efforts to deal with radical Islam." McConnell said he wants to change the rules "because they constitute 'one of the areas that needs probably the greatest deal of attention and improvement . . . using people who speak the native language, understand the culture and the tribal conditions.'"

New Orleans Sees No "Big Comeback" From Katrina. NBC Nightly News (2/6, lead story, Williams, 9.87M) reported from New Orleans' Lakeview neighborhood, where, "like so much of this city, the recovery…is spotty. There is good news next to bad. Some houses rebuilt. Others demolished."

NBC devoted no less than 11 minutes to New Orleans' progress, "or lack of it in some cases," reporting (2/6, story 4, 4:30, Williams) that "a new analysis done by the Associated Press finds more evidence of what we've reported on this broadcast: That FEMA dolled out hundreds of millions of dollars in aid to households that either didn't exist or people who took the money and ran with it. FEMA says it was under pressure back then and unable to verify all the addresses of the people who originally asked for help. And there are still lots of people here, make no mistake, who are legitimately hurting and asking for help." NBC (Savidge) added, "Here it is, a year and a half later, and the big comeback that many people had hoped to see post-Katrina just simply has not happened." Savidge continued that the city is at half its pre-Katrina population, and a recent University of New Orleans study found that "more than 30% of those who have come back are considering calling it quits. One of the reasons predates Katrina -- crime." Meanwhile, the Army Corps of Engineers claim that the city's levees "are as good now as they were before Katrina hardly eases the minds of those considering rebuilding." NBC (Savidge) also cited the Road Home program, for which 105,000 people have applied. "Only 506 have received money. Because of all those reasons we've mentioned and the many others, there are a lot of people who are looking at 2007 and New Orleans as possibly a make-it or even break-it year."

NBC (2/6, story 5, 3:50, Williams) reported on New Orleans' fire department, which "has never recovered from Katrina" and is "badly in need. There are 150 job openings. And there is no money - city, state or federal - to rebuild this firehouse."

NBC (2/6, story 9, 2:40, Williams) ended its broadcast with "a special look at the children. By one estimate as many as 35,000 children across this entire region are suffering from some sort of emotional problem and they're not all, of course, getting help for it." NBC focused on one eight-year-old boy who is one "among many learning to play again in New Orleans with resilience and hope."

Budget Plan Said To Provide Opportunity To Create "New FEMA." Under the headline "New FEMA Emerges From The Wreckage Of Past Disasters," the Washington Post (2/7, D4, Barr, 690K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "On paper, the coming year should be turnaround time for FEMA." Restructured funding for the agency in President Bush's fiscal 2008 will give Director R. David Paulison "his first opportunity to lay claim to money that can be used to restore FEMA's luster and professionalism." The Post adds that Paulison has used public appearances to make "the pitch that FEMA is on the rebound." After storms and tornadoes hit central Florida Friday, Paulison's "promise of relief supplies came a day after storms devastated four counties, a sign of 'the new FEMA,' he said. If money and staffing come together as Paulison hopes, the new FEMA will put an end to what the Government Accountability Office calls 'considerable flux' and 'near-constant organizational change' at FEMA since 2001."

DOJ_NMG_0128648

WAR NEWS:

Senate GOP Worried It Is Losing PR War Over Iraq Resolution. The day after Senate Republicans effectively blocked debate on the anti-"surge" resolution authored by Sen. John Warner, some in the GOP caucus are growing increasingly concerned that they are losing the public relations battle over the Senate debate. The Los Angeles Times (2/7, Levey, Hook, 850K) reports "Senate Republicans continued to insist Tuesday that they simply want a fair debate on the floor of the Senate," but "Democrats hammered Republicans on Monday for ducking a formal debate on the war. And by Tuesday morning, some Republicans worried the public would misunderstand their stance." Sen. John McCain said, "It's very unfortunate that we appear to be blocking. … I hope we can make the American people aware that we're just asking for votes on our amendment, which is the way the Senate works."

Roll Call (2/7, Stanton, Billings) reports "Senate Republican leaders struggled Tuesday to shift their focus away from complaints about parliamentary procedure and onto which party is best supporting the troops as Republicans and Democrats continued their high-stakes game of political chicken over the Iraq War." Republicans "found themselves on the losing end of the public relations fight as they woke up to headlines across the country pinning the blame squarely on them. 'It doesn't matter what's going on the floor. It's all about media,' one senior GOP aide said Tuesday." Roll Call adds, "Privately, Republican leadership sources acknowledged they failed to effectively spin the Iraq debate and suffered at the hands of this week's headlines. GOP Senators were scrambling Monday night into Tuesday to troubleshoot their message, which many feared had become mired in procedural detail and esoteric arguments over fairness." Sen. John Cornyn, the GOP Conference vice chairman, "said despite a day of bad press, Republicans are not going 'to get excited about headlines and a handful of papers that got it wrong.' … '[Democrats] may enjoy today's headlines and a handful of papers that got it wrong, but they're not going to be able to enjoy that forever,' Cornyn said."

The Washington Times (2/7, Hurt, 88K) reports Republican leader Sen. Mitch McConnell "has said he won't allow a vote on the resolution of no confidence unless a similar vote is allowed on two other resolutions." One, authored by Sen. McCain, "would endorse the 'surge' plan but set benchmarks for Iraqi self-governance." Another GOP-backed resolution, sponsored by Sen. Judd Gregg, "would promise not to cut funding for the war." Late yesterday, McConnell "offered to allow the resolution to go forward in exchange for a vote on the 'no funding cutoff' resolution only." Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid "declined." Likewise, USA Today (2/7, Kiely, 2.27M) notes Reid "declared 'negotiations are over.'"

WSJV-TV South Bend (2/6, 10:22 pm) reported Republicans "say they couldn't get amendments considered on their own terms." The newscast showed Sen. Cornyn saying, "We want a debate, but we want it to be a fair debate." A number of other local broadcasts in various parts of the country showed this same quote. Among the stations featuring the Cornyn quote: WFXW-TV Terre Haute (2/6, 10:06 pm), KSFX-TV Springfield, MO (2/6, 9:37 pm), KXRM-TV Colorado Springs (2/6, 9:30 pm), WLUK-TV Green Bay (2/6, 5:36 pm), WBRC-TV Birmingham (2/6, 5:31 pm), and KENS-TV San Antonio (2/6, 5:12 pm).

Chris Matthews, on MSNBC's Hardball (2/6) reported, "The long awaited showdown in the Senate over the war in Iraq was shut down yesterday when almost every Republican voted to stop the Senate from considering a bipartisan resolution opposing the president's plan to escalate the war. Is this political gamesmanship for 2008? Public pressure on Congress to take action on the war couldn't be higher. But where was the courage of senators` convictions?"

The CBS Evening News (2/6, story 4, :20, Couric, 7.66M) noted "the Senate plans to be the first to debate the new strategy fell apart last night." And Fox News' Special Report (2/6, Hume) reported, "Republicans offered Democrats a deal to get the debate on the Iraq war restarted, but Democrats turned it down which left both parties claiming that the other did not want a real debate. … Senate Democrats label the GOP move a distraction from the debate they find more politically advantageous." Fox added, "Democrats appeared content with another story line -- Republicans blocking debate on the new Iraq plan."

In a front-page analysis piece, the New York Times (2/7, Hulse, 1.16M) reports, "Given the influence that voter frustration with Iraq had on the November elections, the national unease with the mounting human and financial costs, and the raw passion on all sides, even some lawmakers say they are astounded that the buildup to the Senate fight over Mr. Bush's proposed troop increase has produced such a letdown." The Times adds, "The fact that that Democrats could pull together only 49 of the 60 votes needed to break a procedural impasse on the resolution opposing Mr. Bush's plan was a product of many competing agendas. There was the Democratic desire to avoid getting tied up on any vote that could be perceived as undercutting United States troops or endorsing Mr. Bush's plan. At the same time, a surprising number of Republicans showed they were not yet ready to abandon the president even though many blame him for their November election losses and worry he will hurt them again next year."

The Wall Street Journal (2/7, A6, Rogers, 2.04M) reports, "Anticipating fights over Iraq spending next month,

DOJ_NMG_0128649

Senate Republicans are pressing for an early vote now to get members on record against withholding funds for the war." The strategy, "which has the quiet backing of the White House, has evolved over a nonbinding resolution sponsored by…Gregg." Gregg "said the administration had no part in drafting his resolution but acknowledged it has 'taken on a life of its own' and he wasn't surprised the White House saw it as useful in protecting…Bush's $93.4 billion emergency supplemental for the war, which could become a target for the many congressional critics of his Iraq policies."

GOP Sen. Kit Bond, on MSNBC's Hardball (2/6), contended that Republicans "have tried to debate the issue, and we believe that, to be fair, as the Senate always does, that we ought not to be shut out from offering our resolutions, either the Lieberman-McCain or the Gregg amendment. But right now, they intend to shut us out. We want to debate it. … They think that setting it up this way, they can gain political advantage. …. It's a P.R. stunt. This is not changing policy. This is Democrats trying to get enough votes to question the military implementation of a strategy."

Democratic Sen. Ken Salazar, also on MSNBC's Hardball (2/6), said, "The fact of the matter is that we should have a vote on whether or not there is a support for the president's plan to escalate the war by sending in 21,500 additional troops. Senator Reid has been eminently fair with the Republican Party by allowing two Republican resolutions to go forward, the McCain resolution as well as the Warner resolution. And so at the end of the day, this is simply whether or not the Republican majority wants to block a vote on the most basic question facing America."

MoveOn To Start Running Ads Against Republicans Who Backed Filibuster. The Politico (2/7) reports, "MoveOn.org will begin airing attack ads as early as Wednesday against eight Republican senators who blocked debate on the Bush administration's plan for a troop surge in Iraq. The liberal organization has already scripted and is now producing the ads to run on CNN. As of Tuesday afternoon, airtime also had been purchased on local television stations in Kansas, New Hampshire, Oregon and Virginia." The ads "specifically target those states' senators: Sam Brownback, John Sununu, Gordon Smith, and John Warner, respectively. Sununu, Smith and Warner face re-election in 2008; Brownback, a presidential candidate, is up again in 2010." The ads also "take aim at Sens. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, John Voinovich of Ohio, Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina and Mitch McConnell of Kentucky. Dole and McConnell both face 2008 challenges."

NYTimes Blames Democrats For Senate Impasse. The New York Times (2/7, 1.16M) editorializes, "It is not an inspiring sight to watch the United States Senate turn the most important issue facing America into a political football, and then fumble it. Yet that is what now seems to have come from a once-promising bipartisan effort to finally have the debate about the Iraq war that Americans have been denied for four years." The Democrats' "ultimate goal was to express the Senate's opposition to President Bush's latest escalation. But the Democrats' leaders have made that more difficult — allowing the Republicans to maneuver them into the embarrassing position of blocking a vote on a counterproposal that they feared too many Democrats might vote for. We oppose that resolution, which is essentially a promise never to cut off funds for this or any future military operation Mr. Bush might undertake in Iraq." But "the right way for the Senate to debate Iraq is to debate Iraq, not to bar proposals from the floor because they might be passed. The majority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, needs to call a timeout and regroup. By changing the issue from Iraq to partisan parliamentary tactics, his leadership team threatens to muddy the message of any anti-escalation resolution the Senate may eventually pass."

Reid May Use Anti-Terror Bill As Vehicle For New Surge Resolution. The Hill (2/7, Schor) reports that as Senate Democrats "seek votes on capping troop numbers and funding for Iraq, they may use the pending bill on the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission as a vehicle. That would set up a replay of the debate over funding for troops that this week derailed their leadership-backed non-binding resolution on…Bush's 'surge' proposal." Reid "has vowed to put Republicans on record on the 'surge' plan, which has opened GOP fissures."

Warner, Nelson And Collins Say They Remain In Agreement On Resolution. The Hill (2/7, Marre) reports, "The three senators who crafted the key resolution rejecting President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq said yesterday they are united despite having gone separate ways on a procedural vote Monday evening." Sens. John Warner, Ben Nelson and Susan Collins "all said they were still united, even though Warner in effect supported a filibuster of the resolution they crafted together. Collins was one of two Republicans who voted with the Democrats on the issue."

More Commentary On Iraq Debate. Thomas Friedman writes in today's New York Times (2/7, 1.16M), "Listening, from Moscow, to the debate in Congress about Iraq is troubling: it sounds as if the American people are being offered two routes to a dead end: either follow…Bush and have troops surging into a roiling civil war, or go with one of the Congressional resolutions and denounce the surge, but without any alternative strategy for securing US interests. I believe there is an alternative strategy, but it will take two concrete numbers to implement: a date -- Dec. 1 -- and a price -- $3.50 cents a gallon." Friedman adds, "We have to impose a tax that creates a floor price of $3.50 a gallon for gasoline -- forever. This is also about leverage. It says to all the parties: we are going to conserve enough gasoline and spur enough clean alternatives to fossil fuels that no matter what you all do in the Middle East, we will not depend on you for energy."

DOJ_NMG_0128650

In the Washington Post (2/7, A17, 690K), David Ignatius says "the debate on Iraq is still animated by wishful thinking. The White House talks as if a surge of 20,000 troops is going to stop a civil war. Democrats argue that when America withdraws its troops, Iraqis will finally take responsibility for their own security. But we all need to face the likelihood that this story isn't going to have a happy ending." Ignatius goes on to predict a "catastrophe" in Iraq.

House To Take Up Anti-Surge Resolution Next Week. USA Today (2/7, Kiely, 2.27M) reports, "The intense political maneuvering over how to signal congressional opposition to President Bush's war policy moved Tuesday to the House of Representatives, where Democratic leaders scheduled three days of debate for next week." The House's action "will guarantee that the president's Iraq policy will remain at the top of the national agenda next week, even if procedural disputes prevent the Senate from voting on its own resolution."

Roll Call (2/7, Davis, Yachnin) reports the language of the House measure "is being crafted by House Foreign Affairs Chairman Tom Lantos (D-Calif.) and Armed Services Chairman Ike Skelton (D-Mo.)." The House Democratic Caucus "is scheduled to hold a closed-door meeting Thursday to build consensus for the resolution vote next week and to assuage some Members' concerns that the resolution does not go far enough."

The Washington Post (2/7, A11, Murray, Kane, 690K) reports, "House Democrats had intended to work with the resolution offered by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), which Senate Democrats have rallied behind. Instead, after assessing the morass on the other side of the Capitol, they are now considering a more narrow statement of objection to Bush's proposal." The Washington Post (2/7, A1, Baker, 690K) also reports Bush strategists "have been surprised by how quickly the politics of the war have shifted in the past few weeks, and they have been grappling for a strategy to contain the political damage. The White House privately believes that a statement of opposition by Congress may be inevitable." Some advisers "have been surprised that Bush has not more aggressively accused Democrats of advocating retreat."

The AP (2/7, Espo) reports Pelosi and Majority Leader Steny Hoyer yesterday "reassured lawmakers clamoring for more robust action that the vote would merely be the first attempt to pressure the president to shift course and that future legislation will be binding." Democrats "intend to allow all lawmakers time to speak on the issue across three days of debate beginning next Tuesday." Rep. John Boehner, the House Republican leader, "said in an interview the GOP would prepare an alternative to the Democratic measure. He said it would include a call for a bipartisan committee to oversee the war effort and lay out a series of standards by which officials could judge whether the Iraqi government was living up to its commitments to help end the violence." Said Boehner, "If you're not for victory in Iraq, you're for failure. … The consequences of failure are immense. I think it destabilizes the entire Middle East, encourages Iran and on top of that, it's pretty clear that the terrorists will just follow us home."

Local TV extensively covered the congressional debate, with most stations focusing on House plans to address the subject next week. Some examples: CLTV-TV Chicago (2/6, 11:39 pm) said in its broadcast that while the Senate debate "is stalled, the House is ready to launch its resolution opposing the President's war plan. The debate will start next week." KWTV-TV Oklahoma City (2/6, 10:00 pm) led off its 10 o'clock newscast by saying, "Democratic Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi says the nonbinding resolution opposes the buildup. Republican House members say they won't block the vote but want an alternative considered."

Gates Says Troop "Surge" Not Final Chance For Iraq Success. The Los Angeles Times (2/7, Neuman, 850K) reports Defense Secretary Robert Gates, "in testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee today, rejected the widely held view in Washington that the Bush administration's decision to send additional troops to Iraq is the last chance to succeed in that troubled country." Gate said, "I would be irresponsible if I weren't thinking about what the alternatives might be." The Times added that as Gates "defended the administration's fiscal 2008 budget request of $481.4 billion -- along with a projected $141.7 billion in supplemental funding in 2008 for Iraq and Afghanistan -- senators expressed doubt about the war." Pressed by lawmakers "on equipment shortages for troops in the field, Gates said that a dearth of armored vehicles in one phase of operations will be remedied by July."

ABC and CBS also reported on Gates' testimony, with both noting that the Secretary said reductions in troop levels were possible if President Bush's plan works. ABC World News (2/6, story 3, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported Secretary Gates "told Senators today that the US might be able to begin withdrawing troops from Iraq later this year if the President's troop buildup reduces the violence in Baghdad. But Gates said the US would have to maintain a military presence in Iraq for years to come."

The CBS Evening News (2/6, story 6, :15, Couric, 7.66M) reported Gates "insisted today that the troop buildup in Iraq is not the last chance to succeed there. And he said that US forces might be able to start leaving Iraq by the end of the year if those additional troops work."

DOJ_NMG_0128651

Senate Armed Services Committee Approves Fallon And Casey. Fox News' Special Report (2/6, Hume) reported, "The Senate Armed Services Committee today approved the nominations of Admiral William Fallon as head of US Central Command and Army General George Casey as Army Chief of Staff, bringing to three the number of top officers who say that the troop surge in Iraq can work that have been approved by Democratically controlled oversight committees studying Iraq policy."

Republicans Enlisted Petraeus To Stall Criticism Of Iraq Surge. The Washington Post (2/7, A1, Baker, 690K) reports in a front page story that before Gen. David Petraeus left for Iraq, he "conducted one last counterinsurgency mission here on the home front -- this one on Capitol Hill." Senators were "approached on the floor and urged to meet with" Petraeus in Minority Leader Mitch McConnell's office. At a time "when the president and most of his top surrogates have lost credibility even among many Republicans in Congress, the administration has turned to the chiseled, widely respected Petraeus to win the day. His name has become the rallying cry for Bush and his allies as they argue that it would be wrong for lawmakers to confirm the four-star general unanimously one moment and then renounce his strategy the next." Sen. Lindsey Graham said, "He's the General Grant of the surge. He's our last best chance as a military commander to bring about a change on the ground." The Post adds Petraeus "maybe the last best chance for Bush allies to head off a resolution rejecting the troop increase or at least keep many Republicans from supporting it." Yet if "invoking Petraeus has been effective for Graham and others trying to rally Republicans, Democrats remain unpersuaded."

Senior Officers Want More Civilian Assistance In Iraq. The New York Times (2/7, Shanker, Cloud, 1.16M) reports, "Senior military officers, including members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, have told President Bush and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates that the new Iraq strategy could fail unless more civilian agencies step forward quickly to carry out plans for reconstruction and political development." The complaints "reflect fresh tensions between the Pentagon and the State Department over personnel demands that have fallen most heavily on the military. But they also draw on a deeper reservoir of concerns among officers who have warned that a military buildup alone cannot solve Iraq's problems, and who now fear that the military will bear a disproportionate burden if Mr. Bush's strategy falls short." In one example, officers "cited a request from the office of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice that military personnel temporarily fill more than one-third of 350 new State Department jobs in Iraq that are to be created under the new strategy." In his Senate testimony, Secretary Gates "made clear that he shared the officers' concerns, telling senators, 'If you were troubled by the memo, that was mild compared to my reaction when I saw it.'" Gates "also told senators that Mr. Bush himself had addressed his cabinet at the White House on Monday about the need for civilian agencies to 'step up to the task.'" The Times notes, "Tasia Scolinos, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, said in a statement that the agency 'has devoted substantial resources' to training the Iraqi police and creating a justice system. She provided a fact sheet that showed that the Justice Department had 200 employees and contractors in Iraq as of last August. … 'We are committed to working closely with the Defense Department and our law enforcement counterparts in Iraq to assess how we can best continue to support the reconstruction efforts in Iraq,' she said."

French Prime Minister Calls Troop Surge "Absurd." In an interview with the Financial Times (2/7, Arnold, Thornhill), French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin warned that "violence in Iraq will continue to worsen until all foreign troops are pulled out," dismissing as "absurd" the idea that an enlarged US force could bring stability and peace to the country. He also "indirectly criticised the decision by US President George W. Bush to boost his country's military presence in Iraq." De Villepin said an occupying force was the "founding stone of the crisis" and a clear timetable had to be set for its withdrawal. He told the Times, ""The idea of saying that foreign troops will leave when Iraq is democratic and pacific is absurd. … We need a clear horizon for the departure of foreign troops and the return of full sovereignty to Iraq."

Term "Granularity" Gains Popularity In Descriptions Of Iraq Policy. The Washington Post (2/7, C1, Weeks, 690K) reports "granularity" is a "mouthful of a term used by guys like Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the top U.S. commander in Iraq; retired Gen. Barry McCaffrey; and White House press secretary Tony Snow." Responding "recently to a question about potential sectarian violence in Iraq if U.S. forces withdraw, Petraeus told the Senate Armed Services Committee, 'It's hard from this distance . . . to get a real feel, or the real granularity of what's going on.'" Lately, "people have been invoking the word to mean specificity. Certain things, such as the administration's vision for the future of Iraq, lack granularity." In other words, "'granularity' is a popular word for the 'nitty-gritty.' But it's not so nitty, not quite as gritty. It's about texture. Concreteness. The word has migrated from science to business and now to politics and popular parlance."

House Panel Questions Bremer Over Use Of Iraq Reconstruction Funds. The New York Times (2/7, A8, Shenon, 1.16M) reports a House committee report Tuesday "questioned whether some of the billions of dollars in cash shipped to Iraq after the American invasion -- mostly in huge, shrink-wrapped stacks of $100 bills -- might have ended up with the insurgent groups now battling American troops." Democrats "sharply questioned" former administrator in Iraq, Paul Bremer, "about lax management of the nearly $12 billion in cash shipped to Iraq between May 2003 and June 2004." Bremer "defended his performance…noting that the United States had to bring tons of American dollars into Iraq because the country had no functioning banking system."

DOJ_NMG_0128652

The CBS Evening News (2/6, story 7, 2:05, Couric, 7.66M) called Bremer "a punching bag for Democrats demanding" answers to what ABC World News (2/6, story 2, 2:05, Gibson, 8.78M) said is "one of the great mysteries in Iraq. … You might call it…the case of the missing $12 billion. That much money in cash, mountains of money, got shipped to Iraq just after the invasion. Congress is asking where it went."

But in a Washington Post column (2/7, A2) titled "Rusty Democrats Unable To Pin Anything On Bremer," Dana Milbank says Bremer "had lost none of his swagger" during what was seen as "the grudge match Democrats waited years for." But Bremer "proved unexpectedly agile at shifting blame: to administration planners ('The planning before the war was inadequate'), his superiors in the Bush administration ('We never had sufficient support'), and the Iraqi people ('The country was in chaos -- socially, politically and economically')." However, Democrats, "after 12 years in the minority, were out of practice." USA Today (2/7, 5A, Kelley, 2.27M) reports Bremer testified that "he and the Bush administration made mistakes, including inadequate planning. … 'I acknowledge I made mistakes,' Bremer said. 'But on the whole, I believe we made great progress under some of the most difficult conditions imaginable.'"

The Wall Street Journal (2/7, A3, Paltrow, 2.04M) reports under the headline "Unspent Iraqi Funds Undercut Bush's Push For More," the Bush administration "faces a new obstacle in its quest to get more funds for reconstruction in Iraq: questions about why the Iraqi government has so much unspent money on hand." One "source of frustration" for the White House and many members of Congress "has been the Iraqi government's difficulty spending money it has on hand from oil and gas revenue." Committee chairman Henry Waxman "faulted the State Department for not making available Timothy Carney, recently named to the newly created position of coordinator of Iraq reconstruction," who the department "said he had to depart earlier than expected for Iraq." The Financial Times (2/7, Kirchgaessner) says Waxman "also hinted that he might subpoena" Carney. The Washington Post (2/7, A11, Chandrasekaran, 690K) reports Waxman said yesterday the State Department "offered several reasons Carney would not be able to appear, the last of which was insurmountable: He left for Baghdad on Friday."

The AP (2/7, Margasak) reports Democrats "are planning dozens of investigations, many of them in Waxman's committee, which scheduled further hearings this week on homeland security contracts and drug prices." McClatchy (2/7, Schoof), Washington Times (2/7, Miller, 88K) and New York Times (2/7, Shenon, 1.16M) run similar reports.

US To Pay $5.8 Billion To Expand Iraqi Security Forces. The AP (2/7, Burns) reports, "The US government will pay $5.8 billion to help Iraq expand further its army and police force, which are deemed too small for its security needs, senior Pentagon officials said Tuesday." The expansion, "announced Monday as part of President Bush's 2008 budget plan, would increase the Iraqi security forces from 328,000, which was the goal set several years ago and reached last December, to 362,000." Tina Jonas, "the Pentagon budget chief, told a small group of reporters that Bush's 2008 budget proposal includes $3.8 billion for the expansion and that the other $2 billion is contained in his request for an additional $93.4 billion to cover overall war costs for the remainder of the current budget year, which ends Sept. 30."

Iran Accuses US Of Role In Diplomat's Kidnapping. The CBS Evening News (2/6, story 5, 1:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Tensions are escalating between the US and Iran over the disappearance of an Iranian diplomat." CBS (Logan) added, "The US military…denied any involvement, and the Iraqi official spokesman said they were investigating whether" the diplomat, Jalal Sharafi, "was kidnapped or arrested." But CBS News reported that "unnamed Iraqi officials claimed commandos from" an "elite Iraqi unit, controlled by US forces, had taken the diplomat, but they offered no proof." Meanwhile, in an interview with ABC World News (2/6, story 5, 0:30, Gibson, 8.78M), "Iran's ambassador to Iraq said Iran is holding the US responsible for the diplomat's safety."

The Financial Times (2/7, Negus) warns the incident may "inflame the already tense relations between Washington and Tehran." Hasan Kazemi-Qomi, Tehran's ambassador to Baghdad, said on Iranian television the kidnappers had "used US vehicles" and that the abduction took place "within the framework of the US president's order to step up encounters with Iranians."

The Washington Post (2/7, A13, Partlow, Londono, 690K) adds, Iraqi officials declined to comment Tuesday on the Iranian allegations, "but Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari scheduled a news conference for Wednesday at which he was expected to address the issue."

The Los Angeles Times (2/7, Susman, 850K) says the "diplomatic snarling has put Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki in an awkward position as he tries to cultivate close relations with Iran while trying to convince American officials that he is serious about quelling violence."

DOJ_NMG_0128653

Blair Warns Global Opinion Hardening Against Tehran. The AP (2/7, Wagner) reports Prime Minister Tony Blair "told lawmakers Tuesday that no military action is planned against Iran, but that international opinion is hardening against Tehran's nuclear ambitions and what he described as its interference in conflicts across the Middle East." Iran "is trying to prevent reconciliation across the region, and I think that is very shortsighted and very foolish," Blair told the House of Commons' Liaison Committee. While conceding that "you can't take any option off the table," Blair stressed that "nobody is talking or planning military intervention."

Merkel Says Talks With Iran Still Possible. AFP (2/7) reports German Chancellor Angela Merkel "said that the door remains open for negotiations between Iran and the international community" over its nuclear program. In a joint press conference with Kuwait's Prime Minister Sheikh Nasser Mohammad al-Ahmad al-Sabah, Merkel said, "Even if the United Nations has decided on sanctions, the door for negotiations remains open." For his part, Sabah also stressed the importance of negotiations, saying, "It is important now to have unconditional negotiations."

Israel Seeking To Increase Pressure On Iran To Abandon Nuclear Program. The Los Angeles Times (2/7, Bordeaux, 850K) reports, "The specter of a nuclear-armed Iran has rattled Israel's self-confidence. Its politicians and generals warn of a "second Holocaust" if, as in the 1930s, the world stands by while a heavily armed nation declares war against the Jews." In response, Israeli officials have begun "an unusually open campaign to muster international political and economic pressures against Iran," warning that "time is growing short and hint that they will resort to force if those pressures fail to prevent Iran's development of an atomic weapon."

Iranian Economy Deteriorating Under Western Isolation. USA Today (2/7, 8A, Slavin, 2.27M) reports Western pressure on Iran "is squeezing its economy, feeding the inflation and joblessness that have swelled under" President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Trade figures and other data "have begun to reflect deepening economic isolation taking place as a result of US-led efforts to penalize Tehran for what the United States alleges is the pursuit of nuclear weapons and sponsorship of terrorist groups." Stuart Levey, US Treasury undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence, told the newspaper, "People who want to pursue legitimate commerce with the West will see that the policies Ahmadinejad is pursuing are leading to isolation and painting a more bleak economic future for the country."

Iran Cracks Down On Women's Legal Campaign. Editorial board member Maura Casey writes in the New York Times (2/7, 1.16M) about Shirin Ebadi, the Iranian lawyer and 2003 Nobel Peace Prize winner "whose relentless campaign against discrimination has enraged the mullahs for more than 25 years." Ebadi's latest campaign "is to help collect the signatures of one million Iranian women on a petition protesting their lack of legal rights." Casey says the movement "is doing on a grand scale what Ms. Ebadi has done for her entire adult life," and the Iranian government "certainly understands the implications." Casey reports that "just a few weeks ago, it blocked access to the campaign's Web site. But within hours the women had another Web site up and running."

Maliki Acknowledges Iraqi Government Errors. The New York Times (2/7, Santora, 1.16M) reports Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki "acknowledged for the first time on Tuesday that his government had stumbled in its efforts to carry out a new security plan in Baghdad and that the delays and mounting violence were hurting its credibility with the Iraqi people." Speaking to senior military commanders in an address "that was broadcast live on Iraqi national television," Maliki said, "I feel that we are late. This delay is giving a negative impression and has led some people to say that we have already failed." The Times adds, "Pressure is increasing on the Maliki government to show signs of progress on the security plan that was announced more than a month ago, especially after three weeks of bloody violence that has killed 3,000 civilians." Maliki "made it clear to the commanders that they needed to show results soon. 'I call on you to quickly finish the preparations so that we don't disappoint people,' he said." The Times adds Maliki "offered no reasons for the delay, but Iraqi military officials have expressed frustration over the slow pace and have cited several problems, including the failure of Iraqi troops from other parts of the country to arrive on schedule in Baghdad, the capital."

US Probes Iraqi Lawmaker's Connection To 1983 Embassy Bombings. The New York Times (2/7, A8, Glanz, Santora, 1.16M) reports a sitting member of the Iraqi Parliament "was convicted more than two decades ago of planning the attacks on the American and French Embassies in Kuwait that left five Americans dead in 1983," Iraqi and American officials said Tuesday. The Parliament member, Jamal Jafaar Mohammed Ali Ebrahimi, was sentenced to death in absentia by a court in Kuwait for the 1983 attacks and was later elected to Parliament in 2005. Lou Fintor, spokesman for the American Embassy in Baghdad, said, "We are actively investigating these serious allegations and continue to be in contact with the government of Iraq to pursue this case." The Times says it was "unclear when American officials first raised the issue with" Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Kamal al-Maliki, "but one official said there have been discussions for at least several months."

DOJ_NMG_0128654

Terror Casts Pall Over Baghdad Markets, Vendors. The Washington Times (2/7, Palmer, 88K) reports from a Baghdad market, "Such marketplaces have become favorite targets for sectarian attacks, including a horrific suicide truck bombing Saturday that killed at least 135 persons -- the deadliest single assault in the 46 months of the war. ... Yesterday, merchants at Abu Shujaa complained that the deteriorating security had hurt their sales, even as their costs continue to climb. ... The one sector that appears to be thriving in the market is the pharmaceutical industry. Akram Najy, 69, a pharmacist here for four decades, said prescriptions for sedatives remain steady, and demand for cold medications at this time of year is as high as ever. The shoppers, for their part, grumble that rising prices are forcing them to limit their purchases to essential items, and the constant threat of car bombs and mortars deters them from lingering in one place."

US To Reexamine Iraqi Refugee Policy. As reported elsewhere Tuesday, the Washington Times (2/7, A1, Kralev, 88K) notes on its front page the announcement this week by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice that the State Department has established a task force to "reexamine US policy on the admission of Iraqi refugees" that will "likely leading to a sharp increase in the number it admits each year." The task force also will "try to resettle in the United States some Iraqi employees of the US Embassy in Baghdad, whose lives are in danger because of their work for Americans."

Author Urges Creation Of Iraqi Refugee Fund. Behzad Yaghmaian, author of "Embracing the Infidel: Stories of Muslim Migrants on the Journey West," writes in a USA Today (2/7, 11A, 2.27M) op-ed, "The United States and its allies again have caused a refugee crisis in Iraq… But this time, CNN's cameras are missing." In order to solve the problem, Yaghmaian says it is "critical that Western nations finance a special Iraqi Refugee Fund that would let the U.N. process an increasing number of Iraqi applicants seeking resettlement." In addition, "A part of the fund could be given to Syria and Jordan to help them provide temporary housing, health care, education and other basic needs to refugees. Western nations should increase the number of Iraqis they accept for temporary or permanent resettlement." Helping to solve the current crisis, he writes, "is a moral obligation of those who contributed to its creation."

Video Shows Friendly-Fire Incident Involving British Soldier. ABC World News (2/6, story 4, 2:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "A dramatic cockpit video from an American fighter jet surfaced today." The video, "obtained and released by a British newspaper, captures the moment when two US pilots came to a sickening realization that they had mistakenly killed a British soldier on the ground." ABC added, "On the tape, the pilots seem genuinely horrified. But there are not in jail. A US military investigation, with British participation, cleared them of any wrongdoing and called the incident a 'tragic and unfortunate accident.'"

The New York Times (2/7, Lyall, 1.16M) reports the recording of 2003's accidental US airstrike on British soldiers in Iraq "became public on Tuesday when the newspaper The Sun published a leaked transcript" of a cockpit conversation between two US pilots involved in the attack. The newspaper also posted video of the attack on its website. The Times adds that as a result of the publication, the "American military announced…it would permit the videotape to be shown to the British coroner's court investigating the circumstances surrounding the death of the soldier who had been killed in the incident, Lance Cpl. Matty Hull, a member of the Household Cavalry Regiment."

The Washington Post (2/7, A12, Jordan, 690K) reports the friendly-fire incident occurred on March 28, 2003, but the US government "had declined to declassify it" until yesterday. Recently, however, "a British coroner investigating the corporal's death demanded that the recording, a cockpit video, be presented as evidence, suspending his proceedings until it was produced." The Post adds, "British officials say the mistaken attack near Basra targeted a convoy of five reconnaissance tanks and wounded four soldiers in addition to killing Hull."

Trial Date Set For Abu Ghraib Accused. The Washington Times/AP (2/7, Dishneau) reports, "The only U.S. military officer charged with crimes in the Abu Ghraib prison-abuse scandal would stand trial in July, under a tentative schedule set at a hearing yesterday. Army Lt. Col. Steven L. Jordan, former director of an interrogation center at the prison in Iraq, would be tried from July 9 to July 20 at Fort Meade in Maryland, according to the schedule set by the judge, Army Col. Stephen R Henley. ... He is accused of failing to exert his authority as prisoners were stripped naked, photographed in humiliating poses and intimidated by military dogs. He also is accused of lying to investigators about abuses he is said to have witnessed."

"Coalition Forces" Capture Al Qaeda Suspects In Afghanistan. The AP (2/7) reports, "Coalition forces captured two suspected al-Qaida members during an early morning raid in eastern Afghanistan on Wednesday, a military statement said. Afghan officials said soldiers captured six men and killed one person during the raid. The raid near the town of Hakimabad in Nangarhar province was conducted based on information provided 'about an al-Qaida member known to pass correspondence for al-Qaida senior leaders,' the U.S.-led coalition said in a statement." The AP continues, "The military did not say who executed the raid, but U.S. Special Forces soldiers operate under the banner of 'coalition forces' in Afghanistan."

DOJ_NMG_0128655

Taliban Still Controls Town It Overran. The AP (2/7, Abrashi) reports, "Taliban militants remain in control of a southern Afghan town nearly a week after capturing it, but NATO expects the Afghan government to soon reassert its authority there, an alliance spokesman said Wednesday." NATO spokesman Col. Tom Collins "said NATO troops stand ready to help the government again take control of the town but that there 'is no need to rush to action here.'"

Gates Says NATO Must Increase Contributions In Afghanistan. The AP (2/7, Baldor) reports Defense Secretary Robert Gates "said Tuesday that NATO allies must provide the troops and equipment needed to battle an expected increase in violence by Taliban insurgents in Afghanistan this spring." Gates, "who will meet with other NATO defense ministers Thursday in Seville, Spain, is expected to outline whether the U.S. plans to adjust its troop levels in Afghanistan or extend the deployment of any units already there, said a senior defense official." At a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing Tuesday, Gates "said the U.S. will hold the NATO countries to promises they offered during a summit in Riga, Latvia, last November, particularly for more trainers."

House GOP Wants Better Coordination To Fight Afghan Insurgency, Drugs. The Los Angeles Times (2/7, Meyer, 850K) reports four ranking Republican lawmakers "on a committee with oversight of U.S. policy in Afghanistan are calling on the Pentagon and State Department to dramatically change their tactics in that country to better contain its growing insurgency and flow of opium to the rest of the world." In a letter "dated today, the GOP House members are urging the Bush administration to act quickly to counter a host of problems in Afghanistan that they say are being made worse by mismanagement and misplaced priorities. They are calling for the appointment of a special coordinator of overall narco-terrorism policy for Afghanistan to prevent losing the fight against insurgents and drug traffickers." The letter "describes in detail how various U.S. agencies such as the Pentagon, State Department and Drug Enforcement Administration are not working together and essentially are fighting separate wars against insurgents and drugs even though they believe that the booming heroin trade is fueling the insurgency and financing terrorist attacks."

Italian FM Protests US Ambassador's Letter. The Washington Times (2/7, Phillips, 88K) reports Italian Foreign Minister Massimo D'Alema yesterday "protested an open letter to a Rome newspaper from US Ambassador Ronald P. Spogli and five other envoys urging Italy to maintain its troop deployment in Afghanistan." D'Alema called the letter -- which was also signed by the ambassadors of Australia, Britain, Canada, the Netherlands and Romania -- an "irregular" departure from normal diplomatic procedures. D'Alema told reports, "There are more appropriate bodies in which to discuss Italy's commitment in Afghanistan rather than through open letters from ambassadors to daily newspapers." In Washington, the State Department said the letter was "a praiseworthy initiative" by the US envoy.

Marine Vehicle Remains Costly Failure. The Washington Post (2/7, Merle, 690K) reports in a highly critical front page article, "After 10 years and $1.7 billion, this is what the Marines Corps got for its investment in a new amphibious vehicle: A craft that breaks down about an average of once every 4 1/2 hours, leaks and sometimes veers off course. And for that, the contractor, General Dynamics of Falls Church, received $80 million in bonuses. ... The Expeditionary Fighting Vehicle is one of the Pentagon's largest weapons programs and exemplifies the agency's struggle to afford a cadre of new mega-systems that are larger and more complex, but also more trouble, than their predecessors."

NNSA Wants Funding To Plan, Produce Next Generation Nuclear Warhead. Under the headline, "Nuclear Officials Seek Approval For Warhead; Design Would Require No Live Testing," the Washington Post (2/7, A6, Pincus, 690K) reports that National Nuclear Security Administration officials "said yesterday that they hope to receive administration and congressional authorization by the end of 2008 for the development and production of a warhead that could be deployed on submarine-launched intercontinental ballistic missiles." The Post adds that the NNSA wants "$88 million in the fiscal 2008 Energy Department budget" to "complete detailed planning with the Navy based on a design produced in December by the nation's two nuclear weapons laboratories. The new funds would support design concept testing and could lead to production of the warhead for the Navy's D5 missile, 24 of which are carried on each US Trident submarine. A key aspect of the Reliable Replacement Warhead program is that the warhead could be certified to enter the US nuclear stockpile without testing, acting NNSA Administrator Thomas D'Agostino and other officials said during a session with reporters." The Post adds that the request comes "as the Bush administration is attempting to stop Iran and North Korea from developing nuclear weapons and trying to keep other countries, such as India and Pakistan, from expanding their stockpiles."

DOJ_NMG_0128656

DOJ:

McNulty Denies Political Motives In US Attorney Dismissals. USA Today (2/7, Johnson) reports, "The Justice Department acknowledged Tuesday that it fired the U.S. government's chief prosecutor in Little Rock for no reason except to replace him with a lawyer who had been an aide to Karl Rove, the Bush administration's chief political strategist. … However, in an appearance before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty rejected criticism that the forced resignations of Bud Cummins and six other U.S. attorneys last year were politically inspired, or amounted to retaliation for the attorneys' involvement in controversial investigations and prosecutions." USA adds, "McNulty's testimony before the panel, which is investigating the firings of the prosecutors, was part of an exchange with Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y. Schumer said the White House's appointment process for prosecutors was 'corrupted with political, rather than prudent, considerations.' … 'What happened here doesn't sound like business as usual; it appears more reminiscent of a different sort of Saturday night massacre,' Schumer said, referring to Watergate-era firings at Justice that were ordered by President Nixon. … 'When I hear you talk about a politicization of the (Justice) Department, it is like a knife in my back,' McNulty responded."

The New York Times (2/7, Johnston) reports, "One disputed case involves H. E. Cummins III, a United States attorney in Arkansas who was asked to step down last summer although his office had increased drug and firearms prosecutions and he had helped organize a multiagency counterterrorism council. … To temporarily replace Mr. Cummins, the Justice Department named J. Timothy Griffin, a former military and civilian prosecutor who was a political director for the Republican National Committee and who once worked as a deputy to Karl Rove, the senior White House political adviser." The Times continues, "At the hearing, Mr. McNulty was asked by Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, whether it was accurate to say that Mr. Cummins had not done anything wrong to justify his removal. Mr. McNulty replied, 'I do not dispute that characterization.' … Had Mr. Cummins ever received a poor performance evaluation, Mr. Schumer asked. … Mr. McNulty answered, 'I'm not aware of anything negative.' … Mr. McNulty said that because the attorneys are presidential appointees, they can be replaced at any time without a specific reason. He said about half of the 93 prosecutors appointed to their jobs by Mr. Bush in his first term had already left voluntarily. Mr. McNulty said the appointment of Mr. Griffin was a chance for 'a fresh start with a new person.'"

The Washington Post (2/7, A3, Eggen) reports, "In often contentious testimony…McNulty also disputed Democrats' allegations that the firings appeared to be aimed at rewarding Republican allies and at avoiding the Senate's role in confirming U.S. attorney appointments. … 'The attorney general's appointment authority has not and will not be used to circumvent the confirmation process,' McNulty said. 'All accusations in this regard are contrary to the clear factual record.'" The Post adds, "McNulty's remarks did little to calm the growing political storm over the recent U.S. attorney firings. Top Democrats have condemned the firings, which have led to proposed legislation that would limit the attorney general's powers to appoint interim prosecutors. … McNulty acknowledged that six U.S. attorneys in the West and Southwest were notified in December that they would be asked to step aside, including the lead prosecutor in San Diego, whose office oversaw the bribery conviction of a former Republican congressman. … A seventh former U.S. attorney, Ed Cummins of Little Rock, has said that he was asked to leave last year to open the job for J. Timothy Griffin, who previously worked for Rove and for the Republican National Committee. McNulty did not dispute that characterization yesterday."

The AP (2/7, Kellman) reports, "McNulty reminded the panel that federal prosecutors serve at the pleasure of the president. And he repeated Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' promise to submit the name of every replacement to the Senate for confirmation. … McNulty spoke after weeks of Democrats' accusations that the forced resignations of prosecutors in Arkansas and California in particular were moves to reward Republican allies."

The Los Angeles Times (2/7, Schreck) reports, "McNulty also expressed strong opposition to a plan by Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) to strip the Justice Department of authority it received last year to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for indefinite periods without Senate confirmation. … That power, added to the USA Patriot Act when it was reauthorized in March, has worried some lawmakers. At issue is the amount of oversight that Congress — now in the hands of Democrats — has over the appointment of federal prosecutors." The Times notes, "Some legal experts have said that the moves, while legal, are unorthodox and could have harmful repercussions. … 'There's at least a strong perception by those in and outside of the United States attorney's office that this is not business as usual,' said Loyola Law School professor Laurie Levenson during her testimony Tuesday."

McClatchy Newspapers (2/7, Taylor) reports that McNulty "denied that politics played any role in the firings of other U.S. attorneys, including Carol Lam, who was asked to step down in San Diego. In 2005, Lam's office won a bribery conviction against then-Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, R-Calif. That investigation is continuing. … McNulty said his department had been 'proud' of the Cunningham prosecution, but he declined to elaborate on Lam's or any other U.S. attorney's firing during the hearing. He agreed instead to brief senators privately on the matter." McClatchy notes, "Last month, McClatchy Newspapers analyzed many of those interim appointments and found that Gonzales had been appointing conservative loyalists from the Bush administration's inner circle to fill the vacancies. … The new U.S. attorneys all have impressive legal credentials, but most of them have few ties to the communities they've been appointed to serve, and some have little experience as prosecutors."

DOJ_NMG_0128657

The Chicago Tribune (2/7, Demirjian) reports, "A year ago, Carol Lam, the U.S. attorney in San Diego, was fielding accolades for her successful prosecution of Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, the California congressman who pleaded guilty to tax evasion and corruption and was sent to prison for more than eight years. … Now, however, she is one of seven federal prosecutors that the Bush administration has removed from office in recent weeks, most for unspecified reasons, as was the case with Lam. The dismissals are unusual and that has prompted several Democratic senators to accuse the White House of taking undue aim at U.S. prosecutors, either to make way for up-and-coming Republicans or even to punish those who aggressively prosecuted friends of the administration." The Tribune continues, "McNulty defended the firings Tuesday at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing, saying, 'U.S. attorneys serve at the pleasure of the President -- they come and go for lots of reasons…. We don't really believe we are obligated to set forth a reason or cause.'" The Tribune notes, "McNulty told the committee that the administration is still consulting senators to identify the best candidates in their respective states and fully intends to send the prosecutors' replacements to the Senate for confirmation. But suspicious Judiciary Committee members said they plan to vote Thursday to rescind the Patriot Act provision that allows the administration to appoint interim U.S. attorneys indefinitely without Senate confirmation."

The San Diego Union-Tribune/Copley News Service (2/7, Cantlupe) reports, "Several members of Congress sent letters complaining about the job performance of U.S. Attorney Carol Lam, who announced her resignation last month. Her final day is Feb. 15, after 4½ years as the top federal prosecutor in the San Diego district. … McNulty repeatedly declined to spell out what Lam's performance shortcomings were, other than to note the complaints. … 'What about Carol Lam? Why was she terminated?' committee member Rep. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., asked McNulty. … 'I respectfully decline to go into specific reasons,' McNulty said. … 'I think the committee needs to know why she was terminated,' Specter responded. … But all McNulty would say is that 'the phone calls made in December were performance-related.' He was referring to calls made to Lam and five other prosecutors demanding their resignations. A seventh U.S. attorney, based in Arkansas, was dismissed earlier last year to make way for a former aide to White House adviser Karl Rove, McNulty said."

The Financial Times (2/7, Masters) reports, "Mr McNulty said Ms Lam's departure was unrelated to the bribery case but he said she was among the group removed for performance-related reasons. … 'In this administration, US attorneys are never, repeat, never, removed in an effort to retaliate against them,' Mr McNulty testified. He also said Timothy Griffin, Mr Cummins' replacement in Arkansas, was well qualified for his new position."

Roll Call (2/7, Van Dongen) reports, "Turning up the heat on the Bush administration on an increasingly touchy issue, Republican and Democratic members of the Senate Judiciary Committee grilled… McNulty… over why and how as many as seven U.S. attorneys around the country were dismissed from their posts since June." Roll Call continues, "Schumer repeatedly pressed McNulty, a former chief Hill counsel during former President Bill Clinton's impeachment proceedings and ex-House ethics committee lawyer, to provide documentation, such as written evaluations of each U.S. attorney's job performance, that would substantiate why the attorneys were fired. If that information is not provided quickly, the Democrat threatened to subpoena that information from Justice. 'For six years, there has been little or no oversight of the Department of Justice. Those days are over,' Schumer vowed." Roll Call notes, "In a strong opening statement putting Justice on the defensive, Schumer's comments were echoed by the panel's ranking member, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), a former Pennsylvania assistant attorney general. … 'If a U.S. attorney general was fired in retaliation for what was done on the prosecution of former Congressman Cunningham, that's wrong,' Specter stated. 'And that's wrong even though the president has the power to terminate U.S. attorneys. U.S. attorneys can't function if they're going to be afraid of the consequences of a vigorous prosecution.'" Roll Call adds, "McNulty strenuously denied any political motivation for the dismissal of the prosecutors, explaining that it was part of normal staff turnover. … McNulty, however, did not dispute Schumer's assertion that (Cummins) was dismissed without any specific cause. Democrats allege that Cummins was asked to step aside in order to install Tim Griffin, a former aide to White House adviser Karl Rove."

The Memphis Commercial Appeal (2/7, Sullivan) reports, "Sen. Mark Pryor, D-Ark., told the committee that 49 days after (Cummins) 'was ousted without cause,' and replaced by interim U.S. Attorney J. Timothy Griffin, he still doesn't know the grounds for the removal. Griffin, a protégé of presidential advisor Karl Rove and a former Republican Party opposition researcher, has not been nominated by the president and has therefore not been subject to the Senate's advise and consent oversight. … 'The failure to acknowledge that Bud Cummins was told to leave for a purely political reason is a great disservice to someone who was loyal to the Administration and who performed his work admirably,' Pryor testified." The Appeal notes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has said that Cummins and six other U.S. attorneys…were not removed for political reasons. … 'I think I would never, ever, make a change in a United States Attorney position for political reasons or if it would in any way jeopardize an ongoing, serious investigation,' Gonzales said last month."

DOJ_NMG_0128658

The Northwest Arkansas Morning News (2/7, Sadler) reports that McNulty told the committee "that Cummins was informed in a June phone call that he was being asked to resign without cause. At that point, Griffin had already been identified as an interim successor, he said. … Sen. Mark Pryor, D-Ark., said the Justice Department changed its story regarding Cummins' departure. … 'First they said that initially Bud Cummins decided to leave on his own,' Pryor said. 'It's taken many weeks to get here, but today the Justice Department admitted he was told to leave.'" The News adds, "Cummins said in a telephone interview Tuesday that he appreciated Pryor's defense of his service, but that he remained a Bush loyalist who had considered leaving his post regardless. … 'In my case, it's fair to say it was handled poorly, because they could just have easily called me and said "You haven't done anything wrong. You're a champ. You've been a great performer for the president, and we'd like you to cooperate with us and give this other guy a job for two years,"' Cummins said."

Lam Departure Reminds Some Of 1982 DOJ Scandal. U.S. News and World Report (2/7, Ragavan) reports, "To some veteran former Justice Department officials, the departure of Lam before the Cunningham probe is completed harks back to a similar case involving a CIA asset more than 25 years ago, in which the U.S. attorney was fired because of pressure from the agency. In 1982, the feds arrested the former chief of the Federal Security Directorate (Mexico's secret police), Miguel Nazar Haro, after he was indicted by a federal grand jury in San Diego for his involvement in an $8 million car-theft ring that had smuggled about 600 stolen American luxury cars and vans from Southern California to Mexico. … The U.S. attorney in San Diego, William Kennedy, had uncovered the car-theft ring and pushed the Justice Department to indict Haro. Kennedy charged that the CIA was blocking the indictment because Haro was a CIA asset in Mexico City and that the Justice Department was dragging its feet. Kennedy was reprimanded in no uncertain terms–President Ronald Reagan fired the prosecutor, a former Justice official says, after the CIA brought pressure to bear. But Haro–who was forced to resign as the secret police chief because of the car-smuggling allegations– was subsequently indicted and arrested. He posted $200,000 bail and fled, becoming a fugitive. And so he remained, until he was again arrested in February 2004, this time on charges that he had kidnapped a leftist leader nearly three decades earlier during Mexico's 'dirty war,' against the left. … After Kennedy was fired, Justice sources say, CIA officials used it as a 'warning' to other Justice officials not to challenge the agency. Kennedy later became a superior court judge in San Diego."

More Commentary. The New York Times (2/7) editorializes, "United States attorneys, the federal prosecutors who work in the states, are supposed to be respected, independent members of the bar. They have extraordinary power: they can file criminal charges and conduct investigations that can destroy reputations. They are supposed to be confirmed by the Senate, and there is a long tradition that they are not removed during the term of the president who appointed them, except for serious cause. .. At a Judiciary Committee hearing yesterday on the dismissals, the deputy attorney general who represented the Bush administration failed to explain convincingly why the United States attorneys had been removed, or to dispel the suspicion that politics was the driving force. Mr. Schumer says he may subpoena the dismissed federal attorneys' performance evaluations if he doesn't get a better explanation. The Senate should keep pushing for answers — and for nonpartisan prosecutors to be placed and kept in these important positions."

In an op-ed for the Baltimore Sun (2/7), George W. Liebmann, a Baltimore lawyer, executive director of the Calvert Institute for Policy Research, and the author of 'The Common Law Tradition: A Collective Portrait of Five Legal Scholars.', writes, "The news that the Bush administration has replaced seven U.S. attorneys, none charged with or guilty of wrongdoing, with people fairly describable as Washington apparatchiks should give pause to all those concerned with America's working Constitution. … The office of U.S. attorney is far more powerful than it was at the time of the ratification of the Constitution. Its functions are no longer limited to federal specialties such as customs and revenue offenses, but extend to virtually the entire range of criminal offenses. Stringent federal sentencing guidelines have rendered federal prosecutions the prosecutions of first resort, even for certain street crimes. During the tenures of Attorneys General Janet Reno, John Ashcroft and Alberto R. Gonzales, the number of federal prosecutors has greatly increased." Liebmann adds, "As the sweep of federal criminal jurisdiction widens, it is imperative that Congress thoroughly review the provisions for appointment and removal of all important federal law enforcement officials - not merely U.S. attorneys. The dispersion of police and prosecutorial power is the bedrock of American civil liberty. In all but two or three states, prosecutors are elected for short terms. … We do not want prosecutors to be laws unto themselves, and we do not want an elective dictatorship. Geographic dispersion of prosecutorial power, of which Congress has lately grown careless with its expansions of federal jurisdiction, has historically been the American answer to this problem. The growth of the central office of the Justice Department renders it imperative that old controls be reinstated and new ones devised."

DOJ_NMG_0128659

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Lengthy AOL Trial Ends With Acquittals Of Three. The Washington Post (2/7, D1, Johnson) reports, "An Alexandria jury acquitted two former AOL executives on all the conspiracy and fraud charges against them yesterday, dealing a blow to prosecutors and marking a decisive end to one of the longest trials in the federal courthouse." The Post continues, "Jurors spent slightly more than three full days in deliberation before clearing Kent D. Wakeford and John P. Tuli of charges that they helped a Las Vegas software client post fictitious revenue in early 2001. As the court clerk read the verdict, Tuli wept while his mother and his wife gasped with delight. Wakeford trembled, clapped his hands twice and hugged his lawyers. … The six-man, six-woman jury also acquitted Christopher J. Benyo, a former vice president at the Las Vegas company, PurchasePro.com. Defense lawyer Terrance Reed last week appealed to the jury to 'set yourselves and Mr. Benyo free' from a case that stretched into a fourth month, a rarity in a courthouse known for dispensing speedy justice. … 'You're free to go, gentlemen,' U.S. District Judge Walter D. Kelley Jr. told the jubilant defendants. Wakeford and Tuli clasped in a tearful embrace as prosecutors filed out of the eighth-floor courtroom without a word to spectators or opponents." The Post notes, "The case marks the second defeat for the government in its five-year-old investigation into accounting misdeeds at PurchasePro and AOL in the early days of the Internet bust. The same judge acquitted a former top lawyer for PurchasePro in December 2005 after a two-week trial. Once the focus of intense government scrutiny, high-ranking AOL sales and marketing officials ultimately avoided criminal charges, an issue that defense lawyers for their subordinates seized on as scapegoating during the trial. … Chuck Rosenberg, the U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia who joined the office last year, issued a statement praising the government team and concluding: 'Sometimes, jurors see things in a different way. We respect their decision.'" The AP (2/7, Barakat) also reports on the verdict.

Oil Drilling Firms To Pay $26 Million In Nigeria Bribery Case. The AP (2/7, Lozano) reports, "Three oil drilling companies - subsidiaries of a British firm - have agreed to pay a $26 million fine for bribing Nigerian officials in order to get preferential customs treatment, Justice Department officials announced Tuesday." The AP continues, "The fine by the companies, subsidiaries of London-based Vetco International Ltd., is the largest criminal settlement of foreign corruption charges, said Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty. … 'This case ... confirms our commitment to root out corruption,' McNulty said. 'The Department of Justice will continue its efforts to assure a level playing field for businesses operating abroad.'" The AP adds, "During a closed hearing in a Houston federal court Tuesday, the companies - Vetco Gray UK Ltd., Vetco Gray Controls Inc., and Vetco Gray Controls Ltd. - pleaded guilty to violating the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. … Vetco Gray Controls Inc. agreed to pay a $6 million fine; Vetco Gray Controls Ltd., $8 million; and Vetco Gray UK Ltd., $12 million. … A fourth subsidiary, Aibel Group Ltd., agreed to accept responsibility for similar conduct by its employees."

The Houston Chronicle (2/7, Fowler) reports, "This is the second time in three years a Vetco-related firm has paid fines for bribery. In July 2004 Vetco Gray of Houston and Vetco Gray of Aberdeen, Scotland, each agreed to pay fines of $5.25 million. At the time the companies were owned by ABB of Switzerland. … Last month General Electric Co. said it would pay $1.9 billion to acquire Vetco Gray." The Chronicle adds, "At a closed hearing this morning before U.S. District Judge Lynn Hughes in Houston, the companies pleaded guilty to violations of the anti-bribery provisions of the FCPA, as well as conspiracy to violate the federal law. … Aibel Group Ltd., another wholly owned subsidiary of Vetco International, also entered into a deferred prosecution agreement with the Justice Department . … According to the government from September 2002 through April 2005 each of the companies used an international freight forwarding and customs clearing company to make at least 378 payments totaling approximately $2.1 million to Nigerian Customs Service officials. The payments were aimed at getting customers officials to give Vetco preferential treatment."

US Subpoenas Allied Capital Records In Pretexting Probe. The New York Times (2/7, Creswell) reports, "Federal prosecutors have subpoenaed records of Allied Capital, a business development company that provides financing to smaller firms, in an effort to discover how private investigators it hired may have obtained the phone records of one of its leading critics." The Times continues, "Allied, which had previously denied any involvement, said yesterday in a statement that it has since become aware that an agent of the company obtained the telephone records of David Einhorn, a hedge fund manager, as well as records of calls from his fund, Greenlight Capital, during 2005." The Times adds, "Allied, which is based in Washington, said that it had received a subpoena from the United States attorney in Washington in December. … The statement added that Allied's management had not authorized the obtaining of the telephone records and that the company was cooperating with prosecutors." The Times notes, "In November, The New York Times reported accusations by Mr. Einhorn and other Allied critics that they had been the victims of pretexting — improperly impersonating an individual to obtain confidential information. … California's attorney general has filed criminal charges against one of Hewlett-Packard's former senior lawyers as well as its former chairwoman, Patricia C. Dunn, and two private detectives. All have pleaded not guilty."

DOJ_NMG_0128660

The Washington Post (2/7, D1, Nakashima, Cho) reports, "Until yesterday's disclosures, the firm and its board had denied allegations by Einhorn and other Allied critics that the firm had engaged in a practice known as pretexting, which involves posing as a person or family member of that person to trick a phone company into giving out phone records. … 'In the course of gathering documents responsive to the subpoena, Allied Capital has become aware that an agent of the company obtained what were represented to be telephone records of David Einhorn and which purport to be records of calls from Greenlight Capital during a period of time in 2005,' the firm said." The Post adds, "Allied also said that while gathering the documents for investigators, 'allegations were made' that management had authorized the acquisition of its critics' phone records and that it had been 'subsequently advised that these records had been obtained.' … 'The management of Allied Capital states that these allegations are not true,' the statement said. 'Allied Capital is cooperating fully with the inquiry by the United States attorney's office and will have no further comment concerning this matter until that inquiry has been conducted.' The company said its board had established a committee to review the matter."

Survey Finds Most Firms Slow In Developing Pretexting Rules. The National Law Journal (2/7, Qualters) reports, "A Deloitte & Touche poll revealed that most companies have not crafted policies to ban pretexting, which exposes them to potential criminal liability if their employees or investigators use deception to gather information in a probe." The Journal continues, "In an online poll of 230 executives during a Webcast conducted by Deloitte Financial Advisory Services late last year, 42 percent said their companies had no written pretexting guidelines, and 45 percent said they didn't know if their company had such policies. … Only 8 percent have guidelines they are satisfied with, while 5 percent believe they have unsatisfactory rules on the books." The Journal adds, "This lack of corporate attention on pretexting is especially alarming in light of a new federal law that creates criminal penalties for illicitly obtaining or disclosing telephone records. … President George W. Bush signed the bill in January, following civil and criminal charges against individuals involved in a Hewlett-Packard Co. scheme to fraudulently obtain phone records in an effort to discover which board members were leaking stories to the media. … Several detectives and the former chairwoman of the Palo Alto, Calif.-based technology company face criminal charges, and the company paid $14.5 million in civil fines." The Journal notes, "Beyond prohibiting tactics that are clearly illegal, such as obtaining bank or telephone records under false pretenses, companies need to consider what kinds of information-gathering techniques -- pretexting as well as other methods -- are acceptable at their firms, said Ernie Brod, director of Forensic & Dispute Services for Deloitte's financial advisory services arm. … The problem is that some individuals may see nothing wrong with surveillance, for example, but 'others may be appalled,' he said."

SEC Sues Former Engineered Support Officials Over Options Scheme. The AP (2/7, Gordon) reports, "Two former top executives of defense contractor Engineered Support Systems Inc. enriched themselves and others in a five-year-long scheme to manipulate the timing of stock option grants, federal regulators charged Tuesday." The AP continues, "The Securities and Exchange Commission filed a civil lawsuit in federal court in St. Louis against Gary Gerhardt, former chief financial officer of the company, and Steven Landmann, the former controller, over the alleged options backdating scheme. Employees and directors of Engineered Support received some $20 million in unauthorized compensation as a result of the backdating, while Gerhardt and Landmann reaped $1.9 million and $518,972, respectively, according to the SEC." The AP adds, "Landmann agreed in a settlement with the agency to pay a $259,486 civil fine and $627,071 in restitution plus interest. He also was barred from serving as an officer or director of, or as an accountant for, any public company. Landmann neither admitted nor denied the SEC's allegations under the accord. … The SEC's case against Gerhardt is still pending. … It was the third case by the agency since last summer involving alleged options backdating, in a scandal in which more than 100 public companies are under investigation by the SEC and the Justice Department, more than $5 billion in profit has been erased by restatements and 18 CEOs have been swept out of office." The AP notes, "Federal prosecutors issued a subpoena last June in the matter to Engineered Support, a St. Louis-based company that supplies electronics for the military and some government agencies. The SEC also began its investigation around that time."

The Wall Street Journal (2/7, A4, Forelle, Bandler) reports, "Yesterday's civil charges by the Securities and Exchange Commission come as the pace of governmental investigations into the backdating matter appeared to be quickening. Criminal charges in other cases are likely to be filed in coming weeks or months, according to people familiar with the matter." The Journal adds, "Federal prosecutors in St. Louis also are investigating Engineered Support's options practices. People familiar with the matter say prosecutors are looking closely at Messrs. Gerhardt and Landmann, and former chief executive, Michael F. Shanahan Sr. and his son, Michael Shanahan Jr., who had been a director."

DOJ_NMG_0128661

Former Qwest CEO Seeks Trial Delay. The AP (2/7, Shore) reports, "Former Quest chief Joe Nacchio's attorneys asked a federal judge Tuesday to delay his insider trading trial, saying prosecutors have been so slow in turning over evidence that his rights could be jeopardized if the trial starts March 19 as scheduled." The AP continues, "Attorney Herbert Stern sought a 60-day postponement to evaluate documents prosecutors have provided in recent weeks, including six CD-ROMs of material that Stern said he was made aware of Monday evening. … He said prosecutors advised if his team wanted to use any of the classified material, they would have to submit them to the court as required by federal law. … 'The government has chosen on the eve of trial to place a heavy burden on the defendant - to review voluminous materials and then make applications to the court and we do not even know the full extent of that burden,' Stern wrote in a brief filed in U.S. District Court." The AP adds, "Stern said the documents may support Nacchio's contention that he had hope for Qwest's future because he knew about the Denver-based phone company's classified business dealings with the government. … 'This request is not of our making, but if not granted will prejudice our ability to mount a full defense as required by the Sixth Amendment,' Stern wrote." The AP notes, "Nacchio's attorneys have complained previously about government attorneys being slow to provide evidence, prompting U.S. District Judge Edward Nottingham last week to order prosecutors to step up efforts to turn over such material. At issue are witness interviews and other documents that Nacchio's attorneys say may help his defense, a contention prosecutors have disputed. … Prosecutors have told the judge that the evidence exchange has been hampered because some documents fall under the Classified Information Procedures Act, which sets guidelines for viewing secret government material such as business contracts."

SEC Ratchets Up Probe Of Wall Street Trading Leaks. The Wall Street Journal (2/7, C15, Scannell, Smith) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission has asked nearly a dozen brokerage firms for trading and other data in an effort to determine whether there is a leak of inside information across Wall Street." The Journal continues, "The inquiry is being driven in part by complaints from mutual funds and others who worry market participants are trading ahead of their trades before they are executed. … The request is an expansion of the agency's continuing 'street sweep' investigation of potential insider trading, which has mainly focused on the passing of inside information within a brokerage firm. Now, the agency is expanding the probe to look at information being exchanged between firms in hopes of avoiding detection, according to a top agency official." The Journal adds, "The SEC is looking at the 'passage of information from one firm to another,' said Lori Richards, director of the SEC's office of compliance, inspections and examinations. 'It's just fact-finding at this point.' … The data request, reported in yesterday's New York Times, was sent by the SEC three weeks ago. The request seeks information on all stock and option orders in the firms' order management system for a 12-day period in late September, as well as a list of customers that use the firms' prime brokerage systems, which are used by hedge funds." The Journal notes, "The agency hopes that once it examines the data, it will be able to determine if the concerns are valid and if there is a tipping chain from firm to firm. The sweep is in the information gathering stages and not all examinations result in enforcement actions. … The new take on potential leaking on Wall Street was spurred partly from other enforcement cases. The SEC and Justice Department have cracked down on instances of traders passing information about large pending trades before they are public across the firm's information boxes, known as squawk boxes."

The New York Times (2/6, Anderson) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission has begun a broad examination into whether Wall Street bank employees are leaking information about big trades to favored clients, like hedge funds, in an effort to curry favor with those clients, executives at Wall Street banks said." The Times continues, "The inquiry, these people said, seems aimed at determining how pervasive insider trading, or the illegal use of market-moving nonpublic information, may be on Wall Street. Knowledge about a large trade, like the sale of a big block of stock by the mutual fund giant Fidelity, would tell a trader which way the stock would move." The Times adds, "Trading ahead of client orders, or front-running, has long been an issue on Wall Street. Large mutual fund companies have often complained in the past that Wall Street brokerage firms were front-running their trades, using information about the funds' plans to buy or sell to make a risk-free bet on a stock's direction. … But the latest S.E.C. investigation appears to have a new twist: Rather than examine whether a bank is trading ahead of its own client by using knowledge of the customer's trade, the scope of the investigation will allow regulators to see if banks tip their valued customers who then go trade at another bank, making the paper trail harder to detect."

USA Today (2/7, 5B, Farrell) reports, "According to people with direct knowledge of the probe, who don't want to be identified because the investigation is ongoing, the banks being examined include but are not limited to: Merrill Lynch, Credit Suisse, Morgan Stanley, Deutsche Bank and UBS. None of those banks would comment on the matter." USA notes, "For years, mutual fund executives have complained that financial intermediaries have used sensitive information about their buy and sell orders to disadvantage them in the marketplace. … Representatives of the mutual fund industry applauded the SEC's decision to conduct the examination. 'This issue is of paramount importance to mutual fund shareholders,' says Edward Giltenan, a spokesman for the Investment Company Institute, a trade organization for funds."

DOJ_NMG_0128662

Decline In Class-Action Securities Fraud Litigation Examined. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (2/7, A15), Joseph A. Grundfest, a professor of law and business and codirector of the Rock Center on Corporate Governance, at Stanford University, writes, "Litigation is booming in the U.S. Courts complain of burgeoning dockets. Lawyers collect record fees. Legislators, regulators and academics either grouse that litigation is driving business offshore and should be contained, or that economic injustice still pervades our economy and that the courthouse doors must be kept wide open to help right wrongs. … But few policy makers or scholars seem aware that a highly controversial component of the litigation market -- the class-action securities fraud litigation business -- is shrinking faster than a polar icecap. The interesting question is why this decline has occurred and what it means for the future of U.S. securities regulation." Grundfest continues, "According to data collected by Stanford Law School and Cornerstone Research, the number of companies sued in plain vanilla class-action fraud claims has averaged about 193 per year from 1996 through 2005, not much different from pre-reform levels. But halfway through 2005 filing activity took a sharp drop, and in 2006 only 110 companies were named as defendants in securities-fraud class actions. … A closer look at the data suggests that the decline is even more remarkable because 20 of these lawsuits allege options backdating activity. Backdating is a one-time event, and if we subtract these 20 cases we arrive at a 'core' litigation rate of 90 companies per year." Grundfest adds, "Why have these declines occurred? … Perhaps fewer companies are being sued for fraud because there is less fraud. Under this theory, the government's aggressive criminal and civil enforcement strategy following the Enron and WorldCom frauds has caused corporate boards and management to 'get religion' when it comes to complying with the securities laws. Executives are acutely aware that a major accounting or disclosure fraud is more likely than ever to leave them fired or indicted. They respond to this new regime like rational economic actors: If you increase the penalties for engaging in fraud then you reduce the incentive to commit fraud. Nothing complicated here at all. … As long as the government's enforcement activities remain sufficiently vigorous, the private class-action securities fraud lawsuit can be viewed as an expensive, wasteful and unnecessary sideshow that generates little deterrence and offers questionable levels of compensation. The question then is not why these lawsuits have been shrinking so rapidly in recent months, but when and whether they should exist at all."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Told Grand Jury Cheney "Upset," "Disturbed" By Wilson Claims. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/7, Apuzzo) reports, "On grand jury audiotapes played at his trial on Tuesday, former White House aide I. Lewis Libby said he learned about a CIA officer from Vice President Dick Cheney, forgot it, then learned it again from NBC News reporter Tim Russert a month later. … Libby's 2004 grand jury testimony…conflicts with testimony at his trial by a former White House press secretary, a recent vice presidential spokeswoman, a former CIA official, a former State Department undersecretary and reporters from The New York Times and Time magazine." The AP notes, "Meanwhile, the long-anticipated testimony by Cheney as well as Libby himself may not materialize. Libby's lawyers…indicated this week only that Cheney was 'potentially' a witness and that Libby might decide against taking the witness stand."

Under the headline "Court Hears Libby Describe Cheney As 'Upset' At Critic," the Washington Post (2/7, A3, Goldstein, Leonnig, 690K) reports Libby testified to the grand jury that "Vice President Cheney and other senior White House officials regarded" former ambassador Joseph Wilson's "accusations that President Bush misled the nation in going to war in Iraq as an unparalleled political assault and...held daily discussions about how to debunk them." Libby "said Cheney had been 'upset' and 'disturbed' by criticisms from…Wilson," and "Libby said that Karl Rove had been 'animated' by a conversation with Robert D. Novak, in which the conservative columnist told Rove he 'had a bad taste in his mouth' about Wilson and was writing a column about him." The Post notes, "Libby's portrayal of the zeal to discredit Wilson's claims, reaching to the White House's highest echelons, reinforces Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald's assertion that the criticism of war provoked such a political crisis among Bush's top aides that it is unlikely the defendant simply forgot his role in the leak, as defense attorneys contend."

The Los Angeles Times (2/7, Schmitt, 850K) reports that "jurors heard his recorded voice describe how he was instructed to leak intelligence secrets to select reporters, even as other White House officials were expressing concern over the leaks and debating whether the administration should formally declassify intelligence reports on Iraq to combat criticism of the case for war." On the tape, Fitzgerald was heard asking, "Was that unusual for you to have the national security advisor, the director of Central Intelligence, the White House chief of staff among others in the dark as to something that you had done regarding declassification?" Libby replied, "It is not unusual for the vice president to tell me something which I am not allowed to share with others."

DOJ_NMG_0128663

The New York Times (2/7, Lewis, 1.16M) notes, "The audiotapes also provided more detail about Mr. Libby's July 8, 2003, meeting with Judith Miller, then a reporter for The New York Times. Mr. Libby told the grand jury that his meeting with Ms. Miller was approved directly by the vice president. Mr. Libby said that in order to convince Ms. Miller that Mr. Wilson's article in The Times was filled with inaccuracies, Mr. Cheney first went to President Bush directly to declassify a National Intelligence Estimate. Mr. Libby said that he used the intelligence estimate in the Miller interview to counter Mr. Wilson's claims that there was no Iraqi effort to obtain uranium from Niger."

CNN (2/7) reports, "On a tape played at his trial Tuesday Lewis 'Scooter' Libby told investigators he thought President Bush authorized him to give a reporter information about CIA agent Valerie Plame. … 'If the president tells you to talk about a document, it's declassified,' Libby told Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald on March 24, 2003, during testimony before a grand jury that would eventually indict Libby for perjury and obstruction of justice." CNN continues, "The audio recordings, made nearly four years ago, shed light on how Libby handled the controversy over Wilson's allegations. … Libby said White House Counsel David Addington told him the president has the power to declassify material on his own. Libby said he asked Addington, 'Can the president declassify a document just by telling us to talk?' and Addington said he could. … Libby quoted that response to Fitzgerald on the stand." CNN adds, "Fitzgerald asked Libby whether he was present when Vice President Dick Cheney asked Bush to declassify the material, whether anyone else was present, and whether issues were raised about how going public might overrule CIA Director George Tenet. … To each question, Libby answered no. … Libby, who was Cheney's chief of staff at the time, also testified he had no knowledge of when or how Cheney got the okay from President Bush and concluded only the three of them were aware the material could be disclosed to New York Times reporter Judith Miller when Libby met with her for coffee at a Washington hotel."

Pennsylvania State Senator Indicted On 139 Corruption Counts. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/7, Dale) reports, "State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo, one of the most powerful and controversial figures in Pennsylvania politics, was indicted Tuesday on federal charges he used a nonprofit group for personal and political gain and defrauded the state out of $1 million. Many of the 139 charges stem from Fumo's ties to a nonprofit agency in his South Philadelphia district," the Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods. "Prosecutors said he used state employees and the nonprofit group to fulfill his every whim -- including cleaning his 33-room mansion, spying on his ex-wife, and fighting a dune project that might block his view of the ocean." The AP notes, "Fumo is to surrender to the FBI on Wednesday, the U.S. attorney's office said."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/7, McCoy, Shiffman, 385K) reports that "Fumo used taxpayer and charity money to pay for everything from political polls to power tools, from cars to farm equipment, from errands to shopping sprees, a grand jury charged yesterday. … 'Sen. Fumo didn't just step over the line,' U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan said yesterday. 'He completely ignored it.' … The indictment says Fumo once told a confidant that he had an acronym for one goal in his life -- spending 'OPM,' that is, 'other people's money.'" The Inquirer notes, "Fumo is scheduled to surrender to the FBI agents this morning who investigated him, Kathleen McAfee and Vicki Humphreys." Meanwhile, the Philadelphia Inquirer (2/7, Lounsberry, 385K) reported, "The 267-page federal indictment…is a portrait of greed and entitlement that prosecutors hope will be a road map to persuading a jury that one of the state's most resilient political figures engaged in fraud and other crimes. And it was the talk of the legal community yesterday, as lawyers across Philadelphia -- and beyond -- marveled at the level of detail and predicted a raging courtroom battle. … 'It's like the government saying, "We're so confident of our hand, we'll show you our hand,"' said former federal prosecutor Robert E. Goldman."

The Philadelphia Daily News (2/7, Hinkelman, 106K) reports that Fumo "touts his membership in the American Mensa Society, a society for people with very high IQs. But Fumo wasn't smart enough to avoid being charged yesterday with 139 felonies by a federal grand jury. … Ruth Arnao, 50, a longtime aide and former executive director of the Fumo charity, Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, also was indicted. She is charged with 45 counts of conspiracy, mail fraud, wire fraud, obstruction of justice and filing a false tax return." The Daily News notes that the "indictment painted Fumo as a man who 'abused' his power to 'build an empire' of Senate and charity employees who catered to his personal needs…Meehan said. … And, then, when Fumo realized investigators were onto him, he orchestrated a coverup by directing aides to destroy e-mails and other electronic evidence to scuttle the federal investigation, Meehan said."

DOJ_NMG_0128664

Philadelphia Editorials Weigh In On Indictment. The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/7, 385K) editorializes, "Fumo will have his day in court and is entitled to the presumption of innocence, of course. Indeed, he sought to preempt the indictment Monday by declaring in a Senate speech that he had 'not done anything illegal.'" However, the "charges resulting from a four-year probe by U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan paint a portrait of an elected official who let his unofficial title as the prince of Philadelphia politics go to his head." The Inquirer adds that the Citizens' Alliance "did good works," but "funds from a regional utility's ratepayers should have been used to benefit the region, not just one senator's district. And how much more good could this money have done if it were distributed to true, and truly effective, nonprofits -- not one so intent on enhancing the reputation, clout and comfort of one politician?

The Philadelphia Daily News (2/7, 106K) editorializes, "A Harrisburg hand grenade rolled into the room a few weeks ago with the news of $4 million in bonuses paid to legislative aides in the House and Senate. U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan just pulled the pin yesterday, when he released the indictment of state Sen. Vincent Fumo. That explosive 267-page document paints a picture of entitlement, a lack of accountabilty and a stunning disregard for the public trust that, if true, indicts not just a single senator, but an entire culture of arrogance, secretiveness and corruption that must be cleaned up."

DOJ Probing Loudoun County Land Deals. The Washington Post (2/7, A1, Laris, Somashekhar) reports, "Federal prosecutors have launched a far-reaching investigation into potential public corruption in Loudoun County, where officials have overseen billions of dollars' worth of development projects in one of the nation's fastest-growing areas." The Post continues, "Loudoun Commonwealth's Attorney James E. Plowman announced a joint investigation yesterday with the U.S. attorney's office in Alexandria, which will take the leading role. 'It's kind of a waste of resources if we're both independently reviewing the same matters,' Plowman said, adding that the combined federal-local effort 'brings about a greater aspect of neutrality.'" The Post adds, "The announcement follows months of quiet interviewing by FBI agents, who have queried county figures about possible abuses of power by officials, and represents a major escalation of the scrutiny facing Loudoun, the officials with the power to approve lucrative development projects and those in the real estate industry with the most at stake. … It also came shortly before Loudoun's Board of Supervisors passed ethics measures designed to increase government transparency. As part of the reforms, the board voted to discourage supervisors from accepting campaign donations from developers and others with pending projects, and it agreed to disclosure guidelines that could expose potential conflicts of interest." The Post notes, "The investigation and board action come after reports by The Washington Post last month that detailed how major land-use decisions in Loudoun have been dominated by a small network of public officials and their allies in the development industry. Developers, landowners and others profited as they coordinated with public officials to influence land-use decisions in the county, e-mails and other records showed. … Plowman, who last month said his office was focusing on eight or nine areas of inquiry, said in a statement that the joint group 'will be tasked with reviewing any potential issues of public corruption within Loudoun County.' It was unclear which individuals or specific actions are being investigated. … U.S. officials would not discuss their role in the probe. A spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, Jim Rybicki, said, 'Department of Justice policy does not allow us to confirm or deny the existence of an investigation.'"

Man, Company Charged With Bribery In "Operation Big Coon Dog." The Bristol Herald Courier (2/7, Still) reports, "A South Carolina resident and a North Carolina contracting firm were indicted Tuesday on corruption charges stemming from the Operation Big Coon Dog investigation that rocked Buchanan County after a 2002 flood nearly wiped out the Hurley community." James Frederick "Rick" Byrd and Byrd Brothers Inc. "were indicted by a federal grand jury in Abingdon, both on two counts of program fraud and money laundering conspiracy, according to a news release issued by the U.S attorney's office in Roanoke. … The indictment alleges that Rick Byrd is the agent for Byrd Brothers. He is accused of paying two bribes to Ray Blankenship, the former chairman of the Buchanan County Board of Supervisors."

FBI Arrests Reputed Bonanno Underboss, 18 Alleged Mob Associates. WABC-TV New York (2/6) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "The acting underboss and the elderly acting consigliore of the Bonanno crime family were among 19 reputed mobsters busted by federal authorities Tuesday morning, officials said. Authorities say acting underboss Nicholas 'Nicky Mouth' Santora, 73-year-old acting consigliore Anthony 'Fat Anthony' Rabito and 17 others were arrested during the raids. Officials say they will be arraigned in Brooklyn federal court on charges that include racketeering, racketeering conspiracy, conspiracy to commit murder in aid of racketeering, illegal gambling, extortion, extortion conspiracy, loansharking, securities fraud and narcotics distribution. It is reportedly the fifth time since 2003 that FBI agents busted the Bonanno crime family." WNBC-TV New York (2/6) noted, "FBI agents conducted raids and made the arrests Tuesday morning. … Former boss Joseph Massino has cooperated with authorities since his arrest, even having worn a recording device to help build a case against his former associates."

DOJ_NMG_0128665

The New York Times (2/7, 1.16M) reports, "All 19 pleaded not guilty yesterday, prosecutors said." US Attorney Roslynn R. Mauskopf "said that as part of an ongoing investigation, more than 100 Bonanno family members and associates have been prosecuted." Newsday (2/7, DeStefano) notes Santora and Rabito "are considered by the FBI to be the latest patchwork of leaders of a crime family that in the past five years has seen more than 70 of its members…convicted of federal charges. … Untouched by the latest charges is Salvatore Montagna, reportedly the new acting boss of the Bonanno crime family. A snippet of information about Montagna's reputed status came out in a letter submitted by prosecutors to the court Tuesday." The New York Daily News (2/7, Marzulli, 729K) and New York Post (2/7, Cohen) also briefly reported on the arrests.

House Republicans Unveil Anti-Crime Agenda. The Washington Times (2/7, Bellantoni, 88K) reports House Republicans on Tuesday "outlined a legislative package to curb drug crime, gang violence and child pornography -- pushing domestic safety issues they say will help them win back a majority." Republican members of the Judiciary Committee "criticized the Democratic leadership for leaving measures against violent crime off its publicized 'first 100 hours' agenda last month." Rep. Randy Forbes said, "If you listened very carefully, there was a deafening silence when it came to dealing with violent crime." The Times adds the "Republican Law and Order Agenda, formally introduced yesterday, lists nine proposals. Several were passed in the House in previous Congresses but stalled in the Senate." Among the Republican proposals "were bills to make the Internet safer for children, target identity theft and other cyberspace crime, and reduce fraudulent claims with the Federal Emergency Management Agency. They also give law enforcement more tools to crack down on drug trafficking and gang crime."

GOP Bill Would Require ISP Tracking. CNET News (2/7, Mccullagh) reports, "All Internet service providers would have to keep track of what their customers are doing online to aid police in future investigations under legislation introduced Tuesday as part of a Republican 'law and order agenda.'" CNET continues, "Employees of any Internet provider who fail to store that information will face fines and prison terms of up to one year, the bill says. The U.S. Justice Department could order the companies to store those records forever." CNET adds, "Rep. Lamar Smith of Texas, the top Republican on the House Judiciary Committee, called it a necessary anti-cybercrime measure. 'The legislation introduced today will give law enforcement the tools it needs to find and prosecute criminals,' he said in a statement. … A second requirement, also embedded in Smith's so-called Safety Act (click for PDF), requires owners of sexually explicit Web sites to post warning labels on their pages or face imprisonment. This echoes, nearly word for word, an earlier proposal from last year that was approved by a Senate committee but never made it to a floor vote." CNET notes, "Even though both requirements are central to a Republican-led effort, neither data retention nor Web labeling are that partisan. A Senate committee approved a telecommunications bill that included Web labeling by a 15-7 vote in June. And Rep. Diana DeGette, a Colorado Democrat, has been the most vocal proponent of data retention in the entire Congress. … Other bills in the Republicans' 'law and order' agenda are related to terrorism, the death penalty, gangs, computer data breaches and drug trafficking. ISP snooping timeline … The legislative fusillade marks the renewal of a political tussle that began in earnest last April, when Attorney General Alberto Gonzales called on Congress to target Internet providers with new regulations, which have been generally opposed by telecommunications companies and civil liberties organizations. CNET News.com was the first to report that the Bush administration has been pushing for such a rule privately since mid-2005. … Until this week, however, no formal bill had been introduced in the U.S. Congress."

Three Plead Guilty To Katrina Cleanup Billing Fraud. The AP (2/7) reports, "Three people, including a Florida contractor, have pleaded guilty to conspiracy to defraud the government by falsifying records of debris clean up from Hurricane Katrina and billing the federal government $716,677 for the work. Allan Kitto, 24, of Dundee, Fla., whose company was a subcontractor for debris cleanup in Pearl River County; Clinton K. Miller, 28, of Carriere; and Lauren Robertson, 23, of Picayune, entered the pleas Tuesday in Gulfport federal court, U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton said." The AP notes, "The indictment also charges that Kitto, in an effort to conceal the conspiracy, would deposit the funds into a bank account opened in the name of one of his employees and then write a check to an unindicted coconspirator who would then pay Kitto and Miller. Miller would then pay Robertson for completing and signing the false load slips, according to the indictment."

US Seeks Return Of $309 Million In Katrina Relief Aid. The AP (2/7) reports, "In the neighborhood President George W. Bush visited right after Hurricane Katrina, the U.S. government gave $84.5 million to more than 10,000 households. But official figures show fewer than 8,000 homes existed there at the time. … Now the government wants back a lot of the money it gave out across the region." The AP continues, "The Federal Emergency Management Administration has determined nearly 70,000 households improperly received $309.1 million in grants, and officials acknowledge those numbers are likely to rise." The AP adds, "In the chaotic period after two deadly hurricanes, Katrina and Rita, slammed the Gulf Coast in 2005, federal officials scrambled to provide help to hard-hit areas. … But an Associated Press analysis of government data suggests the government might not have been careful enough with its aid as it gave out nearly $5.3 billion to storm victims. The analysis found the government regularly gave money to more homes in some neighborhoods than the number of homes that actually existed. … The pattern was repeated in nearly 100 neighborhoods damaged by the hurricanes. At least 162,750 homes that did not exist before the storms may have received a total of more than $1 billion in improper or illegal payments, the AP found." The AP notes, "The AP analysis discovered the government made more home grants than the number of homes in one of every five neighborhoods in the wake of Katrina. After Rita roared ashore, there were more home grants than homes in one of every 10 neighborhoods. … The Justice Department so far has prosecuted more than 400 people for storm-related fraud, and $18 million(has been returned to FEMA or the American Red Cross, according to a recent report by the department's Katrina Fraud Task Force."

DOJ_NMG_0128666

Connecticut Bank Officer Sentenced To Prison For Embezzlement. The Middletown (CT) Press (2/7, Mill) reports, "A longtime bank official who embezzled more than a half-million dollars from Liberty Bank was sentenced Tuesday to 18 months in federal prison." Mary Kuskey "had worked for Liberty Bank in a variety of positions from 1974 until 2005, when she was fired after the bank uncovered a complex scheme to divert bank funds for her personal use." US Attorney Kevin J. O'Connor said that "she has made restitution of $190,148. However, she still owes Liberty another $410,799 'in order to fulfill her restitution requirement,' O'Connor said." The Press adds, "O'Connor commended Liberty Bank for uncovering the fraud and for what he called the bank's 'valuable assistance' with the subsequent FBI investigation."

Florida Man Pleads Guilty To $2.5 Million Medicare Fraud Scheme. The Miami Herald (2/1, Dorschner, 286K) reported, "Law enforcement announced several major developments over the past several days in its fight against healthcare fraud, reported to be a $1 billion a year business in South Florida alone." US Attorney R. Alexander Acosta's office "announced that Marcelo De Jesus Serrano pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit health care fraud. Serrano admitted to conspiring with others to submit fraudulent claims to Medicare for various services from 2003 to 2005 through the services of two local labs, Biocyte Laboratories and Washington Medical Laboratory, resulting in about $2.5 million in false claims, prosecutors charged. Serrano agreed to forfeit about $1.2 million in fraud proceeds in an Etrade account, the press release said."

Three Convicted In Texas Bank Robbery Scheme. The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (2/7, Okada) reports, "James Edward Geske, Kevin Michael Smith and Alicia Nichole Frazier face up to life in federal prison without parole after a Fort Worth jury found them guilty of plotting to orchestrate three simultaneous bank robberies in downtown Hamilton, including using military explosives to blow up 15 police cars." The Star-Telegram continues, "Geske, 27, was the ringleader of the plot that was planned in great detail during October and November. Smith, 37, and Frazier, 25, played lesser roles, but all are equally guilty of participating in the conspiracy to commit the crimes, the jury found. … All three were arrested on Nov. 8, the same day the bank plan was being finalized. On that day, Geske traded a stash of fake methamphetamine for guns with an undercover federal agent. The plan as a whole was largely brought down by two undercover law enforcement officers. … 'The Arlington Police Department and ATF (Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives) and this jury took three dangerous criminals off the streets, as well as a cache of weapons,' federal prosecutor Bret Helmer said. 'The end result could have been catastrophic for a lot of people in Hamilton, Texas.' … Defense attorneys attempted to portray their clients as small-time street characters who talked big but meant little."

US Seeks To Keep Convicted Ex-Coca-Cola Secretary In Jail. The AP (2/7, Weber) reports, "The government said in court papers Tuesday it believes a former Coca-Cola secretary convicted of conspiring to steal trade secrets from the beverage giant should be jailed immediately because she poses a flight risk." The AP continues, "In a motion filed in U.S. District Court in Atlanta, Assistant U.S. Attorney Byung J. Pak said clothing, prescription medication, papers and other personal items were found in Joya Williams' Mustang during a search after a fire destroyed her apartment Friday." The AP adds, "The fire, which has been ruled accidental by local officials in Norcross, occurred nearly 90 minutes after the guilty verdict was reached in federal court in Atlanta. … 'With no place to live, with no money, with a significant amount of debt, and with the prospect of a lengthy prison sentence, the defendant poses a serious risk of flight,' Pak argued in the motion. … Pak also indicated that while local fire investigators deemed Friday's fire was caused accidentally by an unattended candle igniting some curtains in a bedroom of Williams' apartment, the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives continues to investigate the incident. … Pak also said that Williams made inconsistent statements to investigators regarding her location and actions during the fire." The AP notes, "The government motion is seeking to force Williams to prove why she should not be remanded to the custody of federal marshals, and if she fails to do that, asks the court to order her jailed immediately. … Williams, who was out on bond during her trial, currently remains free pending sentencing."

DOJ_NMG_0128667

Cunningham Probe Exposes Secret Iraq Water Contracts. The AP (2/7, Shrader, Hoffman) reports, "CIA officers operating in northern Iraq bought drinking water from a bottling plant there for years prior to the 2003 invasion that ousted Saddam Hussein." The AP continues, "That changed soon afterward. A CIA officer handling logistics for the Middle East and other regions recommended that an American company provide water and other supplies, according to former government officials. … The U.S. contractor that benefited from the multimillion-dollar deal wasn't just anyone. The company had personal ties to the officer, Kyle 'Dusty' Foggo, who would soon leave his logistics post in Frankfurt, Germany, and move to Washington to become the CIA's third-ranking official." The AP adds, "In at least one written communication, a Baghdad CIA officer complained about the no-bid contract. According to one official, the officer believed the deal was simply unnecessary because safe water was available commercially but he was ignored. … The water contract, while small on the scale of the billions that flowed into Iraq, raises questions about why U.S. taxpayer dollars went to well-connected businessmen rather than Iraqis who could have benefited from a share of postwar reconstruction business. And the case provides a window into the murky world of covert government business arrangements." The AP notes, "Foggo retired from the CIA last year. He is now at the center of a federal investigation, nearing completion, into whether he improperly steered contracts to companies controlled by his best friend, San Diego defense contractor Brent Wilkes. … Federal prosecutors in San Diego are preparing to seek indictments against Foggo and Wilkes on charges of honest services fraud and conspiracy, two government officials familiar with the investigation told The Associated Press last week. … The probe of Foggo and Wilkes stems from a broader federal investigation involving at least five federal agencies into how associates of former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham directed government business to a favored network of national security contractors. Cunningham, a San Diego Republican elected to eight terms in Congress, is currently serving more than eight years in jail for taking at least $2.4 million in bribes. Another defense contractor has pleaded guilty to paying some of them."

At Least Six States Consider Broadening Death Penalty. USA Today (2/7, 1A, Bazar, 2.27M) reports, "At least a half-dozen states are considering broadening the death penalty, countering a national trend toward scaling back its use. Lawmakers have proposed legislation that would increase the range of crimes eligible for execution. In Texas and Tennessee, for example, legislators want to include certain child molesters who did not murder their victims." Virginia "is considering bills that would make accomplices to murder, as well as killers of judges and court witnesses, eligible for the death penalty." Other states "with proposals to expand the death penalty" include Missouri, Georgia and Utah.

Six Baltimore Police Officers Suspended In Overtime Pay Probe. The Baltimore Sun (2/7, Sentementes) reports, "Six Baltimore police officers were suspended Tuesday as part of an internal affairs investigation into possible 'irregularities' with their overtime pay, a department spokesman said." The Sun continues, "The officers -- two sergeants and four detectives -- worked in criminal investigations in the department's Eastern District when they filed for overtime that is now being reviewed by internal affairs investigators, police said. One of the sergeants was recently transferred to the Northeastern District, police said." The Sun adds, "Matt Jablow, a Police Department spokesman, declined to release the names of the officers or say how much overtime was in question. … He said that questions about their overtime -- which consisted of money paid out for court and investigative time -- arose as part of an internal audit last summer." The Sun notes, "Their law enforcement powers have been suspended, but the officers will continue to work in administrative positions, Jablow said. … According to a document obtained by The Sun, the suspended officers are Sgt. Darryl Massey, Sgt. Raynard H. Jones, and detectives Sandra D. Forsythe, Dave P. Peckoo, Kerry D. Snead and Kevin R. Turner. … The suspensions come amid a push by the department this year to curtail overtime spending."

CIVIL LAW:

Victims' Families Sue FBI Over Shootings During New Jersey Drug Sting. The Bergen Record (2/6, Crouse) reports, "Relatives of three of the four people gunned down in a Paterson after-hours club sued the federal government Monday, claiming the deaths resulted from a bungled FBI sting operation. Three men and a woman were massacred inside the illegal gambling club during an early-morning robbery Dec. 14, 2005. 'The FBI violated their own policies on undercover cases: to make sure that the safety of unrelated civilians is not in jeopardy,' said the families' attorney, Rosemarie Arnold. 'You have a virtual casino operating in a known dangerous neighborhood without any security. That to me is an invitation to robbery.'" The Record noted, "Based on police files, the lawsuit says the FBI set up the sting four months before the shootings to investigate drugs and arms trafficking by the Latin Kings gang. It claims the agency paid a former convict $3,500 a month to run the business…atop a warehouse on Railroad Avenue, but failed to properly train or supervise him."

DOJ_NMG_0128668

The AP (2/7) reports that the "mishandled FBI sting…led to a massacre in which four people died, according to a lawsuit filed by some of their families." The AP notes that after the shootings, the club manager "escaped the carnage, called 911, and said he worked for the FBI, according to a transcript of his call obtained by The Record of Bergen County and its sister paper, the Herald News of West Paterson. An FBI spokesman, Special Agent Steven Siegel, on Tuesday declined to comment on the lawsuit or on whether the manager was working for the agency."

Fatal Illinois Air Crash Blamed On Lack Of Radar. The Chicago Tribune (2/7, O'Connor) reports, "An air-traffic controller admitted Tuesday that he had no idea of a Cessna's location when he instructed its pilot to turn, a maneuver that less than two minutes later resulted in a midair collision that killed radio star Bob Collins and two others." The Tribune continues, "Testifying at a federal trial stemming from lawsuits filed by the families of the three victims, air-traffic controller Gregory Fowler said the crash of the two small aircraft would have been prevented if the Waukegan Regional Airport had been equipped with radar at the time. … A radar system was installed at the airfield five months after the February 2000 collision that killed Collins, a passenger in his Moravan Z242L plane and the student pilot at the controls of the Cessna 172P, Fowler said." The Tribune adds, "Fowler's testimony highlighted the first full day of testimony in the bench trial before U.S. District Judge John Darrah. Lawyers for the victims have sued the U.S. government, contending the Federal Aviation Administration was responsible for the crash, even though the Waukegan airport is operated by a private company. Other defendants reached settlements before the trial, which is expected to last about two weeks. … Relatives of two victims also testified, including Ed Hock, who struggled to keep his composure as he spoke about his daughter, Sharon, the student pilot, who he said had a vibrant personality. Evan Luscher, 19, whose father, Herman, died in Collins' plane, said he thinks of his dad every day."

Founder Of AmeriDebt Accused Of Hiding Assets From Debtors. The AP (2/7, Manning) reports, "The founder of a credit counseling firm accused of cheating thousands of debtors is hiding assets even though he agreed to contribute millions of dollars to help repay the debtors, a court-appointed receiver told a federal judge (in Greenbelt, MD) Tuesday." The AP continues, "The receiver, Robb Evans & Associates, wants Andris Pukke held in contempt of court, alleging the former head of now-defunct AmeriDebt is using friends and families to hide substantial assets - including an online betting venture, a California mansion, a development in Belize and bank accounts in Latvia." The AP adds, 'Hiding the assets would violate the terms of a 2006 settlement with the Federal Trade Commission that set up a restitution fund of up to $35 million. So far, only about $10 million of Pukke's money has been turned over to the FTC, which had sued him and AmeriDebt for allegedly charging customers $172 million in hidden fees. … 'There has been utter lack of cooperation on Mr. Pukke's part,' Gary Caris, an attorney for Rob Evans & Associates, told U.S. District Judge Peter Messitte in a hearing on the contempt request. … But in testimony Tuesday, Pukke claimed the attorney was overstating his control over money, such as the Latvian bank accounts held in his father's name. Pukke also said he no longer had a major stake in the Belize operation despite Caris' efforts to prove Pukke was still a part of the project." The AP notes, "AmeriDebt once was one of the largest U.S. firms meant to help debt-laden customers pay off their loans. But in its lawsuit, the FTC claimed AmeriDebt collected upfront fees that customers thought were going to pay down their debt but instead went to AmeriDebt. Pukke allegedly used that money, collected from about 300,000 people, to fund a lavish lifestyle. … The FTC and Pukke settled in January 2006 before the case was to go to trial. Pukke admitted no wrongdoing but agreed to disclose his assets for the restitution fund. The judge had already frozen Pukke's holdings a year earlier to keep him from hiding money."

Two New York Hospitals Bring RICO Suit Against UnitedHealth. The AP (2/6, Freed) reported that Flushing Hospital Medical Center and Jamaica Hospital Medical Center, both of New York, "said they sued insurer UnitedHealth Group Inc. on Tuesday alleging 'a pattern of racketeering activity.'" Filing suit under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations in federal court, they seek "at least $50 million in punitive damages, along with millions more in actual damages. The same hospitals sued under a similar set of facts last year in state court in New York." The AP continues, "Both lawsuits claim UnitedHealth cost them business by repeatedly telling patients that Flushing was not in its network and that Oxford Health, which was bought by UnitedHealth, did the same thing to patients at Jamaica Hospital. The lawsuit also claims Oxford postponed signing contracts with both hospitals to avoid paying them higher negotiated fees."

DOJ_NMG_0128669

Judge Orders More Mediation In Virginia Jet-Noise Suits. The Virginian-Pilot (2/7, White) reports, "A federal judge Tuesday ordered all parties involved in nearly 2,100 jet-noise lawsuits back to mediation." The V-P continues, "Judge Victor J. Wolski of the U.S. Court of Federal Claims in Washington set a tentative date in September for a two-week trial for the first group of lawsuits, should negotiations fail. … Wolski also granted a motion by the Justice Department that the court not review a recently submitted report from plaintiffs' lawyers, which included details of the original settlement agreement." The V-P adds, "Government attorneys argued that the information was improperly disclosed and could potentially sway the court if the lawsuits went to trial. … At stake is a proposed $38 million deal that was tentatively reached in October between the federal government and 2,098 homeowners who live near Oceana Naval Air Station in Virginia Beach and Fentress Naval Auxiliary Landing Field in Chesapeake. The median payment to homeowners who agreed to the deal would have been $5,000." The V-P notes, "Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman with the Justice Department, said the government was pleased with the court's order. … In a statement, Magnuson said 'by granting the government's request to appoint a mediator, the United States remains hopeful that the parties can reach agreement on the terms still in dispute and resolve this case without further litigation.'"

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Review Finds Vermont State Hospital Lagging In DOJ-Mandated Improvements. The AP (2/7, Rathke) reports, "The (Vermont) state hospital is behind in improving patient treatment, assessment, discharge and planning but has made progress in other areas, as part of a settlement with the U.S. Department of Justice, according to a six-month review." The AP continues, "The report by two out-of-state psychiatrists outlines numerous areas where the psychiatric hospital was not in compliance with the terms of the four-year settlement. … 'This is the first time that we're going through this and we'll be going through this again and every time we should in be greater compliance,' said Michael Hartman, the new deputy commissioner for mental health. 'Obviously if there weren't problems then we wouldn't be in this place in the first place.'" The AP adds, "The 70-page report released Tuesday noted progress in the hospital's reduced use of restraint and seclusion of patients, improvements to the building, creation of a full-time psychiatric team, hiring a staff neurologist, working with the University of Vermont medical school and certain areas of training, Hartman said. … But the report said the hospital needs a more organized system to better integrate documentation, treatment, assessment, use of medicine and therapy." The AP notes, "The Justice Department investigated the hospital in September 2004 after the facility lost its federal certification and millions of dollars in funding following two patient suicides. … The DOJ found the hospital used excessive seclusion and restraints and provided inadequate psychiatric and psychological services."

DOJ-Funded Human Trafficking Task Force Launched In Las Vegas. KLAS-TV Las Vegas (2/6) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "Local agencies announced Tuesday morning a massive task force has been formed, aimed at combating the problem of human trafficking. Dozens of agencies, including Metro, Henderson police, Nevada child seekers, Salvation Army, the AGS office, TSA, and the FBI are working together to identify people who are bring forced to work in the sex industry or as laborers. The federal government says Southern Nevada is one of 17 communities at high risk for human trafficking." KLAS noted, The Department of Justice granted Southern Nevada $370,000 to launch a task force to fight the problem."

Border Patrol Agent Beaten By Fellow Prison Inmates. McClatchy (2/7, Montgomery) reports that "one of two Border Patrol agents who were sentenced to a decade in federal prison for the shooting of a Mexican drug smuggler in Texas was beaten by five fellow inmates at a medium-security prison at Yazoo City, Miss., lawmakers and members of his family said Tuesday." Former agent Ignacio Ramos "told his family that a group of inmates surrounded his bedside…where they were being held and kicked him in the head, face and mouth" supposedly "after inmates watched an episode of 'America's Most Wanted' that featured the shooting case."

The Washington Times (2/7, Seper, 88K) reports that in response to the beating and resulting "minor injuries" of the former US Patrol agent in prison, White House spokesman Tony Snow "said a 'thorough investigation' has been ordered into the incident" while the Bureau of Prisons spokeswoman Traci Billingsley confirmed "that the assault occurred immediately after the airing of a television show that described Ramos' case" and added that "the Bureau of Prisons is vigorously investigating the matter and will pursue all appropriate sanctions against the assailants." Rep. Duncan Hunter, "a California Republican who has been critical of the government's prosecution of the agents, said the incident 'clearly demonstrates the severe risk involved with incorporating Border Patrol agents into general prison populations.'"

Bill O'Reilly on last night's broadcast of Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (2/6) commented that "this is totally unacceptable. We asked the warden of the prison for information but she would not tell us anything. The Justice Department says it is investigating. … There should be an investigation into her tenure at the prison. This is a high profile case. There is no excuse for this assault. … I knew this was going to happen."

DOJ_NMG_0128670

The AP (2/7, Caldwell) reports, "Prison officials on Tuesday confirmed assertions by a congressman and relatives of Ignacio Ramos. He was attacked Saturday night after his case was described on the TV show 'America's Most Wanted,' the officials said. … Ramos suffered minor cuts and bruises, U.S. Bureau of Prisons spokeswoman Traci Billingsley said in a statement." The AP adds, "Ramos has been moved to the special housing unit at the medium-and low-security federal prison in Yazoo City, Mississippi, where he is serving his sentence, Billingsley said. … The convictions of Ramos and fellow former agent Jose Alonso Compean sparked outcry from critics who argued that the men were merely doing their job defending the border against criminals. … Republican U.S. Rep. Tom Tancredo of Colorado, a vocal supporter of the agents and opponent of illegal immigration, criticized the Bush administration Tuesday for failing to protect Ramos and demanded a full presidential pardon for the two men."

Fox News (2/7, Porteus) reports, "Ignacio Ramos, who was transferred to the Yazoo City Federal Correctional Complex in Mississippi last month to begin serving his 12-year sentence for the February 2005 shooting of Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, was placed in a special housing unit after the incident pending an investigation, according to T.J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council. … 'We received verbal confirmation from the prison folks that he was assaulted and went to the infirmary and was treated for injuries,' Rep. Ted Poe, R-Texas, told FOXNews.com, adding that he has requested a written report of the incident." Fox adds, "Prison authorities, in a statement issued Monday, said that Ramos reported to the staff on Saturday around 10:15 p.m. ET that he was assaulted and that he sustained some 'minor' bruises and abrasions, Bonner said. … Some members of Ramos' family claim the assault happened after the airing of an 'America's Most Wanted' segment featuring both Ramos and Compean. They say the attack happened after Ramos fell asleep." Fox notes, "Ramos and Compean were found guilty by a jury of not only shooting Aldrete-Davila, but also of trying to cover up the incident. Supporters say it was wrong for Sutton to go after the border agents and not the drug dealer who was given immunity for testifying against them, and that the Justice Department has been less than forthcoming about certain facts surrounding the case."

9th Circuit Rules Wal-Mart Class-Action Bias Suit Must Go To Trial. The AP (2/7, Kravets) reports, "A federal appeals court ruled Tuesday that Wal-Mart Stores Inc., the world's largest private employer, must face a class-action lawsuit alleging as many as 1.5 million female employees were discriminated against in pay and promotions." The AP continues, "The ruling by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upholds a 2004 federal judge's decision to let the United States' largest class-action employment discrimination lawsuit go to trial, possibly exposing the Bentonville, Arkansas-based retailing powerhouse to billions of dollars in damages. … 'Plaintiff's expert opinions, factual evidence, statistical evidence and anecdotal evidence present significant proof of a corporate policy of discrimination and support plaintiff's contention that female employees nationwide were subjected to a common pattern and practice of discrimination,' the court wrote in a 2-1 decision." The AP adds, "Wal-Mart said it would ask the court to rehear the case with the same three-judge panel or with 15 judges, a move likely to idle the case for months. Tuesday's ruling came 18 months after the case was argued. … Wal-Mart, which currently employs 1.3 million workers, claimed that the conventional rules of class action suits should not apply in the case because its 3,400 stores, including Sam's Club warehouse outlets, operate like independent businesses, and that the company did not have a policy of discriminating against women."

The Washington Post (2/7, D1, Joyce) reports, "Wal-Mart said it will ask the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit in San Francisco to reconsider its decision. Barring that, the company will ask the U.S. Supreme Court to overturn the certification. A lower court originally said the case could proceed as a class action in June 2004, and the company first appealed the decision in August 2005. … 'We think its analysis is much too deferential to plaintiffs and erred in not taking into account Wal-Mart's evidence," said Theodore J. Boutrous Jr., an attorney for Wal-Mart. He said the court's ruling does not address the merits of the plaintiffs' claims, but whether the case meets the technical requirements to move forward as a class action."

The Financial Times (2/7, Waldmeir) reports, "The US Chamber of Commerce condemned the ruling. 'The suit includes a hodgepodge of claims, it's huge, it's unmanageable, and it's difficult if not impossible to defend,' said Robin Conrad of the National Chamber Litigation Center, the chamber's legal arm. 'Class actions like this are almost extortionate.'"

ABC World News (2/6, lead story, 2:40, Gibson) reported, "It is a lawsuit so large in scope and size, that it staggers the imagination. A Federal appeals court ruled today that a gender bias suit against Wal-Mart can proceed in what is known as a class-action suit. That means 1.5 million to 2 million women would be plaintiffs, arguing, as a group or class, that Wal-Mart discriminated against them in providing promotions and in paying them less than male employees." ABC adds, "It's America's biggest store, biggest employer, and now must defend itself against a huge female group of its own employees who claim Wal-Mart is also the biggest discriminator in the country. A Federal appeals courts in California ruled today that there is, 'significant proof of a corporate policy of discrimination' and that 'female employees nationwide were subjected to a common pattern and practice of discrimination.'"

DOJ_NMG_0128671

The CBS Evening News (2/6, story 10, :20, Couric) reported, "A Federal appeals court ruled today that Wal-Mart will face the largest sexual discrimination lawsuit in US history. The class action suit alleges as many as 1.5 million female employees were passed over for promotions and earned less than male coworkers."

NBC Nightly News (2/6, story 6, :30, Williams) reported, We learned today of a huge class action lawsuit and it's against the retailing giant Wal-Mart. A Federal court has ruled that as many as 1.5 million current and former Wal-Mart workers may sue the company for sex discrimination. A suit that could cost Wal-Mart billions of dollars. Still the case for all these women could be delayed more months. Wal-Mart is asking the court to reconsider the ruling."

Ninth Teen Sentenced In California Halloween Hate Crime. The Los Angeles Times (2/7, Abdollah) reports, "A black teenager was sentenced to probation in the Long Beach hate attack today, the last of a group to be punished in the Halloween night incident." The Times continues, "Judge Gibson Lee put Allyson Stone, who is now 18, on probation, ordered 250 hours of community service and racial tolerance training. … The sentence was similar to that given the eight other teenagers convicted in the attack. Most of the youths also received a sentence of house arrest. … One of the 10 defendants was acquitted in the case." The Times adds, "Darrell Goss, the lawyer for Stone, said he has already filed an appeal, the first in what is expected to be continuing legal action from the attack on a street in the Bixby Knolls neighborhood of Long Beach. … Laura Schneider, 19, Loren Hyman, 21, and Michelle Smith, 19 were injured in the attack."

Dallas Must Fix Jail Problems Within Three Months. The Dallas Morning News (2/7, Krause) reports, "Dallas County officials soon may have to shut the doors to their crowded and understaffed jail and pay millions of dollars to send inmates to other counties if they can't get the inmate population under control." The News continues, "The county has three months to meet the state's minimum staffing requirement of one guard per 48 inmates – something it has consistently been unable to do – or the state probably will order the crowded jail not to admit any more prisoners. … If that happens, the county would have to pay to transport and house its prisoners in other jails across the state, at an annual cost of up to $18 million." The News adds, "Such a scenario would result in 'mayhem,' Chief Public Defender Brad Lollar said. Defense attorneys may not have time to visit clients in distant jails, and inmates would have to be bused back and forth to court hearings. … The Texas Commission on Jail Standards summoned county and sheriff's officials to its meeting last Friday for a status update on the troubled jail. The commission staff had been prepared to recommend the remedial order that day to close the jail but reconsidered after hearing about improvements in the works, said Allen Clemson, the Commissioners Court administrator." The News notes, "County officials are now in emergency mode, having given themselves a 30-day deadline to reduce the jail's population of more than 7,000 by 1,000 inmates, which they said will bring them in compliance. … The Dallas County Jail system – the seventh largest in the nation – has failed state inspections three years in a row, primarily because of inadequate staffing. Dallas has the highest incarceration rate among Texas' five largest counties. … The Sheriff's Department spent more than $9 million in overtime in the jails last fiscal year. But a surprise state inspection in October revealed the jail still wasn't meeting the minimum staffing requirement. … 'We are both in agreement that you cannot go on like this forever,' said Adan Munoz, executive director of the Commission on Jail Standards. 'Remedial orders have to be put in place.' … Mr. Munoz said a U.S. Justice Department report on the jail was the main reason he asked Dallas County officials to appear last week before the commission in Austin. The federal investigation concluded in December that the county is violating inmates' civil rights with dangerous and unsanitary jail conditions."

WPost Urges Democrats To Act On DC Voting Rights. In an editorial in the Washington Post (2/7, A16, 690K) asserts that "it's time for the Democrats who control Congress to act on legislation to end the disenfranchisement of citizens living in the nation's capital." The Post calls for not merely support but action to push the languishing DC voting rights bill for approval in Congress. The Post urges Congressional Democrats not to allow "highly remote and partisan concern to stand in the way of their claimed support for fair representation for District residents" because changing the formula of the proposed legislation "could doom the bill, and no matter how good the intentions of lawmakers, the District deserves results."

ANTITRUST:

Monsanto's Delta Bid Raises Antitrust Concerns. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (2/7, Melcer) reports, "A pair of biotech agribusinesses wants to go head to head with Monsanto Co. in creating a better cotton seed, but they may never get there." The Post-Dispatch continues, "At issue is Monsanto's proposed $1.5 billion purchase of Delta & Pine Land Co. Swiss firm Syngenta AG and Pioneer Hi-Bred International Inc., a DuPont company, had planned to partner with Delta, combining their genetic traits with D&PL's seed. … The Monsanto deal is pending an antitrust review by the Justice Department. If it goes through, Syngenta and Pioneer will have to turn to rival Monsanto as their cotton seed partner." The Post-Dispatch adds, "All of the companies involved say the plans for partnerships are proceeding until the deal closes. They don't know what the future will hold, though Monsanto promises to work with its competitors. … But many cotton farmers say they were hoping increased competition would bring down prices and result in greater service and product choices. Now, they worry that won't materialize. … Monsanto, the world leader in developing biotech crop traits, said bringing competing technology to market is a common agribusiness practice that it is open to continuing with Syngenta and Pioneer. Monsanto's traits, for example, were planted on nearly 86 percent of U.S. cotton acres last year, yet Monsanto's Stone-ville brand of seed grew on just 12 percent of those acres, according to the U.S. Agriculture Department."

DOJ_NMG_0128672

Senate Committee Probing Possible Natural-Gas Price Manipulation. The Wall Street Journal (2/7, C2, Fialka, Davis, 2.04M) reports, "The Senate Energy Committee is investigating whether futures traders are manipulating markets that set natural-gas prices for consumers, farmers and industries. Sen. Jeff Bingaman, the panel's chairman, has sent letters to two federal market regulators, asking them what they know about unusual price fluctuations that may have taken place, which could have the effect of artificially raising indexes used to establish market prices for natural gas." The "investigation aims to explore how federal agencies monitor such trades, and if possible, to identify the agents and motivations behind the alleged illegal trading."

Samsung Settles State Price-Fixing Claims For $90 Million. Bloomberg (2/7, Gullo) reports, "Samsung Electronics Co., the world's biggest memory chipmaker, agreed to pay $90 million to settle claims by California, New York, Illinois, 38 other states and consumers that it conspired to fix prices on some chips." Bloomberg continues, "The accord resolves claims that the unit of Seoul, South Korea-based Samsung Group and other chipmakers drove up prices, inflating the cost of computers and other electronics for consumers and state governments. Samsung agreed to help state officials pursue claims against other chipmakers." Bloomberg adds, "Samsung, Infineon AG and six other companies were sued by U.S. states in July on claims that the companies added billions of dollars to chip costs by fixing prices of dynamic random access memory, the most commonly used semiconductor memory product. So-called DRAM is used by Dell Inc. and Hewlett-Packard Co. in making personal computers, laptops, printers, mobile phones, digital cameras and digital music players. … 'Consumers, states and localities were the victims of an international conspiracy that artificially raised the price of memory chips,' New York Attorney General Andrew Cuomo said today in a statement. 'This settlement is a major step in recovering the overcharges that Samsung and its co-conspirators illegally foisted on consumers and taxpayers.'"

The Financial Times (2/7, Nuttall) reports, "The class-action suits filed in July last year arose from a justice department investigation begun in 2002. It uncovered one of the largest price-fixing schemes on record. … It led to $730m in fines and guilty pleas by Samsung and three other major manufacturers of dynamic random access memory (Dram) chips – Elpida, Hynix and Infineon. A fifth, Micron, admitted taking part but avoided federal criminal charges through its co-operation with the authorities." The Times adds, "The price-fixing suits had charged that Samsung and others reached secret agreements to inflate the prices of memory chips commonly installed in consumer desktop and notebook PCs."

The AP (2/7, Johnson) reports, "About $80 million of the settlement will go to consumers nationwide while $10 million will cover losses suffered by states and local governments, Cuomo's office said." The AP adds, "The settlement is subject to approval in federal court in San Francisco. New York, California and Illinois were the lead plaintiffs in the case. … The lawsuit was one of several filed following a U.S. Justice Department investigation that began in 2002 into whether computer chip companies conspired to manipulate the number of DRAM chips released to market in a scheme to inflate prices. The investigation resulted in more than $730 million in fines and guilty pleas from four companies - Samsung Electronics Co., Elpida Memory Inc., Infineon Technologies AG and Hynix Semiconductor Inc."

Bush Visits Firm Once Accused Of Price-Fixing. The AP (2/7) reports, "President Bush preached the virtues of fiscal responsibility today at a company in Manassas, Virginia that recently settled a class-action lawsuit alleging it had engaged in price-fixing and violated antitrust laws." The AP continues, "Bush went to computer chip-maker Micron Technology Incorporated to talk about the budget he unveiled yesterday. He said Congress needs to set priorities in spending taxpayer money." The AP adds, "Micron Technology, based in Boise, Idaho, settled a federal class action lawsuit last month that was filed in 2002 on behalf of computer manufacturers who bought dynamic random-access memory chips, or DRAM from suppliers between April 1999 and June 2002. … The lawsuit is one of several filed after a U-S Justice Department investigation into whether computer chip companies conspired to manipulate the number of DRAM chips on the market to inflate prices. … The Justice Department granted Micron immunity from criminal charges in exchange for its cooperation. But the amnesty did not shield the company from lawsuits."

DOJ_NMG_0128673

Apple's Jobs Calls For Dumping Online Copyright Protection. The Financial Times (2/7, Nuttall) reports, "Steve Jobs, Apple chief executive, on Tuesday called on the four major record companies to start selling songs online without the copy protection software known as digital rights management." The Times continues, "Apple has been under pressure in Europe to make its iTunes Music Store compatible with players other than the iPod. Consumer groups and agencies in Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Norway, the Netherlands and Sweden have made antitrust complaints against Apple in recent months. … 'Perhaps those [European countries] unhappy with the current situation should redirect their energies towards persuading the music companies to sell their music DRM – free,' he said in a rare statement published on Apple's website." The Times adds, "The songs sold on the service are protected by Apple's proprietary FairPlay software, which prevents users from making multiple copies for distribution. Mr Jobs said Apple had concluded that if it licenses FairPlay to other companies it could no longer guarantee to protect the music it licenses from the major labels – Vivendi's Universal Music, Sony BMG Music Entertainment, EMI and Warner Music Group. … Instead, he favours abolishing DRM entirely so any MP3 player could play music purchased from any online store."

The Los Angeles Times (2/7, Quinn) reports, "The letter, which can be seen at www.apple.com/hotnews/thoughtsonmusic, walks through the problems of anti-piracy software, also known as digital rights management, that is supposed to prevent consumers from copying digital music. … Jobs lists the problems with the software, which is often hacked and needs updating and prevents consumers from listening to their music wherever they like. He also points out that consumers are already buying compact discs and copying them digitally without facing controls to stop them. … What the letter doesn't spell out is how Apple and Microsoft were advocates for DRM use so that the music they sold through their online stores could only be played on their devices."

The Wall Street Journal (2/7, A1, Wingfield, Smith) reports, "In an 1,800-word online essay, Apple Inc.'s chief executive said the world's major music companies should consider allowing Apple and others to sell songs unfettered by anticopying software that prevents them from being shared or played however a consumer chooses. … Mr. Jobs contends that the recording industry isn't solving piracy with the technology, and could spur the market further if music lovers could buy music online without the restrictions. Many consumers resent the curbs on how they can listen to what they buy from online stores. Songs from one company's catalog, for example, won't work on another company's player -- a gridlock that has frustrated some consumers. Getting rid of the antipiracy software could make downloaded music as widely compatible with digital players in the market as compact discs are with CD players." The Journal adds, "While Mr. Jobs is positioning his proposal as a consumer-friendly step, it isn't clear whether the biggest music companies -- Warner Music Group Corp., EMI Group PLC, Vivendi SA's Universal Music Group, and Sony BMG, the joint venture of Sony Corp. and Bertelsmann AG -- will embrace his recommendation. Allowing online music sales without anticopying software would amount to a radical about-face for the recording industry, which several years ago viewed the technology as a remedy to rampant online piracy through file-sharing networks like the original Napster and Kazaa. Music heavyweights have long required Apple and others to use the technology -- known as digital-rights management, or DRM, software -- if they wish to sell their songs online."

USA Today (2/7, Maney) reports, "Apple, which dominates the legitimate digital download market, uses DRM called FairPlay. Songs bought at iTunes can play only on PCs using iTunes software or on Apple's iPod. Songs with DRM from other companies such as Microsoft and RealNetworks won't play on iPods. … Apple has been accused of using FairPlay to lock consumers into iTunes. Jobs contests that, noting that just 3% of songs on an average iPod were bought through iTunes and have DRM. Songs copied from CDs and music files in the MP3 format can be played anywhere."

The New York Times (2/7, Markoff) reports, "He dismissed one possible alternative, in which Apple would license its own system, FairPlay, allowing competing digital players to play iTunes songs and letting other stores sell copy-protected music for the iPod. Mr. Jobs said that approach would only complicate enforcement of digital rights management, as myriad companies would have to coordinate software and hardware updates. … Instead, he proposed that labels could shed digital rights management altogether. Mr. Jobs pointed out that only 10 percent of all music sold last year was through an online store and that music is already easily loaded onto digital players from CDs, with no antipiracy features. Attaching digital rights management to music bought online has only limited the number of online music stores, he wrote." The Times notes, "Mr. Jobs's move comes as the music industry appears to be facing a crisis. Sales of its mainstay product — the album — continue to sink, and sales of digital music, including individual songs, have not increased fast enough to offset the decline. … With a paucity of hit releases to start the year, industrywide album sales are already down more than 15 percent from last year, the worst January performance since computerized sales tracking began in 1991."

DOJ_NMG_0128674

The Washington Post (2/7, D3, Musgrove) reports, "Phil Leigh, senior analyst and president of Inside Digital Media, said Jobs's comments were legitimate, albeit a bit self-serving. … 'Jobs is trying to show that Apple is not the bad guy when it comes to proprietary formats,' Leigh said, noting that the open letter was an aggressive public-relations tactic by a company that eventually will have to renegotiate with the record companies. 'I think he's taking the offensive here.'" The Post notes, "Chris Castle, a music-industry lawyer who represented the original Napster, said the shift from CDs to digital music has hurt the music industry enough that it might be willing to consider Jobs's points. … 'I think the labels are finally starting to come around to this,' he said. 'There's more willingness to entertain this sort of thing than there ever has been.'"

Shareholders To Vote Today On Equity Office Sale. The Wall Street Journal (2/7, A3, Forsyth, Sender) reports, "With only hours until shareholders of Equity Office Properties Trust are to decide whether to sell the company to private-equity firm Blackstone Group, the outcome was still up in the air last evening." The Journal continues, "If Vornado Realty Trust comes in with a higher offer before the vote at noon EST today, it would likely delay the tally -- at least until the Equity Office board has time to consider whether any new offer resolves its reservations that Vornado's previous bids have had too many uncertainties." The Journal adds, "At stake in this high-noon gunfight is the nation's largest office portfolio and bragging rights to pulling off one of the largest leveraged buyouts in U.S. corporate history -- valued at $23 billion, not including the assumption of Equity Office's $16 billion in debt. But the risk for the eventual winner is considerably higher than when the bidding battle began in November with Blackstone's initial bid. … In addition to the size, the bidding battle involves two longtime kings in the commercial real estate world -- with Equity Office led by chairman Sam Zell and Vornado led by chief executive Steven Roth -- and a relative newcomer in Blackstone. Blackstone has become a huge player in real estate with acquisitions within the last 24 months, reflecting the aggressive strategy of Jonathan Gray, the 37-year-old head of its real estate group."

The New York Times (2/7, Pristin) reports, "Real estate investors waited yesterday to see if Vornado Realty Trust would try to top Blackstone's latest all-cash offer of $55.50 a share, which was approved during the night by Equity Office. … Equity Office shareholders are scheduled to vote today on the $39 billion bid by Blackstone, a private equity company." The Times adds, "If Vornado fails to raise its bid to win the deal, many investors will be surprised. Vornado's chief executive, Steven Roth, has said that buying Equity Office would make his company the dominant real estate investment trust in the office sector, with a strong portfolio of 'irreplaceable assets' in the markets where it is hardest for developers to put up new buildings. In addition to office buildings, the company owns shopping centers and showroom space."

MGIC To Purchase Radian In $4.9 Billion Stock Deal. The Wall Street Journal (2/7, A4, Barris) reports, "MGIC Investment Corp., a provider of insurance on low-down-payment mortgages, said Tuesday it agreed to acquire Radian Group Inc., a global credit-risk management company, in a stock swap valued at about $4.9 billion." The Journal continues, "Under the agreement, Milwaukee-based MGIC said it will exchange 0.9658 share of its stock for each share of Radian. The terms don't appear to offer Radian shareholders any premium. Radian shares closed Monday down 44 cents at $60.84, while MGIC's offer was valued at $60.78 at Monday's close. … Shares of both companies jumped sharply in early afternoon trading Tuesday. Radian shares were up 9.3% at $66.47, while MGIC shares rose 11% to $69.70." The Journal adds, "The combined company, a mortgage and credit-risk insurer to be called MGIC Radian Financial Group Inc., will have assets of nearly $15 billion and primary mortgage insurance in force of more than $290 billion, the companies said. The combined company will have 'a broad and balanced mix of businesses including domestic mortgage insurance, financial guaranty, financial services and international credit enhancement,' the companies said. … MGIC Chief Executive Curt S. Culver will head the company until 2009, when he will cede the CEO job to Radian Chief Executive S.A. Ibrahim. Mr. Culver will pass the chairman post to Ibrahim in 2010. The board initially will be tilted 6-5 in MGIC's favor, but will add a sixth Radian director soon after the deal closes." The Journal notes, "MGIC is the parent of Mortgage Guaranty Insurance Corp., a provider of private mortgage insurance serving about 5,000 lenders nationwide and in Puerto Rico. MGIC had $176.5 billion in primary insurance in force covering 1.3 million mortgages as of Dec. 31. The company reported last month that its fourth-quarter earnings fell to $121.5 million from $128.1 million a year ago, as revenue slipped 1% to $367.2 million."

Midwest Management Resists AirTran's $345 Million Offer. USA Today (2/7, 3B, Adams) reports, "As the USA's biggest airlines jostle to get bigger and more powerful, little Midwest Airlines is happy to be itself: an anachronism. … But things could soon change for Midwest as a result of an ongoing hostile takeover effort being waged by Orlando-based AirTran Airways, the USA's third-biggest discounter." USA continues, "Milwaukee-based Midwest, which most East and West coast residents have probably never heard of, has no desire to get rich quick, swallow other airlines or be swallowed itself. It flies to cities in America's heartland that the major carriers would just as soon fly over. … Only Midwest, for example, flies non-stop from Omaha to Reagan Washington National, or from Kansas City non-stop to New York LaGuardia. Along the way, flight attendants bake chocolate chip cookies that are served free, still warm and fragrant. It recently completed its first full year of profit since 2000." USA adds, "The airline 'has built up an amazing love affair with its passengers that I've never seen the likes of,' says Midwest's marketing chief, Scott Dickson. If AirTran succeeds, he says, 'There will be no vestige of Midwest Airlines left.'" USA notes, "Over its objections, AirTran has launched a $345 million tender offer to acquire Midwest's shares directly from shareholders in hopes of forcing the board to sell. AirTran undertook the offer after Midwest's management rejected outright an earlier offer to buy the airline. … AirTran, which owns a few hundred Midwest shares, has gone to court to try to get Midwest's full shareholder list and is lobbying Midwest's institutional investors, who own up to half of Midwest's shares. Shareholders' deadline to tender shares is March 8, extended from an earlier deadline of Feb. 8."

DOJ_NMG_0128675

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Groups Reopen Suit Against EPA Over Pesticide Ban. The AP (2/7, Kim) reports, "Farmworkers and environmental groups have reopened a lawsuit against the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency in an attempt to force it to more quickly phase out a pesticide they say has been poisoning fieldworkers for decades." The AP continues, The federal lawsuit challenges a decision by the EPA last November to set a 2012 timetable for phasing out the pesticide azinphos-methyl, known as guthion or AZM. … 'These pesticides put thousands of workers at risk of serious illness every year,' Erik Nicholson of the United Farm Workers of America said Monday in a news release. 'It is inexcusable for EPA to allow AZM to continue poisoning workers for six more years.' … The pesticide has been used on apples, cherries, pears and other crops since the late 1950s." The AP adds, "The farmworkers and environmental groups, represented by the environmental law firm Earthjustice, sued the EPA in federal court in Seattle in 2004, arguing that the agency was wrong to continue allowing the use of a pesticide that could cause dizziness, vomiting, seizures, paralysis, loss of mental function and even death. The lawsuit was put on hold when the EPA agreed to reconsider the use of AZM and another pesticide, phosmet, which is used on orchard crops and blueberries. … Last November, the EPA decided to end the use of AZM on nursery stocks and Brussels sprouts by Sept. 30, 2007. The phase-out for nuts was extended until Oct. 30, 2009, and for apples, blueberries, cherries, pears and parsley until Sept. 30, 2012. … The EPA decided to lengthen the phase-out time but also progressively limit the amount of AZM that would be available during the period, Enesta Jones, an EPA spokeswoman, said Monday."

Gore Says Bush Administration Paying Scientists To Dispute Global Warming. CNN.com (2/7) reports, "Former Vice President Al Gore said in an interview on Tuesday the Bush administration is now paying scientists to dispute global warming since the administration can no longer argue against it." He "said, 'they've lost the argument and they don't want to stop dumping all this pollution into the Earth's atmosphere. The only thing they have left is cash and now they're offering cash for so-called skeptics who will try to confuse people about what the science really say. But it's unethical because now the time has come when we have to act.'"

"Insiders Poll" Shows Parties Divided On Global Warming. The National Journal (2/7) provides the results of its "Insiders Poll" of 113 members of Congress on global warming. Asked whether "it's been proven beyond a reasonable doubt that the Earth is warming because of man-made problems," 95% of Democrats and 13% of Republicans said "yes." Asked which actions to reduce global warming they could possibly support, 88% of Democrats and 19% of Republicans said they could support mandatory carbon dioxide emissions.

China: Richer Nations Bear Primary Responsibility To Combat Global Warming. The New York Times (2/7, Yardley, 1.16M) reports, "China said Tuesday that wealthier countries must take the lead in curbing greenhouse gas emissions and refused to say whether it would agree to any mandatory emissions limits that might hamper its booming economy." A Foreign Ministry spokeswoman "said China was willing to contribute to an international effort to combat global warming but placed the primary responsibility on richer, developed nations that have been polluting for much longer." Her "comments, combined with another briefing on Tuesday by the country's leading climate expert, represented China's first official response to a landmark report issued last week by a United Nations panel of scientists that declared global warming is 'unequivocal' and warned that immediate action must be taken to prevent harmful consequences."

DOJ_NMG_0128676

Legacy Of Radiation Illness Stirs Opposition To Divine Strake. The Washington Post (2/7, A6, Geis, 690K) reports from St. George, Utah, "The federal government reassured the townspeople they were in no danger as it detonated 952 bombs in Nevada over four decades. But thousands of people who lived downwind of the test site got radiation-related cancer, and the town of 50,000 has its own cancer-treatment center today. So when word got out recently that the government wants to test a huge conventional bomb in Nevada ... people in St. George felt an unwelcome blast from the past. At a series of emotional meetings last month in Las Vegas, St. George, Salt Lake City and the Idaho capital of Boise, people who live downwind of the Nevada Test Site expressed fear that if the government goes ahead with its code-named Divine Strake test, radioactive dust from previous tests will blow their way. ... Like others in southern Nevada, [Rep. Jim Matheson] speaks bitterly of declassified documents that show the government did not detonate nuclear bombs when the wind blew toward Las Vegas. They waited until the wind blew toward St. George."

EPA Chief Under Fire At Senate Hearing. The AP (2/7, Werner) reports, "The head of the Environmental Protection Agency faced down hostile critics Tuesday in his first committee appearance before the Democratic-led Congress, denying accusations that agency decisions last year rolled back environmental safeguards. 'These decisions and actions all accelerate the pace of environmental protection. They all deliver environmental results,' EPA Administrator Stephen Johnson told the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee." The new committee chair, Democratic Sen. Barbara Boxer, replied, "Nobody's fooled by this. … EPA has gone too long without meaningful oversight."

McClatchy (2/7, Whitney) says Boxer "lambasted" Johnson over "environmental rollbacks," and "detailed six areas where she said the agency's decisions have benefited industries at the expense of public health." Said Boxer, "I want to send a clear signal to EPA and to this administration: We are watching...and no longer will EPA rollbacks quietly escape scrutiny."

Energy Department Seeks To End Funding For Geothermal Power. The Christian Science Monitor (2/7, Clayton, 59K) reports that new geothermal power techniques have the potential to provide "[e]nough power to provide 10 percent of US electricity by 2050 – with near-zero emissions of greenhouse gases. That's the promise of 'enhanced geothermal systems,' or EGS, says a recent report by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology." There "are just two major catches. First, about $800 million in research and development is needed over the next decade to make the drilling technology cost-effective. Second, the Department of Energy is trying to kill the program by ending its funding." On Monday, DOE unveiled a "budget with more funding for nuclear power, alternative fuels, and science programs – but nothing for geo-thermal." Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid wrote in a Feb 1 letter to Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman, "The administration has been surprisingly hostile to geothermal energy research development and deployment." Reid "asked the DOE to restore funding to at least 2006 levels and to assure Congress of continued funding."

Conservation Easements Give Tax Incentives To Landowners. The Wall Street Journal (2/7, D1, Silverman, 2.04M) reports that landowners can be "encouraged by recent tax legislation" that allows tax breaks when owners place a permanent "conservation easement" on their land. This allows landowners to continue to use undeveloped land "for farming and timber but most of it can never be developed." While, "landowners who place conservation easements on their scenic, environmentally sensitive or historic properties have long been able to get tax breaks from the federal government…some states have also begun offering tax incentives. Now, a little-noticed provision…passed last summer has made the federal tax breaks even more generous" which "has spurred a sharp increase in the number of landowners interested in placing easements on their property." Although "the law is designed to encourage easement donations by allowing larger tax deductions," the IRS has become more vigilant in monitoring potential easement abuses resulting in inflated deductions.

House Committee Approves Bill Allowing Indian Tribes To Receive Anti-Meth Grants. The AP (2/7) reports a House subcommittee on Tuesday "took a step toward helping Indian communities battle crisis levels of methamphetamine use. A House Judiciary subcommittee passed legislation sponsored by New Mexico Rep. Tom Udall…that would allow territories and Indian tribes to receive law enforcement grants to battle meth use. Udall said larger meth legislation passed by Congress last year 'unintentionally left out' Indian tribes as possible applicants for some grant programs. This legislation would clarify that law so the tribes would be eligible."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

US, Latin American Authorities Gather For Anti-Gang Summit. The Los Angeles Times (2/7, McGreevy, 850K) reports, "As director general of the El Salvador National Civil Police," Rodrigo Avila-Aviles "is here to talk to the FBI about what can be done about the number of gang members moving back and forth between Central America and the United States. … 'As a general rule, the guys who have more status in the gangs in El Salvador are the ones who have been deported from the United States, who have been in prison here,' Avila-Aviles said Tuesday as he and the heads of police forces for four other Central American nations prepared to discuss the issue today with their U.S. counterparts. … But the traffic goes both ways, with U.S. law enforcement struggling to deal with an influx of gang members from Central America and Mexico." The Times notes, "Cooperative measures announced as part of a four-part plan this week by U. S. Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales include fugitive apprehension, international coordination on deportations, information sharing, and cross-border training and prevention programs. To better identify, track and apprehend gang members, the FBI will accelerate implementation of the Central American Fingerprinting Exploitation system, Gonzales said."

DOJ_NMG_0128677

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/7, Glazer) reports that in the past, "Los Angeles' pervasive and violent street gangs were seen as a local problem and not part of an international criminal web, even as some gangs such as MS-13 and 18th Street, oozed across borders into Mexico, Guatemala, El Salvador and Honduras. The three-day summit beginning Wednesday in Los Angeles reflects a recent shift in that philosophy. It features top officials from several Central American and local U.S. police departments, along with the FBI." The AP notes, "Robert B. Loosle, who oversees the FBI's gang investigations in Los Angeles, said crimes committed by gangs in Central America serve as a bellwether for potential criminal enterprises in the U.S. Particularly noteworthy, Loosle said, was a spike in extortion rackets committed by gangs in El Salvador. … 'Since members of gangs travel freely across borders, we need to pay attention to new trends they bring with them,' Loosle said."

The Los Angeles Daily News (2/7, Uranga) also notes, "Local police are afraid some of the more brazen tactics Central American gangs use will emerge in Los Angeles. 'Their tactics are a lot more vicious than other gangs, they are more violent and they are everywhere,' said Robert Loofle, the FBI agent overseeing Los Angeles' criminal division. 'They use intimidation to get what they want, they will commit a vicious homicide to show their power and the force, then easily cross the border. We have to clamp down now so they don't evolve into something stronger and more vicious.'" BBC World Service (2/7, Willis) also is reporting this morning on the Los Angeles summit.

23 Indicted On Drug Charges In "Operation Polar Express." The Boston Globe (2/3, Murphy, Radin, 413K) reports, "They worked out of nondescript little storefronts around Dorchester and Quincy: a flower shop, nail salon, grocery store, and wood floor finishing business," but "law enforcement officials said the unidentified businesses were covers for members of Vietnamese drug rings who had been smuggling ecstasy and marijuana from Canada over the past two years and peddling it throughout Greater Boston. Four indictments handed down by a federal grand jury Thursday…charged 23 people, ranging in age from 22 to 56, with conspiring to sell ecstasy or marijuana, and in some cases both. Three of them were also charged with money laundering." The Globe noted, "A task force of federal agents, state troopers, and local police tapped telephones, sifted through trash, made undercover drug buys, and conducted exhaustive surveillance during a 15-month probe dubbed Operation Polar Express that led to the four indictments, according to law enforcement officials."

The Newton (MA) Daily Tribune (2/3, Roy) added, "'Complete cooperation among federal, state, and local law enforcement partners made it possible to dismantle this drug-dealing organization,' said U.S. Attorney Michael J. Sullivan. … June W. Stansbury, DEA special agent in charge, said the drugs were marketed using images such as Superman, a bat, a kangaroo and even the Statue of Liberty."

Former Los Angeles "Drug Boss" Gets Life Sentence. The Dayton (OH) Daily News (2/6) reported an "ex-Los Angeles drug boss was sentenced Monday in federal court to life in prison for supplying hundreds of pounds of cocaine to the Dayton area. A jury in September convicted Ronald Taylor, 47, on charges accusing him of operating a continuing criminal enterprise and conspiracy to distribute and possess more than 300 pounds of cocaine." Prosecutors said the operation "funneled cocaine from L.A. to Dayton, Columbus, New York City, Buffalo, Milwaukee, Detroit, Nashville and Washington, D.C., between September 1999 and July 2001."

Authorities Link Gambling Losses To San Diego Charger Safety's Cough Syrup Case. The San Diego Union-Tribune (2/7) reports authorities said frequent gambling losses at area casinos "apparently led Chargers safety Terrence Kiel to seek other means of income, including the shipping of codeine-based cough syrup that got him arrested last year. … Kiel, 26, is due in court today for a trial readiness hearing on five felony charges related to the cough syrup matter. Kiel's attorney, Bob Grimes, said he hoped to reach a deal with prosecutors and the judge, and that it could include Kiel's addressing of the gambling issue. … Kiel was arrested in September after Drug Enforcement Administration agents intercepted two express mail packages containing 18 pint bottles full of the drug. Authorities said Kiel admitted to shipping the cough syrup to his native Texas, where it can sell for up to $325 on the street and where it is mixed with soft drinks."

DOJ_NMG_0128678

Connecticut Cocaine Ring Investigation Nets 3 More Guilty Pleas. The Connecticut Post (2/7) reports the front for a cocaine distribution ring "was an auto dealership. The carriers were often cars packed with cocaine and driven [to Bridgeport] from New York. … That is, until the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's High Intensity Drug Task Force wiretapped telephones at East End Auto…and videotaped drug deals. … Three more ring members…pleaded guilty this week, just before the scheduled start of their trial on cocaine-trafficking charges." The three guilty pleas "bring to 13 the number of ring members who have admitted their roles in the operation." The Post says all three pleaded guilty to "conspiring to possess with the intent to distribute cocaine."

North Dakota Issues Industrial Hemp Licenses To 2 Farmers. There are more than 100 media references to North Dakota issuing what the AP says are the nation's first licenses to grow industrial hemp.

The AP (2/6, Nicholson) reported North Dakota "issued the nation's first licenses to grow industrial hemp Tuesday to two farmers who still must meet federal requirements before they can plant the crop. The farmers must get approval from the Drug Enforcement Administration, which treats hemp much the way it does marijuana and has not allowed commercial hemp production but has said it would consider applications to grow it. … The state issued permits Tuesday to Wayne Hauge and Dave Monson, who is also a legislator." The state Agriculture Department "is processing 16 other hemp applications," according to state Agriculture Commissioner Roger Johnson.

In a separate story, the AP (2/6) reports the first two North Dakota farmers licensed to "grow industrial hemp have different plans for their future crops, assuming the federal government allows them to be cultivated." Hauge "said he wants to grow and sell registered hemp seed to other farmers." Monson "wants to sell both hemp seed and fiber." A version of the AP story was used by ABC News, CBS News, FOX News, WLS-TV in Chicago, the New York Times, Washington Post, Los Angeles Times, San Francisco Chronicle, San Diego Union-Tribune, Miami Herald, Houston Chronicle, Boston Globe, Kansas City Star, and North Dakota's Bismarck Tribune.

Lawmakers Seek New Tactics In Afghanistan, Say DEA, Other Agencies Aren't Working Together. The Los Angeles Times (2/7) reports four Republican lawmakers on a committee with oversight of U.S. policy in Afghanistan "are calling on the Pentagon and State Department to dramatically change their tactics in that country to better contain its growing insurgency and flow of opium to the rest of the world. In a letter dated today, the GOP House members are urging the Bush administration to act quickly to counter a host of problems in Afghanistan that they say are being made worse by mismanagement and misplaced priorities. … The letter describes in detail how various U.S. agencies such as the Pentagon, State Department and Drug Enforcement Administration are not working together and essentially are fighting separate wars against insurgents and drugs even though they believe that the booming heroin trade is fueling the insurgency and financing terrorist attacks." The Times says the letter was written by Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.), Mike Pence (R-Ind.), Elton Gallegly (R-Simi Valley) and Dana Rohrabacher (R-Huntington Beach), all members of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Bush's Proposed Budget Eliminates $2.2 Million In Counter-Drug Aid For Venezuela. The AP (2/7) reports Venezuela's foreign minister on Tuesday "dismissed the U.S. government's decision to cut anti-drug aid to the South American nation, saying it does not need money from 'the devil.' Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said Monday that President Bush's proposed 2007-2008 budget eliminated $2.2 million in counter-drug aid originally requested for Venezuela." President Hugo Chavez "broke off cooperation with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration in August 2005 accusing its agents of espionage, and has refused to draw up a new agreement since. … Venezuelan officials say they are fighting drug trafficking with increasing success, but Washington claims that because of corruption and a weak judicial system the amount of drugs smuggled through Venezuela is increasing."

The AP (2/6) also reports the U.S. military's lone outpost in South America is "allowed no more than eight planes at a time. But these surveillance planes play a vital role in keeping Andean cocaine and heroin from reaching the United States and are responsible for about 60 percent of drug interdiction in the eastern Pacific. That matters little to newly inaugurated President Rafael Correa, whose rejection of a U.S. military presence in Ecuador reflects widespread resentment over Washington's foreign policy in a region where President Bush's administration now has few reliable allies. 'We've said clearly that in 2009 the agreement will not be renewed because we believe that sovereignty consists of not having foreign soldiers on our home soil,' Correa said recently." The AP adds, "The State Department has recommended eliminating all drug interdiction aid for Venezuela, which got $2.2 million in the current fiscal year, and slashing overall aid to Ecuador some 30 percent to $20 million."

DOJ_NMG_0128679

Ecuador Criticizes Proposed Cutback In Aid. The Financial Times (2/7) reports Ecuador "criticized Washington on Tuesday for proposing a 40-percent cut in anti-drug aid to the Andean region over the next two years, a move that will be seen as retaliation for the election of leftwing nationalistic governments hostile to the U.S. … In the budget he presented on Monday, President…Bush proposed a cut in the Andean counter-drug initiative from $722m last year to $570m this year and $443m in 2008. … The cuts will be seen in the region as a response to the election of hostile governments in Ecuador and Bolivia, and the failure of others to cooperate fully in the 'war on drugs.'"

IMMIGRATION:

LATimes Criticizes Bush Provision On Aid For Incarcerating Illegals. The Los Angeles Times (2/7, 850K), in an editorial, writes that President Bush "has talked a consistently good game about the federal government's responsibility to take a lead role in dealing with the unique challenges of immigration. But when budget time comes around, he's all talk, and California is once again left holding the bill. In what has become an annual ritual, Bush is seeking to place the entire burden of jailing criminal illegal immigrants on individual states. His new budget would eliminate the State Criminal Alien Assistance Program, which has provided meager federal assistance to states that house a disproportionate share of the non-federal population of illegal immigrant inmates. … The Bush administration should be honest about the real costs of illegal immigration."

WPost Blasts Virginia GOP Stance On Illegal Immigration. The Washington Post (2/7, A16, 690K), in an editorial, writes, "Republican state lawmakers in Virginia have advanced a grab bag of legislation designed to hound, harass and hassle illegal immigrants. The idea, as expressed by the author of one such bill, Del. Jackson H. Miller of Manassas, is 'to make Virginia an unwelcome place if you are in this country illegally.' Translation: Drive the immigrants out of the state. In this the bills are overwhelmingly likely to fail, since most immigrants are likely to remain near jobs despite official persecution. But the bills do threaten to push undocumented immigrants further underground, forcing them to live in fear, draw their curtains and keep their children indoors even as they fill a niche in the local economy.'

TAX:

Court Bars Minnesota Tax Preparer. The AP (2/7) reports, "A St. Paul (MN) tax preparer accused of filing false tax returns that overstated deductions for recent immigrants is now barred from preparing federal tax returns for others." The AP continues, "The Department of Justice said a federal court in Minnesota issued the permanent injunction order against Nash Sonibare, who operated Liberty Financial Group in St. Paul." The AP adds, "The Justice Department lawsuit alleged that the Nigerian immigrant repeatedly prepared returns for his customers containing false or inflated credits and deductions. The complaint alleged that many of Sonibare's customers were from various African countries and had limited English-language skills."

Employees Face Deadline To Drain Flex Accounts. In his "Tax Report" column for the Wall Street Journal (2/7, D5), Tom Herman writes, "Time is running out for many employees to drain their flexible spending accounts for 2006. … More companies are offering these accounts, which let you use pretax dollars to pay for health-care and dependent-care expenses. But there is an important catch: Under what is known as the use-it-or-lose-it rule, you must spend every penny you set aside before the deadline or lose the balance." Herman adds, "The deadline varies among employers. Many have set a cutoff date of March 15 -- only about five weeks from now. That represents a big change from just two years ago, when the deadline typically was Dec. 31. After congressional pressure, the Treasury changed its rules in 2005 and allowed employers to give employees a grace period of as much as 2½ months into the following year. … Initially, many employers were undecided about whether to offer the grace period. Health-care specialists now say most large employers they work with offer the additional time." Herman notes, "Separately, a new law may offer additional relief for some FSA participants. Individuals can now make a one-time transfer to a health savings account, which is for people with high-deductible health-insurance plans, from a health-care flexible-spending account or from a health reimbursement plan. Health reimbursement plans allow employees to use employer contributions to pay for medical bills. … This provision is part of a tax bill signed by President Bush Dec. 20."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Promotes Budget, Defends Tax Cuts. Fox News' Special Report (2/6, Hume) reported President Bush "argued today that the best way to ensure a strong economy is to keep taxes low and encourage businesses to grow. …

DOJ_NMG_0128680

Promoting his new budget in Virginia, President Bush urged Congress to be fiscally responsible and to spur more economic growth by making his tax cuts permanent." Bush was shown saying, "Cutting taxes created the incentives to save, invest and consume which cause the economy to grow. As economy grows, the pie gets bigger, the tax revenues increase. That is what happens."

The New York Times (2/7, Weisman, 1.16M) describes Bush as "combative in defending the budget," and quotes him saying it "can work if Congress resists the temptation to raise your taxes." Bush also "called on Democrats to do more than criticize. 'Now's the time for members of the Congress in both parties to bring their best ideas to the table as to how to solve the problems involved with entitlement programs,' Mr. Bush said, referring to Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid."

Bloomberg (2/7, Murray) says "Bush's budget for the fiscal year that begins October 1 would increase federal spending 4.2% over the current year, even as funding for agencies outside defense and homeland security would rise an average of 1% in each of the next four years. That effectively is a cut because it is less than the rate of inflation, which was 2.5% in 2006." The Senate Budget Committee chairman, Senator Conrad, a Democrat of North Dakota, "said yesterday that the president's spending plan is 'filled with debt and deception.'"

This morning, NPR (2/7) reports Bush "stuck around to talk at Micron Technologies for only 20 minutes or so. He told workers that his new $2.9 trillion budget is set up like a family's budget, or a company's budget – setting priorities, making tough choices and eliminating what's not needed. The President said his proposals, if Congress enacts them, would balance the Federal budget by 2012, a few years after he's out of the White House. On Capitol Hill, Democrats said the President and his staff are lowballing future costs for the war in Iraq, while trying to extend tax cuts for the wealthy. The White House said lawmakers who declare the budget dead on arrival before looking closely are not being responsible with taxpayer money."

The Washington Post (2/7, D4, Kang, 690K) reports, "Micron Technology's plant in Manassas makes some of the most sophisticated memory chips in the world, semiconductors made from wafers of silicon 300 millimeters thin that run MP3 players, smart phones and satellite navigation systems. But the finer details of the 650,000-square-foot plant's operations may have escaped the company's most esteemed visitor yesterday." In his remarks, Bush said they "tried to explain all the big machines that were there to a history major. I played like I understood." Bush "nevertheless praised the company for its growth, exports and creation of high-skill jobs -- a model, he said, for the nation's economic growth." The President also "promised to balance the federal budget by 2012 by 'keeping taxes low and being wise about how we spend your money,'" and "said his hallmark economic policies -- the promotion of trade and tax cuts -- have helped companies like Micron grow."

The Phoenix Business Journal (2/7, Clabaugh) notes "Micron began investing in its memory chip plant on Godwin Drive in 2005. The plant has undergone a $3.5 billion upgrade, and the expansion has created about 1,000 new jobs. The plant manufactures both DRAM memory and NAND flash memory chips, demand for which has surged with the popularity of MP3 players and cell phones with cameras. " Micron "actually downsized the facility when it bought the plant from Toshiba in 2002, slashing 560 of its then 1,200 jobs, part of company-wide cost-cutting. The plant now employees 4,000, according to Micron spokesman Dan Francisco, who describes them as well-paid jobs held by highly-trained technology workers."

But the AP (2/7, Feller) says Bush "preached the virtues of fiscal responsibility Tuesday at a company that recently settled a class-action lawsuit alleging it had engaged in price-fixing and violated antitrust laws." Micron Technology "settled a class-action lawsuit last month that was filed in 2002 in US District Court in San Francisco on behalf of customers, generally computer manufacturers and others, who bought dynamic random-access memory chips, or DRAM, directly from suppliers between April 1, 1999, and June 30, 2002." The White House "knew about the lawsuit when it scheduled Bush's appearance, deputy press secretary Dana Perino said." The lawsuit "is one of several filed following a US Justice Department investigation into whether computer-chip companies conspired to manipulate the number of DRAM chips released to market in a scheme to inflate prices." The Los Angeles Times (2/7, Gerstenzang, 850K) runs a similar story, noting Bush "promoted his newly released federal budget Tuesday at a company that recently settled a class-action lawsuit over alleged price-fixing and antitrust violations." Bush, adds the Times, "called Micron an 'innovative company' that is made up of 'smart people back there making the products that people want.'" Bush "made no reference to the lawsuit."

Bush Officials Defend Budget Plan From Fierce Democratic Criticism. The AP (2/7, Crutsinger) reports Bush's "$2.9 trillion budget plan on Capitol Hill got a predictably cool reception from congressional Democrats Tuesday, while Bush's GOP allies said it's up to the new majority to come up with an alternative that balances the budget without raising taxes." House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Range "said he saw Bush's budget -- which appeals to anti-tax GOP conservatives while curbing Democratic priorities -- as a missed opportunity for Bush to reach out to Democrats, who for the first time in Bush's presidency control both the House and Senate." House Budget Committee Chairman John Spratt Jr. "said the Bush plan shortchanges domestic programs such as heating subsidies for the poor, education and the State Children's Health Insurance Program." White House budget director Rob Portman "disputed contentions by Democrats that the budget achieves its projected $61 billion surplus in 2012 by adopting overly optimistic economic assumptions." And US Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson said "the reductions in the new budget in spending on Medicare and Medicaid would lay the foundation for more comprehensive reform of the benefit programs."

DOJ_NMG_0128681

The Washington Post (2/7, A4, Montgomery, Lee, 690K) reports Administration officials "dispatched to Capitol Hill to defend…Bush's budget received a frosty reception yesterday from congressional Democrats, who argued that the president's proposal to target health care, education and other Democratic priorities suggests a White House more interested in scoring political points than in genuine compromise." The $2.9 trillion "budget blueprint contains little to appeal to, but much to infuriate, the Democratic majority, Democrats said. In a series of hearings, they rattled off a list of their objections: More than $100 billion to be sliced from projected Medicare and Medicaid spending. Further restrictions on the federal food-stamp program. Insufficient cash to maintain health coverage for millions of children. And deep cuts proposed for a range of programs that help communities put police on the street and fund community projects."

Chances For Bipartisan Compromise Examined. The Christian Science Monitor (2/7, Chaddock, 59K) reports "behind the tough talk" over the reception of President Bush's budget on Capitol Hill, "conditions exist for a potential compromise in this year's budget negotiations." Democratic congressional leaders "are convinced that to keep that control after 2008 – and even to take back the White House – they need to show that they can govern. That means avoiding a budget train wreck and completing spending bills for the next fiscal year." Meanwhile, "an unpopular president is looking to leave a domestic legacy." Robert Bixby, executive director of the Concord Coalition, said, "There's an opportunity for compromise this year, because if Bush wants to get anything done in the last two years, he's going to have to work with the Democratic Congress to do it." Bixby added, "If Democrats come across as just being obstructionist or tax-and-spend, the public could take offense. Presuming that they both want to accomplish something, there's an opportunity."

In an opposing view, the AP (2/7, Taylor) says in an analysis article, "Rather than improve prospects of agreement with Democrats, President Bush's proposal for next year seems to have left the budget kitchen in turmoil. Bush's budget appeals to anti-tax GOP conservatives and advocates of private accounts within Social Security while slighting Democratic priorities like health insurance coverage for children in low-income families." House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel said, "I don't think that I can tell the president what to put on the table and not to put on the table, but I can tell him, 'don't pick a damn fight.'"

Lieberman Calls For "War On Terror Tax." The Washington Times (2/7, Dinan, 88K) says Democrats "are left with few good alternatives other than tax increases if they hope to boost spending and match the president's goal of balancing the budget by 2012. It took an independent, Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, who called for a new 'war on terrorism tax,' to broach the issue of tax increases." Said Lieberman, "People keep saying that we're not asking sacrifice of anybody but our military in this war, and some civilians who are working on it. … When you put together the [Department of Defense] budgets with Homeland Security budgets, we need to ask people to help us in a way that they know when they pay more it will go for their security."

Bush Budget Raises $81 Billion Through Higher "User Fees." McClatchy (2/7, Hall) reports the Bush Administration "may be squarely against new taxes, but its proposed fiscal 2008 budget seeks to raise almost $81 billion in new revenue over the next five years by hiking user fees and other charges on taxpayers and businesses." While "technically, changes to these fees aren't taxes," for "anyone who must pay them - everyone from recreational hikers to war veterans - it's a question of semantics." Bush would "raise more than $15 billion through 2012 by allowing the Defense Department to raise enrollment fees and deductibles for medical care provided to military retirees under age 65. It would also raise retail pharmacy co-payments for all military retirees." The president "also seeks to limit the growth in health care subsidies for high-income beneficiaries of Medicare, the federal health-insurance program for the elderly. His budget estimates collecting $5.5 billion over five years through 'reduced subsidies for certain high-income beneficiaries.'"

Bush Plan Said To Achieve Balance Through "Stealth Tax." In her Washington Post column (2/7, A17), Ruth Marcus says, "The only way the administration achieves its balance" by 2012 "is by assuming that it will continue to rake in billions of dollars in revenue from the alternative minimum tax. More than billions, actually: CBO estimates that if left unchanged, the AMT would bring in an extra $1 trillion through 2017." So "the president achieves balance only with a stealth tax increase in the form of the AMT. If he means, as he says and nearly everyone agrees, to fix the AMT, that revenue has to come from somewhere else." Figures "compiled by the Urban Institute-Brookings Institution Tax Policy Center demonstrate the AMT's dramatic effect. If nothing is done to fix the AMT and the Bush tax cuts are extended as he wants, 89 percent of married families with two or more children and incomes between $75,000 and $100,000 will be hit by the AMT by 2010 -- compared with less than 1 percent in 2006. By 2017, almost half of all taxpayers -- 53 million -- will owe the AMT. The tax will hit two-thirds of those making between $75,000 and $100,000 and 90 percent of those making $100,000 or more."

DOJ_NMG_0128682

Democrats May Buck Bush On Child Health Insurance Funding. The AP (2/7, Evans) reports Democrats "may try to override a decision by President Bush to leave stopgap children's health insurance money out of his 2007 emergency war spending proposal." Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "asked the president last week to propose $745 million in supplemental spending for the State Children's Health Insurance Program, or SCHIP, which primarily covers children in low-income working families." Bush "declined the lawmakers' request in the $93 billion emergency war spending proposal he submitted Monday to cover the remainder of 2007. But Democrats, eager to show policy differences with the White House, are saying they may add the $745 million when the bill comes up in the coming weeks." If "allocated, the new money would keep 14 states with looming shortfalls from having to cut off coverage until Congress renews the program later this year.'

Cancer Treatment Groups Limit Trials Over Funding Worries. The Wall Street Journal (2/7, Marcus, 2.04M) reports the "10 federally funded cancer cooperative groups, which enroll nearly half of the patients in the nation who are participating in cancer trials, have begun to shut down trials and stop studying certain cancers amid funding concerns." Robert L. Comis, "president and chairman of the Coalition of Cancer Cooperative Groups, a nonprofit group comprising cancer centers, hospitals and patient- advocacy groups that work to increase participation in clinical trials, said 3,000 patient spots in clinical trials will be eliminated in 2007 at centers around the U.S. Although the decrease will affect all cancers, among the hardest-hit will be rarer cancers such as sarcoma, rare childhood tumors and head-and-neck cancers, Dr. Comis said; some of the cooperative groups are totally eliminating trials in those diseases."

Critics Say Budget Lacks Funding To Meet President's Fuel Goal. The Wall Street Journal (2/7, A8, Hitt, 2.04M) reports, "In his State of the Union address…Bush set an ambitious goal of cutting U.S. gasoline use 20% in the next 10 years. Now that Mr. Bush has unveiled his blueprint for federal spending, it isn't clear he is putting enough money on the table to accomplish that goal." Bush "is calling for millions of dollars in new spending to boost development of alternative fuels, chief among them ethanol." But "[m]any industry officials and lawmakers found the Bush plan wanting after sifting through the details yesterday. They said much broader federal action will be needed, especially to meet the president's goal to have the country using 35 billion gallons of alternative and renewable fuels by 2017, quadruple the current federal mandate."

Bush Budget Said To Give Airlines "Massive Tax Cut." In a USA Today op-ed (2/7, 10A), Ed Bolen, president of the National Business Aviation Association, says, "The president's budget, released Monday, is a sweetheart deal for the airlines. It would give them a massive tax cut, to be paid for largely by a 'general aviation' industry that serves many of the nation's small and mid-sized businesses and their communities." In "supporting the president's budget, the airlines will likely defend their tax break as an opportunity to provide consumers with cheaper ticket prices. But, if history is a guide, this would be just another empty promise. Twice in the past decade, the airlines' federal taxes lapsed and, according to a 2004 Government Accountability Office report, 'carriers generally raised base airfares.'"

Rangel Open To Adding Some Tax Breaks To Minimum Wage Bill. The AP (2/7, Kuhnhenn) reports, "The chairman of the House taxwriting committee said Tuesday he would be willing to link tax breaks for small business to a hike in the minimum wage but that the $8 billion tax package adopted by the Senate was unacceptable." The comments by Rep. Charles Rangel, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, "were the first public acknowledgment by a top House Democrat that some tax cuts might be necessary to win approval of an increase in the federal wage floor." But Rangel "left no doubt that he would reject the Senate tax package -- worth $8.3 billion over 10 years. He refused to speculate on what types of tax cuts would be acceptable and placed the burden for lowering the tax package on Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, Max Baucus, D-Mont."

Unions Press Democrats To Oppose Fast Track. The Hill (2/7, Swanson) reports, "The AFL-CIO, United Autoworkers and other groups representing organized labor are pressing Democrats to deny the Bush administration an extension of its authority to send free-trade deals to Congress for up or down votes, partly by reminding lawmakers of the role trade played in Democrats' re-taking of majorities in the House and Senate." Labor groups "already helped organize a letter to House Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) from 39 members of the freshman House Democratic class that said the 'vocal stand against the administration's misguided trade agenda' was vital to their electoral success." AFL-CIO Assistant Director for International Economics Thea Lee "does not completely rule out fast track for the Bush administration, but said the policy would have to be overhauled fundamentally from the existing authority. Noting the letter from freshman Democrats to Rangel, she said last year's elections have placed labor in a strengthened position for battles over trade policy this year."

DOJ_NMG_0128683

Senate Maneuvering Could Snarl Fiscal Year 2007 Funding Bill. Roll Call (2/7, Pierce) reports Senate Democrats and Republicans "are headed for a classic game of chicken this week over the nine remaining fiscal 2007 appropriations bills." Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) is "poised to bring up a joint funding resolution for 13 Cabinet agencies, Congress and numerous independent agencies as early as today, but he has said repeatedly that he will not permit any Senators to offer amendments to the measure." Reid's stance has "prompted Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) to threaten a Republican filibuster, and both sides are waiting to see who will blink before a possible government shutdown upon the expiration of the current continuing resolution on Feb. 15." Senate Appropriations ranking member Thad Cochran (R-Miss.) said Republicans "are likely to call Reid's bluff and oppose his expected efforts to cut off debate, or invoke cloture, on the $463 billion measure. Reid would need 60 votes to prevail on cloture and move the funding resolution toward passage." Cochran said, "I don't think they can get cloture. We'll be protesting the process."

House Democrats Prepare Rollout Of Long Term Agenda. Roll Call (2/7, Yachnin) reports, "Preparing to return the House to regular order after an initial legislative sprint full of popular bills and closed rules, Democratic leaders said Tuesday they are finally primed to roll out a long-term agenda." House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) "confirmed Tuesday that Democrats will unveil their new agenda next week, although he declined to provide specific details." Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) "said the plan will not be an itemized blueprint, but rather would feature 'guideposts' and serve as a broad outline of the goals the new majority hopes to complete over the next six months." While Hoyer "stated at a weekly press briefing the House will address health care and education bills in coming weeks — specifically mental health parity, the No Child Left Behind Act and re-authorization of the Head Start pre-kindergarten program — in a later interview he would not discuss which topics will take precedent under the new agenda, asserting that House committees must first be allowed to act on the measures."

Lawmakers Press Agencies To Fund Priorities Without Earmarks. Roll Call (2/7, Ackley, Stanton) reports even though "most of the appropriations bills for fiscal 2007 got stripped of practically all Congressionally mandated 'earmarks,' Members — and the lobbyists who push for funding of specific projects — have turned their attention to the executive branch agencies doling out chunks of money that otherwise would have gone for earmarks." Members, "especially those on the Appropriations and authorizing committees, can wield considerable behind-the-scenes power to make sure their favored projects get funded by executive-branch agencies." One appropriations lobbyist "said Members and staffers alike have been calling agency officials to protect their 2007 earmarks." The lobbyist said, "I heard Members and staff already made the calls before they put the money in the [omnibus bill]. They would say verbally, 'If we have this group submit an application -- as long as it is complete and accurate and fits within the parameters of the program -- you will honor that, right?' The answer was in the affirmative every time."

White House Agrees To Pelosi Military Aircraft Request. The Washington Times (2/7, Scarborough, Hurt, 88K) reports the Bush Administration has "agreed to provide House Speaker Nancy Pelosi with regular access to an Air Force passenger jet, but the two sides are negotiating whether she will get the big aircraft she wants and who she may take as passengers, according to congressional and administration sources." A congressional source "said that Rep. John P. Murtha, chairman of House Appropriations subcommittee on defense, which controls the Pentagon's spending, has telephoned administration officials to urge them to give the speaker what she wants." The congressional source "said Pentagon officials complained that" Rep. Murtha "is accusing them of sexism for not immediately heeding her request." Meanwhile, Republican Conference Chairman Adam Putnam of Florida "said Mrs. Pelosi's request represents 'an arrogance of office that just defies common sense' and called it 'a major deviation from the previous speaker.'" Minority Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri "called it a 'flying Lincoln Bedroom,' and Rep. Patrick T. McHenry, North Carolina Republican, labeled the speaker's plane 'Pelosi One.'"

Kucinich Effort To Create Peace Department Has Rocky Start. The Hill (2/7, Kaplan) reports Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D) "may need to stage a sit-in on the House floor before a Department of Peace and Nonviolence is created." Kucinich, "newly empowered as chairman of the domestic policy subcommittee on the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, vowed yesterday to hold hearings on legislation lawmakers have discussed since the dawn of the republic: a bill to establish a Department of Peace and Nonviolence." But it "seems that, like the Founding Fathers before him, Kucinich won't get past the talk — even with a bit of Hollywood backing." Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, "whose job is to manage the flow of legislation to the House floor, said that he considers Kucinich a 'thoughtful, substantive guy and a good friend,' but that 'a lot of members have a lot to say about [the bill] and we're going to give them a lot of time to say it.'" Despite the "logistical hurdles and legislative roadblocks, Kucinich made history when he said he would hold hearings on H.R. 808, which has 52 cosponsors, including centrist Democratic Reps. Ellen Tauscher (Calif.) and Albert Wynn (Md.)."

DOJ_NMG_0128684

Bush Commemorates Anniversary Of Reagan's Birth. The Los Angeles Times/AP (2/7) reports that yesterday would have been former President Ronald Reagan's 96th birthday. Former Attorney General Edwin Meese III and Col. James B. Seaton III, commanding officer of the Marine Corps' Camp Pendleton, "placed a wreath of white roses on behalf of President Bush at Reagan's grave at the Ronald Reagan Presidential Museum. Bush said in a proclamation that the wreath and military honors were sent 'in tribute to his distinguished service to a grateful nation.'" Tonight, Mrs. Reagan planned to present former President Bush with the 2007 Ronald Reagan Freedom Award during a gala at the Beverly Hilton Hotel. … 'George was not only my husband's dedicated vice president, but he was also Ronnie's loyal friend,' Mrs. Reagan said in a statement. 'Working closely with Ronald Reagan was one of the great joys of my life, and receiving this prestigious Reagan Freedom Award is something I will treasure always,' former President Bush said in a statement."

Bush Credited For Pursuing Healthcare Reform. The Wall Street Journal's Holman Jenkins (2/7) writes President Bush "makes peace with the tax code's bias toward health spending in order to do battle with the particular vice of our overreliance on third-party payment. He does so by equalizing the tax treatment of health dollars whether they flow directly from a consumer pocket (the vehicle here is health savings accounts) or through a third-party laundromat. He would do so by equalizing the treatment of health insurance whether you buy it yourself or your employer buys it for you (his latest plan). No, hosannas will not be sung to him by left or right. … There's a lesson in presidential leadership here. Mr. Clinton lost interest in health care after a few months when he discovered health care wouldn't result in a monument to his presidency. In a very pre-postmodern approach, Mr. Bush identified the same basic problem and has worked steadily away at it, showing that a president can accomplish something as long as he's willing not to receive any credit."

Recent Healthcare Reform Proposals Seen As Insufficiently Radical. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (2/7, 690K) Ezekiel J. Emanuel, chairman of the Department of Clinical Bioethics at the National Institutes of Health Clinical Center, Victor R. Fuchs former president of the American Economics Association, write, "It seems everyone has ideas for health-care reform. … This profusion of proposals means that health care is getting more attention, and this makes reform more likely. But these proposals are like band-aids and fall far short of what our sick health-care system needs. They build on what everyone agrees is a broken system. Ultimately, they prop up the sagging employment-based insurance system. … By building on the existing health-care system, these reform proposals entrench the perverse incentives."

Hollywood Seeks Congressional Support For Taxes, Fighting Piracy. The New York Times (2/7, Halbfinger, 1.16M) reports that Hollywood's movie industry is encouraged by the new Democratic majority Congress and "hopes to press its agenda of fighting piracy, obtaining new tax advantages and reining in…production from going abroad. So the Motion Picture Association of America put on a daylong show for lawmakers, lobbyists and Capitol Hill aides, armed with some A-list talent…and a new study showing that film and TV production accounts for $30 billion in wages, $10 billion in taxes, more than 400,000 jobs and a trade surplus of $9.5 billion." In an attempt "to drum up sympathy for an industry symbolized by its highly paid stars," the MPAA event stressed "that the movie business is really made up of middle-class guild and union members." Industry leaders stressed anti-piracy efforts overseas and called for stricter laws to enforce intellectual property laws.

Burton Missed 19 House Votes For Golf Tournament. Roll Call (2/7, Ben Pershing) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "It had been one of the best little puzzles of the 110th Congress so far: Why did Rep. Dan Burton (R-Ind.) miss 19 House votes over four days in mid-January? Where was he? Burton's office hadn't returned several calls from HOH over the past couple of weeks on this subject, nor did it respond to inquiries from the local press. No one in the Republican leadership seemed to know, either. Now, when HOH finally learned Tuesday where Burton had been -- courtesy of a report in The Indianapolis Star -- he kicked himself for not figuring it out earlier. As anyone who has followed Burton over the years should have known, he was playing golf." Roll Call adds, "Specifically, Burton was at the Bob Hope Chrysler Classic in lovely Palm Springs, Calif., where he played in the pro-am event at four local golf courses over four days."

NYTimes Decries Bush Administration's Reliance On Contractors. The New York Times (2/7, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "The United States is quickly becoming a government of the contractors, by the contractors and for the contractors. While the private security personnel in Iraq have attracted the most attention, many day-to-day operations are no longer in the hands of federal employees. … The problem is that the explosion of government outsourcing under the Bush administration has not been accompanied by a sufficient increase in civil service personnel to oversee it and ensure that the work is done properly and without squandering taxpayer dollars."

DOJ_NMG_0128685

OTHER NEWS:

Bernanke Says Education, Training Key To Addressing Economic Inequality. Fox News' Special Report (2/6, Hume) reported Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke "said the best way to narrow the gap between high income and low wage workers in the US would be to strengthen education and training programs. He told an Omaha Chamber of Commerce that erecting trade barriers would do far more harm than good. Today's comments are the most extensive remarks he has made on economic inequality."

The Wall Street Journal (2/7, A6, Wessel, 2.04M) reports the Fed Chairman "warned politicians to avoid responses that would make labor markets less flexible or create barriers to international trade and investment." In "an unusual speech for a central banker," Bernanke "said a wiser approach to the problem would be to improve education and training and to cushion dislocations caused by technology and globalization. He cited such steps as making health and pension benefits more portable and offering retraining and job-search assistance to displaced workers."

The Washington Times (2/7, Hill, 88K) reports Bernanke noted "studies have documented that globalization -- including both trade and immigration -- puts pressure on the wages of low- and middle-income earners who compete with foreign workers even while trade and labor flows overall increase jobs and economic growth." But "by far the largest factor causing inequality has been the skills gap."

USA Today (2/7, 5B, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) says Bernanke's remarks "come as Democrats, who now control Congress, are building an agenda around inequality and middle-class economic concerns. Their initiatives include raising the minimum wage, limiting CEO pay, boosting college aid, making it easier to form unions and addressing labor and trade concerns." President Bush "acknowledged recently that income inequality is a problem, but Democrats differ with his economic remedies, which include a focus on tax cuts."

Stocks Up Slightly. NBC Nightly News (2/6, story 7, :15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today, stocks showed little change on the day. The Dow was up more than 4 points [to close at 12,666.31]. NASDAQ gained just under one point [to close at 2,471.49] in the days trading." USA Today (2/7, 6B, 2.27M) notes "the Standard & Poor's 500 index added 1.01 points to 1448.00." The Wall Street Journal (2/7, 2.04M), among other newspapers, also reports the stock numbers.

GOP Insiders Said To View Clinton 2008 Victory As Inevitable. The Politico (2/7, Sheffield, VandeHei), in an article tiled, "GOP Views Clinton As Virtually Unbeatable," reports, "What many conservatives regard as the nightmare scenario -- President Hillary Rodham Clinton -- is increasingly seen by veteran Republican politicians and strategists as virtual inevitability. In GOP circles, the Democratic front-runner is seen as so strong, and the political climate for Republicans so hostile, that many influential voices -- including current and former lawmakers, and veterans of President Bush's campaigns -- have grown despairing." Former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay is quoted as saying, "If the conservative movement and Republicans don't understand how massive the Clinton coalition is, she will be the next president." Rep. Steve King said, "At this point, short an inspirational Republican nominee, then I would agree that it's going to be very difficult to beat Hillary if she wins the nomination." According to The Politico, "Even some well-connected outside advisers to Bush said in interviews they essentially accept this analysis." Despite the headline, the Republicans quoted in the piece tend to focus on the weakness of the GOP rather than specific calculations which might provide evidence of Sen. Clinton's strength.

The Politico's Roger Simon (2/7) writes, "consider this from a Republican: 'I don't want to contribute to my own party's demoralization and it doesn't necessarily mean there will be a Democratic landslide, but I think there is a thumb on their side of the scale that's not going to come off until after the next election,' said Vin Weber, a former Republican congressman, who is backing Mitt Romney."

Clinton Leading Among New Hampshire Democrats By 14 Points. The AP (2/7, Pickler) reports that among New Hampshire Democrats surveyed for a University of New Hampshire poll, former Sen. John Edwards and Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama "had net favorability ratings ranging from 61 percent to 55 percent, too close to be statistically significant. When asked for whom they would vote, 35 percent of likely Democratic voters picked Clinton, 21 percent Obama and 15 percent Edwards. Eight percent chose former Vice President Al Gore, who is not running. The Democratic portion of the phone poll reached 353 likely voters and had an error margin of plus or minus 5.2 percentage points."

Upcoming Events Likely To Boost Clinton's Fundraising Lead. The Wall Street Journal (2/7, A7, Cummings, 2.04M) reports that "in a show of financial muscle," Clinton "today kicks off a fund-raising effort of volunteers working to direct donations from $25,000 to $1 million to her presidential campaign. … Though party caucuses and primaries are still a year off, the money race begins in earnest this month, as candidates try to generate big numbers for the first quarterly financial disclosure report due on March 31. Advisers to Mrs. Clinton and Republicans Mitt Romney and Rudy Giuliani have said their campaigns are shooting for about $30 million in that first report." Jonathan Mantz, the campaign's finance director, "recently declined to specify his fund-raising target: 'It's a huge number. I've seen a lot of different figures, whether it's $80 or $100 [million], it's a huge number.'

DOJ_NMG_0128686

The Washington Post (2/7, A8, Birnbaum, Mosk, 690K) reports Clinton "is playing hostess to billionaire Hollywood moguls, millionaire lawyers and venture capitalists here this week as she pushes to raise a record sum for her presidential campaign. Last night, the New York Democrat invited about 70 top fundraisers from around the country to a reception at her Washington home. … The high-dollar rainmakers committed to collect at least $250,000 each during the presidential campaign for Clinton, and many have pledged $1 million, participants said. In addition, each agreed to raise $50,000 by the end of this month to bolster the campaign's first-quarter report due at the end of March."

Clinton Raised At Least $15 Million For Other Democrats In 2006. The Hill (2/7, Bolton) reports Clinton "collected at least $15 million for Democratic candidates by participating in more than 100 fundraising events during the 2006 election cycle, thereby cementing relationships with party leaders and colleagues in advance of her presidential campaign. A rough tally of her campaign's fundraising records show that while her rival for the nomination, Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) gave more money to candidates through his leadership PAC, Clinton appears to have surpassed his total by donating millions from her personal reelection account and attending scores of fundraisers.

Clinton To Appear At Nevada Forum. The AP (2/7, Pickler) reports Clinton "has agreed to attend a Nevada forum for Democratic presidential candidates later this month, state party officials said Tuesday. Clinton joins five other presidential hopefuls already confirmed for the Feb. 21 event in Carson City: Sens. Joe Biden of Delaware and Chris Dodd of Connecticut, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson and former Alaska Sen. Mike Gravel. … Representatives for Clinton, Sen. Barack Obama and 2004 vice presidential nominee John Edwards complained last week to national party officials about the number and early timing of forums and debates scheduled in Nevada and other key states."

Giuliani's Favorability In New Hampshire Far Outpaces McCain, Romney. The AP (2/7, Pickler) reports that according to a University of New Hampshire poll, "New Hampshire residents likely to vote in the Republican presidential primary…think more highly of former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani than any of his rivals. … Giuliani's net favorability rating — the proportion of people viewing him favorably minus the proportion viewing him unfavorably — was 56 percent, well ahead of Sen. John McCain, 32 percent, and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, 26 percent." The AP notes, "This long before an election, political professionals pay more attention to favorability than voters' choices if they had to vote today. McCain and Giuliani were essentially tied at about 27 percent on that question among likely GOP primary voters, followed by Romney at 13 percent and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich at 9 percent. The GOP portion of the telephone poll reached 311 likely voters from Thursday to Monday and had an error margin of plus or minus 5.6 percentage points."

Giuliani's Support For Abortion, Gun Control And Gay Rights Draws Scrutiny. Fox News' Special Report (2/6, Hume) reported that "as a pro-choice Republican" Giuiani "is trying to quell conservatives' doubts about his social views. He opposed a ban on partial birth abortion in 2000, saying, "I would vote to preserve the option for women." . Now he says that because the current law banning partial-birth abortion contains an exception to save the mother's life, he supports it. … When it comes to abortion and the Supreme Court, Giuliani told Republicans in South Carolina recently that he would tap 'strict constructionists' such as Samuel Alito and John Roberts to interpret the constitution not make new law. Still conservatives worry that this comment from the socially liberal Rudy Giuliani just a year and a half ago raises concerns." Giuliani was shown saying, "Presidents going back to the beginning of the republic generally appoint people to the Supreme Court that they believe agree with them." Fox went on to note that Giuliani "wanted all gun lovers to be licensed for pistols and rifles. In addition he said, "gun owners should have to pass a written exam that shows they know how to use a gun, that they're intelligent enough and responsible enough to handle a gun." Fox went on to discuss Giuliani's "strong support" for gay rights and noted he "hosted gay pride events."

Giuliani Has Not Yet Said Unequivocally That He Will Be A Candidate. The New York Times (2/7, Chan, 1.16M) reports Giuliani "took two steps closer to a presidential run on Monday, and yet stopped short, once again, of unequivocally throwing himself in the ring. … A few skeptics have wondered whether Mr. Giuliani, who has been crisscrossing the country over the last few months and signaled his interest in the presidency again and again, may ultimately back out — as he did in 2000, when he contemplated a race for the Senate but withdrew." However, "Aides to Mr. Giuliani yesterday dismissed the notion that he was equivocating."

Giuliani Will Deliver Commencement Address At Citadel. The AP (2/7, Pickler) reports Giuliani "will deliver the commencement address at The Citadel in the pivotal primary state of South Carolina, the military college announced Tuesday."

DOJ_NMG_0128687

Coulter Warns GOP Voters Not To Bank On Giuliani's "Electability." Asked on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (2/6) if she would support Giuliani for president, author Anne Coulter said, "I don't want to vote for a pro-choice Republican for president. … I trust Republican primary voters. But the one thing I want to tell Republican primary voters is do not vote for a candidate because you think he's 'electable.' You thought Gerald Ford was electable; you thought Dole was electable. No, you want to vote for the right-wing lunatic who supports your views because that's Ronald Reagan. … I've had it. We've excused enough Republicans who are pro-choice."

Morris Predicts Clinton And Giuliani May Sew Up Nominations By Labor Day. In his column for The Hill (2/7) Dick Morris writes Sen. Hillary Clinton and former NYC mayor Rudy Giuliani "could wrap it up this year." According to Morris, "Hillary re-established the dominance she had back in the spring of 2006 by moving out to a 43 percent vote share among Democrats in the presidential primaries in the Fox News poll of January 30-31." Giuliani "is eclipsing John McCain for front-runner status. In the most recent Fox News poll among GOP voters, Rudy had a convincing 34-22 lead over McCain, with Gingrich in third place at 15 percent. McCain has been hovering in the low 20s all along. … This poll finding — combined with McCain's dismal financial report for the fourth quarter of 2006 ($1.7 million raised and less than $500,000 on hand) — put him in a convincing second place after a year of sharing front-runner status with Giuliani. Do McCain's fundraisers think he is running for Congress or president?" Morris concludes, "Right now, neither Rudy nor Hillary has a front-runner's lock, but they are clearly the man and woman to beat in their respective parties. If they hold their leads through Labor Day, my bet is that it will be all over."

Edwards Bloggers Said To Have Made Anti-Catholic Comments. The AP (2/7, Pickler) reports, "Two bloggers hired recently by Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards were criticized Tuesday by a Catholic group for posts they had written elsewhere on the Internet. Bill Donohue, president of the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights, demanded that Edwards fire Amanda Marcotte and Melissa McEwan. … Donohue cited posts that the women made on blogs in the past several months in which they criticized the pope and the church for its opposition to homosexuality, abortion and contraception, sometimes using profanity."

The New York Times (2/7, Broder, 1.16M) reports Edwards's spokeswoman, Jennifer Palmieri, "said Tuesday night that the campaign was weighing the fate of the two bloggers." Marcotte "has also written sarcastically about the news media coverage of the three Duke lacrosse players accused of sexual assault, saying: 'Can't a few white boys sexually assault a black woman anymore without people getting all wound up about it? So unfair.'"

Romney To Announce His Candidacy In Michigan Next Week. The AP (2/7, Sidoti) reports former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney "will formally announce his candidacy for president next week in Michigan, his native state and an important early test for the GOP nomination, campaign aides said Tuesday." Romney "then will visit Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina -- the first states to hold 2008 contests. He will return to Boston two days later, where he will hold what his campaign is calling 'a unity event' with supporters, aides said."

Huckabee Seen As Evangelical Alternative To Top Three GOP Candidates. The Christian Science Monitor (2/7, Feldmann, 59K) reports former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee "may be most famous for losing 100 pounds and crusading against obesity in America." Huckabee "knows he must rise in the pack by summer's end. 'If by ... September I'm still considered second or third tier, after the Iowa straw poll, then ... I've got a problem,' says the former Baptist minister, who formed a presidential exploratory committee last week. … An evangelical Christian, Huckabee hopes his religiosity will win GOP voters who may have qualms about Senator McCain, who is not overtly religious; former Mayor Giuliani, who is liberal on social issues; and Mr. Romney, whose Mormon faith makes some Republicans uneasy."

New Technology Among Factors Driving Up Primary Spending. The Washington Post (2/7, A1, Mosk, 690K), in a front-page story, reports, "Expense reports released last week provide a glimpse at how aspirants have started spending their money. By the end of last year, budding contenders in the Democratic field had already written more than $660,000 in checks from their federal accounts to fund activities in key states -- more than twice what their counterparts spent in 2002 in the run-up to the 2004 presidential contest." The Post goes on to report, "When then-Sen. John Edwards began preparing for his first presidential bid, he made an early investment of nearly $100,000 to build an Internet operation. As he began constructing his 2008 effort, he found the cost to put his stamp on the Web had more than quadrupled, with close to half a million dollars already spent on consultants and technical-support teams." Consultant Ken Strasma, "whose firm developed a microtargeting program that uses vast supplies of marketing data to identify and persuade a candidate's likely supporters, said the powerful targeting programs will be more widely used this cycle. In small states, such as Iowa, a candidate can spend $100,000 to $200,000 to identify every caucus voter within their reach and figure out how best to persuade them. In larger states, those costs will multiply."

DOJ_NMG_0128688

Obama Considered Overly Abstract. The Washington Post 's Harold Meyerson (2/7) writes that Obama's "broad indictment of contemporary politics has great appeal, I suspect, to young voters in particular. But the cynicism about government that he rightly condemns didn't waft in from nowhere. … The hope Obama personifies can be a powerful force -- but not when he counterposes it to specifics or to political struggle."

US Electorate Seen As Willing To Elect A Black President. In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/7, 1.16M) Martin Plissner, author of "The Control Room: How Television Calls the Shots in Presidential Elections," writes, "On Nov. 5, 1996, Voter News Service — the organization hired by the TV networks to do exit polling — asked people at the polls, who had just given Bill Clinton 49 percent of the vote, Bob Dole 41 percent and Ross Perot 8 percent, how they would have voted if the Republican candidate had been Gen. Colin L. Powell. In an exit poll sample of 3,697 (three times the size of a standard high-grade public opinion survey), the result was this: Powell: 50 percent. Clinton: 38 percent. Perot: 9 percent. … There is a pretty good, if not quite conclusive, case that America has for some time been ready to elect a black president. The question for Barack Obama is whether this time around it will be ready for this one."

Steinem Praises Both Clinton And Obama. In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/7, 1.16M) Gloria Steinem writes, "Even before Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton threw their exploratory committees into the ring, every reporter seemed to be asking which candidate are Americans more ready for, a white woman or a black man? … I think this is a dumb and destructive question." Steinem concludes, "This time, we could learn from history. We could double our chances by working for one of these candidates, not against the other. For now, I've figured out how to answer reporters when they ask if I'm supporting Hillary Clinton or Barack Obama. I just say yes."

Dowd Praises Biden, Says He's Not "Pandering." The New York Times' Maureen Dowd (2/7) credits Sen. Joseph Biden for not "pandering, like Hillary's telling Iowans she likes ethanol, and John McCain's telling Christian conservatives he likes Christian conservatives."

Perry's Lottery Plan Would Fund Education, Insurance For Poor. The Washington Post/AP (2/7, A7) reports that Texas "Gov. Rick Perry (R) proposed Tuesday that Texas sell its state lottery for at least $14 billion, with the money dedicated to an endowment for residents without health insurance and a trust fund for cancer research." Perry described this plan as "a unique opportunity to address great challenges and build the foundation for a future of unparalleled prosperity" in his State of the State address. "Under Perry's plan, money from the sale would be used to establish three trusts: $8.3 billion to replace most of the public-education revenue lost with the sale of the lottery, $3 billion for cancer research, and $2.7 billion to expand health insurance coverage for the working poor."

Washington Press Club Honors Thomas. The Washington Post (2/7, C1, Vargas, 690K) reports, "On this Tuesday night, there was a party to be had and a journalistic legend -- the indefatigable Helen Thomas -- to be honored. And not even the threat of snow could stop the 63rd annual congressional dinner of the Washington Press Club Foundation."

WSJournal Notes Banks Do Not Benefit From Home Foreclosures. The Wall Street Journal (2/7, 2.04M) editorializes, "Mortgage delinquencies are rising, subprime lenders are going belly-up -- another company filed for bankruptcy Monday -- and the Senate Banking Committee is holding hearings today on 'predatory lending.' All of this can only mean one thing: Congress is looking for someone to blame now that the housing boom is over. The noted banking expert Jesse Jackson is scheduled to be a featured witness at today's hearing, along with a couple of unfortunate consumers who were sold mortgages they couldn't afford to repay. … No one likes to see anyone lose his home to foreclosure -- and that includes the banks. Banks make money by lending to people who can repay their loans with interest. Lending people money they can't pay back is a lousy business, as the many recent headlines about subprime lenders going bankrupt demonstrate. If rapacious banks really had a goal of lending people more than they could afford to pay back, they wouldn't be swimming in red ink."

WSJournal Celebrates Move Toward Vouchers In Utah And South Carolina. The Wall Street Journal (2/7, 2.04M) writes in an editorial that after a 38-37 vote in the Utah house, "the senate is likely to pass the reform supported by GOP Governor Jon Huntsman Jr." and "Utah may soon become the first state with a universal school choice plan." Now "South Carolina could be next" where the legislature will consider allowing "nearly 200,000 poor students to opt out of failing public schools by giving them up to $4,500 a year to spend on private school tuition." While, "the voucher movement has been declared dead many times,…its promise of better education is keeping hope alive."

DOJ_NMG_0128689

Bush Budget Contains "Ambitious" Foreign Policy Goals. The Financial Times (2/7, Dinmore) reports, "Ambitious foreign policy goals set out in the Bush administration's federal budget for 2008 include the end of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, dismantling North Korea's nuclear weapons programme and the start of comprehensive multilateral negotiations with Iran." Other targets listed in the foreign assistance component of the budget "seem more like Soviet-era quotas, for example a projected 10 percent increase over the 2006 figure of 769 interviews given by US officials to Arab and other media outlets in the Middle East." An official involved in drawing up the budget said the targets represented "what we intend to achieve with the resources we ask for." He added: "They are in many cases intangible goals."

Lebanese PM Blames US For Nation's Instability. The Los Angeles Times (2/7, Stack, Daragahi, 850K) reports Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora Tuesday "blamed American support of Israel for an increasingly violent political crisis that has shredded this country's stability." His voice "rising in frustration" during an interview with the Times, Siniora "said the troubles in his nation would subside if US officials were to press Israel to withdraw its soldiers from Shabaa Farms." The lingering occupation "has long been cited by Hezbollah as a justification for its armed guerrilla fighters on Israel's border," but Siniora said "the US has ignored his pleas." Responding to the prime minister's comments, NSC spokesman Gordon Johndroe said, "We understand the enormous pressure Prime Minister Siniora is under from Hezbollah and Syria and others that want to undermine democracy in Lebanon. We will stand by him to make sure democracy in Lebanon is successful, and we will continue to work for greater peace within the Middle East."

Rice Sets Meeting With Abbas, Olmert. AFP (2/7) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "plans a series of three-way meetings with Israeli and Palestinian leaders in a major shift of US efforts to broker a peace deal and establish a Palestinian state," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Tuesday. Rice will hold the first meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian President Mahmud Abbas on February 19. "Our expectations are that this is an initial opportunity for these two leaders to start a discussion about those issues that would concern the framework of a possible Palestinian state," McCormack said, noting that the Secretary "intended to pursue the three-way format in a significant departure from Bush's past practice of remaining aloof from the intricacies of Israeli-Palestinian deal-making."

Palestinian Aid Policies Seen As "Backfiring." The Financial Times (2/7, Morris) reports, "Concern is mounting in the international aid community that policies aimed at isolating the Palestinian Authority's ruling Hamas movement have backfired by further impoverishing the people of Gaza and the West Bank without seriously undermining the Islamists." Oxfam "joins the debate on Wednesday with an appeal for Europe to scrap an emergency aid programme that bypasses Hamas and revert to direct funding of the PA government that it controls." The move follows a report last week by the UK parliament's international development committee that "claimed the policies of Israel and international donors towards Hamas were playing into the hands of its Iranian ally."

Palestinian Factions Begin Unity Talks In Mecca. The New York Times (2/7, A3, Fattah, 1.16M) reports leaders of Hamas and Fatah Tuesday "began a two-day Saudi-brokered effort to agree on a unity government that could end a wave of violence in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank and resume relations with donor countries." Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and two Hamas leaders -- Ismail Haniya, the Palestinian prime minister, and Khaled Meshal, the Damascus-based militant leader -- "met separately with King Abdullah," however, all three leaders are expected to "meet with other Saudi officials and mediators before deliberations begin in earnest" on Wednesday.

The AP (2/7, Abu-Nasr) says the "Saudi-led push is key to any future peace talks with Israel -- and to Arab efforts to blunt Iran's growing power." The talks, it notes, are "open-ended, a reflection of Saudi Arabia's determination to keep them going until the Palestinians reach a deal for power-sharing in a new coalition government." Meanwhile, the meetings are seen as "a test of US ally Saudi Arabia," which "has taken an assertive new role in trying to resolve the Palestinian conflict, as well as two other Mideast conflicts that threaten to erupt into full-fledged civil wars: Iraq and Lebanon."

Similarly, the Financial Times (2/7, Saleh) says that by hosting the talks Saudi Arabia "has invested its prestige" as Riyadh "tries to counter Iranian influence in the region."

WPost Welcomes Saudi Arabia's Engagement. In an editorial, the Washington Post (2/7, A16, 690K) writes, "One consequence of the Bush administration's recent decision to divide the Middle East between 'extremists' and 'moderates' was to marginalize US diplomacy in the region. The administration refuses to talk to the 'extremists' -- Iran, Syria, Hezbollah and Hamas -- but those governments and groups are at the center of every major conflict from Iraq to the Gaza Strip. Now one of the administration's 'moderate' allies, Saudi Arabia, has stepped into the vacuum. The result has been a revealing demonstration of how talks with adversaries can sometimes be useful -- and a hint of what may be lost by Mr. Bush's inflexible policy." The Post says, "It's good that Saudi Arabia is testing a contrary theory in practice; even better would be some American diplomatic risk-taking."

DOJ_NMG_0128690

US Will Create Single Africa Command. The New York Times (2/7, Stout, 1.16M) reports, "The Pentagon will establish a new military command to oversee its operations in Africa, President Bush and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates announced Tuesday. ... Three commands now divide responsibility for operations in Africa: the European Command, which oversees most countries on the continent, except those in the Horn of Africa; the Central Command, which has responsibility for Egypt, Sudan, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Djibouti, Somalia and Kenya; and the Pacific Command, which has responsibility for Madagascar, the Seychelles and the Indian Ocean."

Washington Prepared To Renew Relations With Pyongyang. The Financial Times (2/7, Sevastopulo) reports Washington "would be prepared to start normalising relations with Pyongyang before it completed nuclear disarmament if it helped persuade North Korea to move forward on a previous agreement to denuclearise the Korean peninsula." A senior Bush administration official "said Washington would consider starting the process to remove Pyongyang from the list of state sponsors of terrorism, and to ease restrictions on American companies dealing with the state, if North Korea moved forward on its commitment to dismantle its nuclear programs." The US official said South Korea would "take the lead in providing energy assistance and food aid," and in return, Pyongyang "would agree to freeze its plutonium reactor as the first stage of a process that, from the US perspective, would have to lead to complete disarmament."

The AP (2/7, Freire) reports Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said Wednesday the US expects "hard bargaining" at upcoming six-party talks. Speaking to reporters in Tokyo, Hill said, "The big question is whether the North Koreans are really ready to make some progress." He did, however, note that there were "some good signs in Berlin."

Author Urges China's Support For Deal. Gordon Chang, author of "Nuclear Showdown: North Korea Takes On the World," writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/7, A14, 2.04M) that "if there is a deal" at this week's six-party talks, "it will not be because Chinese diplomats worked behind the scenes. It will be because the Bush administration has made concessions it previously refused to consider -- in particular, releasing frozen North Korean funds, providing aid, and accepting only an interim freeze of the North's production of plutonium." If the US "makes the first moves," Chang says China "will persuade North Korea in the future to completely give up its nuclear arsenal." Beijing "has been able to protect Pyongyang because Seoul is doing the same," but Chang says "stripping Seoul from Beijing should be Washington's most immediate tactical goal."

Bush Approves Plan To Pressure Sudan On Darfur. The Washington Post (2/7, A12, Kessler, 690K) reports President Bush has approved "a plan for the Treasury Department to aggressively block US commercial bank transactions connected to the government of Sudan, including those involving oil revenues, if Khartoum continues to balk at efforts to bring peace to Sudan's troubled Darfur region," government officials said Tuesday. The Treasury plan is part "of a secret three-tiered package of coercive steps -- labeled 'Plan B' -- that the administration has repeatedly threatened to unleash if Sudan continues to sponsor a campaign of terror" in Darfur. However, the Administration has "held back on any announcement of Plan B, even after setting a Jan. 1 deadline, in hopes of still winning Khartoum's cooperation." According to the Post, the delays have "increased skepticism that the administration is willing to risk potential diplomatic and commercial fallout from targeting Khartoum."

Bomber Killed In Thwarted Attack At Pakistani Airport. The New York Times (2/7, Masood, 1.16M) reports, "A suicide bomber armed with pistols and grenades killed himself and at least one other person after a shootout with security guards at Islamabad's international airport on Tuesday night, in what the police described as a thwarted but brazen terrorist attack." The Times notes that it was the second suicide bombing in Islamabad in less than a week and "appeared intended to inflict major casualties at the airport." Five people were wounded in the attack.

Russian Tycoon May Cooperate With Police In Poison Probe. The New York Times (2/7, Cowell, 1.16M) reports Boris A. Berezovsky, "an exiled Russian tycoon and bitter opponent of the Kremlin," said Monday that he was "prepared to be interviewed by the Russian police" investigating the poisoning in London last November of Alexander V. Litvinenko. However, in what he called his first newspaper interview since the British police "handed a dossier on the case to the Crown Prosecution Service last week," Berezovsky "said that he would talk to Russian investigators only if they met conditions, including being searched for weapons and poisons." Berezovsky spoke in "a wide-ranging, 50-minute interview" in his London offices, "offering some new insights" into the case. Berezovsky "said he believed that Mr. Litvinenko had been the target of two attempts on his life, the first in mid-October. That attempt failed, he said, because too little poison was used." Berezovsky "also disclosed that the prime suspect identified in British news reports had visited him the day before Mr. Litvinenko was poisoned."

DOJ_NMG_0128691

WSJournal Says Putin Wants Case To Remain Unsolved. The Wall Street Journal (2/7, 2.04M) editorializes, "The wheels of justice in Vladimir Putin's Russia move strangely, but this week all too transparently. Prosecutors brought fresh charges against Mikhail Khodorkovsky that likely ensure that the former Yukos oil magnate and Putin political opponent won't leave his Siberian prison camp before next year's presidential election." Nothing from his first trial, the Journal says, "suggests the outcome will be any better for Mr. Khodorkovsky once a Russian court in distant Chita, near the Mongolian border, takes up the new money laundering and embezzlement case," which "could add 15 years to his prison term." The Journal concludes, "You don't have to be a conspiracy theorist to surmise that the Kremlin wants Mr. Khodorkovsky to stay in Siberia and the [Anna] Politkovskaya and Litvinenko cases to remain unsolved. And so they are."

Investigators Won't Charge Former Blair Advisor. The Financial Times (2/7, Burns, Blitz, Timmins) reports, "Downing Street on Tuesday won a temporary reprieve in the cash-for-honours affair" when the Crown Prosecution Service announced that there was "insufficient evidence" to press charges against headteacher Des Smith. Smith "was arrested last April after allegedly suggesting to a Sunday newspaper that sponsors of the government's flagship city academies would receive honours." The Times adds that Prime Minister Tony Blair's immediate position in relation to the investigation "was…shored up by two other developments" on Tuesday. First, Cabinet Secretary Sir Gus O'Donnell "denied media reports that there was a secret e-mail system inside Number 10 that the police had not been told about." Second, a new opinion poll "showed that the public is less interested than the media and political worlds in the cash-for-honours affair."

The Washington Post (2/7, A14, Sullivan, 690K) reports, "Smith, a former government adviser who helped recruit wealthy sponsors for a key Blair education initiative, told reporters he was relieved that the inquiry regarding him was over and called it 'nonsense from the beginning.'" The Post adds that Smith "was the first of four people arrested" and investigation "centering on whether potential political donors have been enticed with promises of appointments to the House of Lords, the upper house of Parliament."

Mugabe Losing Support As Zimbabwe Economy Plunges. On its front page, the New York Times (2/7, A1, Wines, 1.16M) reports, "For close to seven years, Zimbabwe's economy and quality of life have been in slow, uninterrupted decline. They are still declining this year, people there say, with one notable difference: the pace is no longer so slow. Indeed, Zimbabwe's economic descent has picked up so much speed that President Robert G. Mugabe, the nation's leader for 27 years, is starting to lose support from parts of his own party." Meanwhile, Mugabe, "who blames a Western plot against him for Zimbabwe's problems, has rejected all calls for economic reform."

Global Pathogen Surveillance System Proposed To Fight Bird Flu. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (2/7, A15, 2.04M) Peter Zimmerman, former chief scientist of the U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee staff, writes, "The 'deadly' H5N1 avian flu is back on the front pages of newspapers and TV news shows. … It is probably worth stockpiling many millions of doses before H5N1 escapes into the human population. Because none of us has any useful immunity, the virus could migrate around the world with the speed of commercial air travel, not the steamships that powered the Spanish Flu. If H5N1 escapes, and if it becomes as virulent as the Spanish Flu (which killed 1% of those who developed the disease), the pessimistic predictions of millions of people dead within months could come true. Only if vaccine bottles were already on the shelf, ready for instant use, could the virus be contained. … A global pathogen surveillance system -- as Sen. Joseph Biden suggested almost five years ago -- is necessary because the global first line of defense against influenza is not the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, but the public health agencies of China, Vietnam and other nations in that region."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Bookshops' Latest Sad Plot Twist."
"Israel Sounds Alarm On Iran's Nuclear Efforts."
"The Sudden Descent Of A Shuttle Astronaut."
"In San Francisco, Mayor's Troubles Not Just Personal."
"Apple Seeks To Unchain Melodies."
"Pentagon Considering Alternatives For Iraq."

USA Today:
"Attempted Murder Charge, Handcuffs Ground Astronaut."
"Jobs Wants Fewer Download Limits."
"Wider Death Penalty Sought."

DOJ_NMG_0128692

New York Times:
"Military Wants More Civilians To Help In Iraq."
"Many Voices, No Debate, As Senate Is Stifled on War."
"Rural Colleges Seek New Edge And Urbanize."
"From Spaceflight to Attempted Murder Charge."
"Army Is Going Wrinkle-Free; Velcro Becomes Norm."
"As Inflation Soars, Zimbabwe Economy Plunges."

Washington Post:
"With Discipline Honed By Training, Police Say, Astronaut Set Out to Kill."
"General Is Front Man For Bush's Iraq Plan."
"Loudoun Land Deals Subject of U.S. Probe."
"Problems Stall Pentagon's New Fighting Vehicle."
"Teddy Bear, Version 2.0."
"In Campaign 2008, Candidates Starting Earlier, Spending More."

Washington Times:
"Pelosi's Push For Jet Remains Up In Air."
"U.S. Mulls Iraq Refugees."
"Barry Aims For Gun-ban Hiatus."
"Waxman Hits 'Waste Abuse' Of Iraq Funds."
"Love Triangle Lands Astronaut In Florida Jail."
"Alumni Urge Reversal On Cross."

Detroit Free Press:
"Granholm: We Need Tax Boost To Compete."
"Mullay Calls On Taurus' Power."
"Speech Big On Hope Skimpy On Details."
"Money To be Invested In Business, Students."
"Astronaut's Arrest Reveals Down-To-Earth Frailty."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"PSC Lets GA. Power Hike Bills Next Month."
"No Rescue For State's Insurance For Kids."
"People Outsmart Plants."
"Passion leads Astronaut To hard Landing."
"CDs Bust Throws media Glare On Town Chief."

Houston Chronicle:
"Gunmen Kill 7, Fuel Acapulco Drug War."
"This is Return Home Will Be A Different Story For Astronaut."
"Is Facility For Detainees Best Place For Children?"
"A 'Perplexed' NASA Navigates New Terrain."
"Doctors Say Perry's Inoculation Mandate Is Premature."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Wal-Mart Class Action Suit; Congressional Hearings; Senate hearings-Gates; Friendly Fire; Iran Diplomat Kidnapped-Iraq; Astronaut-Attempted Murder Charges; Breast Cancer Test; Winter Weather; The Priest & A Nun; Fun In The Snow.
CBS: Astronaut Arrested; Astronaut Screening; Winter Weather; Congress-Iraq Surge; Iraq-Iranian Diplomat; Iraq-Troop Level; Iraq Corruption; Hospital Infections; FDA-Breast Cancer Test; Wal-Mart-Sex Discrimination Case; Easy Bake Recall; Internet TV.
NBC: Winter Weather-Chicago; Astronaut-Alleged Murder Charges; Breast Cancer Testing; New Orleans Post-Katrina; New Orleans Fire Dept; Wal-Mart Class Action Suit; Stock Market; New NBC CEO; Children Post-Katrina.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: US-Cold Weather; Upstate NY-Heavy Snow; FL-NASA Astronaut Arrested; House-Iraq Resolution; Sen. Kerry-Iraq Bill; Las Vegas-Accident On Vegas Strip.
NPR: US-Cold Weather; Iraq-Sri Lankan Migrant Workers Rescued; Bush-VA; Tokyo Stock Exchange; Spain Criticizes British Paper For Interviewing Jailed Eta Member; FL-NASA Astronaut Arrested.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Visits Shenandoah National Park; makes Statement on the National Parks Centennial Challenge, Shenandoah National Park.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: 9:30 a.m. ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Hearing on the FY08 Energy Department budget. Secretary Bodman. Location: Room 366, Dirksen.

9:45 a.m. AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION AND FORESTRY _ Full Committee. Hearing on reauthorization of farm programs. Location: Room 106, Dirksen.

10 a.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation and a hearing on predatory lending and home foreclosures. Rev. Jesse Jackson; Harry Dinham, National Association of Mortgage Brokers; Hilary Shelton, NAACP; Martin Eakes, Self-Help Credit Union and the Center for Responsible Lending; Jean Constantine-Davis, AARP. Location: Room 216, Hart.

10 a.m. BUDGET _ Full Committee. Hearing on the FY08 budget proposal. OMB Director Rob Portman. Location: Room 608, Dirksen.

10 a.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Full Committee. Hearing on climate change research and science. Location: Room 253, Russell.

10 a.m. ENVIRONMENT AND PUBLIC WORKS _ Private Sector and Consumer solutions to Global Warming and Wildlife Protection Subcommittee. Hearing on global warming and wildlife. Location: Room 406, Dirksen.

DOJ_NMG_0128693

10 a.m. FINANCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on the proposed FY08 budget for Health and Human Services Department. Secretary Leavitt. Location: Room 215, Dirksen.

10 a.m. RULES AND ADMINISTRATION _ Full Committee. Hearing on improving electronic election systems. California Deputy Secretary of State Lowell Finley; Brit Williams, Kennesaw State University; Dan Wallach, Rice University; Conny McCormack, Registrar-Recorder/County Clerk, Los Angeles County; Warren Stewart, Vote Trust USA; Connie Schmidt, Election Consulting Services; Michael Waldman, NYU School of Law. Location: Room 301, Russell.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Closed. Hearing on Iraq. Location: Room 219, Hart.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10 a.m. Meets for legislative business. Highlights: Suspensions (7 bills): 1) H.R. 742 - To amend the Antitrust Modernization Commission Act of 2002, to extend the term of the Antitrust Modernization Commission and to make a technical correction; 2) H.R. 365 - Methamphetamine Remediation Research Act of 2007; 3) H.Res. 72 - Recognizing the work and accomplishments of Mr. Britt ``Max'' Mayfield, Director of the National Hurricane Center`s Tropical Prediction Center upon his retirement; 4) H.Res. 99 - Commending the University of Nebraska-Lincoln volleyball team for winning the NCAA Division I Women`s Volleyball Championship; 5) H.Res. 120 - Recognizing the African American spiritual as a national treasure; 6) H.R. 187 - To designate the Federal building and United States courthouse and customhouse located at 515 West First Street in Duluth, Minnesota, as the ``Gerald W. Heaney Federal Building and United States Courthouse and Customhouse;'' 7) H.R. 238 - To repeal a prohibition on the use of certain funds for tunneling in certain areas with respect to the Los Angeles to San Fernando Valley Metro Rail project, California.

9:30 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on the FY08 defense budget. Secretary of Defense Gates and Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Homeland Security Subcommittee. Hearings on using risk to determine homeland security investments. William Jenkins, GAO; Henry Willis, Rand Corp. Location: Room 2358, Rayburn.

10 a.m. BUDGET _ Full Committee. Hearing on the Treasury Department's FY08 budget. Secretary Paulson. Location: Room 210, Cannon.

10 a.m. FINANCIAL SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on the Committee on Foreign Investments in the United States. Location: Room 2128, Rayburn.

10 a.m. FOREIGN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the international relations budget for FY08. Secretary of State Rice. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

10 a.m. OVERSIGHT AND GOVENMENT REFORM _ Full Committee. Hearing on wasate, fraud and abuse in the Iraq rebuilding process. Comptroller General David M. Walker, GAO; Stuart W. Bowen Jr., special inspector general for Iraq Reconstruction; William Reed, Defense Contract Audit Agency; Kristal Batalona, daughter of Wesley Batalona, Blackwater employee; Kathryn Helvenston-Wettengel, mother of Stephen Helvenston, Blackwater employee; Rhonda Teague, wife of Michael Teague, Blackwater employee; Donna Zovko, mother of Jerry Zovko, Blackwater employee; Erik Prince, chairman, Blackwater USA; Richard Cousins, chief executive, ESS/Compass Group; Jameel A.E. Al Sane, chairman, Regency Hotel and Hospital Co.; William P. Utt, president and CEO, KBR Inc.; Alan L. Boeckman, chairman and CEO, Fluor Corp.; Tina Ballard, deputy assistant secretary of Army for policy and procurement Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

10 a.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

10:15 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn.

10:30 a.m. EDUCATION AND LABOR _ Full Committee. Hearing on economic solutions to h,elp the middle class. AFL-CIO Secretary-Treasurer Richard Trumka; Judy Feder, Georgetown University; Bill Archey, Advancing the Business of Technology. Location: Room 2175, Rayburn.

11 a.m. NATURAL RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Organizational meeting. Location: Room 1324, Longworth.

1 p.m. HOMELAND SECURITY _ Full Committee. Hearing on issues and challenges facing the Homeland Security Department. Comptroller General David Walker; DHS Inspector General Richard Skinner. Location: Room 311, Cannon.

2 p.m. RULES _ Full Committee. Meeting on rules for floor debate. Location: Room H-313, Capitol.

2 p.m. WAYS AND MEANS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the FY08 budget. OMB Director Rob Portman. Location: Room 1100, Longworth.

Other: INDEPENDENT COLLEGES _ The National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities holds its 2007 meeting, ``Charting Our Course.'' Highlights: 9:15 a.m. Rep. David Loebsack, D-Iowa. Location: Hyatt Regency on Capitol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW.

RESERVE OFFICERS _ The Reserve officers Association holds its Mid-Winter Conference and Military Exposition. Highlights: 11:30 a.m. Coast Guard Commandant Adm. Thad Allen speaks at the Coaast Guard Affairs Committee meeting. 7 p.m. Banquet honoring Rep. Gene Taylor, R-Miss. Location: Washington Hilton & Towers, 1919 Connecticut Ave. NW

DOJ_NMG_0128694

FEDERAL BUDGET-RELATED EVENTS _ Highlights: 9 a.m. Under Secretary for Science Raymond Orbach holds a teleconference to react to the FY'08 budget request. Dial-in 888 529-1867. Conference ID 8480814.

HOMELAND SECURITY _ American Military University holds a two-day conference, ``Homeland Security: The Ripple Effect." Highlights: 9:30 a.m. Session on lessons learned from Hurricane Katrina, with Lt. Gen. Russel Honore, former Commander of the Joint Task Force-Katrina. 12 p.m. Luncheon speaker - former Sen. Gary Hart. 3:30 p.m. James Gilmore, Chairman, National Council on Readiness and Preparedness. Location: National Press Club.

CUBA AFTER CASTRO _ 8:30 a.m. NDN, a progressive think tank and advocacy organization, hosts a panel discussion, ``After Fidel: A New Day for America's Relations with Cuba and Latin America?" Participants: Congressman William Delahunt, Chairman of the Subcommittee on International Organizations, Human Rights and Oversight; Janice OConnell, Professional Staff Member, Senate Foreign Relations Committee; Julia Sweig, Director for Latin America Studies, Council on Foreign Relations; Miriam Leiva, Cuban Dissident via phone from Cuba; Sergio Bendixen, President, Bendixen & Associates; and Joe Garcia, Senior Vice President, NDN (moderator). Location: Phoenix Park Hotel, 520 North Capitol St. NW.

USTR SEMINAR _ 9 a.m. The Carnegie Endowment holds its 7th annual Former USTR Seminar, with Carla Hills, Mickey Kantor, Clayton Yeutter, Charlene Barshefsky, Bill Eberle and Bill Brock. Location: 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

BALANCED BUDGET _ 9:30 a.m. - 11 a.m. The Brookings Institution hosts a discussion with a panel of experts who will discuss their bipartisan plan of spending cuts and tax increases to balance the budget in the next five years, and set the nation on a sustainable fiscal course for the long run. Participants include G. William Hoagland, former director of budget and appropriations for former Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn.; Charles Stenholm, former Member of Congress from Texas; and Isabel Sawhill, a Brookings senior fellow. David Wessel, deputy bureau chief of the Wall Street Journal, will moderate the panel discussion. Location: Brrooking Institution, Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY _ 11 a.m. Sen. George V. Voinovich, R-Ohio; joins Joe Wiegand, Global Brand Protection Manager, Ford Motor Company; Jody Fledderman, President and CEO, Batesville Tool & Die; and Jeffrey O. Evans, CEO and President, The Will-Burt Company, for a press conference to to introduce the Intellectual Property Rights Enforcement Act, legislation that sponsors say will significantly enhance intellectual property (IP) coordination and protection, both domestically and internationally. Location: Room G-11, Dirksen Senate Office Building.

WAL-MART HEALTHCARE _ 11 a.m. Wal-Mart; the Service Employees International Union; the Center for American Progress; the Howard H. Baker, Jr. Center for Public Policy, Kelly Services; the Communications Workers of America; AT&T: Intel and the Committee for Economic Development hold a news conference to announce a major new campaign with a focus on health care. Participants include: Lee Scott, President and CEO of Wal-Mart Stores, Inc.; Andrew Stern, President of the Service Employees International Union (SEIU); John Podesta, President of the Center for American Progress and former Chief of Staff to President Bill Clinton; Howard Baker, founder of the Howard H. Baker, Jr. Center for Public Policy at the University of Tennessee and former Senate Majority Leader and Chief of Staff to President Ronald Reagan. Location: Hyatt Regency Capitol Hill, Capitol Room B (Lobby Level), 400 New Jersey Ave. NW.

CHAO _ 11:10 a.m. Labor Secretary Elaine Chao speaks to the Women of the World Symposium. Location: U.S. Chamber of Commerce, 1615 H St. NW.

METH LABS _ 11:45 a.m. Congressman Bart Gordon will be joined by new members of Congress at a press conference to discuss legislation under consideration in the House of Representatives that would support efforts to clean up meth labs in communities across the country. H.R. 365, the Methamphetamine Remediation Research Act of 2007 will be voted on in the House of Representatives on Wednesday. Location: Room HC-7, Capitol.

NONPROLIFERATION _ 12 p.m. Reps. Edward Markey and Christopher Shays, co-Chairs of the Bipartisan Task Force on Nonproliferation, host Dr. Pierre Goldschmidt, former IAEA Deputy Director General and Head of the Department of Safeguards, to discuss ways in which current nonproliferation norms are faltering and can be improved. Location: Room 1334, Longworth.

ZINNI _ 12 p.m. Retired Gen. Anthony Zinni participates in a discussion on the frontline vision of America's power and purpose, sponsored by Georgetown University. Location: Bunn Center auditorium, Georgetown University.

AARP-BUDGET _ 12:30 p.m. AARP health care policy expert Kirsten Sloan, National Coordinator - Health and Long-Term Care Issues, holds an audio news conference on the Administration's FY'08 budget proposal that calls for cuts in Medicare and Medicaid. Notes: Audio News Conference call-in is 866-835-8845. Please call 202-434-2560 to confirm participation.

EGYPT _ 12:30 p.m. - 2 p.m. The Saban Center for Middle East Policy at the Brookings Institution will host Ahmed Aboul Gheit, minister of foreign affairs for the Arab Republic of Egypt, to discuss these crucial issues in the Mideast, as well as the way forward in US-Egyptian relations. The session will be moderated by Martin Indyk, director of the

DOJ_NMG_0128695

Saban Center for Middle East Policy. Location: Brookings Institution, Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

BUDGET-ENVIRONMENT _ 1 p.m. Environmental and conservation experts hold a telephone briefing on the proposed budget for climate change, public lands and oceans, with Sarah Neiymeyer of the Wilderness Society, Beth Lowell of Oceans, Erich Pica of Friends of the Earth and Peter Raabe of American Rivers. Notes: Accredited media only. Callin number: 800-901-1248; passcode: budget.

COMMUNICATIONS GAP _ 1 p.m. The Joint Commission holds a telephone news conference to propose expert-based solutions to narrow the communications gap between caregivers and patients, and improve patient safety. Notes: Callin number: 800-351-4895; passcode: 13975; conference ID: 34388273.

PENTAGON-AFRICA _ 1 p.m. Principal Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Policy Ryan Henry and Lt. Gen. Walter Sharp, Director, the Joint Staff, hold a press briefing to discuss the establishment of US Africa Command. Location: DOD Briefing Room, Pentagon 2E579.

BUDGET-HEAD START _ 1:30 p.m. Head Start President Sarah Green, others, hold a telephone news conference on cuts in the Head Start program. Notes: Callin number: 800-860-2442; ask for Head Start cuts event.

DEMOCRATS-VETERANS _ 1:50 p.m. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and senior House Democrats hold a photo opportunity with war veterans from VoteVets.org following their meeting. Founded and supported by veterans, VoteVets.org is leading the charge against the President's escalation of the war in Iraq. Location: Room H-230, Capitol.

ONLINE SEXUAL EXPLOITATION _ 2 p.m. Senators John McCain and Chuck Schumer join Representatives Steve Chabot and Nick Lampson for a press conference about the Securing Adolescents From Exploitation-Online Act of 2007. They will be joined by John Walsh, host of ``America's Most Wanted'' and co-founder of NCMEC; Ernie Allen, President of the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children (NCMEC); Sheriff Mike Brown (Bedford County, Virginia); and Miss America 2007. They will discuss their commitment to protecting children from online sexual exploitation. Location: Room S-115, Capitol.

ARMY MODERNIZATION _ 2:30 p.m. The Army holds a two-part media roundtable on Army modernization and on Future Combat Systems modernization, with Maj. Gen. Jeffrey A. Sorenson, Deputy for Acquisition and Systems Management to the Assistant Secretary of the Army and Col. Charles Bush, Army G-8 will discuss Army Modernization beginning at 2:30 p.m. At 3:30 p.m., Maj. Gen. Charles Cartwright, Program Manager, Future Combat Systems Brigade Combat Team and Dennis Muilenburg, Vice President/ General Manager, Boeing Combat Systems and Program Manager Future Combat System will discuss budget-induced changes to the FCS Modernization Program. Location: Army Public Affairs Conference Room, Pentagon Room 1E462.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Wednesday, February 07, 2007 8:21 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Wednesday, February 07, 2007
Attachments:	dojclips070207.pdf; dojclips070207.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

U.S. Declines To Join Accord On Secret Detentions (WP) 5
Feds Want PUC To Put Off Contempt Hearing For Verizon (AP) 6
White House Ceding Legal Ground In Detainee Battle? (ABC) 6
Detained Saudis Described As Democracy Activists (WP) 7

Homeland Response:

GAO Criticizes Homeland Security Lawyers (AP) 8
Thwarted DHS Probes Alleged (WP/AP) 9
Incoming Intelligence Chief Plans To Ease Hiring Of Arab Americans (WP) 9
New FEMA Emerges From The Wreckage Of Past Disasters (column) (WP) 10

War News:

House Democrats May Take Lead On War Resolution Front (LAT) 11
Senate GOP Tries To Shift Message (RC) 12
House Democrats Eye Iraq Resolution (WT) 13
House Now The Focus Of Iraq Debate (USAT) 14
Many Voices, No Debate, As Senate Is Stifled On War (NYT) 15
Vote Is Sought On Iraq Funding (WSJ) 17
MoveOn Already Attacking Senators Blocking Debate On Surge (POL) 17
It's The War, Senators (NYT) 18
Senate Dems To Try Again On The 'surge' (HILL) 19
Cloture Vote Does Not Split Warner Group (HILL) 20
Yes, We Can Find The Exit (NYT) 20
Expect The Worst In Iraq (WP) 21
House On Deck In Iraq Debate (RC) 22
Senate Leaders Continue Squabbling Over Iraq (WP) 24
General Is Front Man For Bush's Iraq Plan (WP) 25
Democrats Press Bush To Change Iraq Plan (AP) 26
Surge Is Not 'Last Chance' For Success, Gates Says (LAT) ..28
Military Wants More Civilians To Help In Iraq (NYT) 29
French PM Attacks Iraq Troop 'surge' (FT) 30
The Nitty-Gritty About This Particulate Of Speech (WP) 31
House Panel Questions Monitoring Of Cash Shipped To Iraq (NYT) 32
Rusty Democrats Unable To Pin Anything On Bremer (WP) ..33
Bremer Admits Errors In Occupying Iraq (USAT) 34
Unspent Iraqi Funds Undercut Bush's Push For More (WSJ) 35
Billions Given Away In Baghdad Free-for-all (FT) 36
Democrats, Bremer Spar Over Iraq Spending (WP) 37
Waxman Raps Ex-Iraq Chief Over Aid Funds (AP) 38
Bremer Defends Spending In Iraq (MCT) 39
Waxman Hits 'Waste, Abuse' Of Iraq Funds (WT) 40
U.S. To Pay $5.8B To Expand Iraqi Forces (AP) 41
Iran Accuses US Of Role In Iraqi Kidnap (FT) 42
Iran Alleges U.S. Role In Kidnap Of Embassy Official In Baghdad (WP) 42
U.S. Orchestrated Seizure Of Baghdad Envoy, Iran Alleges (LAT) 43
Blair Urges Iran To Change Its Ways (AP) 44
Merkel Says Talks With Iran Still Possible (AFP) 45
Israel Sounds Alarm On Iran's Nuclear Efforts (LAT) 45
Iran's Economic Conditions Deteriorate (USAT) 48
Challenging The Mullahs, One Signature At A Time (NYT) ...49
Iraqi Premier Admits Errors In Introducing Security Plan In Baghdad (NYT) 50
Kuwait Court Convicts Iraqi Lawmaker In 1983 Bombings That Killed 5 Americans (NYT) 51
Terror Takes Toll On Market, Vendors (WT) 53
U.S. Mulls Iraq Refugees (WT) 54
Refugees Are An Overlooked Casualty Of Iraq War (USAT) ...55
Tape Recounts U.S. Attack That Killed British Soldier (NYT) 56
'I Think They're Rocket Launchers' (WP) 57
Abu Ghraib Trial Date Set (WT/AP) 58
Afghan Forces Capture Suspected Al-Qaida (WP/AP) 59

Taliban Still Controls South Afghan Town (AP) 59
Gates Bracing For More Afghan Violence (AP)..... 60
GOP Lawmakers Press Bush On Afghanistan (LAT)..... 60
Official Hits U.S. For Afghan Missive (WT)..... 62
Problems Stall Pentagon's New Fighting Vehicle (WP) 62
Nuclear Officials Seek Approval For Warhead (WP)..... 64

DOJ:

Prosecutor Fired So Ex-Rove Aide Could Get His Job (USAT) 65
A U.S. Attorney Was Removed Without Cause, Official Says (NYT) 66
Deputy Attorney General Defends Prosecutor Firings (WP) ... 67
Justice Lawyer Explains Attorney Firings (AP) 68
Justice Official Defends Prosecutors' Firings (LAT) 69
Official Denies Prosecutors Were Ousted For Political Reasons (MCT)..... 70
Senate Given No Reason For Prosecutor Firings (CHIT) 71
Lawmakers' Letters Led To Lam's Ouster (SDUT) 72
White House Denies Prosecutors Were Sacked In Retaliation (FT) 73
Senators Press Officials On U.S. Attorney Firings (RC)..... 74
Judiciary Panel Questions Removal Of Arkansas U.S. Attorney (MCA) 75
Deputy AG Acknowledges Cummins Was Forced Out (NAMN)..... 76
Congress Probes Departures Of U.S. Attorneys (USNEWS)... 77
Playing Politics With Justice (NYT)..... 78
Bush Replaces U.S. Attorneys In Power Play (BSUN)..... 79

Corporate Scandals:

3 Acquitted In Lengthy AOL Trial (WP)..... 80
Defendants Acquitted In AOL-PurchasePro Trial (FINDLAW/AP)..... 81
Oil Drilling Companies To Pay Record Settlement In Bribery Case (AP) 81
Firms To Pay $26 Million In Nigeria Bribery Case (HC)..... 82
Allied Records Are Subpoenaed In 'Pretexting' Case (NYT).. 82
Allied Capital Says Its 'Agent' Got Phone Data (WP)..... 84
Corporate Guidelines On Pretexting Slow To Develop (NLJ) 85
Engineered Support Ex-Excutives Accused (AP)..... 86
SEC Alleges Fraud At DRS Unit (WSJ) 87
Nacchio Seeks Trial Delay (AP)..... 88
SEC Boosts Probe For Wall Street Leaks (WSJ)..... 89
S.E.C. Is Looking At Stock Trading (NYT) 90
SEC Pores Over Trading Data To See If Hedge Funds Are Being Tipped Off (USAT) 91
The Class-Action Market (WSJ) 92

Criminal Law:

NBC Reporter To Testify At CIA Leak Case (NSDY/AP)..... 93
Court Hears Libby Describe Cheney As 'Upset' At Critic (WP) 94
Libby Testimony Details Plot To Discredit Critic (LAT) 95
Libby Speaks On Tape, But May Not In Court (NYT) 97
Libby Says He Thought Bush Authorized Unmasking Plame (CNN) 98
Powerful Pa. Senator Indicted (NSDY/AP) 99
The Case Against Fumo (PHI)..... 100
Indictment Is In The Details (PHI) 103
A FEDERAL CASE (PHI)..... 104
Editorial | Fumo Charged (PHI) 106
INDICTED: THE CURRENT CULTURE IN HARRISBURG (PHI) 107
Loudoun Land Deals Subject Of U.S. Probe (WP) 108
More Indictments From Operation Big Coon Dog Investigation (TRI) 109
FBI: 19 Bonano Crime Family Members Busted (WABC) 110
Alleged Bonanno Crime Family Under Boss Busted (WNBC) 110
Feds: Top Bonanno Mobsters Busted (NSDY)..... 111
City Briefs (NYDN)..... 112
BONFIRE OF THE BONANNOS BUSTS 19 (NYPOST) 112
Fighting Crime Tops GOP Priorities (WT) 113
GOP Revives ISP-tracking Legislation (CNET)..... 114
Three Plead Guilty To Fraud In Katrina Debris Removal (BSH)..... 115
U.S. Wants US$309 Million In Katrina Hurricane Aid Returned (FINDLAW/AP) 115
Former Manager Gets 1 1/2 Years For Theft (MIDP) 116
Trio Convicted In Bank Robbery Scheme (FWST) 117
Government Wants Former Coke Secretary Jailed (AP) 118
Water Deal Exposes Secret Iraq Contracts (AP) 118
Wider Death Penalty Sought (USAT) 120
6 City Police Officers Suspended (BSUN)..... 121

Civil Law:

Relatives Sue FBI, Say Club Sting Was Bungled (BERGREC) 122
FBI Sued By Relatives Of Victims In Club Shooting (MH) 123
Radio Star's Fatal Air Crash Blamed On Radar Lack (CHIT) 123
AmeriDebt Founder Accused Of Hiding Funds Meant For Debtors (FINDLAW/AP)..... 124
Two Hospitals Allege RICO Violations By UnitedHealth (AP) 125
All Parties In Jet-noise Lawsuits Sent To Mediation (VAPILOT) 126

DOJ_NMG_0128699

Civil Rights:

Review Lays Out Lags In State Hospital Improvements (AP) 126
New Task Force Formed To Fight Human Trafficking (KLAS) ... 127
Fellow Inmates Beat An Imprisoned Border Patrol Agent (MCT) ... 128
Former Border Agent Assaulted In Prison (WT) ... 129
Former Border Patrol Agent Convicted Of Shooting Drug Smuggler Beaten By Fellow Prison Inmates, Authorities Say (FINDLAW/AP) ... 130
Ex-Border Patrol Agent In Prison For Shooting Mexican Drug Runner Assaulted By Inmates (FOX) ... 130
Appeals Court Sends Wal-Mart Women Bias Case To Trial (FINDLAW/AP) ... 132
Wal-Mart Loses Bid To Block Group Bias Suit (WP) ... 133
Wal-Mart Faces Sex Bias Lawsuit (FT) ... 134
Final Teen Gets Probation In Long Beach Hate Crime (LAT) 135
Dallas Has 3 Months To Fix Jail (DMN) ... 135
More Than Words (WP) ... 137

Antitrust:

Deal Raises Concerns About Antitrust Issues (SLPD) ... 137
Senate Panel Probes Gas Trades For Possible Market Manipulation (WSJ) ... 138
Samsung To Pay $90 Million To Settle 41 State Claims (Update3) (BLOOM) ... 139
Samsung Settles Price-fixing Suit For $90m (FT) ... 139
Samsung To Pay $90 Million To Settle Price-fixing Lawsuit (AP) ... 140
Bush Talks About Fiscal Responsibility At Company Accused Of Price-fixing (AP) ... 140
Apple Calls To End Online Copy Protection (FT) ... 141
Jobs Pitches Dumping Anti-piracy Software (LAT) ... 141
Jobs's New Tune Raises Pressure On Music Firms (WSJ) . 142
Jobs Wants Fewer Download Limits (USAT) ... 144
Jobs Calls For End To Music Copy Protection (NYT) ... 145
Jobs Calls For Open Music Sales (WP) ... 147
In Equity Office Battle, A Matter Of Scale (WSJ) ... 148
Shareholder Vote Today Could Settle Fight For Office REIT (NYT) ... 149
Advertisement TODAY'S MOST POPULAR 1. Beijing Gets Rid Of Bad Translations 2. A Shoelace Obsession Goes Online 3. Kodak's Printer Strategy: Cheaper Cartridges 4. Should Bond Investors Watch The Thin Ice? 5. Steve Jobs Raises Pressure On Music Firms MORE C (WSJ) ... 150
Midwest Flies In The Face Of Takeover Effort (USAT) ... 151

Environment/Indian Affairs:

US Farmworkers, Environmental Groups Reopen Lawsuit To Quicken Pace Of Pesticide Ban (FINDLAW/AP) ... 152
Gore Says Bush Administration Paying Scientists To Dispute Global Warming (CNN) ... 153
China Says Rich Countries Should Take Lead On Global Warming (NYT) ... 153
Legacy Of Radiation Illness Stirs Objection To Nevada Bomb Test (WP) ... 154
Democrats Rip EPA Chief Over Reforms (AP) ... 155
Senator Grills EPA Chief Over `environmental Rollbacks' (MCT) ... 156
Mining Heat From The Earth? New Technology Shows Promise. (CSM) ... 157
Tax Break With A View (WSJ) ... 158
House Committee Approves Bill To Combat Indian Meth Use (AP) ... 160

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Combating Threat Of Cross-border Gangs Discussed (LAT) 161
Central America's Top Cops In LA For International Gang Summit (MERCN) ... 162
L.A. Exports Gang Terror (LADN) ... 162
21 In Dorchester, Quincy Arrested (BOS) ... 164
Newton Man Faces Federal Drug Charges (DNT) ... 165
Former Drug Boss Sent To Prison For Life For Cocaine Ring (DDN) ... 165
Prosecutors Tie Kiel Problems To Gambling (SDUT) ... 166
3 Plead Guilty In Drug Ring (CP) ... 167
North Dakota Issues First Hemp Production Licenses To 2 Farmers (AP) ... 167
Hemp Farming Licensees Have Different Plans (AP) ... 168
GOP Lawmakers Press Bush On Afghanistan (LAT) ... 169
Venezuela: Nation Doesn't Need U.S. Aid (AP) ... 170
Troubled U.S. Presence On Ecuador Coast (AP) ... 170
Ecuador Assails US Antidrug Funding Cuts (FT) ... 172

Immigration:

Border States' Burden (LAT) ... 172
Next Stop: Underground (WP) ... 173

Tax:

Tax Preparer Barred From Preparing Federal Returns For Others (AP) ... 174
Deadline Nears For 2006 Health-Care Accounts (WSJ) ... 174

DOJ_NMG_0128700

Congress-Administration:

Cabinet Members Go To Congress To Push The Budget (NYT) 175
President Bush Asks Lawmakers To Resist Raising Taxes (NYS/BL)....176
Micron Plant Provides Backdrop For Bush (WP) 177
Bush Visits Micron's Manassas Plant (PBJ)....178
Bush Touts Fiscal Responsibilityin Speech At Micron Plant In Virginia (AP)....178
Budget Talk Venue Carries Baggage (LAT)....179
Paulson: Growth Can Spur Balanced Budget (AP) 180
Hill Democrats Critical Of Bush's Budget Plan (WP) 181
Gleams Of Hope For '08 Budget Deal (CSM) 182
Analysis: Budget Deal Seems Unlikely (NSDY/AP)....183
Bush Tax Cuts' Fate Hangs In Balance (WT) 184
Still Against Taxes, Bush Embraces User Fees (MCT)....185
Bush's Stealth Tax Increase (WP) 186
Dems May Override Bush On Kid Insurance (AP)....187
Funding Fears To Halt Some Cancer Trials (WSJ) 188
Can Bush Reach Ethanol Goal With Proposed Spending Plan? (WSJ)....189
Sweetheart Deal For Airlines (USAT)....190
Rangel Open To Tax Cuts In Wage Measure (AP)....190
Labor Pushes Dems To Deny Bush Extension Of Authority (HILL)....191
Senate GOP Threatens Filibuster Over Budget (RC)....192
Democrats Set To Unveil Agenda (RC)....193
Members Earmarking Without Earmarks (RC) 195
Pelosi's Push For Jet Remains Up In Air (WT)....196
Department Of Peace Bill Off To A Rocky Start — Again (HILL)....197
White House Wreath Placed In Honor Of Ronald Reagan's Birthday (LAT/AP) 198
The Biggest Secret In Health Care (WSJ)....199
Beyond Health-Care Band-Aids (WP)....200
Hollywood Takes Its Concerns About Piracy And Taxes To Washington (NYT)....202
Mystery Solved (RC)....203
Government Inside Out (NYT)....204

Other News:

Fed Chief Warns Of Widening Inequality (WSJ)....205
Bernanke Suggests Job Skills To Combat Inequality (WT)..206
Bernanke: Fixing Income Gap Will Take Education (USAT)207
Markets Quiet While Awaiting Cisco News (USAT) 207
DJIA Edges Up To 12666.31, 7.37 Points Shy Of Record (WSJ) 208
GOP Views Clinton As Virtually Unbeatable (POL)....209
Iraq War And History Favor The Democrats (POL)....212
Poll Favors Giuliani In New Hampshire (AP) 213
Clinton Lifts Fund-Raising Stakes (WSJ)....214
Clinton Fundraising Goes Full Force (WP)....216
Clinton Helped With $15M (HILL) 217
White House Bid? Giuliani Is Still Undeclared (NYT) 218
Hillary And Rudy Could Wrap It Up This Year (HILL) 219
Catholics Slam Bloggers Hired By Edwards (AP) 221
Edwards's Bloggers Cross The Line, Critic Says (NYT)....221
Romney To Announce Presidential Bid (AP) 222
Mike Huckabee: Can He Fell The Big Guys In '08? (CSM)..223
In Campaign 2008, Candidates Starting Earlier, Spending More (WP)....223
Who's Hitting The Right Notes? (WP)....225
Ready For Obama Already (NYT) 226
Right Candidates, Wrong Question (NYT) 227
This One's For You, Joe (NYT) 228
Texas Governor Has Funding Idea: Sell The Lottery (WP/AP)229
On A Wintry Night, The Press And The Politicians Get Cozy (WP)....230
Subprime Politics (WSJ) 231
Choice Advances (WSJ)....232
Budget Sets High Foreign Policy Targets (FT)....233
Lebanon Leader Puts Onus On U.S. (LAT)....234
Rice Sees Summits With Israeli, Palestinian Leaders (AFP)235
Palestinian Aid Policies 'backfiring' (FT)....236
Fatah And Hamas Leaders Meet Saudi King For Peace Talks (NYT) 237
Palestinians Try To Stave Off Civil War (AP) 238
Saudis Offer Counterweight To Resurgent Iran (FT)....239
Saudi Arabia's Diplomacy (WP) 240
U.S. To Create A Single Command For Military Operations In Africa (NYT) 241
US Signals Scope For Ties With N Korea (FT) 242
U.S. Expects Intense N.Korea Nuke Talks (AP) 242
Northern Exposure (WSJ) 243
Bush Approves Plan To Pressure Sudan (WP)....244
Suicide Bomber Dies At Airport In Pakistan (NYT)....245
Russia Tycoon May Talk To Police On Poisoning (NYT) 246
Russian Justice (WSJ)....247
Blair Wins Cash-for-honours Reprieve (FT)....247
British Prosecutors Clear Blair Ally In 'Cash-for-Honors' Probe (WP)....248
As Inflation Soars, Zimbabwe Economy Plunges (NYT) 249
From Bird To Person (WSJ)....251

DOJ_NMG_0128701

TERRORISM NEWS:

U.S. Declines To Join Accord On Secret Detentions (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

PARIS, Feb. 6 -- Representatives from 57 countries on Tuesday signed a long-negotiated treaty prohibiting governments from holding people in secret detention. The United States declined to endorse the document, saying its text did not meet U.S. expectations.

Louise Arbour, the U.N. high commissioner for human rights, said the treaty was "a message to all modern-day authorities committed to the fight against terrorism" that some practices are "not acceptable."

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack declined to comment, except to say that the United States helped draft the treaty but that the final wording "did not meet our expectations."

The Associated Press reported that McCormack declined to comment on whether the U.S. stance was influenced by the Bush administration's policy of sending terrorism suspects to CIA-run prisons overseas, which President Bush acknowledged in September.

"Our American friends were naturally invited to this ceremony," French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy said after the signing here. "Unfortunately, they weren't able to join us. That won't prevent them from one day signing on in New York at U.N. headquarters, and I hope they will."

Some U.S. allies in Europe also declined to join, among them Britain, Germany, Spain and Italy.

The convention defines forced disappearance as the arrest, detention or kidnapping of a person by state agents or affiliates and subsequent denials about the detention or location of the individual.

The treaty, adopted by the U.N. General Assembly in December, has been pushed for nearly a quarter-century by rights groups and the families of individuals who have disappeared at the hands of various governments. It also addresses the international debate over the rights of terrorism suspects.

At a separate gathering, a non-binding accord banning the use of child soldiers was signed here Tuesday by representatives of 58 countries, including African nations that have been harshly criticized by the United Nations and human rights groups for arming children. The United States did not participate, saying that it objected to some of the wording of the documents but that it remained committed to its treaty obligations on the issue.

Douste-Blazy, the French foreign minister, described the agreement as having "a great political value" in pressuring national armies, paramilitaries and opposition forces to stop using children as combatants.

"What this conference has shown is that there is a great deal of political commitment to ending the unlawful recruitment of children," said Rima Salah, deputy executive director of UNICEF, the United Nations' advocacy agency for children, which co-sponsored the conference with the French government. "What needs to be done now is to harness this commitment and turn it into concrete action on the ground."

U.N. and human rights groups estimate that as many as 300,000 children younger than 18 are used worldwide in armed conflicts as soldiers or servants for soldiers. They say girls in particular are often sexually abused and exploited by militaries and armed groups.

The accord calls for an immediate halt to recruitment of children, the release of those now serving in militaries or paramilitaries and the expansion of programs for reintegrating the youngsters into their communities and societies.

Among the countries signing the accord were Congo, Chad, Sudan and Uganda, all of which the United Nations has singled out on the abuse of children by armed factions and militaries. Burma and the Philippines, which the United Nations has also cited, did not take part in the conference or sign the agreement, UNICEF said.

DOJ_NMG_0128702

The International Criminal Court in The Hague considers the use of children younger than 15 in armed conflicts a war crime and announced last week that Congolese warlord Thomas Lubanga Dyilo will be tried on charges of recruiting child soldiers as young as 10.

Feds Want PUC To Put Off Contempt Hearing For Verizon (AP)

AP, February 7, 2007

AUGUSTA, Maine — The Justice Department asked a judge Tuesday to bar the Maine Public Utilities Commission from proceeding with a contempt hearing for Verizon that stems from telephone customer complaints related to allegations about domestic surveillance by the National Security Agency.

A multi-customer complaint filed with the Maine PUC last May effectively seeks to force Verizon to say whether it provided telephone call records to the government without a warrant.

The PUC has challenged the adequacy of Verizon responses to date and set a hearing for Friday.

In a federal court filing Tuesday, the Justice Department said PUC officials had been put on notice months ago that the federal government believes the information being sought about an alleged involvement of Verizon with the NSA "cannot be disclosed."

The Justice Department requested a judicial order to keep the Maine PUC from moving forward until a court decides "what is clearly a federal question without the immediate threat of disclosure of the very information that is at issue in this case _ information that, if disclosed, might reveal or tend to reveal highly significant federal classified intelligence activities."

In addition to seeking to block PUC action, the Justice Department said the order it was requesting would bar Verizon from responding to PUC demands "because of the substantial risk of direct or inadvertent disclosure of information that would tend to confirm or deny the existence of foreign intelligence activities."

Justice Department lawyer Alexander Haas said he had no comment. Department spokesman Charles Miller confirmed that the request for a court order was aimed at Friday´s scheduled PUC hearing.

Assistant Maine Attorney General Chris Taub said the state planned to formally respond on Wednesday in advance of a Thursday hearing in U.S. District Court in Bangor before Judge John Woodcock.

"We´re going to oppose the motion and ask the court to permit the PUC hearing to take place as scheduled," Taub said.

Verizon spokesman Peter Reilly said the company had no comment.

Verizon, in answer to last May´s customer complaint, issued a response on May 19, 2006, in which it referred to points made in two press releases, including one that declared the company was not asked for records by the NSA and did not provide such records.

The PUC subsequently ordered Verizon, on Aug. 9, to affirm in writing that its representations to the commission were true.

On Aug. 21, the same day that the U.S. Justice Department originally filed suit against the PUC and Verizon asserting that the PUC was pre-empted by federal law from investigating the alleged spying program, Verizon said it would not submit an affirmation, citing legal action by the federal government.

Since then, the PUC has sought to have the federal suit dismissed and the complaint case has not moved forward.

Ten days ago on Jan. 29, the PUC voted 3-0 to hold a contempt hearing.

White House Ceding Legal Ground In Detainee Battle? (ABC)

By Justin Rood

ABC News, February 7, 2007

A line item buried in the president's budget reveals the Bush administration is gearing up for emboldened legal challenges from Gitmo detainees.

A brief paragraph in President Bush's 2008 budget request shows he plans to hire nearly two dozen new Justice Department lawyers to fight suits brought by Guantanamo detainees challenging their imprisonment.

The boost is planned despite a new law that should prevent detainees' claims from ever reaching a U.S. court, suggesting the White House may believe that law will be quickly reversed.

DOJ_NMG_0128703

The increase in lawyers "signals real concern on the administration's part," said Vincent Warren, president of the New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights, that the new law is unconstitutional and will be struck down. His organization represents over 200 Guantanamo detainees and has helped lawyers representing hundreds of others.

The controversial bill passed through Congress late last year at the urging of President Bush. The Military Commissions Act (MCA), as it's known, stripped Guantanamo detainees of their right to challenge their captivity. President Bush signed the measure into law, despite critics calling the measure unconstitutional.

Currently, just seven Justice Department attorneys defend the government against Gitmo detainees' suits. By removing the threat of such lawsuits, the MCA should theoretically reduce or even eliminate the need for those attorneys -- but instead the White House wants to add 23 lawyers starting this October and arm the group with a $5.5 million budget. This year, the office's budget was $2.3 million.

Click Here for Full Blotter Coverage.

Military legal expert Eugene Fidell agreed with Warren's analysis. The request "presupposes that Congress will overturn the MCA...or tweak it," or the act could be affected by a Supreme Court ruling, said Fidell, president of the National Institute of Military Justice. "Or both," he added.

But Justice Department spokesman Eric Ablin disagreed. "I don't think you can read into [the request] in any way whatsoever," he said. "I think it's reflective of the expense of those Guantanamo cases."

Even so, the government's growth strategy might not be the best move, Fidell cautioned. After all, "you can turn 50 lawyers loose on a legal issue and not necessarily be better off," he said.

Detained Saudis Described As Democracy Activists (WP)

By Faiza Saleh Ambah

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

JIDDAH, Saudi Arabia, Feb. 6 -- Saudi police have arrested 10 men and accused them of collecting donations to fund terrorist acts outside the kingdom, the Interior Ministry said. But a lawyer and a prominent dissident said that at least seven of the men were Saudi democracy activists whose arrest was a government attempt to abort their civic rights work.

Matrouk al-Faleh, who was jailed in 2004 for calling for more democracy in the kingdom, said the seven men, most of them lawyers and professors, had been waiting for government approval to set up a civic rights group. They also had planned to present authorities this week with a list of more than 40 prisoners without legal representation whom they intended to defend.

"The terrorist allegation is a coverup," Faleh said. "It was used against me as well when I was arrested. . . . This is an attempt to abort the civic rights work they were planning."

Police went to the Jiddah beach house of lawyer Essam Basrawi on Friday night and arrested him and five other Saudi men. Saudi businessman Abdul-Aziz al-Khereiji was arrested at a checkpoint as he drove to Jiddah with his wife, said Bassim Alim, an attorney who represents four of the detainees.

Basrawi's Moroccan personal assistant also was detained. There was no information on the identities of the two other men.

An Interior Ministry spokesman told local newspapers that the arrested men had been involved in financing recruiters who sign up young Saudis to go into "turbulent areas," which is generally a reference to Iraq. The spokesman said sizable amounts of cash had been found during searches of the men's homes.

Many young Saudi radicals have crossed the long and porous border between the kingdom and Iraq and joined up with Sunni Muslim insurgents there.

Alim said that the government's accusations were baseless and that his clients were well-known reformists with no connection to terrorism. He said they might have been raising funds for Palestinian or Iraqi refugees. The men had been warned repeatedly by the government not to gather or write petitions because authorities feared the rise of a new political reform movement, he said.

"They don't want any kind of organized reform movement; they're trying to stomp on any organized calls for reform," Alim said.

DOJ_NMG_0128704

Alim said police had illegally searched the men's homes without warrants after midnight on Friday and seized files, books and computers. Neither Alim nor family members have been allowed to see the arrested men.

"If they are guilty of any crime, why aren't they allowed lawyers and charged publicly and shown proof or evidence?" Faleh said.

The arrests were the first to target democracy activists since reform-minded King Abdullah took the throne in 2005 and pardoned Faleh and two other leading activists who had spent 18 months in prison.

A dozen other men arrested with them in March 2004 signed statements pledging to stop lobbying for politic al freedoms. But Faleh and the two others refused to sign and demanded legal representation and a public trial. Legal defense and public trials are allowed under Saudi law but rarely applied. Most defendants go to court without attorneys.

Saudi Arabia, an absolute monarchy, has a consultative council appointed by the government, and carried out limited municipal elections in 2005. Despite Abdullah's cautious steps toward reform, the kingdom continues to show little tolerance for political opposition. It imposes strict limits on freedom of expression and bans public gatherings and political parties.

One of men arrested Friday, Sulaiman al-Rushoodi, is a lawyer and former judge who had been among the group of activists detained in 2004. He was released several weeks later after pledging to address his demands solely to authorities, and he joined the defense team of the three activists then still behind bars.

Basrawi is a prominent activist who helped draft petitions addressed to the government during a vibrant period of political activism before the 2004 arrests.

The consultative Shura Council recently announced it was considering laws permitting the setting up of civic rights groups, which are currently not allowed in the kingdom. Saudi Arabia has two government-appointed human rights committees but bans independent human rights and civil rights organizations.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

GAO Criticizes Homeland Security Lawyers (AP)

By Beverley Lumpkin

The AP, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON- Government lawyers have hampered investigations into waste and fraud at the Homeland Security Department, officials told Congress on Tuesday.

The head of the Government Accountability Office, the nonpartisan investigative arm of the Congress, and the department's own inspector general said Homeland Security officials, particularly lawyers in the general counsel's office, had delayed pro bes and demanded inappropriate access to interviews with employees. There was no suggestion of criminality.

Homeland Security Department spokesman Russ Knocke denied the allegations, terming them inaccurate and unfair. He said there are many times that investigators from both offices have interviewed employees without attorneys present and that the general counsel's office is involved only when sensitive information is discussed.

Both investigators told a House subcommittee that numerous inquiries into waste, abuse or management problems had been delayed.

"They're not very responsive. They don't give information quickly," said David Walker, head of the GAO.

"Every document we seek to review has to be reviewed (first) by the general counsel's office," Walker added. He said the department's general counsel wants to "sit in on every interview," which he deemed inappropriate.

Walker said when there are more lawyers than other staff involved, "you've got problems."

"I agree wholeheartedly," said Inspector General Richard Skinner. "It's not a denial of information, but it's very cumbersome to obtain information."

Skinner also said that having a supervisor or attorney present when his office interviews an employee "sets a chilling effect" and tells the employee he's presumed not to be a team player.

Until his resignation last month, the general counsel was Phil Perry, son-in-law of Vice President Dick Cheney.

DOJ_NMG_0128705

Walker and Skinner told the House subcommittee that "the tone is set from the top" and that Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff himself needs to address the situation.

"You can be assured that we're hearing you loud and clear," replied the panel's chairman, Rep. David Price, D-N.C. Chertoff is due on Thursday to make his first appearance before the subcommittee since Democrats took control of Congress.

Skinner also complained that he had asked department leaders to send a message to all employees explaining what his office does, and how to contact it. He said the draft letter had been "sitting in the general counsel's office" since last summer.

Knocke said the inspector general has an informative and detailed page on the department's intranet Web page that is available to all employees. Knocke said that is the usual mechanism for communicating with nearly 200,000 employees scattered around the world.

However, Knocke acknowledged that a recent "all hands" message was sent as a letter to all employees by Deputy Secretary Michael Jackson. The Associated Press reported last week that a survey found Homeland Security employees ranking last in job satisfaction of 36 federal agencies. Jackson wrote it was a "clear and jolting message" that department leadership was taking seriously.

That survey also came up at Tuesday's hearing, with Rep. Jose Serrano, D-N.Y., questioning the two watchdogs on whether such bad morale could have an impact on national security.

Skinner said some morale problems stem from combining 22 disparate agencies when the department was created in 2003. For example, the new agencies born from the old Customs and Immigration agencies have suffered from "very, very severe competition, jealousies, cultural differences, inability to get along with one another, inability or refusal to share information."

The panel also explored management failings recently revealed about two enormous long-term contracts the department has put in the hands of private companies.

The Coast Guard's Deepwater program was severely criticized by Skinner last month. The $24 billion, 25-year program to modernize the agency's fleet is being run by a joint venture of two defense contractors, Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman.

Skinner said he had recently spoken with Coast Guard Commandant Thad Allen, who Skinner said has taken the critique seriously and has reorganized his staff, named a new assistant commandant to oversee the program and rewrite the contract. Skinner quoted Allen as saying he would "put the Coast Guard back in the driver's seat."

There has also been criticism of the new border security program, the Secure Border Initiative, that Skinner has estimated could end up costing between $8 billion and $25 billion.

Walker noted that department officials had learned from their Deepwater problems and are moving more cautiously on the program, which covers both physical fencing and beefing up cameras, sensors and other technology on the border, and have been allocating funds for only small portions at a time.

Thwarted DHS Probes Alleged (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Government lawyers have hampered investigations into suspected waste and fraud at the Department of Homeland Security, officials told a House subcommittee yesterday.

The head of the Government Accountability Office, the nonpartisan investigative arm of Congress, and the department's own inspector general said that Homeland Security officials, particularly lawyers in the general counsel's office, had delayed inquiries and demanded inappropriate access to interviews with employees. There was no suggestion of criminality.

DHS spokesman Russ Knocke denied the allegations, calling them inaccurate and unfair. He said that investigators from both offices have interviewed employees many times without attorneys present and that the general counsel's office is involved only when sensitive information is discussed.

Numerous inquiries into suspected waste, abuse and management problems had been delayed, the investigators said.

Incoming Intelligence Chief Plans To Ease Hiring Of Arab Americans (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0128706

The incoming director of national intelligence, retired Navy Vice Adm. John M. McConnell, plans to change security rules to make it easier for intelligence agencies to hire first-generation Arab Americans for highly sensitive jobs.

These rules, dating from World War II, limit intelligence agencies' ability to employ first-generation Americans "who might have native language capabilities from serving in some of these very sensitive positions in the intelligence community" and hinder efforts to deal with radical Islam, McConnell said during his confirmation hearing Friday before the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence.

The rules McConnell described are in a directive from the director of central intelligence, or DCI. They require citizenship verification for access to the most highly classified data, known as sensitive compartmented information. For the foreign-born, there must be verification of U.S. citizenship and legal status in this country of immediate family members, including "spouse, cohabitant, father, mother, sons, daughters, brothers, sisters," the directive states.

Another element that must be considered when hiring is "foreign influence," according to adjudication guidelines that the White House adopted in December 2005. One section of the guidelines refers to "contact with a foreign family member, business or professional associate, friend, or other person who is a citizen of or resident in a foreign country if that contact creates a heightened risk of foreign exploitation, inducement, manipulation, pressure, or coercion."

An intelligence agency chief can waive these criteria, but McConnell said he wants to change them because they constitute "one of the areas that needs probably the greatest deal of attention and improvement . . . using people who speak the native language, understand the culture and the tribal conditions."

A spokesman for the Office of the Director of National Intelligence said yesterday that he could not comment directly because McConnell has yet to be confirmed. But, as part of transforming the old DCI directives into the new "intelligence community directives," the spokesman said, "the issue of first-generation access will be addressed."

McConnell is not the first to raise the issue, though his proposal to alter the relevant security rules goes further than did his predecessor's. In his farewell address as national intelligence director on Jan. 19, John D. Negroponte talked about the need to "tap into the great diversity of ethnicities and talents our nation possesses" and "increase training and education in foreign language."

In April 2005, former CIA case officer Lindsay Moran raised concerns about language expertise and security on PBS's "The NewsHour with Jim Lehrer." No one in her initial training class, she said, "spoke any of the languages that the CIA needs to go after terrorist groups, such as Arabic, Pashtu or Urdu."

And, she added, "The agency has completely ignored a whole pool of potential employees of second-generation Americans . . . because there's this inherent distrust of foreigners within the agency, they're unwilling to hire these kinds of people -- exactly the kinds of people that we need in order to gather effective intelligence in the Middle East."

New FEMA Emerges From The Wreckage Of Past Disasters (column) (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

On paper, the coming year should be turnaround time for FEMA.

President Bush's fiscal 2008 budget restructures funding for the Federal Emergency Management Agency, giving the agency's head, R. David Paulison, his first opportunity to lay claim to money that can be used to restore FEMA's luster and professionalism.

Inside the agency, Paulison has urged his executives to look to the future and learn from what went wrong with the federal response to Hurricane Katrina, which devastated Gulf Coast states in 2005.

In public appearances, Paulison describes FEMA as a partner with states and localities when it comes to planning for and responding to natural disasters. He also makes the pitch that FEMA is on the rebound.

After touring storm-damaged central Florida on Saturday, Paulison assured state officials that tractor-trailers loaded with water, meals, tarps and generators were on their way. The promise of relief supplies came a day after storms devastated four counties, a sign of "the new FEMA," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0128707

If money and staffing come together as Paulison hopes, the new FEMA will put an end to what the Government Accountability Office calls "considerable flux" and "near-constant organizational change" at FEMA since 2001.

Perhaps the biggest change came in 2003, when FEMA was folded into the new Homeland Security Department. From 2003 through 2005, programs and millions of dollars moved in and out of FEMA, disrupting operations and creating uncertainty, the GAO said in a report released last month.

FEMA also was forced to pay "a disproportionate amount" to help finance the start-up costs of the new department, leaving it with less money for its operating expenses, the GAO found.

After Katrina exposed leadership and management problems in FEMA, Congress conducted hearings and investigations that led to passage of the 2006 Post-Katrina Emergency Reform Act. The law transferred several offices within Homeland Security into FEMA, effective at the end of March.

The evolving FEMA "is very much the subject of attention in our budget," Michael Chertoff, secretary of homeland security, said Monday in discussing the administration's fiscal 2008 priorities.

The president will request $100 million for staffing, equipment, supplies and technology for the new FEMA initiative, Chertoff said. About $48 million will be used to convert FEMA's on-call response and recovery employees, who hold temporary positions, into full-time agency employees, Chertoff said.

That change would add about 1,000 employees to FEMA's full-time staff, which currently numbers about 2,200, agency spokesman Aaron T. Walker said. FEMA also will rely on about 3,240 employees who are paid from the disaster relief fund to work in recovery and relief efforts.

To help create the new FEMA, Paulison commissioned 18 studies aimed at strengthening the agency's business and support systems, such as personnel, finance, procurement and technology. The 18 assessments should be completed by April, and Walker said funding has been set aside to pay for any recommended changes in operations.

Finding the right people and getting them in the right jobs may be one of FEMA's biggest challenges. Investigations into Katrina suggested that FEMA lost too many senior managers during the merger into Homeland Security.

The American Federation of Government Employees, which represents FEMA workers, has expressed concerns about turnover in the agency. Andrea E. Brooks, the union's vice president, said Paulison "is trying to do the right thing," but added that she puts little stock in the staffing promises, in part because a previous hiring initiative fell short of its goal.

Paulison has made some strides in hiring experienced hands. With one more hire, he will have filled FEMA's 10 regional offices with directors who have lengthy experience in emergency preparedness and disaster relief operations, the first time in years that the majority of those jobs have been filled by seasoned professionals, Walker said.

WAR NEWS:

House Democrats May Take Lead On War Resolution Front (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey And Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON — House Democrats threatened Tuesday to take up a resolution next week to oppose President Bush's controversial troop buildup in Iraq, cranking up the pressure on Republicans who have blocked a vote on the measure in the Senate.

The move would shift the focus of the debate over the four-year-old war to the House, where Democrats have enough votes to pass a measure over Republican opposition. It also may further isolate the White House and its allies in the Senate, who are bucking public opinion that has turned sharply against the Iraq war and the president's plans to expand it.

When congressional Democrats began their campaign to challenge Bush over the unpopular war last month, House leaders decided to defer to the Senate to pass a resolution first.

But on Monday GOP senators derailed consideration of a nonbinding, bipartisan resolution that criticizes the Bush plan by preventing Democrats from getting the 60 votes needed to bring up the measure.

DOJ_NMG_0128708

On Tuesday, with few signs that the impasse would end soon in the Senate, House leaders said they might move first on an issue that Americans say is the most pressing one facing the nation.

"We said for a long period of time we would follow the Senate, but we believe it is important for us to make . . . our views known," House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md., said at his weekly briefing with reporters.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., has told her colleagues that a resolution against the president's call for 21,500 additional troops would be just the first of several legislative actions intended to pressure Bush into starting to withdraw American combat forces from Iraq.

Despite the mounting pressure, Senate Republicans continued to insist Tuesday that they simply want a fair debate on the floor of the Senate.

As they did Monday, they complained that they were not being allowed to bring up two alternatives to the resolution crafted by Sen. John Warner, R-Va., that "disagrees" with the president's plan to send more troops into Baghdad to control the sharply escalating sectarian violence.

One of the other resolutions -- sponsored by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., the leading cheerleader for a troop buildup -- backs the new strategy but also expresses the need for the Iraqi government to meet certain benchmarks to prove its commitment to help the American effort.

The other was offered by Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., and is a short resolution that opposes any limit on funds for American troops in the field.

But Senate Democrats hammered Republicans on Monday for ducking a formal debate on the war. And by Tuesday morning, some Republicans worried the public would misunderstand their stance.

"It's very unfortunate that we appear to be blocking," McCain complained. "I hope we can make the American people aware that we're just asking for votes on our amendment, which is the way the Senate works."

By Tuesday afternoon, Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., the minority leader, said he would no longer insist that McCain's measure come up for a vote. He offered no public explanation why Republicans had chosen to champion Gregg's resolution rather than McCain's.

Other GOP lawmakers remained defiant, casting themselves as the most loyal defenders of U.S. troops, a tactic they have employed in previous war debates. "We're not going to yield on this," Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, told reporters in the hallways outside the Senate chamber.

But the Democratic assault continued Tuesday as senators came to the floor to accuse the GOP of seeking to avoid a debate on the president's policy.

"It is absolutely outrageous. It is immoral," said Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., as she held up a photo of an Iraqi schoolgirl stepping over blood on the stairs of her school after a mortar attack.

MoveOn.org, a leading grass-roots organization opposing the war, announced it is running television ads targeting some Republican lawmakers, accusing them of not having "the courage to face a vote."

Now, House Democrats are also poised to ratchet up the pressure. And House Republicans have started to attack the resolution. "A meaningless, nonbinding resolution from Democrats may score a couple political points here at home, but it will not score any points with our troops," said Kevin Smith, a spokesman for House Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio.

But without rules like those in the Senate that enable the minority to impede legislation, the House is a far less hospitable environment for the Republicans. Hoyer said Tuesday that Democrats would not allow any GOP amendments to the resolution criticizing the White House Iraq plan.

Senate GOP Tries To Shift Message (RC)

By John Stanton And Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, February 7, 2007

Senate Republican leaders struggled Tuesday to shift their focus away from complaints about parliamentary procedure and onto which party is best supporting the troops as Republicans and Democrats continued their high-stakes game of political chicken over the Iraq War.

DOJ_NMG_0128709

Following their successful filibuster Monday of a resolution opposing President Bush's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq, Republicans found themselves on the losing end of the public relations fight as they woke up to headlines across the country pinning the blame squarely on them.

"It doesn't matter what's going on the floor. It's all about media," one senior GOP aide said Tuesday, warning that the focus on complaints about how Democrats are conducting the debate mandated by Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) and Minority Whip Trent Lott (R-Miss.) put the GOP on treacherous ground. "We really need to get away from this process stuff," this aide complained, warning that McConnell and Lott could begin to suffer significant defections by rank-and-file members.

Privately, Republican leadership sources acknowledged they failed to effectively spin the Iraq debate and suffered at the hands of this week's headlines. GOP Senators were scrambling Monday night into Tuesday to troubleshoot their message, which many feared had become mired in procedural detail and esoteric arguments over fairness.

"It wasn't good," acknowledged one Republican Senate staffer.

On Tuesday, several leading GOP Senators were trying to refocus the message to one of supporting the troops. They also argued that the flurry of nonbinding resolutions sends confusing messages to the enemy and to the troops in harm's way.

The Senate Republican Conference circulated talking points at their regular Tuesday policy luncheon asking GOP Senators to argue that the Senate should vote on Sen. Judd Gregg's (R-N.H.) resolution expressing support for troops and avoid complaints about process.

"We can win if we focus on Gregg," one GOP source said, arguing that the tried-and-true tactic of using patriotism against Democrats could splinter Majority Leader Harry Reid's (Nev.) Democratic Caucus.

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), the GOP Conference vice chairman, said despite a day of bad press, Republicans are not going "to get excited about headlines and a handful of papers that got it wrong." Cornyn argued that Republicans want to debate the troop surge, and will continue to debate it even as Reid and McConnell engage in a stare-down over how to proceed.

"[Democrats] may enjoy today's headlines and a handful of papers that got it wrong, but they're not going to be able to enjoy that forever," Cornyn said.

Despite those warnings, many Republicans appeared to have difficulty avoiding the process complaints — including McConnell himself. For instance, he and Reid engaged in a lengthy back-and-forth on the chamber floor Tuesday afternoon in which McConnell repeatedly complained that Reid was attempting to dictate to Republicans what resolution they were allowed to bring up even after he had narrowed the Republican list of demands from five to ultimately one — Gregg's troop-support resolution.

Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) also slipped back into arguments over process. While speaking with reporters following the GOP's closed-door luncheon, Stevens argued Republicans are "trying to protect the rights of the minority" and lashed out at Democrats for limiting the number of amendments or proposals Republicans can bring. "The amount of amendments we're going to have is really the issue here," he said.

House Democrats Eye Iraq Resolution (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, February 7, 2007

House Democrats next week will take up the resolution condemning President Bush's plan to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq, House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer said yesterday, while the Senate continues negotiations over handling the nonbinding rebuke.

"The reason we're going ahead is not because we don't think the Senate will ever act, but we're not sure when the Senate is going to act," the Maryland Democrat told reporters yesterday.

"I think the resolution will clearly say we do not believe that the president's proposal of an escalation of 21,000 troops is the proper policy to be pursuing," Mr. Hoyer said, adding that the House resolution will also be nonbinding.

House Democrats initially said they would wait until the Senate approved such a measure, but Republicans in the upper chamber managed to block it this week. They have accused Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, of trying to limit the scope of the debate by not allowing two other resolutions expressing support for the war effort to be voted on in a similar fashion.

DOJ_NMG_0128710

After the Senate resolution was blocked on a procedural motion Monday evening, Mr. Reid said he expects the resolution will come up again but did not elaborate.

In a letter to supporters yesterday, the Nevada Democrat accused Republicans of dodging a debate on Iraq.

"There are very few men and women in America who believe the Iraq war is not worthy of debate," he wrote. "They are the Republican members of the United States Senate. Yesterday, they did our country a grave disservice."

Republican leader Sen. Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, has said he won't allow a vote on the resolution of no confidence unless a similar vote is allowed on two other resolutions.

One would endorse the "surge" plan but set benchmarks for Iraqi self-governance. A third resolution would promise not to cut funding for the war.

Late yesterday, Mr. McConnell offered to allow the resolution to go forward in exchange for a vote on the "no funding cutoff" resolution only. Mr. Reid declined. Republicans say they want Democrats on the record either favoring or opposing cuts in funding, which many Democratic voters are demanding. But Mr. Reid does not appear likely to allow such a vote to occur.

Rather, he wants a vote on the resolution of condemnation and said last month that he expects it to be painful for Republicans who face re-election in 2008.

"I'll tell you one thing: There are 21 Republicans up for re-election this time," he told reporters on Jan. 26. "If they think this is going to be a soft vote for them, they've got another think coming. They have more than [Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles E.] Schumer to worry about."

Mr. Hoyer, meanwhile, said the resolution will be similarly limited in scope when it arrives on the floor next week.

"I expect this bill be debated for an extended period of time -- maybe over three days," he said, though amendments will not be allowed.

Also yesterday, Sen. John Kerry told reporters he is introducing legislation that would set a firm deadline for the withdrawal of most U.S. troops from Iraq.

The Massachusetts Democrat hopes to kick-start a major diplomatic initiative, enforcing a series of benchmarks for meeting key political objectives, shifting the military mission to training Iraqi security forces and counterterrorism operations, and maintaining an "over-the-horizon" presence to protect U.S. regional interests.

"The only people who believe there is a workable military solution for the conflict in Iraq is the Bush administration," Mr. Kerry said. "We must find a way to force the Iraqi politicians to make the tough compromises necessary to find a sustainable political solution."

House Now The Focus Of Iraq Debate (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON — The intense political maneuvering over how to signal congressional opposition to President Bush's war policy moved Tuesday to the House of Representatives, where Democratic leaders scheduled three days of debate for next week.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., declared "negotiations are over" in the Senate, where Republicans and Democrats failed on Monday to agree on the ground rules for debating competing resolutions on Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq.

Instead, House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md., said the House will spend three days next week debating a resolution expressing "disagreement" with the president's plans. "We do not believe the president's proposal is proper policy," Hoyer said.

The House's action will guarantee that the president's Iraq policy will remain at the top of the national agenda next week, even if procedural disputes prevent the Senate from voting on its own resolution.

It also moves the Iraq debate into a chamber where House rules give the Democrats, as the majority party, control of the agenda. In the Senate, a handful of members can bring activity to a halt.

DOJ_NMG_0128711

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., reiterated that he would permit a vote on the measure opposing Bush's plan if Democrats set a 60-vote threshold for passage and also agree to a vote on a separate resolution, authored by Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., that says no funds will be cut for troops in the field. Reid balked because Gregg's resolution could pass overwhelmingly, but the measure opposing Bush could fall short of 60 votes.

"This is a trick play to distract attention from the real issue before the American people," Reid said.

McConnell, meanwhile, blamed Democrats for the impasse: "The only reason negotiations broke down is that they don't want to vote on the Gregg amendment."

The political implications of the Senate stalemate were evident Tuesday.

MoveOn.org, a well-funded liberal group, said it will run ads today through Friday nationally on CNN and locally in four target states: Kansas, New Hampshire, Oregon and Virginia. Republican senators in all of those states all have publicly expressed misgivings about the president's proposed troop increase but sided with McConnell in blocking a vote on the resolution of disapproval.

Although the Democrats will be able to continue the Iraq debate on their own terms in the House, some of the political impact may be lessened, said Norman Ornstein, a congressional scholar at the American Enterprise Institute.

Democratic leaders had hoped for a victory first in the Senate because the resolution being debated there was co-authored by Republican Sen. John Warner, a former Senate Armed Services Committee chairman and former secretary of the Navy.

The House will likely pass a resolution disapproving of the Bush policy with some Republican votes, Ornstein predicted, but he added: "I'm not sure it's the same things in symbolic terms as having the Senate adopt something with the name John Warner on it. Warner is an iconic figure because he has been a supporter of the president."

Hoyer said he hopes the House resolution will have bipartisan sponsorship, as the Senate measure did, when it comes to the floor Tuesday.

The three-day debate is unusual for the House, which generally can complete a bill in a day. The Democrats set the time frame to mirror the October 2002 deliberations that led to a vote to authorize the war, said House Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill.

Many Voices, No Debate, As Senate Is Stifled On War (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6 — At a time when even President Bush acknowledges that the war in Iraq is sapping the nation's spirit, the Senate has tied itself up in procedural knots rather than engage in a debate on Iraq policy.

Given the influence that voter frustration with Iraq had on the November elections, the national unease with the mounting human and financial costs, and the raw passion on all sides, even some lawmakers say they are astounded that the buildup to the Senate fight over Mr. Bush's proposed troop increase has produced such a letdown.

"It just floors me," said Senator Amy Klobuchar, a freshman Democrat from Minnesota who campaigned against the war, as the two parties pointed fingers on Tuesday. The day before, the Senate proved unable to agree on a plan to even begin debate on a bipartisan resolution opposing the administration strategy. "People in Minnesota, when they see a debate we should be having — whatever side they are on — blocked by partisan politics, they don't like it," Ms. Klobuchar said.

The fact that that Democrats could pull together only 49 of the 60 votes needed to break a procedural impasse on the resolution opposing Mr. Bush's plan was a product of many competing agendas.

There was the Democratic desire to avoid getting tied up on any vote that could be perceived as undercutting United States troops or endorsing Mr. Bush's plan. At the same time, a surprising number of Republicans showed they were not yet ready to abandon the president even though many blame him for their November election losses and worry he will hurt them again next year. Then there were the presidential ambitions of several senators who are trying to distinguish themselves from others on the issue, and have little incentive to seek common ground.

By the end of the day on Tuesday, Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the majority leader, said he saw little prospect that Democrats and Republicans could reach agreement on a plan to bring the resolution to the floor. "The negotiations are over," said Mr. Reid, who dismissed Republican efforts to force a separate vote on the war money as a ploy intended to distract the public from the matter of whether senators supported or opposed the president's policy.

DOJ_NMG_0128712

Republicans spent the day trying to counter the idea that they had been obstructionists in impeding the debate. It was a label they had successfully hung on Democrats for years, and they did not appreciate the role reversal. They said their main goal had been to ensure that the Senate could guarantee in a separate resolution that Congress would not endanger forces in the field by restricting spending in the future.

"I can't believe that any parent, any husband, wife, son, daughter of any soldier serving in Iraq doesn't expect the Congress to take that position," said Senator Mitch McConnell, Republican of Kentucky, who had made some retooled overtures to Democrats to try to break the deadlock.

But the lingering impasse forced the hand of House Democrats, who had become increasingly impatient waiting for the Senate to weigh in on the president's troop plan. Unwilling to wait any longer, the Democratic leadership said it would set aside three days next week to deliver its own verdict on the administration strategy.

"The reason we're going ahead is not because we don't think the Senate will ever act," said Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the majority leader, "but we're not sure when the Senate is going to act."

Democrats contend that they foisted off most of the blame for the breakdown on Republicans and were more than happy to have the fight end for now, leaving the opposition trying to explain the complex Senate rules and why Republicans had not been willing to go ahead.

"We have the high ground here," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "We have the high ground substantively. We have the high ground politically. We're not going to give it up."

But some Republicans suggested that the public might grow frustrated with such political crowing. "I think most Americans view this as political theater, that it is more about us than supporting the troops," said Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina.

The Senate fight also exposed a weakness for the Democrats, one that will become more pronounced as the Senate moves from its inability to take up a nonbinding resolution making a statement about administration policy to more consequential votes on war spending.

Republicans had laid a bit of a trap for Democrats, seeking a 60-vote threshold for competing resolutions on the war. They knew that the bipartisan plan by Senators John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia, and Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan, did not have 60 votes. But the plan calling for no reductions in spending, written by Senator Judd Gregg, Republican of New Hampshire, was likely to get at least 60, meaning the only resolution that would have passed would have been one that essentially backed the president.

Most Democrats are not ready to begin the politically charged discussion of restricting war spending. "There isn't a Democrat here that wants to take monies away from the troops," Mr. Reid said.

Democrats said Republicans were simply trying to dodge the chief question at hand and if it was not the financing proposal, they would have found something else to muck up the proceedings. And there is little doubt that some Republicans are determined to save the president an embarrassing loss while others are just as determined to deny the Democrats a symbolic win.

Still, there was some evidence that the debate was moving beyond the bottled-up resolution. Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, a prospective Democratic presidential candidate, renewed his call to begin redeploying troops in May with a complete withdrawal of combat brigades by March 2008. Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts proposed a plan to set a one-year deadline to redeploy American forces from Iraq. And pressure from outside advocacy groups intensified on Democrats to take concrete steps such as capping troop levels or blocking funds for new troops.

Ultimately, one senator said, lawmakers may discover that the rules of engagement for debating Iraq are not fully within their control.

"The reality in Iraq sets it own time limits, sets its own dimensions," said Senator Jack Reed, Democrat of Rhode Island. "If it continues to be chaotic, it will accelerate calls for this vote, and calls for even more."

DOJ_NMG_0128713

Vote Is Sought On Iraq Funding (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Anticipating fights over Iraq spending next month, Senate Republicans are pressing for an early vote now to get members on record against withholding funds for the war.

The strategy, which has the quiet backing of the White House, has evolved over a nonbinding resolution sponsored by Sen. Judd Gregg (R., N.H.) to express opposition to Congress taking any action that might endanger U.S. forces, including the "reduction of funds for troops in the field."

Mr. Gregg said the administration had no part in drafting his resolution but acknowledged it has "taken on a life of its own" and he wasn't surprised the White House saw it as useful in protecting President Bush's $93.4 billion emergency supplemental for the war, which could become a target for the many congressional critics of his Iraq policies.

The stakes were heightened when Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R., Ky.) announced Republicans will insist on a vote on the Gregg resolution before permitting Senate action on a bipartisan resolution challenging Mr. Bush's plans to increase U.S. troop levels by 21,500 over the coming months.

In doing so, Mr. McConnell effectively abandoned an alternative backed by Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.) that was until recently being hailed as a rallying point for Republicans allied with Mr. Bush. Now the party leadership has put its full weight behind Mr. Gregg and appears to be preparing for the next round in the Iraq fight: the $93.4 billion emergency supplemental.

"It's squeezing our Constitutional authority, saying that 'OK, if you're for Gregg, you've just said you're not going to cut back on any resources,' " complained Senate Majority Whip Richard Durbin (D., Ill.). "They don't want an up-and-down vote on escalation. They lose. They have to change the subject."

In skipping ahead to the spending bill, Democrats say Republicans are stifling debate on an Iraq resolution crafted by former Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner (R., Va.). If a vote were to be permitted, Mr. Gregg agreed it would command a majority of the Senate -- a setback for the White House.

The New Hampshire conservative predicted his resolution would receive perhaps 75 votes and aggravate divisions among Democrats. "The activist base of the Democratic Party is so over the top," Mr. Gregg said, that members don't want to be in a position where some would have to cast a vote that their base would be extremely upset with.

Majority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.) dismissed the Gregg proposal as a diversion from the real substance of the debate over troop levels. Until agreement is reached over how to proceed, Senate action on Iraq is stalled, and against this backdrop, the House Democratic leadership said it would bring up its own resolution for a floor vote next week challenging the president's policies.

There too, the political dynamics are focused increasingly on the supplemental spending bill. The House Appropriations Committee is slated to begin consideration March 7, and Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.), who will manage the bill, said again that he will recommend adding restrictions on the funding itself.

MoveOn Already Attacking Senators Blocking Debate On Surge (POL)

By Ryan Grim

The Politico, February 7, 2007

MoveOn.org will begin airing attack ads as early as Wednesday against eight Republican senators who blocked debate on the Bush administration's plan for a troop surge in Iraq.

The liberal organization has already scripted and is now producing the ads to run on CNN. As of Tuesday afternoon, airtime also had been purchased on local television stations in Kansas, New Hampshire, Oregon and Virginia.

The ads specifically target those states' senators: Sam Brownback, John Sununu, Gordon Smith, and John Warner, respectively. Sununu, Smith and Warner face re-election in 2008; Brownback, a presidential candidate, is up again in 2010.

The ads also take aim at Sens. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, John Voinovich of Ohio, Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina and Mitch McConnell of Kentucky. Dole and McConnell both face 2008 challenges.

DOJ_NMG_0128714

An ad campaign for a Senate race nearly two years away—when many incumbents don't yet have opponents—would have been unthinkable just years ago. But the extreme interest in '08 and advanced technology have combined to shorten political time frames.

Tom Matzzie, MoveOn.org's Washington director, said a fundraising e-mail went out Tuesday morning and had raised more than $150,000 for the ad campaign by the afternoon. "It went from conceptive to creation in less than 24 hours," he said.

Join The Conversation

You need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

by bigben on 02.06.2007 at 06:34 PM

Force the Republicans to physically filibuster. When was the last time we saw that happen? Shut down the Senate for a few days and let the Republicans talk themselves silly on C-SPAN in FAVOR of the surge plan. The American people would give them the message in quite short order, I assure you.

Before you start composing please note that you will need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

It's The War, Senators (NYT)

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

It is not an inspiring sight to watch the United States Senate turn the most important issue facing America into a political football, and then fumble it. Yet that is what now seems to have come from a once-promising bipartisan effort to finally have the debate about the Iraq war that Americans have been denied for four years.

The Democrats' ultimate goal was to express the Senate's opposition to President Bush's latest escalation. But the Democrats' leaders have made that more difficult — allowing the Republicans to maneuver them into the embarrassing position of blocking a vote on a counterproposal that they feared too many Democrats might vote for.

We oppose that resolution, which is essentially a promise never to cut off funds for this or any future military operation Mr. Bush might undertake in Iraq. But the right way for the Senate to debate Iraq is to debate Iraq, not to bar proposals from the floor because they might be passed. The majority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, needs to call a timeout and regroup. By changing the issue from Iraq to partisan parliamentary tactics, his leadership team threatens to muddy the message of any anti-escalation resolution the Senate may eventually pass.

As it happens, the blocked Republican alternative, proposed by Judd Gregg of New Hampshire, itself represents an end run around the Senate's constitutional responsibilities. The rational way to oppose cuts in funds is to vote against them, if and when any ever come before the Senate. Mr. Reid should not be shy about urging fellow Democrats to vote against this hollow gimmick, which tries to make it look as if the senators support Mr. Bush's failed Iraq policies by playing on their fears of being accused of not supporting the troops.

America went to war without nearly enough public discussion, and it needs more Senate debate about Iraq this time around, not less. The voters who overturned Republican majorities in both houses last November expect, among other things, to see energized Congressional scrutiny of the entire war — not just of the plan for an additional 21,500 troops but also of the future of the 130,000 plus who are already there.

Another Republican resolution, proposed by Sen. John McCain, gives the appearance of moving in that more promising direction by ticking off a series of policy benchmarks and then urging the Iraqi government to meet them. But listing benchmarks is one thing. It is another to spell out real consequences for not meeting them, like the withdrawal of American military support. Instead of doing that, the McCain resolution hands an unwarranted blank check to Mr. Bush's new Iraq commander, Lt. Gen. David Petraeus. It breathtakingly declares that he "should receive from Congress the full support necessary" to carry out America's mission.

Frustrated by the Senate's fumbles, the House plans to move ahead next week with its own resolution on Mr. Bush's troop plan. When the Senate is ready to turn its attention back to substance again, it should go further.

DOJ_NMG_0128715

Senators need to acknowledge the reality of four years of failed presidential leadership on Iraq and enact a set of binding benchmarks. These should require the hard steps toward national reconciliation that the Iraqi prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki continues to evade and that the White House refuses to insist on.

Senate Dems To Try Again On The 'surge' (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, February 7, 2007

As Senate Democrats seek votes on capping troop numbers and funding for Iraq, they may use the pending bill on the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission as a vehicle. That would set up a replay of the debate over funding for troops that this week derailed their leadership-backed non-binding resolution on President Bush's "surge" proposal.

Despite the minority's decision to block the start of an Iraq debate, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has vowed to put Republicans on record on the "surge" plan, which has opened GOP fissures over President Bush's unpopular war policy. But any up-or-down vote on the binding restraints backed by the Democrats' more vocal war critics would expose equally potent tensions in their own caucus.

Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) said yesterday that the 9/11 Commission bill, slated for floor debate after the continuing resolution that is next up for the Senate, is a "good opportunity" to bring up his proposal for a binding funding cutoff for future deployments to Iraq.

Feingold said he and Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.), the only other Democrat who indicated he would oppose the Reid-backed non-binding resolution, are amassing consensus among anti-war lawmakers: "We're working very closely together with a number of senators who think we are not going far enough."

Reid told colleagues on the floor after Monday evening's failed cloture vote that the 9/11 bill, which House Democratic leaders trumpeted in their "100 Hours" agenda, will be open to war-related amendments. Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.), who unveiled his own binding troop proposal yesterday, said yesterday that the 9/11 Commission bill is his preference.

"It's very possible" that binding limits on the war could hitch a ride on the new aviation and port security funding in the 9/11 measure, according to Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), chief sponsor of a troop-ceiling bill that currently sits on the Senate calendar.

"The leader has said we can amend the 9/11 bill," Sen. Jim Webb (D-Va.) said. "I have one [related to Iraq] I'm thinking about."

If the Senate indeed takes up the continuing resolution before it must pass by Feb. 15, Democratic backers of binding limits could see their moment come just after this month's recess. Reid has hinted he will file for cloture on the continuing resolution as soon as today. Meanwhile, the House is looking to finish its debate on a non-binding disapproval of the troop increase even before the recess, Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said yesterday.

Debating binding troop caps and funding limits, however, could play into the hands of Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) and his conference. Republicans continued yesterday to pursue an alternative amendment from Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.). It is aimed at redefining the Iraq debate as whether to fund an ongoing troop presence rather than whether senators support Bush's handling of the war.

"If one of these resolutions actually passed that say [troops should] withdraw by March 31, [2008], do you know what it would take?" asked Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (Texas), Republican Policy Committee chairwoman. "A surge … to protect them as they withdrew."

That March 2008 date has been proposed by Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), whose own troop-redeployment bill picked up a House counterpart yesterday. Rep. Mike Thompson (D-Calif.), a Vietnam veteran, and freshman Rep. Patrick Murphy (D-Pa.), a veteran of the current Iraq war, introduced the companion measure.

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), Vice Chairman of the GOP Conference, wondered why Democrats would resist Republicans' desire to debate war funding this week when similar calls could come from within the majority's ranks during the 9/11 Commission debate.

"The question is, why has [Reid] denied us the opportunity to have that vote now?" Cornyn said. "It's certainly inconsistent."

DOJ_NMG_0128716

Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine), an original sponsor of a non-binding resolution with stronger language than the measure Reid ultimately backed, voted with her leadership against starting debate, out of what she described as a desire for open amendments from both sides of the aisle.

Snowe acknowledged that the Democrats' non-binding approach was intended to win over influential GOP centrists like herself but said attempting to limit amendments "taints the whole approach."

Sen. Robert Menendez (D-N.J.), a supporter of Kennedy's troop-cap proposal, said he is unconcerned about any possible risk to his state in delaying the 9/11 Commission bill by linking it to the Iraq debate.

"Iraq is overarching over all of our issues," Menendez said. "So, the 9/11 bill, [much] of which has expenditures attached, is being undermined by Iraq."

Asked whether Democrats would open themselves to Republican criticism by choosing the popular 9/11 Commission bill as a forum to rein in the war, Feingold echoed Menendez's assessment.

"They can try, but the fact is, Iraq is sapping our national security, so the two are linked," he said.

Meanwhile, MoveOn.org will begin airing new TV spots today in the states of eight senators who voted against opening debate on the non-binding Iraq resolution in a bid to amplify voters' frustration. Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) is not a target of the latest anti-surge ad push, having voted with Democrats late Monday, but he said such efforts have little effect on his vote.

"MoveOn.org can put 1,000 things in front of me," Coleman said. "That's not going to move me."

Cloture Vote Does Not Split Warner Group (HILL)

By Klaus Marre

The Hill, February 7, 2007

The three senators who crafted the key resolution rejecting President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq said yesterday they are united despite having gone separate ways on a procedural vote Monday evening.

Sens. John Warner (R-Va.), Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) and Susan Collins (R-Maine) all said they were still united, even though Warner in effect supported a filibuster of the resolution they crafted together. Collins was one of two Republicans who voted with the Democrats on the issue.

Nelson said yesterday he and Warner had spoken about the vote before it happened. "Sen. Collins took a different view and of course I took a different view," Nelson said, adding that despite the split on the procedural vote, the entire group is still behind the resolution.

Collins emphatically stated that the group was "absolutely" still in accordance on the resolution, and Warner concurred.

Nelson noted that support for the resolution in Congress remains strong, despite the lack of GOP support to cut off debate. Democrats won the vote 49-47 but did not muster even close to the 60 votes necessary to end debate.

Yet the Nebraska lawmaker acknowledged that Monday's vote "didn't help" with regard to fostering bipartisanship on the issue.

Nelson sad he remains hopeful that Senate leaders will find a solution to allow a vote on the resolution, as well as GOP alternatives. He said it was too early to tell what other vehicles the language could be attached to if no agreement can be reached.

Yes, We Can Find The Exit (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

MOSCOW

Listening, from Moscow, to the debate in Congress about Iraq is troubling: it sounds as if the American people are being offered two routes to a dead end: either follow President Bush and have troops surging into a roiling civil war, or go with one of the Congressional resolutions and denounce the surge, but without any alternative strategy for securing U.S. interests.

I believe there is an alternative strategy, but it will take two concrete numbers to implement: a date — Dec. 1 — and a price — $3.50 cents a gallon. Let me explain.

DOJ_NMG_0128717

What is the U.S. interest in Iraq right now? It's to quell the civil war enough so the parties may eventually reach a negotiated settlement, and if that proves impossible, to get America out of Iraq with the least damage to our interests.

We will not quell this civil war with a surge of troops alone. The only thing that will do that is a power-sharing, oil-revenue-sharing deal between the parties. The only way we will get serious negotiations going is with leverage that America does not now have: leverage on the parties inside and outside Iraq. Negotiating in the Middle East without leverage is futile. These folks know how to calculate the balance of power down to the last ounce.

So how do we get leverage? The first way to do that is by setting a firm date to leave — Dec. 1. All U.S. military forces are either going to be home for Christmas 2007 or redeployed along the borders of Iraq, away from the civil war.

Right now everyone in Iraq is having their cake and eating it — at our expense. We have to change that.

The Sunnis, who started this whole murderous cycle, participate in the government, negotiate with us and also indulge the suicide bombers and the insurgents. The Shiites collaborate with us, run their own retaliatory death squads and dabble with Iran. The Saudis tell us we can't leave, but their mosques and charities funnel Sunni suicide bombers to Iraq and dollars to insurgents. Iran pushes its Iraqi Shiite allies to grab more power, while helping others kill U.S. troops. Ditto Syria.

O.K., boys, party's over: we're leaving by Dec. 1. From now on, everyone pays retail for their politics. We will no longer play host to a war where we're everyone's protector and target. If you Sunnis want to go on resisting, we'll leave you to the tender mercies of the Shiites, who vastly outnumber you. You Shiites, if you want to run Iraq without compromising with Sunnis, fine, but you'll have to fight them alone and then risk having to live under the thumb of Iran.

You Saudis and other Arabs, if you don't use your influence to delegitimize Sunni suicide bombers and press Iraq's Sunnis to cut a deal, we won't protect you from the consequences. And Iran, you win — yes, if we leave, you win the right to try to manage Iraq's Shiites. Have a nice day.

But at the same time, we have to impose a tax that creates a floor price of $3.50 a gallon for gasoline — forever. This is also about leverage. It says to all the parties: we are going to conserve enough gasoline and spur enough clean alternatives to fossil fuels that no matter what you all do in the Middle East, we will not depend on you for energy.

Today in Iraq, none of the key parties have to make any choices, and we don't have any choices. That is the definition of "stuck." Right now we can win only if all the parties in and around Iraq act in the most farsighted and flexible manner. Otherwise we lose in our attempt to democratize Iraq, and we're left holding the bag. We need to be in a win-win situation that we control.

"I don't think at this stage that the promise of 20,000 more troops will change any minds in Iraq," said Michael Mandelbaum, author of "The Case for Goliath." "But the threat of a lot fewer U.S. troops might conceivably get everyone focused. Right now, the U.S. is the passenger in a car that other countries are driving — and it's not going in the right direction. We have to change that dynamic."

Indeed we do. Once we've set a date to leave by and a gas price to live by, we, for the first time, will have choices in Iraq. We can stay to broker a deal if the parties want to be guided by their better angels or, if they want tribal instincts to reign, we can leave by Dec. 1 and insulate ourselves from Islam's civil war with a new energy policy.

To put it another way, if setting a date to leave miraculously brings them to their senses, our aspirations for the Iraqis will have been achieved, and we'll be stronger. And if it doesn't, but we have set an exit date and a gas price, we'll be out of Iraq and more energy-secure — and we'll also be stronger.

Expect The Worst In Iraq (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Somehow, after four years, the debate on Iraq is still animated by wishful thinking. The White House talks as if a surge of 20,000 troops is going to stop a civil war. Democrats argue that when America withdraws its troops, Iraqis will finally take responsibility for their own security. But we all need to face the likelihood that this story isn't going to have a happy ending.

That was the underlying message of the National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq, released last week. It warned the administration that if the sectarian conflict continues, as it almost certainly will, "we assess that the overall security situation will continue to deteriorate." The current conflict isn't just a civil war, the analysts noted; it's worse -- with criminal gangs, al-Qaeda terrorists and Shiite internal feuding adding to the anarchic state of the country.

DOJ_NMG_0128718

And for critics of the war who favor a quick American withdrawal, the analysts had this stark warning: "If Coalition forces were withdrawn rapidly during [the next 12 to 18 months] . . . we judge that this almost certainly would lead to a significant increase in the scale and scope of sectarian conflict in Iraq." With U.S. troops gone, the analysts forecast, the Iraqi army would collapse and al-Qaeda attacks inside and outside Iraq would surge. "Massive civilian casualties and forced population displacement would be probable."

In this bleak situation -- where, as everyone keeps repeating, "there are no good options" -- what's the right course for U.S. policy? A useful approach may be to start planning, not for the best but for the worst. Congress and the administration should begin thinking about potential catastrophes in Iraq -- and about how to protect the core national interests of the United States and its allies.

In thinking about catastrophic outcomes, I have been guided by a paper that was privately circulated last week by Robert Jervis, a professor of political science at Columbia University. He begins with this assessment: "The U.S. will withdraw its troops from Iraq at some point, and when it does, if not earlier, the situation is likely to deteriorate badly. This could be a truly dreadful time -- it could be a tsunami sweeping over the entire region."

So how to protect vital American interests amid this tsunami of violence? I would offer several basic precepts, drawn from conversations with experts in and out of government:

Â· Contain the sectarian violence. The United States can't stop the Iraqi civil war between Sunnis and Shiites, but it can try to keep this conflict within Iraq's borders. Here lies the great danger of the new strategy of "realignment" that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice outlined in an interview with me last month. In seeking to rally Sunni Arab moderates to combat Iran and its proxies, the United States risks expanding the Sunni-Shiite fault line from Iraq to the region as a whole.

This is a dangerous course. The risks were summed up by Amr Moussa, the head of the Arab League. The war in Iraq "opened the gates of Hell," he told me, and if the conflict expands to Iranian-backed Shiites and Sunni Arabs, "we will enter Hell itself." America should not encourage this descent into the inferno.

Â· Protect the oil. The United States should be planning with its allies how to secure the region's oil supplies. We have done it before: Persian Gulf oil exports continued through eight bloody years of the Iran-Iraq war, thanks in part to U.S. naval escorts and reflagging of tankers. America should help prepare a similar international effort now, including new pipelines that avoid the Gulf altogether.

Â· Shield the Iraqi population. America hasn't been able to stop the civil war, but U.S. troops can reduce the slaughter and help provide humanitarian relief for what's likely to be a growing tide of refugees fleeing the battle zones.

Â· Talk with the neighbors. Facing the prospect of a catastrophic outcome in Iraq, the United States must engage in dialogue with all the regional states, including Syria and Iran. America shouldn't initially offer any deals, much less "grand bargains," but it should talk about mutual security interests and explore where they converge.

Â· Push for Arab-Israeli peace. The one thing everyone in the region seems to agree on -- from Israel to Saudi Arabia -- is the need for a Palestinian state. The Palestinians themselves can't offer Israel a meaningful peace agreement now -- they're too weak, angry and disorganized. But the Arabs, led by Saudi King Abdullah, can. That's the breakthrough Rice should pursue.

These crisis management steps won't stop the catastrophe that is unfolding in Iraq, but they could mitigate its effects, which may be all we can hope for. And the benefit of worst-case thinking is that things occasionally work out better than expected.

House On Deck In Iraq Debate (RC)

By Susan Davis And Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, February 7, 2007

With their Senate counterparts unable to move a resolution through the chamber disapproving of President Bush's Iraq War strategy, House Democrats will push ahead with a measure of their own next week designed to put Members on record before they return to their districts for the Presidents Day recess.

DOJ_NMG_0128719

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) told reporters Tuesday that he expected up to three days of debate on the resolution, whose language is being crafted by House Foreign Affairs Chairman Tom Lantos (D-Calif.) and Armed Services Chairman Ike Skelton (D-Mo.).

The House Democratic Caucus also is scheduled to hold a closed-door meeting Thursday to build consensus for the resolution vote next week and to assuage some Members' concerns that the resolution does not go far enough.

Hoyer said that resolution will express "disagreement" or "reservation" on Bush's plan to escalate the U.S. military presence in Iraq by 21,500 troops, and House Democratic leadership aides said Tuesday that the chamber's resolution is expected to largely mirror the language in the Senate resolution authored by Sen. John Warner (R-Va.).

Like Warner's, the House resolution also will be nonbinding, and Hoyer said it will come to the floor under a closed rule to limit amendments, arguing that an open rule would prompt too many amendments and unnecessarily extend the debate.

It is unlikely the resolution will go through the regular committee process at Foreign Affairs or Armed Services. Hoyer said next week's time-crunch could make Democratic leaders opt to bypass committee to get the resolution on the floor Tuesday; however, he noted that the president's proposal has already been subject to "extensive" hearings.

"We believe it's important for us to make our views known prior to leaving for the Presidents Day break," Hoyer said.

While GOP leaders have already voiced objection to the process under which the resolution will come to the floor, a number of Republicans are expected to vote for the resolution. "I hope so and expect so," Hoyer said Tuesday.

House Minority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) and Republican Conference Chairman Adam Putnam (Fla.) objected to Democrats' decision to bring the resolution to the floor under a closed rule that forbids amendments.

"If you're not going to really bring all of the ideas out there, the debate is only to score political points," said Blunt.

Putnam went further, stating that when Republicans brought an Iraq War resolution to the House floor in November 2005 regarding troop withdrawal under a similarly restrictive rule, they were wrong and did so for political gain.

"You know what? [Democrats] were right," Putnam said, "It was a game, and we got beat. I mean, did we learn anything from that? It was a resolution that didn't go through committee and it should have, and it would have been a better resolution if it had."

In recent weeks, knowledgeable House GOP sources said they could foresee at least 30 Members voting for the resolution, and possibly significantly more depending on the specific language of the measure. If the resolution does in fact largely resemble Warner's proposal, one House Republican said they could lose up to 50 Members, particularly from the moderate faction of the Conference. House GOP and Democratic leaders have both said they will not whip the vote, allowing Members to vote freely.

Hoyer said he expected Republicans to be allowed to offer an alternative, and one Democratic leadership aide said the GOP likely would be allowed to offer a substitute on the floor.

House Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) has sponsored a leadership-backed resolution to create a bipartisan panel to conduct oversight on the war and set benchmarks for success in Iraq. Rep. Sam Johnson (R-Texas) also has sponsored a bill backed by leadership that would prohibit the House from cutting off funds to troops in the field.

Republicans are waiting to see the specifics of the Democratic resolution before they counter with their substitute.

Originally, House and Senate Democrats sought to have the Senate pass a resolution first before sending the identical language over to the House because any language that could garner majority support in the other chamber would have to be bipartisan, and the intention was to pass the bill with as many votes as possible in the House.

However, Senate parliamentary tactics prevented an up-or-down vote on the resolution Monday when Democrats failed to get the 60 votes necessary to end debate and move to the underlying bill. While Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has vowed to eventually get a vote on the Senate floor, the timetable is uncertain.

"The reason we're going ahead is not because we don't think the Senate will ever act," Hoyer said Tuesday. "But we're not sure when the Senate is going to act."

House Democrats are expected to vote overwhelmingly for the resolution. Democratic aides said that while the resolution is intended to get bipartisan support, some of their rank-and-file Members on the left who advocate more extreme policies, such as immediate troop withdrawal, could oppose the resolution because it does not go far enough.

DOJ_NMG_0128720

However, Rep. Jan Schakowsky (D-Ill.), one of the approximately 70 Members in the Out of Iraq Caucus in the House, said that she expected Democrats to be able to reach near unanimity on the resolution. “I think it will be easier to get consensus on this,” she said, noting that the resolution is just the first step in a longer term strategy. “Speaker [Nancy] Pelosi (D-Calif.) has made it very clear that our goal is to end this war.”

Democrats who advocate troop withdrawal and a dramatic de-escalation of troops are more likely to make their stand in the near future as the House takes up Bush’s war supplemental and the fiscal 2008 budget.

“I think we have to divide the questions,” Schakowsky said. “How do you define supporting the troops in terms of how we spend the money?”

Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio), one of the war’s most vocal opponents, declined to say how he would vote on the resolution before the language is made public, but he said that even Members who do not believe it goes far enough would be hard-pressed to vote against it because it would appear as though they were voting with Bush.

Kucinich added that the funding is the bigger issue. “The war is binding, the resolution is not,” he said, “We’ve got to get out of there, Congress must cut off the funds.”

Senate Leaders Continue Squabbling Over Iraq (WP)

By Shailagh Murray And Paul Kane

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Senate leaders squabbled yesterday over how to consider resolutions opposing President Bush's plan for more troops in Iraq, but the quarrel did not stop lawmakers from launching an informal debate on the chamber floor over the war.

"The only people who believe there is a workable military solution for the conflict in Iraq is the Bush administration," said Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), who advocates requiring Bush to complete the removal of American troops from Iraq within a year.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) called Democrats disingenuous for declaring support for U.S. troops while denouncing their commander in chief's strategy. Troops serving in Iraq "won't buy it," McCain said. "A vote of no confidence is a vote of no confidence."

Senate leaders made little progress yesterday toward agreeing on the terms of votes on a series of nonbinding resolutions, each of which addresses Bush's decision to deploy an additional 21,500 troops.

"This is all a game to divert attention from the fact that we have before us now an issue that the American people want us to address," Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) said on the Senate floor, nodding across the aisle to Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.).

"What we're asking by any standard is reasonable," answered McConnell. "It is not too late to have the debate this week."

Senate Majority Whip Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) disagreed, declaring last night that the Iraq debate was over and that Democrats would move on today to other legislation.

Meanwhile, House Democratic leaders scheduled a war debate to begin next Tuesday, culminating with a vote aimed at repudiating Bush's plan.

House Democrats had intended to work with the resolution offered by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), which Senate Democrats have rallied behind. Instead, after assessing the morass on the other side of the Capitol, they are now considering a more narrow statement of objection to Bush's proposal.

In the three days of debate, Each House member will be given five minutes to state his or her views, Democrats said. That is a considerable amount in the House, where speeches typically run one minute.

"We're going to do what's been missing -- a serious debate on the war," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), a member of the House leadership.

Durbin, saying that the "plug had been pulled" on the nonbinding resolution, urged his Senate colleagues to look ahead to other Iraq-related showdowns as future vehicles for opposing Bush's war proposals.

Reid suggested on the Senate floor last night that the House's nonbinding resolution, assuming it passes, could make its way to the Senate floor.

DOJ_NMG_0128721

Republicans remained reluctant to give up on the current debate. At one point yesterday afternoon, upon being told of Reid's refusal to relent to GOP terms, McConnell indicated that talks would resume in the near future. "Stay tuned," he said.

McConnell offered the day's biggest concession, proposing to shelve a resolution written by McCain that would establish tough benchmarks for the Iraqi government without opposing the additional U.S. troops.

But Republicans continued to demand that the two remaining resolutions -- one written by Warner and Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), and a pro-Bush proposal from Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) -- meet a 60-vote threshold to pass.

Republicans are advocating the Gregg resolution because they know, as do Democrats, that only it could garner 60 votes. Gregg's proposal would recognize the power of the president to deploy troops as well as the "responsibility" of Congress to fund them.

Democrats regard the measure as a political stunt but are loath to go on the record opposing it, for fear of giving the impression that they would harm troops in the field. They also recognize that a vote in favor of Gregg would amount to a taci t endorsement of Bush's troop plan.

"I find it almost incomprehensible that the Democratic leader doesn't want a vote on this language. It is not radical language. It is fairly reasonable language," Gregg insisted to reporters yesterday afternoon.

Speaking later on the Senate floor, Reid questioned why Gregg and his GOP allies were advocating a measure that did not directly address the troop deployment. "You know what he kind of reminds me of?" Reid said of Gregg. "Somebody who comes into the basketball game not to score points, but to kind of rough people up."

Gregg responded sarcastically: "I appreciate the senator's generous comments. I take them as a compliment."

Amid the taunting, serious discussion of the war continued. Testifying yesterday before the Senate Armed Services Committee, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates revealed that the Pentagon, the Joint Chiefs of Staff and other agencies are devising a "sophisticated checklist or matrix" to measure the Iraqi government's performance in meeting various benchmarks linked to Bush's new strategy. Gates added that he is considering alternative courses of action in case the Baghdad security operation fails.

"I would be irresponsible if I weren't thinking about what the alternatives might be if that didn't happen," Gates testified. "But we, at this point, are planning for its success."

Gates said that one alternative he could envision would be pulling U.S. troops away from Iraq's most dangerous areas, presumably major cities. He added that he did not foresee what he called a "precipitous withdrawal."

Asked by Warner whether the current strategy marks the "last chance" in Iraq, Gates replied: "No, it is not the last chance."

General Is Front Man For Bush's Iraq Plan (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Before he flew off to Iraq this week to take command of U.S. forces there, Gen. David H. Petraeus conducted one last counterinsurgency mission here on the home front -- this one on Capitol Hill.

With the Senate about to debate President Bush's troop increase, Petraeus was set up last week in the office of Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky). Senators were approached on the floor and urged to meet with him. And the new Iraq commander then privately outlined his view of the war and what he will do with the 21,500 extra troops.

At a time when the president and most of his top surrogates have lost credibility even among many Republicans in Congress, the administration has turned to the chiseled, widely respec ted Petraeus to win the day. His name has become the rallying cry for Bush and his allies as they argue that it would be wrong for lawmakers to confirm the four-star general unanimously one moment and then renounce his strategy the next.

"I've been selling Petraeus to anybody who would listen," said Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), who terms the Bush troop increase the "Petraeus Doctrine" and fetched senators off the floor to meet the general in McConnell's office. "He's the Gene ral Grant of the surge. He's our last best chance as a military commander to bring about a change on the ground."

And maybe the last best chance for Bush allies to head off a resolution rejecting the troop increase or at least keep many Republicans from supporting it. The Petraeus card is about the only one left to play for a White House confronting low poll numbers, an unpopular war and an opposition Congress. With as many as 11 Senate Republicans against Bush's new Iraq plan, Petraeus has sway that his commander in chief does not. "There's not much the White House could do right now, to be honest with you, to change votes," Graham said.

DOJ_NMG_0128722

Yet if invoking Petraeus has been effective for Graham and others trying to rally Republicans, Democrats remain unpersuaded. "He's a capable officer. He's got the talent and skill for the job," said Sen. Jack Reed (R.I.), a member of the Armed Services Committee. But "we're not talking about the Petraeus plan," he added. "We're talking about the president's plan. It's not only appropriate, but I think we have an obligation to point out its shortcomings."

Bush strategists have been surprised by how quickly the politics of the war have shifted in the past few weeks, and they have been grappling for a strategy to contain the political damage. The White House privately believes that a statement of opposition by Congress may be inevitable. "Our goal is to try to cabin off the most egregious" versions, particularly any that would threaten funding, said a senior official who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

Bush has kept a relatively low profile as the issue has dominated Capitol Hill in recent days. Although Vice President Cheney and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates warned that a resolution would embolden terrorists, Bush has generally avoided incendiary language. Rather than inserting himself into the debate, he has been talking about childhood obesity and fiscal discipline. When he met privately with Republican senators Friday, Bush employed a soft sell, the senior official said. He made the case for his decision but told the senators to vote their consciences. "Do what you think is right and I'll be your friend the next day," he told them, according to the official.

Some advisers have been surprised that Bush has not more aggressively accused Democrats of advocating retreat. "If he wanted to use his megaphone to shout that, it would put the Democrats back on their heels," said Ed Rogers, a Republican lobbyist close to the White House. "But for whatever reasons, I think they're pulling their punches."

Instead, Petraeus has become the front man of sorts. On Jan. 26, the day the Senate voted 81 to 0 to confirm him, Petraeus met with Bush for the cameras. Later that day, the president told House Republicans in a closed-door retreat that he found it "ironic" that senators would support the general but oppose a plan he helped devise, according to Republicans present.

It was a line he later took public. "The Senate overwhelmingly supported his nomination to be the new general in command of Iraq," Bush said on Fox News on Jan. 31. "The fundamental question is: Will they back him up? They voted for him. Will they back him up?" Allies quickly picked up the argument.

But Democrats saw it as a cynical ploy. "The White House seems desperate to avoid a real debate on the merits of the plan they've put forward, so they're trying to use General Petraeus as a shield," said William A. Galston, a Clinton administration aide who is now at the Brookings Institution. "I don't think the Petraeus talking point passes the laugh test because, in fact, I'm sure a lot of the senators who voted for Petraeus but don't like the surge believe he's the best general available to address the situation."

It is common for a nominee like Petraeus to meet with senators before a confirmation, but the general returned to Capitol Hill even after the vote to continue talking to members in both houses. The White House said it did not orchestrate the post-confirmation visits. Petraeus was in transit to Iraq yesterday but a senior defense official said he "met with many others in Congress after the hearings prior to departure."

Graham said he grabbed Petraeus last week and had him wait in McConnell's office while he ushered in senators to see the general. "From my conversation with him, he understands the gravity of the situation," said Sen. Richard C. Shelby (R-Ala.). "He understands it's probably 10 minutes to 12 on the clock. And he believes he can do something about it."

Democrats Press Bush To Change Iraq Plan (AP)

By David Espo

AP, February 7, 2007

Democratic critics of the Iraq war seized the offensive at both ends of the Capitol on Tuesday, disclosing plans for a symbolic rejection by the House of President Bush's decision to deploy additional troops and filing legislation in the Senate to require withdrawal of U.S. military personnel.

DOJ_NMG_0128723

"We're going to stand by our soldiers, but we're not going to stand by a failed policy that exposes more of our soldiers to death and suffering," said Sen. Richard Durbin of Illinois, rebutting charges that the war's critics may be undermining the morale or even the safety of U.S. forces.

Democrats pressured Bush to change course as Defense Secretary Robert Gates told lawmakers that U.S. forces might be able to start leaving Iraq before the end of the year — if daunting conditions including subdued violence and political reconciliation are met.

He also said that the buildup in troops is "not the last chance" to succeed in Iraq and added, "I would be irresponsible if I weren't thinking about what the alternatives might be."

The Pentagon is in the midst of implementing Bush's order to raise troop levels by 21,500, part of a plan to help quell sectarian violence in Baghdad.

New checkpoints were in evidence in Iraq's capital city, and there were reports of inspections of increased numbers of vehicles. At the same time, more than 50 people were killed or found dead during the day, and Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said insurgents were responding to the new security measures by killing as many people as possible.

The war has claimed the lives of more than 3,000 U.S. troops so far, and officials announced two more deaths. The casualties included a soldier killed Tuesday at a security post southwest of Baghdad and a Marine who died Monday in Anbar Province.

Bush's decision to dispatch additional troops has become a flashpoint for critics of his Iraq policy in the new, Democratic-controlled Congress, whose lawmakers were elected last fall by a war-weary electorate.

Officials said that House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California and Majority Leader Steny Hoyer of Maryland had both pledged to the Democratic rank and file that the House would vote next week on a nonbinding measure critical of Bush's plan to add 21,500 additional forces. They also reassured lawmakers clamoring for more robust action that the vote would merely be the first attempt to pressure the president to shift course and that future legislation will be binding.

Brendan Daly, a spokesman for Pelosi, said the measure brought to the floor next week would focus on "our opposition to the surge in troops" but has not yet been drafted.

Pelosi said last month the measure would declare that the troop increase was "not in the national interest," language once included in a Senate measure, but now abandoned.

Democrats intend to allow all lawmakers time to speak on the issue across three days of debate beginning next Tuesday.

Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, the House Republican leader, said in an interview the GOP would prepare an alternative to the Democratic measure. He said it would include a call for a bipartisan committee to oversee the war effort and lay out a series of standards by which officials could judge whether the Iraqi government was living up to its commitments to help end the violence.

"If you're not for victory in Iraq, you're for failure," Boehner told The Associated Press. "The consequences of failure are immense. I think it destabilizes the entire Middle East, encourages Iran and on top of that, it's pretty clear that the terrorists will just follow us home."

Under House rules, Democratic leaders have the authority to advance legislation to the floor for three days of debate, and there is little doubt they will have the votes to prevail.

That stands in contrast to the Senate, where Republicans have so far blocked an attempt by Democrats to hold a full-fledged debate on the war.

Gates and other administration officials have been sharply critical of efforts to pass legislation expressing disapproval of the increase in troops, even in nonbinding form.

That has had no noticeable impact on Democratic critics of the war, though. Some of them argue that Bush's policies have led to a situation in which U.S. troops are thrust into the middle of a civil war in Iraq.

Two bills were unveiled during the day to force the president to move toward a troop withdrawal.

"The only people who believe there is a workable military solution for the conflict in Iraq is the Bush administration," said Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., in announcing legislation that would require Bush to "complete the redeployment" of American troops within a year.

DOJ_NMG_0128724

Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, a Democratic presidential hopeful, joined two House members in proposing a measure to block Bush from implementing his planned troop increase, and to begin a withdrawal by May 1, with all combat brigades out by March 31, 2008.

"This is what I think has the best chance of bringing our troops home," said Obama.

Apart from legislation, Democrats have embarked on an effort to undermine public support for the war by holding numerous hearings.

At a daylong session, Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., accused the former U.S. occupation chief in Iraq of haphazardly doling out billions of dollars after the U.S.-led invasion

Waxman said 363 tons of cash was loaded onto airplanes and sent into the war zone in 2003, adding that U.S. officials had "no way of knowing whether the cash would wind up in enemy hands."

L. Paul Bremer III, who was head of the Coalition Provisional Authority, said he had done the best he could to kickstart the Iraqi economy, which he said was "flat on its back" after years of rule by Saddam Hussein followed by the U.S.-led invasion. He said the money belonged to Iraqis and had come from the U.N.-run oil-for-food program and from seized Iraqi assets.

One Republican accused Democrats of trying to embarrass the administration. "It's old news," said Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va.

Surge Is Not 'Last Chance' For Success, Gates Says (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON — Defense Secretary Robert Gates, in testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee today, rejected the widely held view in Washington that the Bush administration's decision to send additional troops to Iraq is the last chance to succeed in that troubled country.

"I would be irresponsible if I weren't thinking about what the alternatives might be," Gates said, arguing that the so-called surge is "not the last chance."

As Gates defended the administration's fiscal 2008 budget request of $481.4 billion -- along with a projected $141.7 billion in supplemental funding in 2008 for Iraq and Afghanistan -- senators expressed doubt about the war.

"How much longer do you think we're going to be in Iraq?" asked Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.).

Gates replied that "if the plan to quiet Baghdad is successful and if the Iraqis step up and accept their responsibilities…I hope we'd be able to begin drawing down our troops later this year."

Byrd said: "Try again…I don't see any end to it."

Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Peter Pace said that the operation to quiet Baghdad and the western Al Anbar region, a stronghold for Sunni insurgents, could require more than the anticipated 21,500 troops.

"It would not be more than 10% more," said Pace, explaining that an additional 3,000 forces would be largely needed to support the combat troops.

Pressed by lawmakers on equipment shortages for troops in the field, Gates said that a dearth of armored vehicles in one phase of operations will be remedied by July.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) told Gates that committee members were still skeptical about the Pentagon's response "considering the amount of evidence about shortages." She also signaled that the unprecedented outsourcing of contracts by the Pentagon in Iraq would be "a very important issue for this Congress."

Sen. John Warner (R-Va.) asked Gates what happens if the surge plan fails. "I have to believe we're thinking beyond the Baghdad operation," said Warner, who has written one of several Senate resolutions opposing the military gambit.

"It is not the last chance," Gates replied. "We, at this point, are planning for success."

Gates also disclosed that President Bush had given the green light to a Pentagon plan for a new military command for operations in Africa.

Responsibility for Africa is now shared by three commands -- European, Central and Pacific -- which Gates called "an outdated arrangement left over from the Cold War."

DOJ_NMG_0128725

The Pentagon hopes a new framework would enable better coordination in a region with growing terrorist and other threats, particularly from countries ravaged from war, such as Somalia.

In other action, the committee voted 14-3 to approve Gen. George Casey as Army chief of staff. Voting against the nomination were Republicans John McCain of Arizona, John Ensign of Nevada and Saxby Chambliss of Georgia.

The panel also voted 16-0 to approve Adm. William Fallon's nomination to become the top U.S. commander for forces in the Middle East.

johanna.neuman@latimes.com

Military Wants More Civilians To Help In Iraq (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And David S. Cloud

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6 — Senior military officers, including members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, have told President Bush and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates that the new Iraq strategy could fail unless more civilian agencies step forward quickly to carry out plans for reconstruction and political development.

The complaints reflect fresh tensions between the Pentagon and the State Department over personnel demands that have fallen most heavily on the military. But they also draw on a deeper reservoir of concerns among officers who have warned that a military buildup alone cannot solve Iraq's problems, and who now fear that the military will bear a disproportionate burden if Mr. Bush's strategy falls short.

Among particular complaints, the officers cited a request from the office of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice that military personnel temporarily fill more than one-third of 350 new State Department jobs in Iraq that are to be created under the new strategy.

At a Senate hearing on Tuesday, Mr. Gates made clear that he shared the officers' concerns, telling senators, "If you were troubled by the memo, that was mild compared to my reaction when I saw it."

To back up his point, Mr. Gates also told senators that Mr. Bush himself had addressed his cabinet at the White House on Monday about the need for civilian agencies to "step up to the task."

At one level, the conflict is a cultural clash between a military that has ordered hundreds of thousands of troops to Iraq in the last four years, and a Foreign Service that offers incentives for civilians to work in war zones but cannot compel diplomats to accept hardship assignments to places like Iraq.

Under Mr. Bush's strategy, the military is pushing more than 20,000 fresh troops to Baghdad to augment the American military force of about 132,000 already in Iraq.

The State Department, leading an interagency effort, has been ordered to expand the provincial reconstruction teams in Baghdad and western Anbar Province to accelerate political and economic development at the local level.

Small teams of American personnel are to be placed inside Iraqi ministries to make sure that $10 billion in Iraqi funds committed to the effort are spent, and spent correctly.

The entire United States Foreign Service numbers only 6,000 people, about the size of a military brigade.

In defense of the diplomats' role, David M. Satterfield, the State Department's Iraq coordinator, told Congress in January that the department's task in Iraq amounted to "the largest presence of the foreign service in any country in the world," including more than 140 Foreign Service officers in Baghdad and over 50 more in the existing provincial reconstruction teams.

Last month, after Mr. Bush announced his new strategy, Ms. Rice told Congress that the department was "ready to strengthen, indeed to 'surge,' our civilian efforts."

But Mr. Gates said Tuesday that Ms. Rice had told him that her department needed six months to locate and prepare civil servants and contractors to send abroad. "It is illustrative of the difficulty of getting other agencies to provide people on a timely basis," Mr. Gates said.

Members of the Joint Chiefs and commanders in Iraq have been delivering the same message recently to the president and defense secretary about the necessity for other parts of government to join the effort, according to administration and military officials.

DOJ_NMG_0128726

"The chiefs have made that point, and repeatedly," said one senior Bush administration official who, like others interviewed for this article, spoke on condition of anonymity to describe internal discussions among the president, defense secretary, commanders in Iraq and members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The officials said the commanders had also been expressing broader frustrations, including that the additional $1 billion in new money for reconstruction requested by the president may not be sufficient.

They also fear that additional contractors may not be readily available to assist, and that a large number of jobs that could be performed by civilians — like engineers, lawyers, veterinarians and accountants — are still conducted by military personnel at a time when the armed services are stretched thin.

The mounting tensions between the Pentagon and other departments are in some ways the mirror image of those that roiled the government before the 2003 invasion. Then, State Department officials grumbled that the Pentagon was usurping its role in planning the postwar civilian occupation; today, the military is eager to see others step in.

State Department officials say they are using both incentives and subtler pressures to induce employees to go to Iraq.

But from the standpoint of personal security, taking those jobs — many of them, by definition, outside the relative safety of the Green Zone — is widely seen as an unattractive career option.

Some Foreign Service officers and other civilians in the national security field spoke privately of their frustration at coming under pressure to serve in Iraq, a mission they view as bungled as the Pentagon rebuffed the involvement of experts in other government agencies.

"This is not at all a finger-pointing exercise," said Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, during his Senate testimony on Tuesday. "This is about the current status of our government to be able to respond, and it goes to the expeditionary nature or a lack thereof of most other departments in the government, understandably, based on the kind of wars we've faced in the past."

General Pace argued that the United States government needed "to be able to get folks over to be able to help with judiciary systems, be able to help with engineering, be able to help with electricity and the like before a country devolves into a state where the terrorists can find a home."

Tasia Scolinos, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, said in a statement that the agency "has devoted substantial resources" to training the Iraqi police and creating a justice system. She provided a fact sheet that showed that the Justice Department had 200 employees and contractors in Iraq as of last August.

"We are committed to working closely with the Defense Department and our law enforcement counterparts in Iraq to assess how we can best continue to support the reconstruction efforts in Iraq," she said.

As evidence of the importance of civilian reconstruction, military officers involved in the internal debate are citing a recent classified study, conducted by the Joint Warfare Analysis Center of the Defense Department, based in Dahlgren, Va., that suggests violence in Baghdad drops significantly when the quality of life improves for Iraqi citizens.

Relying on surveys and other data on those wounded and killed in the violence as compiled by the military, the study found that a 2 percent increase in job satisfaction among Iraqis in Baghdad correlated to a 30 percent decline in attacks on allied forces and a 17 percent decrease in civilian deaths from sectarian violence.

The study did not examine the security benefits of adding troops to Iraq or compare it to the nonmilitary portions of the new strategy, according to those who have been briefed on the classified document.

But its emphasis on the importance of reconstruction is being cited by senior military officers and Pentagon officials as more evidence that Congress and the government's other civilian departments must devote more money and personnel to nonmilitary efforts at improving the economy, industry, agriculture, financial oversight of government spending and the rule of law.

French PM Attacks Iraq Troop 'surge' (FT)

By Martin Arnold And John Thornhill

Financial Times, February 7, 2007

Violence in Iraq will continue to worsen until all foreign troops are pulled out, Dominique de Villepin has warned, dismissing as "absurd" the idea that an enlarged US force could bring stability and peace to the country.

DOJ_NMG_0128727

In an interview with the Financial Times, France's prime minister indirectly criticised the decision by US President George W. Bush to boost his country's military presence in Iraq.

Mr de Villepin, who has just three months left in office, said an occupying force was itself the "founding stone of the crisis" and a clear timetable had to be set for its withdrawal.

"The idea of saying that foreign troops will leave when Iraq is democratic and pacific is absurd. It will never happen," he said, chopping his desk with the side of his hand in his ornate office at the Hôtel Matignon.

"Whatever the level of foreign troops in Iraq, things will continue to deteriorate.

"We need a clear horizon for the departure of foreign troops and the return of full sovereignty to Iraq. Until this is clearly stated, with the stages and the objective of a total withdrawal, things will not improve. I do not know a single diplomatic subject that can be fixed without a clear schedule."

His comments will rile the Bush administration as Mr de Villepin is still widely remembered for his impassioned speech at the United Nations in February 2003 opposing the invasion of Iraq. Alluding to this speech, the former foreign minister added: "I said in 2003, we said it strongly with President [Jacques] Chirac, that there is no military solution in Iraq. What we said in 2003 remains true in 2007."

However, Mr de Villepin said all domestic, regional, and foreign parties in Iraq had a long-term interest in preventing the country's downward spiral into civil war.

Echoing the recent Baker-Hamilton report in the US, Mr de Villepin said more should be done to rope Iraq's neighbours Syria and Iran into the stabilisation process.

He also warned the international community was "lacking imagination" in its attempts to stop Iran's suspected nuclear weapons programme. "Iran with nuclear military capacity is unacceptable," he said.

"Iran must respect its international engagements, notably the Non-Proliferation Treaty, which it has signed."

But he said the international community should not ignore the origins of the crisis that lay in Iran's desire to assert itself as a regional power for reasons of national pride and security.

The Nitty-Gritty About This Particulate Of Speech (WP)

By Linton Weeks

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

There's that word again: granularity.

It's a mouthful of a term used by guys like Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the top U.S. commander in Iraq; retired Gen. Barry McCaffrey; and White House press secretary Tony Snow.

Responding recently to a question about potential sectarian violence in Iraq if U.S. forces withdraw, Petraeus told the Senate Armed Services Committee, "It's hard from this distance . . . to get a real feel, or the real granularity of what's going on."

On "NBC Nightly News," McCaffrey said that sending more troops on a mission to Iraq "to get down to detailed granularity to fight a counterinsurgency battle in a city of 6 million Arabs who are murdering each other . . . is a fool's errand."

And talking about the inability to definitively link Saddam Hussein and Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, Snow said in an autumnal news conference, "We just don't have that kind of granularity in terms of the relationship."

Lately, people have been invoking the word to mean specificity. Certain things, such as the administration's vision for the future of Iraq, lack granularity. Newlyweds' dreams, psychic-network predictions and late-night kitchen-table get-rich-quick schemes also suffer from granularity deprivation.

Mike Mills, writing in Congressional Quarterly about the U.S. health care system's collection of personal medical information, notes that "sometimes the newer standard appears to take granularity to an extreme."

So, specifically, what exactly are we talking about?

"When I wrote that particular column," Mills says in an e-mail, "I remember hesitating before using the word, knowing at least subconsciously that it has now become jargon for 'detail.' "

In other words, "granularity" is a popular word for the "nitty-gritty." But it's not so nitty, not quite as gritty. It's about texture. Concreteness.

DOJ_NMG_0128728

The word has migrated from science to business and now to politics and popular parlance. Mills, a journalist who spent several years in the overdrive world of dot-com commerce, says that "its modern origin as a technical term comes from the digital realm of computer graphics -- pixels."

The greater the number of pixels in an image, he points out, the greater the granularity, or clarity. The contemporary "use of this word seems to signal that the digital convergence has now crept into the human mind -- which techies call 'wetware.' "

When people try to describe abstract concepts, Mills says, they are now thinking and expressing themselves with digital imagery.

People have been using mechanical terms to describe concepts for a long while. For example, in the early 20th century, when Sigmund Freud wrote of pressure in the human brain and mental breakdowns, he used steam-engine metaphors.

Granularity "is a hot word," says Mike Agnes, editor in chief of Webster's New World dictionaries, in Cleveland. "It gives people a word they can use for a new way of looking at things -- whether it be engineering, business, politics -- and a new way of evaluating."

It means depth of detail, he says. "If you were a photographer or an astronomer, speaking of an image, you would use the term 'resolution.' "

All of a sudden, Agnes says, "granularity" is a buzzword.

"It's a very interesting concept, and if we've got a concept we need a word."

It's also a way of speaking about basic things without sounding simplistic.

Businesspeople have been using it for years. Now, like "synergy" and "drilling down," it's creeping into the general consciousness. When Santa Clara, Calif., Assistant City Manager Ron Garratt was asked earlier about a proposal for a new San Francisco 49ers stadium, he replied, "Until we drill down, until we see the granularity of this proposal and what the pieces of this plan are, we won't know from a staff perspective if the definition of 'no impact on general fund' will be met or not."

According to Webopedia, "granularity" is helpful when discussing systems: "The extent to which a system contains separate components (like granules). The more components in a system -- or the greater the granularity -- the more flexible it is."

Without granularity, it's hard to get traction.

Agnes says he would not hesitate to use the word in everyday discourse.

Words and phrases often move from the particular to the general. For instance, he has noticed a surge (ahem) in the use of "event horizon."

"Originally it was used in physics, particularly cosmology," Agnes says. Lately it's been popping up in the business world to denote the moment that marks the beginning of an inevitable process. It's the point of no return. "Once you reach an event horizon, the event itself is sure to follow," he says.

With granularity.

House Panel Questions Monitoring Of Cash Shipped To Iraq (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6 — A House committee report on Tuesday questioned whether some of the billions of dollars in cash shipped to Iraq after the American invasion — mostly in huge, shrink-wrapped stacks of $100 bills — might have ended up with the insurgent groups now battling American troops.

The report was released by the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee at a hearing when Democrats sharply questioned the former American civilian administrator in Iraq, L. Paul Bremer III, about lax management of the nearly $12 billion in cash shipped to Iraq between May 2003 and June 2004.

Mr. Bremer defended his performance as head of the Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq, noting that the United States had to bring tons of American dollars into Iraq because the country had no functioning banking system.

“We had to pay Iraqis in cash,” Mr. Bremer said of the money, most of which came from Iraqi oil sales. “Delay would have been demoralizing and unfair to millions of Iraqi families.”

DOJ_NMG_0128729

Government auditors have repeatedly criticized the American and Iraqi governments for failing to monitor the money once it reached Iraq.

Representative Henry A. Waxman, the California Democrat who is the committee's new chairman, acknowledged that he had no evidence that Iraqi insurgent groups had received any of the cash. But he suggested that it was possible, given how much money was rushed into the country.

"We have no way of knowing if the cash that was shipped into the Green Zone ended up in enemy hands," he said. "We owe it to the American people to do everything we can to find out where the $12 billion went."

The hearing was evidence of the turnaround in Mr. Bremer's standing in Washington.

Hailed by Republicans and Democrats alike when he last testified at a Congressional hearing in 2004, Mr. Bremer found himself the target of sharp criticism from Democrats on Tuesday. They questioned whether his decisions might help to explain the continuing turmoil in Iraq. He stepped down from his Iraq post in June 2004.

"I acknowledged that I made mistakes," Mr. Bremer said. "And with the benefit of hindsight, I would have made some decisions differently." But he said that given the chaos he found after arriving in Iraq in May 2003, "I think we made great progress under some of the most difficult conditions imaginable."

Mr. Waxman, whose panel is pursuing investigations of fraud and abuse by the federal government and its contractors in Iraq, said he found it remarkable that the Bush administration had decided to send billions of dollars of American currency into Iraq so quickly after the United States occupied the country.

The committee calculated that the $12 billion in cash, most of it in the stacks of $100 bills, weighed 363 tons and had to been flown in on wooden pallets aboard giant C-130 military cargo planes. "Who in their right mind would send 360 tons of cash into a war zone?" Mr. Waxman said. "That's exactly what our government did."

Republican committee members accused the panel's Democratic leaders of rehashing old allegations against Mr. Bremer and the conduct of American forces in Iraq for political gain.

"Self-righteous finger-wagging will not make Iraq any more secure," said Representative Tom Davis of Virginia, the panel's ranking Republican. He said Mr. Bremer was asked to take charge of a "country with, basically, no government."

Rusty Democrats Unable To Pin Anything On Bremer (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Jerry Bremer wore black dress shoes instead of his trademark combat boots yesterday as he testified before the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee. But except for that concession, the former American viceroy of Iraq had lost none of his swagger.

His widely condemned move to disband the Iraqi military? "I stand by the decision."

Billions of dollars potentially wasted on dubious contracts? "I did not have authority over the awarding of contracts."

Incompetent personnel at the Coalition Provisional Authority? "My role in hiring was very limited."

"On the whole," Bremer told the lawmakers, "I think that we made great progress."

It was to have been the grudge match Democrats waited years for: The ferocious Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), newly installed as chairman of the committee, was to flex his new oversight muscles by summoning Bremer to account for his actions while running Iraq in 2003 and 2004.

But Bremer proved unexpectedly agile at shifting blame: to administration planners ("The planning before the war was inadequate"), his superiors in the Bush administration ("We never had sufficient support"), and the Iraqi people ("The country was in chaos -- socially, politically and economically").

And Democrats, after 12 years in the minority, were out of practice. Instead of going after Bremer's greatest vulnerabilities -- his autocratic management style and his "de-Baathification" of Iraq -- Democrats instead chose a strange focus for the hearing: the failure to account for $8 billion of cash payments three years ago. After nearly five hours of questioning, the lawmakers failed to find a smoking gun: It wasn't U.S. taxpayer money, it was a pittance compared with U.S. spending in Iraq, there was no hard evidence of fraud, and the episode had been investigated two years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0128730

Waxman, who began the hearing with a broad smile and played frequently with the gavel while sitting on the edge of the chairman's seat, gradually grew more somber and sank back into his chair. The natty Bremer, sporting a pocket handkerchief and a flag lapel pin, grew more confident. As his deflections thwarted the lawmakers, Bremer's wife, unable to contain her delight, reached out from the first row of the audience to pat her husband on the back.

Republicans could hardly believe their luck. "Nobody took him on," exulted Tom Davis (R-Va.), who surrendered the chairman's gavel to Waxman last month. "We thought they'd be all over him for de-Baathification."

For Waxman, the surprises began with the opening gavel. "The committee's Web site will now have a fraud, waste and abuse tip line to make it easier for our constituents to give us information we need," he announced in his statement. "The Web site is www.oversight.house.gov, and we will pursue all credible allegations that are shared with us."

Davis countered that announcement in his own opening statement. "Beginning today, our Republican committee Web site invites whistleblowers and anyone else with information about waste, abuse, fraud or needed reform to provide information anonymously or to e-mail us up at oversight@mail.house.gov," he said.

"We seem to have rival tip-line Web sites," Waxman observed.

Then the new chairman made a crucial error: At the start of the 10 a.m. hearing, he allowed every member of a committee to make an opening statement. By the time Bremer uttered his first word, it was almost noon.

Democrats sounded menacing in their opening statements. "I'm curious about how it was that Mr. Bremer, a man who'd never been to Iraq, never led reconstruction efforts, could have been put in charge of the most important civil reconstruction program since the Marshall Plan," said Rep. Paul Hodes (D-N.H.).

But Republicans, unexpectedly, were equally dedicated to Bremer's defense. "Our folks that we sent tried to do the best they could," said Rep. John Mica (R-Fla.). When Bremer did speak, his 1,800-word opening statement had but a sentence admitting fault, and that was quickly qualified. "I acknowledge that I made mistakes and that, with the benefit of hindsight, I would have made some decisions differently," he allowed. But he quickly listed the mitigating circumstances.

Waxman tried to direct more of the blame toward Bremer. He showed photos of bricks of American dollars bound for Iraq. "Ambassador Bremer, are you concerned about the possibility that some of this money went to ghost employees?" Waxman asked. "It might be showing up in the hands of the insurgents that are fighting U.S. troops."

"If there were evidence of that, I would certainly be concerned," Bremer deflected.

Other Democrats had no better luck. Rep. William Clay (D-Mo.) tried to elicit a mea culpa about Bremer's banning of prominent Baath Party members from government. "The mistake I made was letting the Iraqi politicians implement it," Bremer replied. "So it was the right policy, poorly implemented."

Rep. Diane Watson (D-Calif.) demanded to know "how can we in good conscience say to our constituents, 'Let's send them more money.' "

"I don't represent the administration," Bremer demurred.

Bremer represented only himself, but he did it ably.

Bremer Admits Errors In Occupying Iraq (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON — The former head of the U.S.-led occupation in Iraq testified at a congressional hearing Tuesday that he and the Bush administration made mistakes, including inadequate planning.

Paul Bremer — former administrator of the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA), which ruled Iraq for 14 months in 2003 and 2004 — said he was wrong to temporarily stop paying salaries and pensions to former Iraqi army officers. He added that Iraqis went too far with his order to purge members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party from the government.

"I acknowledge I made mistakes," Bremer said. "But on the whole, I believe we made great progress under some of the most difficult conditions imaginable."

In his first appearance on Capitol Hill since leaving office in June 2004, Bremer strongly denied accusations by auditors and House Democrats that the CPA was too lax with the billions of dollars in cash it handed out to Iraqi government ministries.

DOJ_NMG_0128731

The House Oversight and Government Reform Committee kicked off four days of hearings this week into allegations of wasteful federal spending with Bremer as its first witness. The committee chairman, Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., promised "a two-year effort … to prevent taxpayers' money being wasted."

Some Republicans on the panel complained that the hearing was little more than "self-righteous, arrogant, Monday-morning Bush bashing," as Rep. Mark Souder, R-Ind., put it.

Other Republicans disagreed with that assessment. "Conservative Republicans should feel no obligation to defend waste just because it happened in Iraq," said Rep. John Duncan, R-Tenn.

Bremer said the CPA never had enough funding, materials or employees to properly do its job as the interim government of Iraq. He defended two controversial decisions: the dissolution of the Iraqi military and the removal of former members of Saddam's ruling party from government jobs. Gen. David Petraeus, the new commander of U.S. military forces in Iraq, criticized both actions in Senate testimony before his confirmation last month.

Bremer said the Iraqi army had effectively ceased to exist when the CPA took control of the country. He said it would have been a mistake to keep Saddam's former military intact, however, because Iraq's Kurds would have seceded had the Iraqi army remained.

Accusing Iraqi officials of going too far with ridding the Iraqi government of Baath Party members, Bremer said he intended to remove the top 1% of Baath Party members, not the lower-level bureaucrats who had to join the party to survive under Saddam's rule.

"It was a good policy poorly implemented," Bremer said. An Iraqi committee headed by Ahmad Chalabi carried out the policy. Chalabi, a former exile leader with close ties to the Bush administration, was later accused by U.S. authorities of leaking classified information to Iran.

Unspent Iraqi Funds Undercut Bush's Push For More (WSJ)

By Scot J. Paltrow

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

The Bush administration faces a new obstacle in its quest to get more funds for reconstruction in Iraq: questions about why the Iraqi government has so much unspent money on hand.

Democrats at a House hearing on Iraqi reconstruction noted large sums of reconstruction money are unaccounted for and that the Iraqi government currently has $12 billion in unspent funds in bank accounts. Reps. Henry Waxman (D., Calif.) and William Delahunt (D., Mass.) questioned the president's call for $1.7 billion more for reconstruction.

Mr. Waxman called the hearings to improve oversight of how money is spent in Iraq. He said he also will press for legislation requiring better controls over contractors.

Testimony before the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, where Mr. Waxman is chairman, focused on a January 2005 audit report by Stuart Bowen, the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction. The findings faulted the way the Coalition Provisional Authority, which temporarily ran Iraq after the U.S.-led invasion, hurriedly dispensed more than $8.8 billion to Iraqi ministries to keep the government there running. It also found loose controls of the vast amounts of cash, and the likelihood that much of it had disappeared to pay "ghost employees."

Although the report was issued more than two years ago, Mr. Waxman said testimony was timely because the previous, Republican-controlled Congress declined to hold a hearing on the matter. Records obtained from the Federal Reserve and Defense Department show that from May 2003 to June 2004 the Federal Reserve Bank in New York shipped nearly $12 billion to Iraq, mainly in $100 bills. Much of it was doled out in Iraq from the back of pickup trucks and was only loosely accounted for.

Former CPA head Paul Bremer confirmed that he had overruled lower-level American employees who had warned that money would be siphoned off to ghost workers. He said that if money was withheld for salaries for large numbers of security guards and others, the danger to order in Iraq outweighed the risk that some money would disappear through corruption.

Mr. Bremer, who has been a lightning rod for criticism of the administration's postinvasion handling of Iraq, admitted having made mistakes. He blamed former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein for having destroyed much of the Iraqi economy, and U.S. intelligence agencies for not having detected in advance the dire state of the economy and individual industries.

DOJ_NMG_0128732

One source of frustration for the White House and many members of Congress has been the Iraqi government's difficulty spending money it has on hand from oil and gas revenue. The large number of pending corruption investigations by an Iraqi commission established by Mr. Bremer is believed to be deterring government ministries from spending additional money.

Mr. Bush has called on Iraq to commit to spend at least $10 billion of its funds in order for the country to qualify for the additional $1.7 billion he has proposed.

Mr. Waxman faulted the state department for not making available Timothy Carney, recently named to the newly created position of coordinator of Iraq reconstruction. The State Department said he had to depart earlier than expected for Iraq.

Billions Given Away In Baghdad Free-for-all (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, February 7, 2007

The Bush administration went on a $5bn spending spree in Iraq in 2004 just six weeks before returning control of the government to Iraqis, according to a Democratic lawmaker investigating the payments.

Huge sums were doled out, sometimes in dollar bills from the back of pick-up trucks, it was alleged.

In a hearing before the chief House oversight committee, Democrats on Tuesday demanded answers from Paul Bremer, who headed the Coalition Provisional Authority, Iraq's first post-occupation government, and oversaw the disbursement of $12bn in cash in reconstruction funds in the months after the invasion.

In his first appearance before Congress since leaving Iraq, Mr Bremer admitted making mistakes during his 13-month tenure. However, he emphasised that Iraq was in a "desperate situation" in May 2003 and that the CPA could not have waited to install a "modern financial system" before beginning the process of getting the defunct Iraqi government and various ministries reinstated.

The payments in question comprised of Iraqi funds that had been held by the Federal Reserve Bank in New York before the invasion and consisted of a fund that succeeded the United Nations Oil for Food programme and seized Iraqi assets.

"I acknowledge that I made mistakes and that, with the benefit of hindsight, I would have made some decisions differently. But on the whole, we made great progress under some of the most difficult conditions imaginable," Mr Bremer told the committee.

Mr Bremer's remarks did little to quell criticism by Congressman Henry Waxman, chairman of the oversight committee, and others that the lack of accountability raised questions about whether the "cash shipped into the Green Zone ended up in enemy hands".

Mr Waxman took Mr Bremer to task for the manner in which US officials disbursed $20bn (€15.5bn, £10.2bn), including $12bn in cash, in Iraq between March 2003 and June 2004.

Mr Waxman said that, in a 13-month period, the US government had shipped 360 tonnes of cash to Iraq. "Who in their right minds would send 360 tonnes of cash into a war zone? But that's exactly what [this government] did."

One official from the provisional authority described an environment awash with $100 bills, said a memo released by Mr Waxman's office.

"One contractor received a $2m payment in a duffel bag stuffed with shrink-wrapped bundles of currency." In some cases, cash was stored in unguarded sacks in Iraqi ministry offices.

Questions about the lack of transparency in how the US spent the Iraqi funds were supported by a January 2005 report by Stuart Bowen, the special inspector-general for Iraq reconstruction, which found that the provisional authority did not implement adequate managerial controls over $8.8bn in funds that were meant to finance various Iraqi ministries.

Many of the critics of the Bush administration's handling of the war have pointed fingers at Mr Bremer's tenure at the CPA, asserting that his early missteps, from the de-Ba'athification policies he put in place, to the disbandment of the Iraqi armed forces, set the stage for the turmoil in Iraq today.

Mr Waxman also hinted that he might subpoena Tim Carney, a new State Department official in charge of co-ordinating reconstruction in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0128733

Mr Carney had been invited to the hearing but the State Department had kept him from testifying, in spite of his willingness to do so, Mr Waxman said.

Democrats, Bremer Spar Over Iraq Spending (WP)

By Rajiv Chandrasekaran

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

House Democrats criticized former Iraq occupation administrator L. Paul Bremer yesterday for disbursing nearly $9 billion in Iraqi oil revenue without instituting accounting systems to track more carefully how Iraqi officials were using that money.

In a five-hour hearing, Democratic members of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee probed whether the money, which was provided to Iraqi government agencies to pay salaries and fund other operations in 2003 and 2004, was spent properly. The Democrats cited an audit conducted two years ago by the special inspector general for Iraq's reconstruction that found that Bremer's Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) engaged in "less than adequate" managerial and financial control of the money.

The funds were provided to the Iraqis in cash, often in shrink-wrapped packages of $100 bills. The committee's chairman, Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), said the U.S. government flew nearly $12 billion in cash into Baghdad on military cargo planes from May 2003 to June 2004.

"Who in their right mind would send 363 tons of cash into a war zone? But that's exactly what our government did," Waxman said. Because of the way the CPA kept track of the payments, Waxman said, "we have no way of knowing whether the cash shipped into the Green Zone ended up in enemy hands."

Bremer responded that he was trying to make the best of a bad situation. Iraqi ministries, he said, lacked modern financial management systems, and the country's banks could not handle electronic fund transfers. Waiting to implement new accounting and banking practices, he insisted, would have resulted in lengthy delays in paying salaries and pensions.

"Delay would have been demoralizing and unfair to the citizens of Iraq," Bremer said. "Delay might well have exacerbated the nascent insurgency and thereby increased the danger to Americans on the ground."

The hearing did not dwell on some of the more controversial aspects of Bremer's time in Iraq, such as his decisions to disband Iraq's army and fire Baath Party members from government jobs. Instead, the disagreement between Democrats and Bremer came down to a rather obscure point: whether Bremer should have required Iraqi ministries to provide a more detailed accounting of the money the CPA gave them.

Democrats asserted that the CPA failed to follow its own basic accounting standards, which Bremer enacted in 2003. Bremer maintained that the authority "met our obligations." He said a team of specialists from the International Monetary Fund "found that the existing Iraqi systems were adequate and recommended we use them while beginning the longer-term process of modernizing them." Distributing cash in a war zone wasn't "a perfect solution," Bremer said. "But there are no perfect solutions in Iraq."

During the 15-month occupation, the United Nations allowed the U.S. government to sell Iraq's oil and keep the proceeds in a trust fund. The $8.8 billion in question was drawn from that fund.

Republicans noted that the inspector general, Stuart W. Bowen Jr., did not provide any evidence to suggest that the $8.8 billion was stolen or fraudulently appropriated. "Limited visibility over payments to Iraqi ministries by itself doesn't establish the [Democratic] majority's alleged $8 billion fraud," said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (Va.).

Democrats fired back by implying that Bremer and his budget director, David Oliver, who also testified yesterday, adopted a blasÃ© attitude toward the $8.8 billion because it was Iraqi money, not U.S. taxpayer money. Rep. Diane Watson (Calif.) played a tape of an interview Oliver gave to the BBC last year in which he said: "I can't tell you whether or not the money went to the right things or didn't -- nor do I actually think it's important."

She then read from a transcript of a speech Bremer gave at Clark University in Massachusetts in April 2005. "I suggest you not worry because the $9 billion is Iraqi money, not American money," Watson quoted Bremer as saying.

Bremer insisted that he "took seriously" the responsibility to spend Iraqi funds.

Only a few Democrats pressed Bremer on other issues.

DOJ_NMG_0128734

Rep. John F. Tierney (Mass.) asked Bremer about reports that many CPA employees were selected on the basis of political loyalty and connections instead of experience with post-conflict reconstruction or expertise in the Middle East. Bremer said that most staff members were hired by the Pentagon and that he was not involved in personnel issues.

Rep. William Lacy Clay (Mo.) asked Bremer whether he regretted disbanding Iraq's army and also whether he would admit that "your de-Baathification program helped to set the stage for the takeover of Iraqi politics by Shiite politicians with close ties to Iran."

Bremer contended that if he had called members of the former Iraqi army into service, it would have angered Shiites and Kurds -- who collectively make up more than 75 percent of Iraq's population -- and it might have led the Kurds to secede from Iraq. He also defended the overall thrust of his "de-Baathification" decree, but he acknowledged it was a mistake to leave the implementation up to Iraqi politicians, who "broadened it."

"It was the right policy, but poorly implemented," Bremer said.

Bremer, who received the Medal of Freedom from President Bush for his service in Iraq, appeared before the committee voluntarily. Waxman had also requested the appearance of Timothy Carney, a retired ambassador who was recently tapped to serve as the reconstruction coordinator in Iraq, but Waxman said the State Department refused.

Waxman said State offered several reasons Carney would not be able to appear, the last of which was insurmountable: He left for Baghdad on Friday.

Waxman Raps Ex-Iraq Chief Over Aid Funds (AP)

By Larry Margasak

AP, February 7, 2007

House Democrats, taking charge of investigations now that they control Congress, grilled the former U.S. occupation chief in Iraq on Tuesday about the way he doled out up to $12 billion of Iraqi dollars without accounting for the money.

L. Paul Bremer III, with support from Republicans, fired back by insisting he did the best he could in the middle of a war and repeating over and over that he was spending Iraqi — not U.S. — money.

The hearing by the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform scrutinized the chaotic days that began after a burning and looted Baghdad fell to U.S. troops four years ago. Bremer ran the country for 14 months.

However, the days of the Coalition Provisional Authority seemed like a distant past compared with a simultaneous Senate hearing — where Defense Secretary Robert Gates spoke of the situation today, including the hope of a U.S. troop withdrawal before year's end.

The significance of the House hearing came when Oversight and Government Reform Committee Chairman Henry Waxman, D-Calif., promised two years of investigations of fraud, waste and abuse on the Bush administration's watch.

Democrats are planning dozens of investigations, many of them in Waxman's committee, which scheduled further hearings this week on homeland security contracts and drug prices.

The hearing presented two divergent views of what financial controls were possible in an Iraqi capital with no functioning national government.

Waxman and a hearing witness, special inspector general for Iraq Stuart Bowen Jr., criticized Bremer for failing to install accounting systems that would have forced Iraqi ministries to account for up to $12 billion in Iraq's funds. The money came from a United Nations oil-for-food program and seized Iraqi assets, but fell under Bremer's control.

"Without strong standards, we have no way of knowing whether the cash could end up in enemy hands," said Waxman.

Bremer countered, "I arrived in Baghdad at a time when much of the city was burning. Looting was still widespread. My responsibilities were to kickstart the economy."

Former committee chairman Tom Davis, R-Va., now the senior minority member, defended Bremer and criticized Waxman.

He said Waxman was rushing to "old judgments" in a hearing that was "old news."

DOJ_NMG_0128735

Bowen, responding to Bremer's assertions that he was operating without a functioning Iraqi government, said, "That situation screams for more oversight, more controls." But the inspector general told the hearing he couldn't say whether insurgents got any of the funds.

Bremer painted the bleakest possible picture of the situation he faced.

Looters were running wild. Buildings were burning. Competent government officials had fled or were on the run. Civil servants had not been paid for months. Banks were closed and only cash would keep the economy from total collapse.

Waxman said up to $12 billion in Iraqi money was converted to dollars, held in the Federal Reserve Bank in New York and shipped in pallets to Baghdad that totaled 363 tons.

"Millions of Iraqi families depended on civil service salaries and pensions," Bremer said. "It was clear we had to get this Iraqi money in the hands of people immediately."

Bremer acknowledged that he and the U.S. government made mistakes. He said he mistakenly described the Iraqi Army as being disbanded — leaving an incorrect impression because "there was not a single unit of the Iraqi army standing in place. "

He said too many government workers were fired because he mistakenly let Iraqis carry out his policy of dismissing only 1 percent of the government officials under Saddam Hussein.

And Bremer said he believed from the start that the best way to provide security was to increase the number of U.S. troops beyond the numbers sent to Iraq.

Bremer Defends Spending In Iraq (MCT)

By Renee Schoof

McClatchy Newspapers, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON - Democrats in the House of Representatives on Tuesday grilled the former U.S. administrator of Iraq, L. Paul Bremer, demanding that he account for billions of dollars distributed in Iraq that no one seems able to trace.

Much of the questioning focused on $12 billion -mostly in $100 bills packed in huge bundles, 363 tons of cash in all - from Iraqi oil sales and frozen assets of Saddam Hussein's regime. The United States shipped the money to Iraq for Bremer's organization to disburse to Iraqi ministries.

A government audit in 2005 found that $8.8 billion was turned over to the ministries without assurance that it would be properly used and accounted for. A House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform staff document issued Tuesday says that much of the money appears to have been lost to corruption and waste.

Oversight committee Chairman Henry Waxman, D-Calif., said that with no clear standards, it was possible that some of the money ended up in enemy hands.

Bremer acknowledged making mistakes, but said that overall - given the violence and the sorry state of Iraq's economy - he did the best he could. It was the first time he'd testified before Congress since he turned over Iraq to an interim government in 2004 after running the Coalition Provisional Authority for 14 months.

"Despite the chaotic situation we found in Iraq, I believe the CPA discharged its responsibilities to manage these Iraqi funds on behalf of the Iraqi people, " Bremer said. "I am proud of what we achieved."

Bremer said he used the money to pay government workers their salaries and pensions. He said the Iraqi ministries didn't have good payroll records but that he had to turn over the money they requested quickly because he didn't want government employees to go without pay.

Rep. John Tierney, D-Mass., asked Bremer about reports that many of the 3,000 CPA staffers were recent American college graduates who got their jobs because of their loyalty to the Bush administration.

Bremer said it was difficult to get qualified people to work in Baghdad and that he wasn't responsible for selecting them.

Since Iraq's spiral downward into a violent insurgency and sectarian civil war, many analysts have blamed Bremer's decisions to disband the Iraqi army and ban members of Saddam's Baath party from public service as key reasons that anarchy emerged.

Bremer defended both decisions. He said the Iraqi army had been a vehicle of Saddam's repression and that the Baath party was modeled on the Nazis - "all right out of Hitler's playbook."

DOJ_NMG_0128736

He said he'd suggested that only top Baath members lose their jobs but that Iraqi politicians implemented the plan and "broadened it way out." The chairman of the de-Baathification committee was then-Pentagon favorite Ahmad Chalabi.

Also testifying was Stuart Bowen, the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, who headed the 2005 audit of Iraqi money. Bowen said Bremer had failed to follow CPA rules set to ensure there'd be more transparency about how the Iraqi ministries used the money. But Bowen said he didn't find that the CPA had engaged in any fraud.

Bowen said his office continued to pursue fraud in Iraq and was examining 80 cases.

Republicans on the committee said Bremer found himself in an extremely difficult job and couldn't be blamed for the U.S. government's lack of planning for post-invasion Iraq.

"We could have been accused of holding their money" if Bremer hadn't disbursed it swiftly, said Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn.

Waxman said he'd asked the Bush administration's new official in charge of Iraq reconstruction, Tim Carney, to testify and Carney was willing, but that the State Department had refused and said he wouldn't be available to appear before the panel for six months. Carney, a former ambassador to Haiti and Sudan and a former peacekeeping official in Somalia, Cambodia and South Africa, worked in Iraq for Bremer's predecessor, Lt. Gen. Jay Garner, for three months beginning in March 2003.

Waxman Hits 'Waste, Abuse' Of Iraq Funds (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, February 7, 2007

Rep. Henry A. Waxman yesterday excoriated the Bush administration for not tracking $12 billion of Iraq reconstruction funds, beginning the first of what he promised would be two years of hearings into "fraud, waste and abuse in federal spending."

"My concern is that without strong standards, we have no way of knowing whether the cash shipped into the Green Zone ended up in enemy hands," said Mr. Waxman, California Democrat and chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee.

L. Paul Bremer III, former administrator of the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA), which governed Iraq immediately after the overthrow of dictator Saddam Hussein, testified that there was no evidence the money went to insurgents or al Qaeda in Iraq.

After the hearing, Mr. Bremer said opponents of the administration's Iraq policy always have been long on criticism and short on new ideas.

"Nobody today and nobody in the past three years come up with an alternative," he told The Washington Times. "Nobody has ever said we could have on an air-tight accounting system. We came in the middle of a war in a devastated economy."

Still, Mr. Bremer said the hearing helped clear up misinformation about the money. The money was Iraqi oil money, not taxpayer dollars, Mr. Bremer told lawmakers, and the funds were used to run the Iraqi government, not to build infrastructure.

During the hearing, Mr. Waxman recounted how from May 2003 to June 2004 the Federal Reserve Bank in New York sent nearly $12 billion in cash aboard C-130 cargo planes to Baghdad.

The currency 281 million individual bills weighing a total of 363 tons came from Iraq oil proceeds and was sent to finance nation-building by the CPA.

"The numbers are so large that it doesn't seem possible that they're true," Mr. Waxman said. "Who in their right mind would send 363 tons of cash into a war zone? But that is exactly what our government did."

Mr. Bremer defended the cash payouts, saying Iraq lacked phone service, electricity and banks after the fall of Saddam's regime in April 2003.

"We had to find a way to get the Iraqi people money quickly so they could start rebuilding their country," Mr. Bremer said. "It was not a perfect solution, Mr. Chairman, but there are no perfect solutions in Iraq."

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III of Virginia, the committee's ranking Republican, faulted the chairman for describing the accounting failures as waste or fraud.

"The majority continues to equate a lack of exquisite accounting in Iraq with massive waste," he said. "Limited visibility over payments to Iraqi ministries, by itself, simply does not establish the majority's alleged $8 billion flood of fraud."

DOJ_NMG_0128737

Mr. Bremer conceded the administration's "poor planning" for reconstruction after Iraq fell and said a "business-as-usual approach to contracting and personnel didn't work."

However, he assured the committee that his caretaker government took steps to "combat corruption" within the Iraqi government that he said was a legacy of Saddam's dictatorship.

Mr. Waxman noted reports that millions of dollars went to "ghost employees" in the Iraqi ministries, which Mr. Bremer said was another holdover from the Saddam regime.

The crux of the hearing was a January 2005 audit report that found "the CPA did not establish or implement sufficient managerial, financial and contractual controls to ensure that funds were used in a transparent manner."

The report by Stuart W. Bowen Jr., special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, concluded that the CPA distributed $8.8 billion to the ministries "without assurances the monies were properly used or accounted for."

Mr. Bowen acknowledged the difficulties the CPA faced.

"It was an extremely chaotic situation," he said. "The government was nonexistent. To me, that screams out for more controls."

Democrats pressed Mr. Bowen to speculate on where the money went.

"We don't know where the money ended up. Do we?" asked Rep. Elijah E. Cummings, Maryland Democrat.

"How it was spent by the Iraqi ministries is something I can't account," Mr. Bowen said. "We have anecdotal evidence that it was used to pay payroll, and we know it was used for overhead."

Mr. Cummings said, "You don't know that it didn't go to insurgents."

Rep. Dan Burton, Indiana Republican, asked Mr. Bowen about whether the audit revealed fraud.

"We found no instances of fraud," said Mr. Bowen, who also said accounting practices within the CPA were adequate, in contrast to practices within the Iraqi ministries.

Waxman

L. Paul Bremer III, the former administrator of the Coalition Provisional Authority, yesterday slammed critics of the Bush administration's Iraq war policy saying that "nobody in the past three years come up with an alternative."

U.S. To Pay $5.8B To Expand Iraqi Forces (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, February 7, 2007

The U.S. government will pay $5.8 billion to help Iraq expand further its army and police force, which are deemed too small for its security needs, senior Pentagon officials said Tuesday.

The expansion, announced Monday as part of President Bush's 2008 budget plan, would increase the Iraqi security forces from 328,000, which was the goal set several years ago and reached last December, to 362,000.

The Bush administration has made the development of competent Iraqi security forces a centerpiece of its strategy for eventually withdrawing U.S. military forces. But the process has been slower than planned.

Tina Jonas, the Pentagon budget chief, told a small group of reporters that Bush's 2008 budget proposal includes $3.8 billion for the expansion and that the other $2 billion is contained in his request for an additional $93.4 billion to cover overall war costs for the remainder of the current budget year, which ends Sept. 30.

The plan to expand the Iraqi army was generated last year while Donald H. Rumsfeld was defense secretary. But it took more months to work out with the Iraqi government how much it would cost and how that would be shared.

Vice Adm. Stephen Stanley, a top budget official on the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said Tuesday that the Iraqis are responsible for the cost of training and equipping 19,000 of the 34,000 additional troops and police. The United States would pay for the other 15,000.

Jonas also said that in the first two months of the current budget year — October through November 2006 — the Pentagon spent about $8.6 billion a month on the Iraq war and about $1.4 billion in Afghanistan. By comparison, the spending rate for Iraq alone during the 2006 budget year, which ended last Sept. 30, was about $6.8 billion per month, according to a Pentagon chart on war costs since 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0128738

Stanley said the spending rate in Iraq of $8.6 billion a month so far this budget year is probably the highest since the initial invasion in March 2003.

Jonas noted that war costs usually are higher in the initial months of a budget year because more contracts for services are paid early in the year. Also, overall costs in Iraq have grown because the Pentagon is now using the war budget to pay for repairing, replacing and replenishing equipment lost or damaged in combat.

Iran Accuses US Of Role In Iraqi Kidnap (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, February 7, 2007

The Iranian government on Tuesday accused the US of complicity in the kidnap of one of its diplomats in Iraq, in an incident that might inflame the already tense relations between Washington and Tehran.

The Iranian government said that Jalal Sharafi, second secretary at Tehran's embassy in Baghdad, was seized on Sunday by gunmen who it claimed "operate under the supervision of the American forces in Iraq", the official Islamic Republic News Agency reported.

An Iraqi official was quoted by [a news agency] as saying that Mr Sharafi was snatched in the central Karrada district by 30 gunmen wearing the uniforms of a special Iraqi army unit that often works with US forces in Iraq.

Hasan Kazemi-Qomi, Tehran's ambassador to Baghdad, said on Iranian television the kidnappers had used US vehicles and that the abduction took place "within the framework of the US president's order to step up encounters with Iranians".

"Responsibility for this operation lies with American forces . . . those who kidnapped Jalal Sharafi . . . were not affiliated to [Iraq's] defence ministry, rather this operation was carried out under the supervision of a group connected to the Americans."

The US military denied any of its units were involved in the incident. The White House last month authorised its forces in Iraq to kill or capture Iranian agents deemed to be a threat.

Diplomats are regularly targeted in Iraq, where armed factions engage in political assassination as well as abduction for ransom. The presence of Iranian diplomats in Iraq is particularly sensitive, thanks largely to the bitter 1980-1988 war fought between the two countries.

In 2004, Iranian diplomat Faridoun Jihani was kidnapped on a highway south of Baghdad by a Sunni insurgent group, who accused him of stirring sectarian conflict. He was released after two months.

Last month US forces detained five Iranians working for an informal consulate in northern Iraq on suspicion of funding militant activity.

It is unlikely that Tehran knows at this stage who abducted Mr Sharafi.

Iran Alleges U.S. Role In Kidnap Of Embassy Official In Baghdad (WP)

By Joshua Partlow And Ernesto Londoã±o

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 6 -- Iranian officials in Iraq on Tuesday accused U.S. forces of collaborating with Iraqi soldiers in what they described as the kidnapping of an Iranian diplomat in downtown Baghdad.

Four Iraqis allegedly involved in the kidnapping Sunday evening of diplomat Jalal Sharafi were arrested and interrogated by Iraqi police, according to two Iranian officials in Baghdad. The detained Iraqis, who wore military uniforms and carried military identification cards, were "not under the Ministry of Defense control, they were directly connected to the American control," said an official at the Iranian Embassy who spoke on condition of anonymity.

A U.S. military spokesman, Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, said Tuesday that the military was not involved in the reported abduction and that he was not aware of any involvement by Iraqi forces.

Iraqi officials declined to comment Tuesday on the Iranian allegations, but Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari scheduled a news conference for Wednesday at which he was expected to address the issue.

The Iranian officials condemned the disappearance of Sharafi, whom they identified as a second secretary at the embassy in Baghdad, and said his abduction was part of the Bush administration's effort to counter Iranian influence in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0128739

"The Islamic Republic of Iran considers it a responsibility of U.S. forces in Iraq to protect members of the diplomatic community, including Iranian diplomats, and will hold them responsible for obtaining the release of the abducted Iranian diplomat," Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammad-Ali Hosseini told the Islamic Republic News Agency.

Sharafi, who has worked at the embassy for two years, has a wife and children living in Iran, said Abbass Ittry, the embassy's office manager. At the time of the apparent abduction, which was first reported by the New York Times, Sharafi was traveling with two colleagues, the Iranian officials said. They said that Sharafi's colleagues escaped and notified police, and that police and the abductors exchanged gunfire during a brief clash.

Iraqi Defense and Interior Ministry officials are searching for Sharafi, said Brig. Abdul Khaliq Karim, a spokesman for the Interior Ministry.

U.S. officials have accused Iran, a Shiite Muslim theocracy, of exacerbating tensions in Iraq by providing funding, sophisticated explosives and training to Shiite militias. President Bush last fall secretly authorized the killing or capturing of Iranian intelligence operatives or Revolutionary Guard members operating in Iraq. U.S. officials last month detained five Iranians at a liaison office that provided consular services in the northern Iraqi city of Irbil. Iraqi officials said the men were in the process of being certified as diplomats. In December, U.S. forces detained five Iranians in two raids in Baghdad.

The U.S. military, in statements Tuesday, disclosed the deaths of two American service members. A Multinational Division soldier was killed Tuesday after "insurgents targeted a security post" in southwest Baghdad, and a Marine was died Monday in Anbar province "from wounds sustained due to enemy action." Their names will be released after relatives have been notified.

Meanwhile, U.S. officials said they are investigating a report that a member of the Iraqi parliament had been convicted in the 1983 bombing of the U.S. and French embassies in Kuwait.

"We are actively investigating these serious allegations and continue to be in close contact with the government of Iraq to pursue this case," said Lou Fintor, a U.S. Embassy spokesman in Baghdad. He said he had no further details.

Citing "U.S. military intelligence," CNN reported Tuesday that Jamal Jaafar Mohammed, a member of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's Dawa party, was sentenced to death for his alleged role in the bombings, which killed five people and injured more than 80.

Special correspondents Saad al-Izzi and Naseer Nouri contributed to this report.

U.S. Orchestrated Seizure Of Baghdad Envoy, Iran Alleges (LAT)

By Tina Susman

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

BAGHDAD — Iran accused the United States on Tuesday of being behind the abduction of an Iranian diplomat in Baghdad, but U.S. officials refused to confirm that a kidnapping had taken place as the two countries' campaign of finger-pointing was brought up another notch.

Iranian officials said Jalal Sharafi, their embassy's second secretary, had not been seen since gunmen in Iraqi military uniforms intercepted his car Sunday as he left a branch of a state-owned Iranian bank.

"They acted under U.S. supervision," Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammed Ali Hosseini said in a statement released in Tehran. He described the incident as a "terrorist attack."

The Bush administration has accused Iran of fueling the sectarian warfare in Iraq by providing Shiite Muslim extremists with weapons and explosives being used against U.S. troops and Sunni Arab targets. U.S. officials have been holding five Iranians seized last month in a raid in the northern city of Irbil. The Iranian officials are accused of planning attacks on Americans.

The seizure Sunday was another example of U.S. heavy-handedness, an official at the Iranian Embassy in Baghdad said. "They should release our colleague as soon as possible," he said angrily.

Neither U.S. government nor military officials in Baghdad would confirm such an incident, much less the allegation that it had been orchestrated by American forces.

"We have no record of any event that looks remotely like the described abduction," said Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a U.S. military spokesman. The U.S. Embassy said it was "aware of the reports" and was looking into them.

DOJ_NMG_0128740

Kidnappings are common in Baghdad, where high-ranking officials and ordinary merchants alike may fall prey to gangs looking to get rich by ransoming hostages. Iranian officials, however, refused to consider that Sharafi's alleged abduction was anything but another attempt by Washington to put the squeeze on Tehran. They cited the detention of the Iranians in Irbil as evidence.

"This is not the first time such a thing has happened," the Iranian Embassy official said of Sharafi's alleged abduction. "Normally, the United States is responsible."

As Iraq's violence has escalated, so too has the tension between the United States and Iran, whose leaders deny bolstering Shiite militias at work in Iraq. The diplomatic snarling has put Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki in an awkward position as he tries to cultivate close relations with Iran while trying to convince American officials that he is serious about quelling violence.

A joint U.S.-Iraqi security plan announced last month has yet to produce tangible results, at least in the view of Iraqis living under constant threat of car bombs, mortar attacks, stray gunfire and street crime.

The bodies of at least 19 men, all shot to death and most showing signs of torture, were found in Baghdad on Tuesday, police and morgue officials said. In addition, at least five people died when a car bomb exploded in the east Baghdad neighborhood of Mashtal.

In the city of Kut, about 100 miles southeast of Baghdad, a roadside bomb targeting a passing U.S. military convoy instead blew up under a civilian minivan, killing a woman.

The U.S. military announced the death of a Marine in Al Anbar province, west of Baghdad, bringing the number of American troops killed since the March 2003 U.S.-led invasion to at least 3,103, according to the website icasualties.org, which tracks casualty figures in the war.

In the Shiite neighborhoods of Ur and Shaab, in northern Baghdad, residents said U.S. and Iraqi forces set up checkpoints Tuesday morning, snarling traffic for hours but doing little to reassure people of the new security plan's effectiveness.

Majid Abdullah, 42, who owns an auto parts shop in Shaab, said that most checkpoints had been dismantled by afternoon and that those remaining were manned by Iraqis, with U.S. troops only passing by occasionally.

"Frankly speaking, there doesn't seem to be anything different in their activities compared to any other days," he said. "In fact, they don't seem that enthusiastic and rarely ever search vehicles and passersby."

Abdullah complained that he had gone through the checkpoint several times in his car and had yet to be searched. "I want to be searched. We want them to be more diligent."

A resident of Ur said about 10 Strykers, hulking U.S. armored vehicles, had made their way through her neighborhood but become stuck on a narrow street. Unable to turn around, she said, the first Stryker rammed down the walls of a school and drove through it, followed by the rest of the convoy.

Maliki acknowledged delays in implementing the security plan he announced early last month and, after meeting with Iraqi military commanders, urged them to disprove skeptics who he said were doubting their ability or determination to stabilize Iraq.

"I address my speech to you, the Iraqi commanders, to prove and to show the world that you are up to the responsibility that is in your hands," he said.

Abdullah, however, made clear he was not optimistic.

"It's a new security plan every day, and there is all this hype about it when in fact it is not different and therefore will not make any difference," he said. "It's another disappointment."

Blair Urges Iran To Change Its Ways (AP)

By Thomas Wagner

AP, February 7, 2007

Prime Minister Tony Blair told lawmakers Tuesday that no military action is planned against Iran, but that international opinion is hardening against Tehran's nuclear ambitions and what he described as its interference in conflicts across the Middle East.

Iran has been widely criticized for links with Hezbollah in Lebanon, Hamas in the West Bank and Gaza, and Shiite militias fighting coalition forces in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0128741

Iran "is trying to prevent reconciliation across the region, and I think that is very shortsighted and very foolish," Blair told the House of Commons' Liaison Committee.

"If they were able to play a constructive role in Iraq, it would be of immense help to the international community. It would also actually be of immense help to Iran in the end since they don't want chaos on their borders," Blair said during his biannual appearance before the committee to discuss a wide range of local and international issues.

"You can't take any option off the table, but nobody is talking or planning military intervention. That's not what the international community wants, " Blair said. "It's not what we want."

President Bush has said the U.S. has no plans to invade Iran. But he recently increased the U.S. naval presence in the Persian Gulf to its highest level since 2003 by ordering a second aircraft carrier strike group to the region. Bush also has authorized the U.S. military to kill or capture any Iranian agents plotting attacks in Iraq against American forces.

The United States and several Western allies believe that Iran is using its nuclear program as a cover to produce atomic weapons — a charge Iran denies. Tehran says it seeks only to generate electricity.

Merkel Says Talks With Iran Still Possible (AFP)

AFP, February 7, 2007

German Chancellor Angela Merkel said that the door remains open for negotiations between Iran and the international community over its contested nuclear programme.

"Even if the United Nations has decided on sanctions, the door for negotiations remains open," Merkel said at a joint press conference with Kuwait's Prime Minister Sheikh Nasser Mohammad al-Ahmad al-Sabah.

"I hope that reason will prevail and that we will be able to hold talks again," added Merkel, whose country currently holds the rotating European Union presidency.

The premier of Kuwait, which lies just across the Gulf from Iran, also stressed the importance of going back to negotiations over Tehran's nuclear drive.

"It is important now to have unconditional negotiations. We have to sit down at the negotiating table and talk openly and without conditions," he said. "It is absolutely necessary to have peace in the region."

EU foreign ministers agreed late January to implement the full raft of UN sanctions against Iran to punish Tehran for failing to meet international demands over its nuclear programme.

The UN Security Council in December adopted a resolution imposing sanctions on Iran for its repeated refusal to fully cooperate with the UN atomic energy watchdog or suspend uranium enrichment.

Merkel was in Kuwait after a stop in the United Arab Emirates where she met Emirati President Khalifa bin Zayed al-Nahayan on Monday as part of talks with Gulf leaders on international efforts to revive the Middle East peace process.

Her regional tour has also taken her to Riyadh and Cairo.

Israel Sounds Alarm On Iran's Nuclear Efforts (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

JERUSALEM — Israeli leaders rarely invoke the Holocaust in the face of enemies. The Jewish homeland founded after Adolf Hitler's genocide has, for the last generation, felt secure enough to fight its many battles with little or no help.

But the specter of a nuclear-armed Iran has rattled Israel's self-confidence. Its politicians and generals warn of a "second Holocaust" if, as in the 1930s, the world stands by while a heavily armed nation declares war against the Jews.

Spelling out that scenario, Israeli officials have begun an unusually open campaign to muster international political and economic pressures against Iran. They warn that time is growing short and hint that they will resort to force if those pressures fail to prevent Iran's development of an atomic weapon.

Israeli leaders fear that an Iranian bomb would undermine their nation's security even if Tehran never detonated it. That Israel has its own nuclear arsenal would not counteract the psychological and strategic blow, they believe.

Israel began secretly preparing in the early 1990s for a possible air raid on Iran's then-nascent nuclear facilities and has been making oblique public statements about such planning for three years.

DOJ_NMG_0128742

What is new is Israel's abandonment of quiet diplomacy to rally others to its side. Until a few months ago, Israeli leaders worried that high-profile lobbying would backfire and provoke accusations that they were trying to drag the United States and its allies into a war.

Israel's new activism coincides with a recent drumbeat of U.S. threats against Iran, including President Bush's vow to "seek out and destroy" Iranian and Syrian networks he said were arming and training anti-American forces in Iraq, and his dispatch of a second aircraft carrier group to the Persian Gulf.

Several factors have contributed to Israel's more assertive campaign, Israeli officials and defense analysts said.

Israel's war against Iranian-backed Hezbollah guerrillas in Lebanon last summer brought Tehran's hostility alarmingly close to home. At the same time, the war made relatively moderate Sunni-dominated Arab nations more wary of Shiite Iran, easing Israel's isolation and creating a de facto anti-Iran coalition.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has repeatedly called for Israel's destruction. And while denying any plan to build an atomic weapon, Iran has continued to enrich uranium and acquire long-range missiles.

And Israeli leaders worry that the window is closing on any hope for decisive action by Bush, their most powerful supporter. The head of Mossad, Israel's foreign intelligence agency, told parliament late last year that Iran would be able to produce a nuclear weapon as early as 2009, the year Bush is to leave office. Other analysts have predicted a longer timetable.

Since last summer, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has sounded an alarm against Iran in public and in meetings with the leaders of Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Russia, China, Egypt and Jordan. He has also met twice with Bush.

"The Jewish people, on whom the scars of the Holocaust are deeply etched, cannot allow itself to again face a threat against its very existence," Olmert said last month in a speech reviewing the diplomatic campaign. "In the past, the world remained silent and the results are known. Our role is to prevent the world from repeating this mistake."

Israel strongly prefers that the world keep Iran from developing nuclear weapons through crippling, dissuasive economic sanctions, Olmert said. But he added: "We have the right to full freedom of action in defense of our vital interests. We will not hesitate to use it."

'Force them to reconsider'

Olmert on Tuesday reiterated that economic pressure might be enough to halt Iran.

"I think there is a way to stop the Iranians from moving forward on their nuclear program without violent actions," the prime minister said in a speech to visiting American Jewish leaders.

If wide-ranging sanctions can "cause such damage to the Iranian economy — and we see some signs already — it will force them to reconsider," he said.

Israel's new stance was evident in December as its lobbying contributed to a United Nations Security Council decision to ban the sale to Iran of materials used in uranium enrichment, reprocessing and building ballistic missiles. Enriched uranium can be used to produce electricity or a nuclear bomb.

Despite misgivings about the risk of a backlash, Israel is helping the United States push broader voluntary sanctions to cut Iran's trade credits, oil investments and ties to foreign banks. In that effort, it is helping the U.S. Treasury Department monitor the activities of Iranian banks abroad.

"It might be bad for Israel and bad for American Jews for Israel to be seen as pushing for action on Iran," said Yossi Klein Halevi, a senior fellow at the Shalem Center, a research institute in Jerusalem. "But we don't have the luxury of time anymore."

Iran says it is seeking nuclear technology for civilian purposes. But because it kept its program secret for 18 years and has failed to comply with U.N. nuclear inspections, Iran is presumed by Israel and Western countries to be trying to acquire the technology to make a bomb.

If Iran achieves that threshold, it will radically alter the region, Israeli officials and analysts said.

Emboldened by the bomb, they said, Iran could provide Islamic militant movements Hezbollah and Hamas with longer-range and deadlier rockets to fire at Israel than the current stock of Katyushas and Kassams. It could also veto any Palestinian or other Arab effort to make peace with the Jewish state.

No longer a deterrent

DOJ_NMG_0128743

Israel's possession of nuclear weapons since the late 1960s, though rarely acknowledged by its leaders, has worked as a deterrent until now.

"For decades, the Arab countries … knew they couldn't beat Israel, so there was no coalition forming against us," said Maj. Gen. Amos Gilad, director of the Defense Ministry's Political-Military Bureau.

But soon, he said, "the Iranians could create a belief that they can beat us, and under their umbrella create an axis that will destabilize the Middle East."

Also, Sunni Arab countries — Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Algeria, Jordan and Libya — could strive to build atomic weapons to compete with Shiite Iran, making any regional conflict a potential nuclear tinderbox, he said.

In such an environment, many Israelis might flee. A December poll in the newspaper Maariv found that 27% of Israelis would leave or consider leaving if Iran acquired nuclear weapons. Two-thirds of those surveyed said they believed Iran would drop a nuclear weapon on Israel.

Apocalyptic scenarios involving Iran dominated last month's annual Herzliya conference, Israel's premier gathering of foreign policy, defense and security specialists. Participants pressed several U.S. presidential hopefuls on how they planned to thwart Iran's nuclear ambitions.

"I see a syndrome of America acting late," Sami Friedrich, an Israeli management consultant, lectured Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who joined the conference by video hookup from Washington. "America came in late in the Second World War. Now America accepts the diagnosis that it failed to imagine the worst with Al Qaeda. America has this worrying pattern."

Despite the anxiety, Israeli officials at the conference said they were hopeful that sanctions would force Iran to suspend its enrichment program.

They were encouraged by Ahmadinejad's setback in recent local elections, rising unemployment and inflation in Iran, and reports that domestic criticism of the president was escalating.

Vice Premier Shimon Peres told students in Qatar last week that Israel's problem was with Ahmadinejad, not the Iranian people, and it did not "intend to use military action."

If Ahmadinejad were to fall, "someone else would come to power, someone less hostile, and the question of whether they have nuclear capability will be less important," said Uri Lubrani, a former Israeli ambassador to Iran who advises the Defense Ministry and opposes military action.

That, however, appears to be a minority view in the government and defense establishment. Other officials and analysts argue that voluntary sanctions are unlikely to win full support from European countries and in any case would be undermined by Russia, China and India. They say time is too short and the stakes too high to bet solely on a change in government.

"We cannot sit back and wait for a revolution," said Isaac Ben-Israel, a reserve air force major general who heads Tel Aviv University's Security Studies Program.

Ben-Israel helped plan the 1981 Israeli air raid that destroyed Iraq's Osirak nuclear reactor. He said Israel had the capacity to set back Iran's atomic program by striking a few key targets, such as its uranium conversion facility at Esfahan, its enrichment facility at Natanz and its heavy-water reactor at Arak.

'A new front in Iran'

But Israel lacks the capability for a sustained offensive that might be needed to strike the bulk of Iran's facilities. Because of that, Ben-Israel and other officials say, Israel would prefer to join in an American-led attack on Iran — a scenario Bush has refused to rule out. But they worry that Bush has been so weakened at home by the Iraq war that "opening a new front in Iran may not be feasible for him," Ben-Israel said.

Israelis have been hinting strongly that they are prepared to act on their own. In an article in last week's issue of the New Republic, Halevi and Michael Oren, also a senior fellow at the Shalem Center, wrote that if Israel decided to strike, it would probably do so within 18 months.

Israel would wait long enough to give sanctions a chance to work, the authors predicted, but not so long that Iran's facilities would become radioactive, making the consequences of bombing them far more lethal.

Robert J. Einhorn, the assistant secretary of State for nonproliferation in the Clinton administration, said Israel's threats, coupled with the possibility of U.S. military action, could help bolster the push for sanctions.

DOJ_NMG_0128744

"It's important that not only the Iranians believe the military option is credible," said Einhorn, who is a senior advisor at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a Washington think tank. "The more the Europeans believe the use of military force is thinkable in Iran, the more they will be prepared to use economic leverage to avoid that possibility.

"Israel is sounding the alarm with lots of countries, urging them to do all sorts of things," he said. But if those efforts fail, "they are going to have to decide whether to act unilaterally and militarily. That will be a very hard decision."

Iran's Economic Conditions Deteriorate (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON — U.S. and Western pressure on Iran is squeezing its economy, feeding the inflation and joblessness that have swelled under its controversial president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Trade figures and other data have begun to reflect deepening economic isolation taking place as a result of U.S.-led efforts to penalize Tehran for what the United States alleges is the pursuit of nuclear weapons and sponsorship of terrorist groups.

For example, Iran's imports from Germany fell 14% in the first eight months of 2006, the German-Iranian Chamber of Commerce says. European Union countries account for 40% of Iran's imports, and Germany is Iran's largest European supplier, providing machinery, steel and electrical equipment, along with other goods.

German government export credits, used to finance trade, also fell by a third last year and are expected to drop again this year, said Ulrich Sante, a spokesman at the German Embassy in Washington.

"People who want to pursue legitimate commerce with the West will see that the policies Ahmadinejad is pursuing are leading to isolation and painting a more bleak economic future for the country," said Stuart Levey, U.S. Treasury undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence.

The United Nations Security Council imposed sanctions on Iran in December after Tehran failed to suspend uranium enrichment. The sanctions block exports that can be used in Iran's nuclear and missile programs and freeze assets of officials linked to those programs.

Separately, the Bush administration has cut off two Iranian banks from access to the U.S. financial system and dollar-based transactions on grounds that terrorists and weapons programs used accounts at those banks.

The United States has had no diplomatic relations with Iran and has restricted trade with Tehran since 1980, when Iran took U.S. Embassy personnel hostage.

Iran's economic challenges include:

•Banking restrictions. A half-dozen European banks have ended or restricted dollar dealings with Tehran to avoid jeopardizing business with the United States. Mohammad Jafar Mojarrad, vice governor of Iran's Central Bank, said most of the lenders continue dealing with Iran in other currencies.

Peter Pietsch, spokesman for giant German bank Commerzbank, said the institution halted dollar transactions with Iran on Jan. 31 but still conducts transactions with Iranians in euros.

Credit Suisse, a major Swiss-based financial services firm, stopped taking new clients in Iran in late 2005 "in light of the developments in the country … as well as to safeguard our reputation," spokeswoman Esther Gerster said.

•Rising import costs. Saeed Laylaz, a Tehran business consultant, said exporters require Iranian buyers to deposit the full amount of a transaction to obtain letters of credit, and that has added 8% to 12% to the cost of imports.

•Declining oil production. Oil Minister Kazem Vaziri-Hamaneh told the Iranian Student News Agency last year that Iran's annual oil output had declined by half a million barrels per day as the country struggled to pump from aging fields. Iran produces 3.9 million barrels per day and exports 2.4 million. Roger Stern, an economist at Johns Hopkins University, has predicted that Iranian oil exports could decline to zero by 2015 without a significant increase in investment or a decline in domestic consumption.

Mojarrad said Iran was taking steps to encourage new investment. He cited a $10 billion deal signed last month by Spain's Repsol and Royal Dutch Shell to develop an offshore Iranian field.

DOJ_NMG_0128745

The Iranian economy continues to grow at a rate of more than 5% a year in inflation-adjusted figures, Mojarrad said. He said sanctions will hurt Americans more than Iranians by undermining the use of the dollar as a reserve currency, depressing its value and making U.S. imports more expensive.

Even before the latest sanctions, the Iranian president's rhetoric — calling for Israel to be destroyed — and defiance on the nuclear issue appeared to have a chilling effect on investment and trade.

Iran faced "a cooling off of the business environment in the last year because of the nuclear issue and the rhetoric" of Ahmadinejad, said Adam Pener of the Conflict Securities Advisory Group, a Washington-based consulting firm.

Laylaz said the sanctions have added to problems caused by Ahmadinejad's free-spending policies. Inflation — officially 12%, according to Iran's Central Bank — is likely to rise to 15% this year, Laylaz said.

Unemployment was 11.5% in the year ending in March, 1.2% higher than the previous year, according to the Iran Statistical Center. Food prices rose by a third from March to August, the cost of housing went up 14%, and the cost of medical care increased more than 18%, said Iran's Karafarin Bank, which provides overviews of the Iranian economy to the International Monetary Fund.

Joblessness rose in spite of a 37% increase in Iran's hard currency earnings, derived mainly from oil. Iran's oil revenue was $50 billion last year. Oil revenue, taxes on oil and other oil-related income financed more than 70% of Iran's government spending, according to Karafarin Bank.

Challenging The Mullahs, One Signature At A Time (NYT)

By Maura J. Casey

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

"Well-behaved women rarely make history," my favorite bumper sticker says. It surely applies to Shirin Ebadi, the Iranian lawyer and 2003 Nobel Peace Prize winner whose relentless campaign against discrimination has enraged the mullahs for more than 25 years.

In a country where the law values a woman's life at only half the price of a man's, Ms. Ebadi will not be quiet, and she is urging other women to find their voices. Her newest effort is to help collect the signatures of one million Iranian women on a petition protesting their lack of legal rights.

The concept is simple and revolutionary, melding education, consciousness-raising and peaceful protest. Starting last year, women armed with petitions began to go to wherever other women gathered: schools, hair salons, doctors' offices and private homes.

Every woman is asked to sign. But whatever a woman decides, she receives a leaflet explaining how Iran's interpretation of Islamic law denies women full rights.

The material explains how Iran's divorce law makes it easy for men, and incredibly difficult for women, to leave a marriage, and how custody laws give divorced fathers sole rights to children above the age of 7.

Ms. Ebadi says the petition drive has already trained "400 young women to educate others" about these injustices. The movement, made up of a network of women's organizations and publications, has no formal leadership, in part to lessen the chances of retaliation. That didn't help three female journalists who were arrested late last month after they wrote articles for feminist publications backing the drive. They have since been released but will face a hearing in two months. Ms. Ebadi will defend them.

It's only natural to wonder how many more women will be arrested as they rebel, one signature at a time. And only natural to marvel about the courage of the 30,000 women who have already signed.

The movement is doing on a grand scale what Ms. Ebadi has done for her entire adult life. When I last spoke with her, eight years ago in her Tehran home, she had emerged as a tenacious human rights campaigner after being forced to step down as a judge by the Islamic revolution. She was blunt about the lack of freedom in Iran and well aware of the price for such outspokenness.

She's been arrested and imprisoned and the target of death threats. In New York in January for meetings at the United Nations, she was just as defiant and just as unafraid as I remembered. Winning the Nobel Prize has not given her immunity.

DOJ_NMG_0128746

There's a lot to speak out about. When Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, is not propagating lies about the Holocaust or cheering on Iran's nuclear program, he's having independent journalists arrested. But he is not the only problem. Above him is the hard-line Council of Guardians and above it the supreme religious leader. The Council of Guardians vetoed legislation increasing civil liberties and banned most moderates from running for Parliament in 2004.

Given the breadth of the institutional opposition arrayed against them, the Change for Equality Petition Drive is especially clever. Rather than directly confronting the system, it goes around it. Even women who don't sign the petition will be better informed about their second-class status. The hope is that they will then be less likely to accept injustice indefinitely. And if Iran's women start questioning their lack of rights, perhaps Iran's men will have the courage to speak out, too.

The government certainly understands the implications. Just a few weeks ago, it blocked access to the campaign's Web site. But within hours the women had another Web site up and running.

Ms. Ebadi, the lifelong agitator, does not mask her pride or her belief that women's voices will someday make all the difference. "By getting one million signatures, the world will know we object to these conditions," she said. And I can't help but think that instead of one courageous woman for the government to contend with, it will have reaped a million.

Iraqi Premier Admits Errors In Introducing Security Plan In Baghdad (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 6 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki acknowledged for the first time on Tuesday that his government had stumbled in its efforts to carry out a new security plan in Baghdad and that the delays and mounting violence were hurting its credibility with the Iraqi people.

"I feel that we are late," he said in an address to his senior military commanders that was broadcast live on Iraqi national television. "This delay is giving a negative impression and has led some people to say that we have already failed."

Pressure is increasing on the Maliki government to show signs of progress on the security plan that was announced more than a month ago, especially after three weeks of bloody violence that has killed 3,000 civilians.

Mr. Maliki made it clear to the commanders that they needed to show results soon. "I call on you to quickly finish the preparations so that we don't disappoint people," he said.

Mr. Maliki offered no reasons for the delay, but Iraqi military officials have expressed frustration over the slow pace and have cited several problems, including the failure of Iraqi troops from other parts of the country to arrive on schedule in Baghdad, the capital.

The choice of top commanders, drawn from the army and the police, has largely been settled, the officials said, but was slowed by sectarian disagreements, with Shiites objecting to Sunnis and Sunnis objecting to Shiites.

Integrating the Iraqi police force with the army, essential to the plan, remains a problem, officers say. Some Sunni neighborhoods remain off limits to the police, because they are thought to be deeply infiltrated by Shiite militias and are widely distrusted by Sunni residents.

The stepped up pace of the violence against Shiites since the plan was announced, which American and Iraqi officials say is part of a strategy by Sunni insurgents to undermine the government, has further convinced many Shiites that the Iraqi security forces are hapless.

Mr. Maliki told his commanders that they needed to be aggressive and to deploy their troops in force soon to combat that impression, and he promised that unspecified elements of the crackdown would start within days.

"We should not be late, because any more delay would raise suspicions about the military and police forces," he said.

Mr. Maliki has sought to put an Iraqi face on the new plan, but people whose lives have been torn apart by the bloodshed here have also blamed the Americans for failing to provide security. American officials have defended the pace of the operation, emphasizing that it involves a rolling buildup of forces that will take time.

On Tuesday, few signs indicated that anything had changed on the streets of Baghdad, aside from some new checkpoints scattered around the city. An aggressive clearing operation began Tuesday night in a Sunni neighborhood in eastern Baghdad. Iraqi officials said it was part of the new crackdown, but similar operations have been under way for weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0128747

American military officials said one large event to signal the start of the crackdown was unlikely.

The violence continued Tuesday, though perhaps more slowly than in the past few days. An employee in the prime minister's office who was working on antiterrorism issues was killed, a police official said.

Three car bombs killed at least six people and wounded 17 more, gunmen killed two police officers, and 11 people were kidnapped from a house in the Sadr City section of Baghdad overnight.

Mr. Maliki's aides said that while they were frustrated by the delay, trying to rush the security plan into action before the forces were ready would only compound the problems.

"It could be like an abortion for this operation," said Sadiq al-Rikabi, a political adviser to the prime minister. "Finishing it before it starts."

American officers said the new plan, under which an additional 17,000 American forces are to be deployed in Baghdad, would not necessarily have an official start. They said it would be more accurate to describe the effort as a broader strategy shift that would put American troops in Baghdad neighborhoods in more aggressive ways, living and working with Iraqi troops.

The Americans are arriving in staggered intervals over months, and troops on the ground are beginning to carry out the new strategy, the officers said. In western Baghdad, American forces are living with Iraqi soldiers at new Joint Security Stations in two neighborhoods. More stations are under construction.

From the beginning, American officers have cautioned that the new plan would take time, because any chance of success rests on building trust with a population whose faith has been severely tested by nearly a year of vicious sectarian violence. But they know that time is not on their side.

"There have to be some early successes to establish momentum," said one battlefield commander, who like the others spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not designated to talk with reporters.

Despite the setbacks, the shape of the Iraqi side of the plan is coming into focus.

Last month, Mr. Maliki appointed Lt. Gen. Aboud Qanbar as the overall Iraqi commander for forces in Baghdad. General Qanbar, who had worked in the prime minister's office for six months on security issues, was not Mr. Maliki's first choice; that one was rejected by the Americans as too sectarian. But Mr. Maliki, in turn, rejected the candidate proposed by the Americans, leading to a bitter row that ultimately ended with the Americans accepting General Qanbar, who was largely unknown to them.

But one of General Qanbar's chief selling points to Iraqi officials was precisely his relative obscurity since the American invasion in 2003. "There are many officers who could do the job better, but appointing them would have caused an uproar among the Sunnis," an Iraqi officer said.

Under the new plan, two other commanders will report directly to General Qanbar, one responsible for eastern Baghdad and the other responsible for western Baghdad. The Iraqis and the Americans have agreed on those appointments.

The plan also calls for Baghdad to be divided into nine security districts, each with a commander. Those choices were completed recently, Iraqi officials said.

Kuwait Court Convicts Iraqi Lawmaker In 1983 Bombings That Killed 5 Americans (NYT)

By James Glanz And Marc Santora

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 5 — A sitting member of Parliament was convicted more than two decades ago of planning the attacks on the American and French Embassies in Kuwait that left five Americans dead in 1983, Iraqi and American officials said Tuesday.

The Parliament member, Jamal Jafaar Mohammed Ali Ebrahimi, was sentenced to death in absentia by a court in Kuwait for the 1983 attacks. He was elected to Parliament in 2005 as a part of the Shiite coalition that now governs Iraq.

"We are actively investigating these serious allegations and continue to be in contact with the government of Iraq to pursue this case," said Lou Fintor, a spokesman for the American Embassy here.

Mr. Jamal, as he is known, served for a while as a security adviser to Iraq's first prime minister after the American invasion, Ibrahim al-Jafaari, officials in Washington said. It was then that they first suspected that he was involved in the 1983 embassy attacks. Their suspicions grew over the past year, and they are almost certain of the connection today.

DOJ_NMG_0128748

It was unclear when American officials first raised the issue with the current prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, but one official said there have been discussions for at least several months.

The embassy bombings led to the kidnapping of at least seven Americans in Lebanon and several other terrorist acts aimed at freeing 17 prisoners under death sentences in Kuwait for the attacks. The hostage-taking also led to a scandal in the Reagan administration — famously involving the delivery of a cake in the shape of a key by a presidential envoy — as Washington sought the hostages' freedom with the offer of a secret arms deal to help Iran, which was then at war with Iraq.

Mr. Jamal, who was in Iraq until a week ago, is now in Iran, according to two associates. The presence of a wanted terrorist in the Parliament of Iraq's American-backed government is likely to be an embarrassment for the United States, particularly given Iran's role in sheltering Mr. Jamal.

The United States and Iran are locked in a standoff of sorts in Iraq. The United States has warned Iran against meddling in Iraq and American forces have detained a number of Iranians here on charges of providing assistance to illicit armed groups. Iran, a Shiite state with deep and longstanding ties to Iraq's Shiite political parties, has denied those charges and announced that it plans to expand its ties with Iraq.

Tensions between the rivals rose higher on Tuesday as Iran said it held the United States responsible for the safety of an Iranian diplomat kidnapped in Iraq two days before. Although the diplomat, Jalal Sharafi, was abducted on a Baghdad street by men wearing Iraqi military uniforms and with official identification, Iran has accused the United States of directing the operation. American officials deny any involvement.

"The Islamic Republic of Iran holds U.S. forces responsible for his safety and demands his immediate release," Iran's foreign ministry spokesman, Mohammad Ali Hosseini, told the ISNA news agency on Tuesday.

But Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a spokesman for the American-led forces in Iraq, said: "This specific event we don't have any knowledge of."

There was no news on Mr. Sharafi's fate on Tuesday.

How Mr. Jamal went unnoticed for so long in the Iraqi government was a mystery that Iraqi officials were at a loss to explain.

The story of how he came to power, his close association with many Iraqi officials, and his long association with Iran all underscore the complicated and intertwined nature of the relationship between the two nations.

Mr. Jamal, who also goes by the name Abu Mahdi al-Mohandis, meaning the engineer, was first identified as a wanted terrorist a month ago by Strategic Policy Consulting, an Iranian dissident group in Washington that gets much of its information from the People's Mujahedeen, the largest and most militant group opposed to Tehran.

However, it was only on Tuesday, when CNN confirmed the group's assertion, that American officials acknowledged they were investigating the case. But several Iraqi officials who know Mr. Jamal said there was little doubt that he was involved in the bombing in Kuwait.

Ali al-Timimi, a Shiite politician who met Mr. Jamal in the early 1980s and used to be a member of the same political party, the Supreme Council for Revolution in Iraq, or Sciri, said Mr. Jamal came back to Iraq shortly after the American invasion in 2003. Another Iraqi politician, insisting on anonymity, confirmed that Mr. Jamal worked for a time for Mr. Jafaari as his security adviser.

Mr. Jafaari, like Mr. Jamal and many other leading Iraqi officials, spent years in exile in Iran while Saddam Hussein, a Sunni, was in power. That was where Mr. Timimi got to know both men. His account was supported by one other Iraqi official who was an associate of Mr. Jamal's, but who insisted on anonymity.

Mr. Timimi said Mr. Jamal, who was from the southern city of Basra, left Iraq in 1979, fleeing to the Iranian town of Ahvaz, just across the border.

The Iranians, who were fighting a war with Iraq at the time, had set up a camp there to train Iraqi dissidents, with the ultimate goal of undermining Mr. Hussein. The bombing operation was opposed by some who worried about reprisals against the thousands of Iraqis in Kuwait without official papers. But Mr. Jamal "insisted on this operation and helped plan these attacks," Mr. Timimi said.

DOJ_NMG_0128749

But the plotters outsourced the actual bomb making to a Lebanese cell, and among the 17 sentenced to death were three Lebanese, which spurred a series of hostage takings in Lebanon and other terrorist acts, which included the hijacking of a Kuwaiti airliner to Tehran in December 1984, in which two Americans aboard were killed.

The Kuwaiti government steadfastly refused either to free the prisoners or to execute them, but they are believed to have escaped in the confusion attendant with Saddam Hussein's invasion of Kuwait in 1990 and the subsequent American attack that drove the Iraqis out.

Terror Takes Toll On Market, Vendors (WT)

By James Palmer

The Washington Times, February 7, 2007

BAGHDAD -- Along a row of tables that crowd a bustling sidewalk, women in billowing black abayas sift through heaps of newly picked tomatoes, bell peppers, cucumbers, eggplant, carrots, cauliflower and potatoes.

Down the street, a fishmonger watches over a pushcart filled with carp feebly splashing in the cloudy water for their last breaths.

This is the Abu Shujaa Market in the Karrada district of central Baghdad, a nearly century-old mishmash of pushcarts, collapsible stalls and permanent shops.

Such marketplaces have become favorite targets for sectarian attacks, including a horrific suicide truck bombing Saturday that killed at least 135 persons -- the deadliest single assault in the 46 months of the war.

Police, ever on the watch for car bombs, prevent most vehicles from parking at the side of the road, while shop owners often place barricades along the curbs to prevent unfamiliar drivers from stopping in front of their businesses.

This area suffered five terrorist strikes last year, according to local residents and traders. Yesterday, merchants at Abu Shujaa complained that the deteriorating security had hurt their sales, even as their costs continue to climb.

Hamada Mohammed Ali, a 30-year-old produce vendor, said his daily earnings have fallen by half, to just under $100, since he inherited his sprawling stand from his father two years ago.

"Fewer people are coming by because they're afraid," Mr. Ali said, as he sat perched on a plastic crate above a scale and a set of metal measuring weights.

Uday Kasim, 29, who runs the butcher shop his family has owned since 1973, said many of his regular customers have left the country, and today he earns "just enough to live on." All of the lamb and beef Mr. Kasim sells in his shop must be hauled over increasingly dangerous roads from farms outside of the capital.

Rather than pay someone else, produce seller Hussein Gatti, 37, braves some of Iraq's most treacherous roads to secure his fruits and vegetables. The round trip to Mahmoudiya, 11 miles each way, often takes him more than two hours.

Other merchants say they are unable to cut their expenses and are on the verge of going broke.

Hassam Nadim, 37, who peddles housewares from a space approximately 20 feet deep and 5 feet wide, said he is behind on last month's rent of roughly $230.

"My business is down because of the explosions, but the government is doing nothing to protect us," Mr. Nadim complained.

The one sector that appears to be thriving in the market is the pharmaceutical industry. Akram Najy, 69, a pharmacist here for four decades, said prescriptions for sedatives remain steady, and demand for cold medications at this time of year is as high as ever.

The shoppers, for their part, grumble that rising prices are forcing them to limit their purchases to essential items, and the constant threat of car bombs and mortars deters them from lingering in one place.

Abdul Razak, a 61-year-old clerk in the Agriculture Ministry, said he can afford to spend only little more than $23 a day to feed a household of 12. "I buy vegetables every day, but I can only afford fruit once a week."

Mr. Ali, the produce vendor, said he has raised his prices 10 percent to compensate for his dwindling customer base, so now a pound of potatoes or tomatoes at his stand costs roughly 37 cents.

DOJ_NMG_0128750

As a consequence, shoppers have little left to spend with people like 28-year-old fishmonger Raad Ahmed. "I can't sell more than 15,000 dinars ($11.63) a day," Mr. Ahmed said.

For the enterprising, however, there are opportunities created by the chronically faltering infrastructure.

Waleed Khalid now sells 12 kerosene lanterns a day on the sidewalk outside of his brother's hardware shop.

"I came out to sell these things because no one was coming into the shop," said the 26-year-old Mr. Khalid.

U.S. Mulls Iraq Refugees (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, February 7, 2007

The State Department said yesterday it will re-examine U.S. policy on the admission of Iraqi refugees, likely leading to a sharp increase in the number it admits each year.

A task force set up by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice this week also will try to resettle in the United States some Iraqi employees of the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad, whose lives are in danger because of their work for Americans.

The steps follow sharp criticism from humanitarian organizations and members of Congress, who note that Middle Eastern countries are struggling with a flood of Iraqi refugees while the United States has admitted only 466 since the war began in 2003.

"Clearly, there is a need that exists, and there are problems that need to be addressed," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters, saying it was too early to discuss how many Iraqis the United States can absorb.

"We want to do what is appropriate, what is right under our obligations under the U.N. Charter in providing our fair share of relief for those individuals who have been classified as refugees," he said.

Supporters of the existing policy have warned that hostile elements such as al Qaeda terrorists might try to enter the United States posing as refugees. Mr. McCormack did not say what steps might be taken to screen the applicants.

The U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), a Geneva-based agency that determines who qualifies as a refugee, estimates that at least 1.6 million Iraqis are internally displaced and up to 1.8 million have fled to neighboring countries. Those figures include people displaced before 2003.

"Between January and mid-November 2006, an estimated 425,000 Iraqis fled their homes for other areas inside Iraq, most of them following sectarian violence sparked by the bombing of an important Shia mosque in February 2006," the UNHCR said last month.

"At midyear, internal displacement was estimated to be continuing at a rate of some 50,000 a month," it said.

According to UNHCR rules, only those in a foreign country at the time of their application qualify for refugee status. Once the agency grants applicants that status, it starts to look for countries willing to take them in. Most Iraqi refugees are now in Jordan, Syria and Egypt.

Critics of the administration have argued that the United States has a moral responsibility to admit many more Iraqi refugees than the 466 accepted so far because their suffering is directly related to the conditions in Iraq created by the U.S. invasion.

"Washington is spending about $2 billion per week on the war in Iraq, but has barely begun to address the human fallout from the war," Bill Frelick, refugee-policy director at Human Rights Watch, said last month.

The United States admitted almost 1 million Vietnamese in the years before and after the fall of Saigon in 1975. Many who had worked with U.S. forces were brought to America immediately, while tens of thousands more fled as "boat people" and came to the United States after being processed at camps in the Philippines and elsewhere.

There were no large-scale refugee movements after the Persian Gulf War in 1991.

Mr. McCormack did not agree that the United States has a moral obligation in the case of the Iraqis, saying the plight of those fleeing their homes is a "shared global responsibility." He also noted that many Iraqis were displaced by Saddam Hussein's regime before the war.

Congress has mandated that the United States absorb 70,000 refugees this year, and 50,000 of those slots have been allocated among geographic regions. The remaining 20,000 have no specific designation, and the administration plans to use some of those slots to accommodate Iraqis, officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0128751

The new task force, which will be chaired by Paula J. Dobriansky, undersecretary of state for democracy and global affairs, also will try to help Iraqis working for the U.S. government in Iraq, most of whom have either lost family members or had their lives threatened.

Mr. McCormack said those Iraqis would be granted a "special immigrant visa," but it was not clear how that would be worked out legally. There are two main tracks for obtaining such a visa -- through employment or a family reunion.

In rare circumstances, an applicant can receive what is known as a "genius visa" for exceptional abilities in arts or sciences. Even more seldom, Congress can bestow permanent resident status on someone if it determines that it would be in the U.S. national interest.

Mr. McCormack would not say whether the Iraqis would be offered employment with the government. He cited an existing Pentagon program for Iraqis who have worked for the U.S. military.

"It is allowing people to emigrate to the United States based on meeting a certain set of conditions, the most important of which is some length of service working for the United States government," he said.

Refugees Are An Overlooked Casualty Of Iraq War (USAT)

By Behzad Yaghmaian

USA Today, February 7, 2007

Casualties of the war in Iraq are many; among them are the 3.8 million refugees (including some who fled before the U.S. invasion) and internally displaced people. They are the hidden victims of the war in Iraq.

Not long ago, in 1991, the first Gulf War produced another massive refugee crisis in Iraq. Encouraged by the promise of U.S. support, millions of Iraqis responded to President George H.W. Bush's call "to take matters into their own hands and force Saddam Hussein … to step aside." These Iraqis fought the good fight, but U.S. support did not materialize.

Hussein responded by sending troops to quell the rebellion by Kurds in the north and Shiites in the south. Scores of Kurdish refugees were killed by Iraqi soldiers or died on snow-covered slopes. What ended this crisis were the horrific images of stranded Kurdish refugees aired on CNN, which resulted in the declaration of a no-fly zone in Northern Iraq.

Now, the United States and its allies again have caused a refugee crisis in Iraq — "the largest population movement in the Middle East since Palestinians were displaced following the creation of the state of Israel in 1948," according to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR). But this time, CNN's cameras are missing.

Forgotten refugees queue outside foreign embassies and the offices of the UNHCR in Syria and Jordan, pleading for acceptance as refugees by the West. The UNHCR estimates there are between 500,000 and 1 million Iraqi refugees in Syria, 700,000 in Jordan, 40,000 in Lebanon and 20,000-80,000 in Egypt; 1.8 million are internally displaced. But these refugees face closed doors everywhere.

The Iraqis probably could have seen this coming. Afghan refugees faced a similar fate after the fall of the Taliban in 2001. Afghanistan was soon declared a safe country. Western states encouraged refugees to return home to rebuild their country. For most, it didn't work out. Soon scores of Afghans were driven from their places of birth and forced to wander elsewhere in the world for refuge.

This seems to be the future that awaits Iraqi refugees. Only 466 have been granted resettlement in the USA in the past two years. The situation is not much better in Great Britain. Evidently, to allow admission to refugees is to accept failure in establishing democracy in Iraq.

The long-term solution depends on ending the violence, restoring stability and generating jobs. Because peace is highly unlikely anytime soon, Iraqi refugees require immediate attention. But the U.N.'s refugee office is understaffed and underfunded. For example, in Syria, UNHRC's budget last year was less than $1 per Iraqi refugee.

It is critical that Western nations finance a special Iraqi Refugee Fund that would let the U.N. process an increasing number of Iraqi applicants seeking resettlement. A part of the fund could be given to Syria and Jordan to help them provide temporary housing, health care, education and other basic needs to refugees. Western nations should increase the number of Iraqis they accept for temporary or permanent resettlement.

DOJ_NMG_0128752

U.S. embassies in Syria and Jordan should run their own resettlement programs, clearing the most vulnerable Iraqis. Using similar resettlement programs, hundreds of thousands of Vietnamese were resettled in the United States after U.S. forces withdrew from Vietnam in 1975; 840 Iraqis were granted admission after the first Gulf War in 1991.

Helping to solve the current crisis is a moral obligation of those who contributed to its creation. The Iraqi refugee crisis and its solution must become an integral part of the public debate about the U.S. involvement in Iraq.

Behzad Yaghmaian is author of Embracing the Infidel: Stories of Muslim Migrants on the Journey West and professor of political economy at New Jersey's Ramapo College.

Tape Recounts U.S. Attack That Killed British Soldier (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 6 — The videotape is jolting enough, but it is the audio portion — the conversation between two American pilots in Iraq — that is most unnerving.

In the 2003 recording, seconds after the pilots congratulate themselves for having hit enemy armored vehicles, they learn that they have in fact struck their British allies, killing one soldier and wounding others.

They fall apart in a duet of shock, panicked swearing and audible weeping. "I'm going to be sick," one says. "We're in jail, dude."

The material became public on Tuesday when the newspaper The Sun published a leaked transcript of the cockpit conversation and posted the video on its Web site. As a result, the American military announced later in the day that it would permit the videotape to be shown to the British coroner's court investigating the circumstances surrounding the death of the soldier who had been killed in the incident, Lance Cpl. Matty Hull, a member of the Household Cavalry Regiment.

Four other members of the regiment were wounded in the attack, on March 28, 2003, while the convoy was on a reconnaissance mission near Basra in southern Iraq.

The United States military investigated the incident soon afterward, and no charges were brought against the two pilots, both members of the Idaho National Guard, said Lt. Col. Teresa Connor, a spokeswoman for United States Central Command.

"The incident took place in a complex combat situation, and the pilots followed all the appropriate procedures and processes for engaging targets," she said in an interview. "They verified with the ground controller, and verified visually, and reverified."

The transcript shows that the pilots repeatedly asked about the orange panels on the roofs of the tanks below — an indicator, usually, that the vehicles belonged to allied forces — and were repeatedly told that there were no "friendlies," or allies, in the area. It was not until they had fired twice on the convoy, setting fire to the tanks, that the information changed, and they were told they had instigated a "blue on blue" incident, hitting British troops.

"I don't think you could find anyone more remorseful than those two pilots," Colonel Connor said. "If you listen to the words, you hear very much remorse immediately."

It is standard practice in Britain to hold inquests when soldiers die in combat, and this one, which opened on Jan. 30, has been singular in its implicit criticism of the unwillingness of the authorities — particularly the American authorities — to provide information about Lance Corporal Hull's death. The Americans gave the British authorities the tape in 2003. Last week, the coroner, Andrew Walker, asked the British Defense Ministry to release the recording and transcript of the cockpit conversation.

But the ministry argued that it had no choice in the matter.

"The U.K. is not authorized to release documents subject to U.S. classification without U.S. authority, and the decision as to whether that authority can be given is being addressed urgently," a lawyer for the ministry told the court last week.

In a burst of anger, Mr. Walker said: "This is a simple matter, and I simply fail to understand why it is proving so difficult to resolve. At the heart of this matter is a grieving family who have already had to wait far too long for this inquest."

On Friday, he said he planned to adjourn the inquest until the recording was released.

The release of the material by The Sun — under the headline "Top Secret Video Nails U.S. Friendly Fire Pilots Who Killed Our Matty" — broke the impasse, but put the Americans on the defensive.

DOJ_NMG_0128753

"We were working through the issues at the time this story broke," Colonel Connor said. "The process never had a chance to unfold."

Asked why no Americans had testified at the inquest, David Johnson, deputy chief of mission at the United States Embassy here, said it was not American policy to bring soldiers into civilian courts to answer questions about combat.

The United States had "cooperated fully with the military authorities," he said on the Today radio program.

'I Think They're Rocket Launchers' (WP)

By Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 6 -- A dramatic cockpit recording leaked to a British newspaper captures two American pilots reacting in horror and disbelief after one of them mistakenly fired on a convoy of British armored vehicles in Iraq. Told that an allied soldier has died, a pilot is heard saying, "I'm going to be sick" and "We're in jail, dude."

The friendly-fire incident that killed Lance Cpl. Matty Hull, 25, occurred on March 28, 2003, eight days into the Iraq invasion, but the recording was made public only Tuesday by the Sun newspaper. The U.S. government had declined to declassify it. But recently a British coroner investigating the corporal's death demanded that the recording, a cockpit video, be presented as evidence, suspending his proceedings until it was produced.

In Britain, where the Iraq war is highly unpopular, the video caused an uproar with its vivid depiction of an attack that some people here say could have been avoided. Hull's family has expressed anger over his death.

Hours after the video was posted to the Sun's Web site and clips were aired on British television, the Pentagon said it would release the recording to the coroner and the family. Des Browne, the British defense secretary, welcomed the decision, saying, "The release of classified information, even for the closest of allies, is never straightforward, but this is the right thing to do."

While there have been numerous friendly-fire incidents, the U.S. government rarely releases video and audio recordings related to them. "If you show certain tactics and capabilities, of course your enemy can see it, too," said Air Force Lt. Col. Teresa Connor, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Central Command.

The Sun said there had been a half-million downloads of the recording by late afternoon.

The 15-minute video shows the view forward from the cockpit of an A-10 Thunderbolt attack jet, as well as computerized flight data. Its audio track includes the voices of the jet's pilot, the pilot of another A-10 flying in tandem, the voices of several U.S. ground controllers and the sounds of the attacking aircraft's guns.

The two pilots are heard asking a ground controller if there are any friendly troops in the area near Basra where they are patrolling. The answer comes back: "You are well clear of friendlies."

Because of mistaken attacks in past conflicts, friendly vehicles advancing into Iraq were being marked by orange panels visible from the sky.

One of the U.S. pilots who has spotted a convoy of vehicles remarks: "They got something orange on top of them." Later, he says, "I think they're rocket launchers."

One of the jets strafes the vehicles with rapid-fire cannons, then stages a second attack. Shortly afterward, another ground controller is heard telling the pilots: "You have friendly armor in the area."

The pilots are told to abort the mission and, audibly upset and using profane language, are heard asking for word on the condition of the men on the ground whom they have just attacked.

Connor, the U.S. military spokeswoman, said an investigation had determined that "appropriate procedures for engaging targets" were followed. She said no disciplinary action was taken against the pilots or other U.S. personnel involved in the incident. None has been publicly identified.

She also said that just before this incident, the two pilots, from the 190th Fighter Squadron of the Idaho Air National Guard, had "engaged enemy targets" nearby.

David Johnson, deputy chief of mission at the U.S. Embassy in London, said in an interview that the recording makes clear the pilots' reaction of "revulsion and horror" after "this extraordinary tragedy."

DOJ_NMG_0128754

Being attacked by one's own forces or allies has always been a problem in warfare, but it has intensified with the technological advances of the last century. An estimated 75,000 French soldiers were killed by their own artillery during World War I, according to the Oxford Companion to Military History. The advent of air power added to the problem: The highest-ranking U.S. casualty of World War II, Lt. Gen. Leslie J. McNair, was killed by an American bombing in France.

Just five days before Hull was killed, A-10 fire was mistakenly directed against Marines near the Iraqi city of Nasiriyah. A Central Command report a year later said that of the 18 Marines killed, eight were hit by Iraqi fire and it could not be determined conclusively how the others died.

British officials say the mistaken attack near Basra targeted a convoy of five reconnaissance tanks and wounded four soldiers in addition to killing Hull. One soldier in the convoy, Trooper Christopher Finney, was given the British award for gallantry, the George Cross, for pulling a wounded soldier from a burning tank and then, despite being wounded, trying to rescue Hull.

Mike Hull, Matty Hull's grandfather, said in a telephone interview that he believed "some disciplinary action" should have been taken against the U.S. pilots. He said that while it is "disheartening" to watch the video, "it is time the truth came out." The family has said that British officials told them no such video existed.

Matty Hull's wife, Susan, said she was glad the recording was now in the open.

The British Defense Ministry issued a statement Tuesday saying that "there has never been any intention to deliberately deceive or mislead" Hull's family and that it had informed them that "some classified material had been withheld, but we did not specify its exact nature."

Abu Ghraib Trial Date Set (WT/AP)

By David Dishneau

The Washington Times, February 7, 2007

The only U.S. military officer charged with crimes in the Abu Ghraib prison-abuse scandal would stand trial in July, under a tentative schedule set at a hearing yesterday.

Army Lt. Col. Steven L. Jordan, former director of an interrogation center at the prison in Iraq, would be tried from July 9 to July 20 at Fort Meade in Maryland, according to the schedule set by the judge, Army Col. Stephen R Henley. The judge also ordered a pretrial hearing March 12 at Fort McNair in the District.

Col. Jordan, 50, is seeking dismissal of eight charges, which carry up to 22 years in prison. The judge deferred ruling on Col. Jordan's claim that the government had exceeded a 120-day limit between charging him April 28 and arraigning him Jan. 30. The rules allow for exclusions.

The judge likely will rule within days on the dismissal motion, said Lt. Col. Patricia Lewis, a military justice specialist.

Col. Jordan, a reservist from Northern Virginia, isn't in custody but remains on involuntary, extended active duty at the Intelligence and Security Command at Fort Belvoir, Va.

Col. Jordan directed the interrogation center at Abu Ghraib in fall 2003.

He is accused of failing to exert his authority as prisoners were stripped naked, photographed in humiliating poses and intimidated by military dogs. He also is accused of lying to investigators about abuses he is said to have witnessed.

The charges include cruelty and maltreatment, disobeying a superior officer, dereliction of duty and making false statements.

Col. Jordan's defense at a hearing in October was that he had no operational control over investigations and spent much of his time at Abu Ghraib trying to improve soldiers' living conditions.

Capt. Samuel Spitzberg, the leader of Col. Jordan's three-man defense team, argued that Col. Jordan, a divorced father of three, has suffered ostracism and forced separation from his family as a result of having his active duty extended since the Abu Ghraib investigation began in early 2004.

"It has been years since Lt. Col. Jordan has been waiting and waiting and waiting to find out what happens, and the emotional strain of that cannot be ignored," he said.

The prosecution team yesterday gained a third member, Capt. Stefan Wolfe, an Army lawyer assigned to the Military District of Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0128755

The only witness called was Col. Thomas A. Allmon, a garrison commander at Fort Myer, Va., who acknowledged that he had considered recommending in December that Col. Jordan's case be handled as an administrative, rather than criminal, matter.

But Col. Allmon changed his mind and recommended a general court-martial after conferring with both sides and the officer who presided in October at Col. Jordan's Article 32 hearing, the military version of a preliminary hearing.

Afghan Forces Capture Suspected Al-Qaida (WP/AP)

The Washington Post/AP, February 7, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan -- Coalition forces captured two suspected al-Qaida members during an early morning raid in eastern Afghanistan on Wednesday, a military statement said. Afghan officials said soldiers captured six men and killed one person during the raid.

The raid near the town of Hakimabad in Nangarhar province was conducted based on information provided "about an al-Qaida member known to pass correspondence for al-Qaida senior leaders," the U.S.-led coalition said in a statement.

The two Afghan men were taken into custody to determine their association with al-Qaida, the statement said.

Ghafoor Khan, the spokesman for the provincial police chief, said coalition troops shot and killed one person during the raid, and that six people were detained and taken away. He said the raid took place 10 miles south of Jalalabad.

The reason for the discrepancy in the number arrested was not immediately clear.

Several militant groups including al-Qaida, the Taliban, and fighters for warlord Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, operate in eastern Afghanistan. The groups do not always operate together, though they may share the same goals.

The military did not say who executed the raid, but U.S. Special Forces soldiers operate under the banner of "coalition forces" in Afghanistan. Coalition forces work under a separate command structure than NATO's International Security Assistance Force.

In the western province of Herat, meanwhile, three police died and one was injured while attempting to disarm a roadside bomb discovered in Shindand district, said Interior Ministry spokesman Zemeri Bashary.

Taliban Still Controls South Afghan Town (AP)

By Fisnik Abrashi,

AP, February 7, 2007

Taliban militants remain in control of a southern Afghan town nearly a week after capturing it, but NATO expects the Afghan government to soon reassert its authority there, an alliance spokesman said Wednesday.

Some 200 people have fled the southern town of Musa Qala after militants captured it last week, said Col. Tom Collins, a spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force.

The Taliban fighters — whose local leader was killed in a NATO airstrike on Sunday — are operating in the town center but are not reinforcing their presence there, Collins said.

The town was peaceful for four months following an October peace deal between village elders and the Helmand provincial government. The deal prevented NATO, Afghan and Taliban fighters from coming within 3 miles of the town center.

Last Thursday, a group of some 200 militants moved into town, disarmed the local police force, destroyed the district center and temporarily held the local elders hostage.

Collins said NATO troops stand ready to help the government again take control of the town but that there "is no need to rush to action here."

"We are confident that the government of Afghanistan, with ISAF's support, will take back Musa Qala at a time and place that is most advantageous" to them, Collins said.

Coalition forces, meanwhile, captured two suspected al-Qaida members during an early morning raid in eastern Afghanistan on Wednesday, a military statement said. Afghan officials said soldiers captured six men and killed one person during the raid.

DOJ_NMG_0128756

The raid near the town of Hakimabad in Nangarhar province was conducted based on information provided "about an al-Qaida member known to pass correspondence for al-Qaida senior leaders," the U.S.-led coalition said in a statement.

The two Afghan men were taken into custody to determine their association with al-Qaida, the statement said.

Ghafoor Khan, the spokesman for the provincial police chief, said coalition troops shot and killed one person during the raid, and that six people were detained and taken away. He said the raid took place 10 miles south of Jalalabad.

The reason for the discrepancy in the number arrested was not immediately clear.

Several militant groups including al-Qaida, the Taliban, and fighters for warlord Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, operate in eastern Afghanistan. The groups do not always operate together, though they may share the same goals.

The military did not say who executed the raid, but U.S. Special Forces soldiers operate under the banner of "coalition forces" in Afghanistan. Coalition forces work under a separate command structure than NATO's International Security Assistance Force.

In Kandahar province, a remote-controlled bomb exploded next to a car carrying Afghan security guards Wednesday, killing two of them and wounding six, said Abdul Khaliq, who was riding in the convoy.

The attack happened in the district of Neven as the convoy was transporting supplies for a NATO base in Helmand, Khaliq said.

In the western province of Herat, meanwhile, three police died and one was injured while attempting to disarm a roadside bomb discovered in Shindand district, said Interior Ministry spokesman Zemeri Bashary.

Gates Bracing For More Afghan Violence (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, February 7, 2007

Defense Secretary Robert Gates said Tuesday that NATO allies must provide the troops and equipment needed to battle an expected increase in violence by Taliban insurgents in Afghanistan this spring.

Gates, who will meet with other NATO defense ministers Thursday in Seville, Spain, is expected to outline whether the U.S. plans to adjust its troop levels in Afghanistan or extend the deployment of any units already there, said a senior defense official.

The defense official spoke on condition of anonymity because details have not been made public. Currently there are about 27,000 U.S. troops in Afghanistan, the highest number since the start of the war in 2001.

At a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing Tuesday, Gates said the U.S. will hold the NATO countries to promises they offered during a summit in Riga, Latvia, last November, particularly for more trainers.

His comments come about two weeks after the Defense Department said 3,200 soldiers from the New York-based 10th Mountain Division already in Afghanistan would have their tour extended by four months. Defense officials have not ruled out extending other units, but a recent increase of U.S. troops in Iraq for a new push to secure Baghdad is already straining the military.

The defense official said the U.S. is looking for an increased level of effort by the NATO allies in Afghanistan, and fewer war-fighting restrictions place on forces by their home countries.

About 15,000 of the U.S. troops in Afghanistan are serving in the NATO-led force, which now totals about 36,000 from 37 different countries.

Some of the NATO forces, however, are limited in what they can do. Some, for example, are restricted to specific regions of the country, or — because of training or equipment issues — can't perform certain missions or fight at night. U.S. officials have consistently argued that the restrictions must be lifted in order to successfully fight the insurgency.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., told Gates at the hearing that the U.S. needs to tell its allies "that we need a lot more from them than we're getting, not only in rules of engagement for the troops, but also in various commitments they have made, such as assistance in setting up judiciary."

After the meeting in Seville, Gates will travel to Munich for an annual meeting of the world's top security officials.

GOP Lawmakers Press Bush On Afghanistan (LAT)

By Josh Meyer

DOJ_NMG_0128757

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON — Four ranking Republican lawmakers on a committee with oversight of U.S. policy in Afghanistan are calling on the Pentagon and State Department to dramatically change their tactics in that country to better contain its growing insurgency and flow of opium to the rest of the world.

In a letter dated today, the GOP House members are urging the Bush administration to act quickly to counter a host of problems in Afghanistan that they say are being made worse by mismanagement and misplaced priorities. They are calling for the appointment of a special coordinator of overall narco-terrorism policy for Afghanistan to prevent losing the fight against insurgents and drug traffickers.

The letter describes in detail how various U.S. agencies such as the Pentagon, State Department and Drug Enforcement Administration are not working together and essentially are fighting separate wars against insurgents and drugs even though they believe that the booming heroin trade is fueling the insurgency and financing terrorist attacks.

"As we will soon face another massive opium harvest in Afghanistan, and a related spring offensive by anti-coalition militants (ACMs), it is time for some new thinking to ensure that Afghanistan does not fall into a failed narco-state status and become, once again, a safe haven for Al Qaeda. We need to act now to prevent that," wrote Reps. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.), Mike Pence (R-Ind.), Elton Gallegly (R-Simi Valley) and Dana Rohrabacher (R-Huntington Beach), all members of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The letter was sent late Tuesday to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, with copies delivered to the White House, DEA, Office of National Drug Control Policy and the British government, said a senior congressional staffer who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the letter.

The four Republicans say they may introduce legislation to enact and fund some of their proposals, but urge the White House to quickly implement other policy changes on its own. Democrats in Congress also have complained about rising drug trafficking and the growing insurgency in Afghanistan.

White House national security spokesman Gordon Johndroe said he had not seen the letter and could not comment on the lawmakers' requests. But he said the administration had been actively reassessing its policies in Afghanistan in recent months as part of a comprehensive "strategic review," which prompted senior officials to call for at least $10.6 billion in additional funding for Afghanistan over the next two years.

The new funding was a recognition "that we needed to make a larger effort … so that we can help the Afghan government succeed and we can defeat the Taliban," Johndroe said. "But obviously our counter-terrorism and counter-narcotics programs in Afghanistan work hand in hand. This is something that our people are coordinating on the ground."

The additional funding, though much needed in Afghanistan, is virtually worthless without a coordinated policy that ensures that all U.S. counter-terrorism and counter-narcotics agencies are working together, and not against each other, the senior congressional official asserted. "We have so many different views of narcotics within our own government and with our allies that somebody has to bang everybody's heads together and get something done on this," the staffer said. "We are out of time, and losing Afghanistan."

The Republican House members also said the United States must resolve a growing dispute with Britain over how to best fight the booming opium trade. British authorities who are now in charge of much of the counter-narcotics effort in Afghanistan are refusing to go along with a controversial U.S. policy to eradicate entire fields of poppy by aerial spraying.

Britain, as well as the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, which leads the forces battling the insurgency in Afghanistan, believes the U.S. policy is dangerous because it alienates farmers and the population at large and undermines Western efforts to turn them against the narco-traffickers and the Taliban, several U.S. and British counter-terrorism officials said.

The senior congressional staffer said the four lawmakers didn't want to get into the middle of the dispute over whether poppy eradication should be stopped. Instead, they want the U.S. government and its allies to more forcefully go after kingpins who preside over global narcotics trafficking enterprises that together bring in more than $2 billion a year in wholesale drug profits.

DOJ_NMG_0128758

They are urging the Bush administration to force the Pentagon to provide more operational assistance to DEA agents operating in Afghanistan and to order the arrests of senior-level drug traffickers under a provision of the Patriot Act passed last year that allows such suspects to be extradited to the United States for prosecution.

A similar campaign has worked well in Colombia and is urgently needed in Afghanistan because that country has no judicial infrastructure to prosecute drug traffickers, the lawmakers say. "We must establish deterrence where none now exists," their letter says.

They also are urging the Pentagon to make good on a promise to provide at least eight Russian-made Mi-17 helicopters to Afghan authorities and their U.S. counter-narcotics advisors for the drug war, along with qualified pilots and maintenance and operational support.

"We have waited long enough to get this vital air lift…," the lawmakers' letter says. "We need someone put in charge of getting this done now, enough time has gone by already."

Official Hits U.S. For Afghan Missive (WT)

By John Phillips

The Washington Times, February 7, 2007

ROME -- Foreign Minister Massimo D'Alema yesterday protested an open letter to a Rome newspaper from U.S. Ambassador Ronald P. Spogli and five other envoys urging Italy to maintain its troop deployment in Afghanistan.

Mr. D'Alema, a former communist who, as prime minister in 1999, won NATO's trust with his support for the bombing of Kosovo, called the letter an "irregular" departure from normal diplomatic procedures. The letter also was signed by the ambassadors of Australia, Britain, Canada, the Netherlands and Romania.

Prime Minister Romano Prodi's center-left government is struggling to maintain its deployment of 1,938 troops in Afghanistan in the face of opposition from Communists and Greens in the Cabinet, three of whom abstained when the Cabinet voted to refinance the mission last month.

Mr. Prodi has withdrawn most Italian troops from Iraq, and his government's razor-thin majority in the Senate could collapse if the dissident coalition members follow through on threats to vote against the Afghan refinancing.

"There are more appropriate bodies in which to discuss Italy's commitment in Afghanistan rather than through open letters from ambassadors to daily newspapers," Mr. D'Alema snorted during a visit to Seoul.

In Washington, the State Department said the letter was "a praiseworthy initiative" by the U.S. envoy.

Mr. D'Alema last night sent his own letter to the six envoys, expressing "surprise and disapproval" at their decision to make their missive public. Gianfranco Fini, a spokesman for the opposition, fired back, telling Mr. D'Alema, "What was irregular was your angry response."

A Canadian Embassy spokesman rejected speculation in the Italian press that Mr. Spogli had pressured his fellow ambassadors to sign the letter.

"It is true that the Americans had a guiding role in the affair, but the letter was born out of exchanges of views between the various ambassadors on the spot," the spokesman said. "It was totally shared by all of us."

Some Italian newspapers speculated that the ambassadors of France, Germany and Spain also had been approached but had declined to sign the letter because their governments were uncomfortable with a NATO appeal for increased troop deployments in Afghanistan.

Foreign Ministry sources said they were aware that Mr. Spogli and his recently arrived British counterpart, Edward Chaplin, planned to ask Italy to assign its troops in Afghanistan to more front-line duties.

Sources said Mr. D'Alema heard nothing more until he received a call in Japan informing him that the letter from the six envoys had been published in the left-leaning newspaper La Repubblica.

Problems Stall Pentagon's New Fighting Vehicle (WP)

By Renae Merle

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0128759

After 10 years and $1.7 billion, this is what the Marines Corps got for its investment in a new amphibious vehicle: A craft that breaks down about an average of once every 4 1/2 hours, leaks and sometimes veers off course.

And for that, the contractor, General Dynamics of Falls Church, received $80 million in bonuses.

The amphibious vehicle, which can be launched from a ship and then driven on land, is so unreliable that the Pentagon is ditching plans to begin building the first of more than 1,000 and wants to start over with seven new prototypes, which will take nearly two years to deliver, at a cost of $22 million each.

The Expeditionary Fighting Vehicle is one of the Pentagon's largest weapons programs and exemplifies the agency's struggle to afford a cadre of new mega-systems that are larger and more complex, but also more trouble, than their predecessors.

Despite reforms meant to rein in costs, it is not unusual for weapons programs to go 20 to 50 percent over budget, the Government Accountability Office recently found. Among the offenders is the Army's sprawling modernization program, which aims to update everything from tanks to drones and is now expected to cost $160 billion, up from $90 billion, and a Lockheed Martin missile-warning satellite program, which is projected to cost more than $10 billion, up from $4 billion.

The Marines' troubled program is on a collision course with critics who are wary of its growing price tag and who wonder about the utility of an amphibious vehicle meant to storm beaches in a way the military hasn't done for decades, at a time when soldiers are consumed with urban warfare in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The Marines, though, have not been dissuaded by the vehicle's poor showing in tests, as such fits and starts are common in military development programs.

"We were disappointed. We weren't shocked," program manager Col. John Bryant said.

The cost of the amphibious vehicle effort has increased 50 percent, to about $12 billion from $8 billion, with another cost bump projected after the program is relaunched.

The overruns are eating away at the Pentagon's buying power but not its appetite. The amount the Pentagon plans to spend on major weapons systems has doubled in the past five years, to $1.4 trillion from $700 billion, according to the GAO.

"I would never state, in an enterprise this large, that we ever have it all under control," Kenneth Krieg, the Pentagon's acquisition chief, said in a December interview. "I think we're on a good path and only performance will prove that, and that's what we got to do."

When it was launched in 1996, the Expeditionary Fighting Vehicle was promoted as an example of acquisition reform as hundreds of General Dynamics and Marine Corps officials moved into the same 62,000-square-foot office building in Woodbridge to run the program, in hopes of saving time and money. The program's efforts to keep maintenance costs low won plaudits from Defense leaders and twice earned the program the Pentagon's highest acquisition award, in 1997 and 1999. In 2001, the program collected an innovation award for developing a system to keep the craft's internal components from overheating, a technology that has been adopted for other weapons.

But the program has struggled with repeated delays, cost increases, budget cuts and dashed expectations, according to military officials and government reports. Problems range from leaks in hydraulics systems to software glitches, according to the reports. Last year, the vehicles completed just two of 14 planned tests.

"They started out really well, and I was really pleased," said Philip Coyle, the Defense Department's former director of operational test and evaluation. "But gradually the complexity of the program has overcome the contractor, so they are years behind schedule."

General Dynamics defends its progress, noting that the vehicle has met many goals, including being able to reach speeds of 30 knots on the water. The vehicle is fast enough to keep up with the Abrams tank on land, it can carry 17 Marines, and its systems can communicate with other ships and tanks, all key performance criteria, the company says.

"I have heard no one in leadership say that they don't need this capability, that they don't want this capability," said Peter Keating, a General Dynamics spokesman.

An independent review released in December by the Navy's acquisition office questioned the company's commitment to solving the development problems that plagued the vehicle. The report said General Dynamics appeared more interested in starting production than trouble-shooting and didn't manage the groups making many of the decisions. The production phase is typically more profitable for a contractor and often marks a point at which a program becomes more difficult to cancel.

DOJ_NMG_0128760

General Dynamics "seems to be focused on production rather than on solving significant design and engineering problems," the Navy report said. "This must be changed if the Program is to move ahead successfully."

Noting that the bonuses the company received did not reflect the vehicle's performance, the report recommends that the Defense Contract Management Agency consider recovering some of the award fees. A DCMA spokesman said the agency had not addressed the issue because it was unaware of the recommendation.

The Marine Corps has tried to deal with some of its development problems by lowering its expectations for the vehicle. The service originally wanted a craft that could operate 70 hours between major breakdowns, but it cut that target to 43.5 hours after tests revealed the vehicles were struggling to meet the higher goal.

But even the lower targets have been hard to hit. Marine Corps officials were distressed to discover that the prototypes encountered an "operational mission failure" on average every 4.5 hours in tests last year. There were 645 failures within the subsystems, overwhelming the three-man maintenance crew, according to a report by the service's testing agency.

"It's a very complex vehicle; when it breaks, it's difficult to repair," said Col. Michael Bohn, director of the Marine Corps testing agency.

General Dynamics has also struggled with the vessel's complicated software. During testing, the software operating the guns didn't always fire on command, for example. Some of the problems date to 2001, when responsibility for software development was given to a General Dynamics division with little track record of running such a complex project, according to the GAO. The Marine Corps gave the company a year to improve the division's capabilities, the report said. When it failed to meet the deadline, the company was granted an extension. Eventually, the Marine Corps turned 70 percent of the work to a government organization.

"From a taxpayer standpoint, I think, 'Gee, didn't we pay GD to do this?,' " said Paul L. Francis, the GAO's director of acquisition and sourcing management. "Are they going to pay us for doing it for them?"

Keating, the General Dynamics spokesman, said the company is confident it can meet the Marine Corps' demands. He noted that the service had asked the firm to establish a new software-development organization and that such organizations often take several years to mature. "We started from ground zero," he said.

Now, the Marine Corps is ready to start over. The service is to present a plan to salvage the program to Defense leaders in March. In addition to buying seven new prototypes, the Marine Corps proposal will probably require at least a two- or three-year delay, adding $200 million in development costs a year, said Bryant, the Marines program manager.

The service will seek to simplify the design, "getting rid of the complexity where we don't need complexity," he said.

Noting that his son was a Navy combat corpsman in a battalion using the aging amphibious vehicles that were supposed to be replaced by now, Bryant added: "I need to fix our reliability and make the EFV a vehicle I'd be proud to hand to my own son."

Nuclear Officials Seek Approval For Warhead (WP)

By Walter Pincus

Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Officials of the National Nuclear Security Administration, which runs the nuclear weapons complex, said yesterday that they hope to receive administration and congressional authorization by the end of 2008 for the development and production of a warhead that could be deployed on submarine-launched intercontinental ballistic missiles.

The NNSA requested $88 million in the fiscal 2008 Energy Department budget -- up from $27 million this year -- to complete detailed planning with the Navy based on a design produced in December by the nation's two nuclear weapons laboratories. The new funds would support design concept testing and could lead to production of the warhead for the Navy's D5 missile, 24 of which are carried on each U.S. Trident submarine.

A key aspect of the Reliable Replacement Warhead program is that the warhead could be certified to enter the U.S. nuclear stockpile without testing, acting NNSA Administrator Thomas D'Agostino and other officials said during a session with reporters.

DOJ_NMG_0128761

U.S. moves to develop a new warhead come as the Bush administration is attempting to stop Iran and North Korea from developing nuclear weapons and trying to keep other countries, such as India and Pakistan, from expanding their stockpiles.

Last month, former secretaries of state Henry A. Kissinger and George P. Shultz, former defense secretary William Perry and former senator Sam Nunn (D-Ga.) called for the Bush administration to take the leadership in reversing reliance on nuclear weapons as a step toward preventing proliferation. In a Jan. 6 op-ed in the Wall Street Journal, the four called for ratification of the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty, taking nuclear weapons off alert, further reducing the number of nuclear forces and halting production of fissile materials.

Hans M. Kristensen, director of the Federation of American Scientists' nuclear information project, said yesterday that as a result of the op-ed piece, "There are a lot of new groups in Washington looking at what really low numbers [of U.S. warheads] would look like."

Rep. Ellen O. Tauscher (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Armed Services strategic forces subcommittee, said yesterday that she would hold a hearing next month on the RRW program to review the new design and to determine if it meets military needs and whether it would lead to a smaller and more reliable stockpile with no testing, a smaller nuclear production complex and increased dismantling of older warheads.

"There are significant questions in Congress about how all this holds together," Tauscher said.

The NNSA officials said that in the past, the nuclear weapons labs held underground nuclear tests at this stage in the development of a new warhead. But they said the new designs, by the Los Alamos and Lawrence Livermore national laboratories, could be certified without testing. Meanwhile, there needs to be detailed planning with the Navy before the NNSA could proceed to the engineering phase.

The warhead is being built to fit into the Mark V reentry vehicle used on the D5, which is commonly known as the Trident II missile. The joint decision last year by the Energy and Defense departments was to try to come up with a warhead that could be used on Navy and Air Force missiles.

NNSA officials said yesterday that production of the new warhead would allow for the Bush administration's plan to reduce the number of deployed nuclear warheads from about 6,000 today to between 1,700 and 2,200 by 2012, and also to lower the number in ready reserve. Critics of the Bush plan, which was set out in the 2001 Nuclear Posture Review, have claimed that far fewer numbers of nuclear warheads will be needed in the future because of the accuracy of precision-guided conventional weapons.

DOJ:

Prosecutor Fired So Ex-Rove Aide Could Get His Job (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Justice Department acknowledged Tuesday that it fired the U.S. government's chief prosecutor in Little Rock for no reason except to replace him with a lawyer who had been an aide to Karl Rove, the Bush administration's chief political strategist.

However, in an appearance before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty rejected criticism that the forced resignations of Bud Cummins and six other U.S. attorneys last year were politically inspired, or amounted to retaliation for the attorneys' involvement in controversial investigations and prosecutions.

McNulty's testimony before the panel, which is investigating the firings of the prosecutors, was part of an exchange with Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y. Schumer said the White House's appointment process for prosecutors was "corrupted with political, rather than prudent, considerations."

"What happened here doesn't sound like business as usual; it appears more reminiscent of a different sort of Saturday night massacre," Schumer said, referring to Watergate-era firings at Justice that were ordered by President Nixon.

"When I hear you talk about a politicization of the (Justice) Department, it is like a knife in my back," McNulty responded.

DOJ_NMG_0128762

Schumer and other committee members have questioned the department's action, suggesting the administration was taking advantage of a section of the USA Patriot Act that allows the appointment of interim U.S. attorneys for indefinite periods. The process, Schumer and other critics in Congress have said, could allow federal prosecutors to be appointed without having to face confirmation by the Senate.

McNulty said the administration has no plan to circumvent the confirmation process and will send the Senate nominations for permanent replacements for the prosecutors. He said the six prosecutors dismissed besides Cummins — including San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam, who oversaw the corruption prosecution of former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif. — were let go for performance-related reasons.

Much of Tuesday's hearing focused on Cummins and Lam.

McNulty acknowledged that Cummins had had a successful tenure in Arkansas and that he was asked to step aside last year to allow former White House aide Tim Griffin to take the job.

McNulty said that aside from his political work, Griffin had more prosecutorial experience than Cummins did when he first took the Little Rock job five years ago. The deputy attorney general said Griffin's experience included a stint in Iraq as a military prosecutor.

Before his call to active duty in 2005, Griffin was an aide to Rove at the White House. Griffin's résumé says he "organized and coordinated support for the president's agenda, including the nomination of Judge John Roberts" to be U.S. chief justice.

In Lam's case, McNulty said, the Justice Department considered the political impact of removing her in light of her involvement in the prosecution of Cunningham, who was sentenced to eight years in federal prison last year after pleading guilty to accepting $2.4 million in bribes.

McNulty declined to publicly detail the reasons for her dismissal. But Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., cited letters to the Justice Department and Lam from members of Congress who complained about Lam's alleged inattention to prosecuting smugglers of illegal immigrants.

A U.S. Attorney Was Removed Without Cause, Official Says (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6 — A top Justice Department official said on Tuesday that one of several United States attorneys forced from their jobs last year was dismissed without a specific cause in order to give the job to a lawyer with close political ties to the White House.

But the official, Paul J. McNulty, the deputy attorney general, testified at the Senate Judiciary Committee hearing that none of the forced resignations last year was politically motivated. He said most of the incumbents had been urged to leave because of poor performance.

“We never have and never will seek to remove a United States attorney to interfere with an ongoing investigation or prosecution or in retaliation for a prosecution,” Mr. McNulty said.

Democrats have charged that the dismissals of 7 to 10 United States attorneys amounted to an n effort to make room for favorites of the Bush administration by ousting independent-minded prosecutors, all Republicans appointed by President Bush.

One disputed case involves H. E. Cummins III, a United States attorney in Arkansas who was asked to step down last summer although his office had increased drug and firearms prosecutions and he had helped organize a multiagency counterterrorism council.

To temporarily replace Mr. Cummins, the Justice Department named J. Timothy Griffin, a former military and civilian prosecutor who was a political director for the Republican National Committee and who once worked as a deputy to Karl Rove, the senior White House political adviser.

At the hearing, Mr. McNulty was asked by Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, whether it was accurate to say that Mr. Cummins had not done anything wrong to justify his removal. Mr. McNulty replied, “I do not dispute that characterization.”

Had Mr. Cummins ever received a poor performance evaluation, Mr. Schumer asked.

DOJ_NMG_0128763

Mr. McNulty answered, “I’m not aware of anything negative.”

Mr. McNulty said that because the attorneys are presidential appointees, they can be replaced at any time without a specific reason. He said about half of the 93 prosecutors appointed to their jobs by Mr. Bush in his first term had already left voluntarily. Mr. McNulty said the appointment of Mr. Griffin was a chance for “a fresh start with a new person.”

At the hearing, Senator Mark Pryor, an Arkansas Democrat who testified as a witness, said he would not support Mr. Griffin if Mr. Bush nominated him to replace Mr. Cummins permanently.

Mr. Pryor, a former state attorney general in Arkansas, said that in a conversation with Mr. Griffin last August “I told him that I know many lawyers in the state, but I knew very little about his legal background.”

Mr. McNulty acknowledged that Mr. Griffin did not have an extensive background as a prosecutor, but said he had enough experience to be well qualified. He also said that a number of successful United States attorneys had been engaged in past political activities, and that it should not disqualify an appointee.

Among others who Justice Department officials said had been asked to leave were Carol Lam of San Diego, Kevin V. Ryan of San Francisco, Daniel G. Bogden of Nevada and David C. Iglesias of New Mexico. Others who are said to be departing are Paul K. Charlton of Arizona and John McKay of Washington State.

Ms. Lam’s departure, on Feb. 15, has prompted especially strong complaints among Democrats because she headed the investigation that resulted in a guilty plea by former Representative Randy Cunningham, a California Republican who is serving an eight-year prison term for corruption-related offenses.

Mr. McNulty denied that the Cunningham case had anything to do with the ouster of Ms. Lam, who has been criticized by some lawmakers as failing to prosecute immigrant smuggling and gun cases along California’s border with Mexico.

“What happened in the prosecution of Cunningham was a good thing for the American people and the Department of Justice to accomplish,” Mr. McNulty said, adding, “We’re proud of that accomplishment.”

Behind the debate about forced dismissals is a dispute over language approved last year as part of legislation renewing the antiterrorism statute known as the USA Patriot Act.

In the past, the law permitted the Justice Department to name an interim United States attorney, but only for 120 days, when a federal judge would name a substitute to serve until a presidential nominee was confirmed.

The change approved last year permitted the Justice Department to name temporary replacements for an indefinite period. Several senators said Democrats and Republicans were discussing a compromise to return to the earlier procedures.

Deputy Attorney General Defends Prosecutor Firings (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

A senior Justice Department official acknowledged yesterday that a top federal prosecutor in Arkansas was removed to make room for a former aide to presidential adviser Karl Rove, but he said that six other U.S. attorneys were fired for "performance-related" issues.

In often contentious testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty also disputed Democrats' allegations that the firings appeared to be aimed at rewarding Republican allies and at avoiding the Senate's role in confirming U.S. attorney appointments.

"The attorney general's appointment authority has not and will not be used to circumvent the confirmation process," McNulty said. "All accusations in this regard are contrary to the clear factual record."

McNulty's remarks did little to calm the growing political storm over the recent U.S. attorney firings. Top Democrats have condemned the firings, which have led to proposed legislation that would limit the attorney general's powers to appoint interim prosecutors.

McNulty acknowledged that six U.S. attorneys in the West and Southwest were notified in December that they would be asked to step aside, including the lead prosecutor in San Diego, whose office oversaw the bribery conviction of a former Republican congressman.

DOJ_NMG_0128764

A seventh former U.S. attorney, Ed Cummins of Little Rock, has said that he was asked to leave last year to open the job for J. Timothy Griffin, who previously worked for Rove and for the Republican National Committee. McNulty did not dispute that characterization yesterday.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) said the firings "reek of politics" and warned McNulty that the panel would consider issuing subpoenas for job evaluations of the fired prosecutors unless the Justice Department agrees to hand them over. Justice officials said they will work to accommodate the request.

"What happened here doesn't sound like business as usual," Schumer said. "Even the hiring and firing of our top federal prosecutors has become infused and corrupted with political, rather than prudent, considerations."

McNulty responded later: "When I hear you talk about the politicizing of the Department of Justice, it's like a knife in my heart. . . . Your perspective is completely contrary to my daily experience."

Several top lawmakers, including Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), have been particularly angered by a little-noticed provision slipped into USA Patriot Act legislation last year that allows Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to appoint replacement prosecutors, such as Griffin, on an indefinite basis.

Feinstein and other Democrats in the House and Senate have proposed legislation to return to the old selection process, which allowed district courts to appoint interim U.S. attorneys after 120 days until a final candidate was confirmed by the Senate. Sen. Arlen Specter (Pa.), the Judiciary Committee's ranking Republican, said yesterday he will join Democrats in pushing for a return to the previous arrangement.

But McNulty said the Justice Department is in "strong opposition" to that proposal because it puts the judicial branch in the position of hiring people in the executive branch.

Gonzales told the committee last month that the forced resignations were not politically motivated, but he declined to comment on details of the cases. McNulty went further in some of his testimony yesterday, talking at length about the Arkansas case and defending Griffin's record as a military and civilian prosecutor, in addition to his role as a prominent GOP operative.

In an unusual appearance as a committee witness, Sen. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.) complained that Justice Department officials had initially misled him about Cummins's dismissal and said he could not support Griffin's nomination as U.S. attorney.

Griffin declined to comment yesterday.

The other case that has drawn significant ire from Democrats is in San Diego, where prosecutor Carol S. Lam was fired about a year after overseeing the guilty plea by former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) for taking $2.4 million in bribes. McNulty declined to comment on why Lam was removed, but he said the Cunningham case was "a very good thing for the American people and the Department of Justice to accomplish."

Justice Department officials say Lam presided over a drop in prosecutions of firearms and smuggling cases, and point to complaints from many lawmakers -- including Feinstein -- about lax immigration enforcement in the San Diego area.

Feinstein said in an interview that her concerns about border enforcement are "unrelated" to the question of whether the prosecutors were dismissed appropriately. "The issues are being confused," she said.

In addition to Cummins and Lam, those forced to resign include Kevin Ryan in San Francisco, John McKay in Seattle, David C. Iglesias in New Mexico, Daniel G. Bogden in Nevada and Paul K. Charlton in Arizona.

Mary Jo White, who was appointed U.S. attorney general for the Southern District of New York during the Clinton administration and then retained for a while under President Bush, told the committee that the firings were "unprecedented" and "troubling."

"The appearance . . . tends to undermine the importance of the office of the United States attorney," White said.

Justice Lawyer Explains Attorney Firings (AP)

By Laurie Kellman, The Associated Press

AP, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON - A top Justice Department official acknowledged Tuesday that more than a half-dozen U.S. attorneys were fired in the last year, in some cases without cause, but denied Democrats' allegations that they were dismissed and replaced for political reasons.

DOJ_NMG_0128765

In testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty defended the department's firing of seven U.S. attorneys since March, for reasons he would not divulge.

McNulty reminded the panel that federal prosecutors serve at the pleasure of the president. And he repeated Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' promise to submit the name of every replacement to the Senate for confirmation.

"The attorney general's appointment authority has not and will not be used to circumvent the confirmation process," McNulty told the Democrat-led panel. We never have and never will seek to remove a United States attorney to interfere with an ongoing investigation or prosecution or in retaliation for a prosecution."

McNulty spoke after weeks of Democrats' accusations that the forced resignations of prosecutors in Arkansas and California in particular were moves to reward Republican allies.

Democrats and Republicans blamed the situation on that fact that without their knowledge a little-known provision was slipped into the Patriot Act reauthorization that took effect in March letting the attorney general replace prosecutors indefinitely. They now are seeking legislation to give interim appointment authority to District Court judges, with a deadline by which the prosecutor must be confirmed by the Senate.

Judges often are not qualified to make those appointments, Gonzales told The Associated Press last month.

The hearing, chaired by Sen. Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., gave lawmakers a new chance to insist the Justice Department has used that provision to appoint political allies to U.S. attorney offices.

In Arkansas, H.E. Bud Cummins received a call from a Justice Department official last year telling him to resign and assuring him there was no cause for the firing, a fact McNulty confirmed Tuesday. Cummins' replacement was to be J. Timothy Griffin, a former aide to presidential counselor Karl Rove and a former military prosecutor.

Also riling Democrats is the case of former San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam, whose pursuit of public corruption cases included the government's case against Randy "Duke" Cunningham, the former Republican congressman who pleaded guilty to taking $2.4 million in bribes.

McNulty denied Lam was fired in retaliation for Cunningham's conviction, calling Lam's pursuit of the case "a very good thing for the American people and the Department of Justice to accomplish."

"We are proud of that accomplishment," McNulty said.

Justice Official Defends Prosecutors' Firings (LAT)

By Adam Schreck, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

Deputy Atty. Gen. McNulty tells a Senate panel that they were forced out over performance, not politics. Democrats are skeptical.

WASHINGTON — The recent forced resignations of six top federal prosecutors, including two in California, were based on "performance-related" concerns and were not politically motivated, a Justice Department official testified Tuesday on Capitol Hill.

Appearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Deputy Atty. Gen. Paul J. McNulty defended the dismissals.

"The indisputable fact is that United States attorneys serve at the pleasure of the president," he said. "They come and they go for lots of reasons."

McNulty also expressed strong opposition to a plan by Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) to strip the Justice Department of authority it received last year to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for indefinite periods without Senate confirmation.

That power, added to the USA Patriot Act when it was reauthorized in March, has worried some lawmakers. At issue is the amount of oversight that Congress — now in the hands of Democrats — has over the appointment of federal prosecutors.

Seven U.S. attorneys, including Carol Lam in San Diego and Kevin Ryan in San Francisco, have been asked to leave. Some Democrats have suggested that the firings are an attempt by the Bush administration to reward political allies and get rid of otherwise capable prosecutors who may be at odds with the White House.

"I have never seen the department more politicized and pushed further away from its mission," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.). "And now it appears even the hiring and firing of our top federal prosecutors has become infused and corrupted with political, rather than prudent, considerations — or at least there is a very strong appearance that this is so."

DOJ_NMG_0128766

McNulty dismissed suggestions that the firing of the seven prosecutors was politically motivated. The Justice Department, he said, has not and will not "remove a United States attorney to interfere with an ongoing investigation or prosecution or in retaliation for prosecution."

"When I hear you talk about the politicizing of the Department of Justice, it's like a knife in my heart," he told Schumer.

Some legal experts have said that the moves, while legal, are unorthodox and could have harmful repercussions.

"There's at least a strong perception by those in and outside of the United States attorney's office that this is not business as usual," said Loyola Law School professor Laurie Levenson during her testimony Tuesday.

Much of Tuesday's hearing focused on the dismissals of Lam, who plans to step down Feb. 15, and of H.E. "Bud" Cummins, a prosecutor in Little Rock, Ark., who was replaced by a former aide to Karl Rove, President Bush's longtime political strategist.

Lam, who declined to comment about McNulty's remarks Tuesday, headed an investigation that led to the guilty plea, on bribery charges, of Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham of Rancho Santa Fe. She has been criticized as not being tough enough on smugglers of illegal immigrants.

In a written statement, Ryan, who has not announced a departure date, said only that his resignation was the result of "a mutually agreeable decision with Washington."

McNulty would not publicly discuss why individual prosecutors were asked to step down, other than to say six of the seven were replaced because of "performance-related" issues. The decision to replace the seventh, Cummins, was an "opportunity to provide a fresh start with a new person in that position," he said.

adam.schreck@latimes.com

Official Denies Prosecutors Were Ousted For Political Reasons (MCT)

By Marisa Taylor

McClatchy Newspapers, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON - The No. 2 Justice Department official acknowledged Tuesday that at least seven U.S. attorneys were asked to resign, but he denied that the administration ousted them for political reasons.

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told the Senate Judiciary Committee that six U.S. attorneys were asked to step down in December because of "performance-related" issues.

However, McNulty said H.E. "Bud" Cummins, the former U.S. attorney in Arkansas, wasn't fired because of how he handled his job. Rather, McNulty said, administration officials wanted to make room for Timothy Griffin, a former aide of presidential adviser Karl Rove.

McNulty emphasized that the administration has the power to fire U.S. attorneys from the politically appointed positions - even without any apparent cause. But he denied that politics played any role in the firings of other U.S. attorneys, including Carol Lam, who was asked to step down in San Diego. In 2005, Lam's office won a bribery conviction against then-Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif. That investigation is continuing.

McNulty said his department had been "proud" of the Cunningham prosecution, but he declined to elaborate on Lam's or any other U.S. attorney's firing during the hearing. He agreed instead to brief senators privately on the matter.

"We never have and never will seek to remove a United States attorney to interfere with an ongoing investigation or prosecution, or in retaliation for prosecution," he said. "Such an act is contrary to the most basic values of our system of justice."

The decision to fire the U.S. attorneys came under scrutiny late last month after Senate Democrats discovered that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales could use a little-noticed change in the Patriot Act to fill the vacancies with appointees.

The legal change last March allowed Gonzales to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for indefinite terms.

Last month, McClatchy Newspapers analyzed many of those interim appointments and found that Gonzales had been appointing conservative loyalists from the Bush administration's inner circle to fill the vacancies.

The new U.S. attorneys all have impressive legal credentials, but most of them have few ties to the communities they've been appointed to serve, and some have little experience as prosecutors.

Several have become permanent U.S. attorneys after Senate confirmation.

Traditionally, the top assistant U.S. attorney in each local office fills any vacancy while home-state senators search for preferred candidates to present to the White House for consideration. If it takes more than four months to find a permanent successor, a judge can extend the temporary appointment or name another acting U.S. attorney. Ultimately, the candidates must be confirmed by the Senate.

Senate Democrats said they were concerned that the administration is attempting to bypass the Senate confirmation process under the new Patriot Act provision.

Administration officials argue that the change was necessary to ensure that judges didn't appoint interim U.S. attorneys who were hostile to the administration.

McNulty said that the Justice Department is committed to giving home-state senators of the president's party their traditional say in submitting the names of preferred candidates for White House consideration.

Mary Jo White, who was appointed U.S. attorney for the southern district of New York by President Clinton in 1993, told the committee that any firings of U.S. attorneys in the middle of an administration "without significant cause," such as serious misconduct, would be unprecedented.

If U.S. attorneys had been removed because of controversy over cases or "just to give another person the opportunity to serve," the actions would "pose a threat to the independence of the U.S. attorneys," she said.

Laurie Levenson, a former assistant U.S. attorney who's now a professor at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles, said the revelation about Cummins being removed to give someone else a chance to be U.S. attorney "was precisely the problem."

"The job of U.S. attorney should not be a political prize," she said. "There's too much at stake for the district and the people who work in that office."

Despite Griffin's relative inexperience as a prosecutor, McNulty described the former Rove aide as "well qualified" to run the office in Little Rock.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., contended that the appointment didn't "pass the smell test."

"I can't even see how Mr. Griffin would be better qualified in any way than Bud Cummins, who had done a good job, who was well respected, who had now had years of experience," he said.

Bills are now pending in the House of Representatives and the Senate that would restore the traditional interim appointment process to judges.

Senate Given No Reason For Prosecutor Firings (CHIT)

By Karoun Demirjian

Chicago Tribune, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A year ago, Carol Lam, the U.S. attorney in San Diego, was fielding accolades for her successful prosecution of Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, the California congressman who pleaded guilty to tax evasion and corruption and was sent to prison for more than eight years.

Now, however, she is one of seven federal prosecutors that the Bush administration has removed from office in recent weeks, most for unspecified reasons, as was the case with Lam. The dismissals are unusual and that has prompted several Democratic senators to accuse the White House of taking undue aim at U.S. prosecutors, either to make way for up-and-coming Republicans or even to punish those who aggressively prosecuted friends of the administration.

The Department of Justice has strongly denied the allegations, but also has refused to publicly give any reasons for the dismissals.

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty defended the firings Tuesday at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing, saying, "U.S. attorneys serve at the pleasure of the President {ndash} they come and go for lots of reasons…. We don't really believe we are obligated to set forth a reason or cause."

The nation's 94 U.S. attorneys, the chief federal prosecutors in their respective cities or geographic regions, are generally appointed at the beginning of a president's term, and barring serious misconduct, serve until the end of his tenure or until they choose to leave voluntarily.

DOJ_NMG_0128768

The current round of removals has attracted Democratic attention because of a little-noticed measure that was slipped into the Patriot Act Reauthorization last year allowing the White House to circumvent the Senate approval process for U.S. attorneys by making open-ended interim appointments.

Since President Bush signed the bill, about a dozen U.S. attorneys have resigned. McNulty said at least seven of the resignations were sought by Justice. But he said only the resignation of H.E. Cummins III of Little Rock, Ark. was sought without a specific job performance-related cause. Cummins was replaced by J. Timothy Griffin, a military prosecutor and former assistant to White House political operative Karl Rove.

McNulty told the committee that the administration is still consulting senators to identify the best candidates in their respective states and fully intends to send the prosecutors' replacements to the Senate for confirmation. But suspicious Judiciary Committee members said they plan to vote Thursday to rescind the Patriot Act provision that allows the administration to appoint interim U.S. attorneys indefinitely without Senate confirmation.

Sen. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.) told the committee, "I am convinced that the administration and future administrations will bypass the Senate if the law isn't changed." He said he doubted that in the seven months since Cummins had first been asked to step down that the administration couldn't send an official nominee to the Senate for confirmation. "This is larger than any party affiliation or any single appointment."

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) bristled at allegations that he had played any part in crafting the clause on interim appointments in the Patriot Act and agreed to cooperate to revert the law on U.S. attorney appointments back to its pre-2006 state. In the earlier law, interim terms expire after 120 days, and if no replacement can be nominated and confirmed in that time, the local federal court names a replacement.

But McNulty said that arrangement has caused problems in the past, such as in South Dakota in 2005, when a U.S. district judge's appointee for interim U.S. attorney was overruled by the Justice Department in favor of a candidate it selected, precipitating a legal dispute.

But several senators said that the alternative in the Patriot Act, possibly cutting them entirely out of the appointment process, is unacceptable.

"The Patriot Act should not have been amended," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), who sponsored the measure to revise the law. "I do not believe anyone in this committee knew it was in the law—no Republican, no Democrat."

Not all members of the Judiciary Committee voiced concern about the firings. Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.), said, "For seven out of 94 to be asked to step down is not that big a deal to me. My personal opinion is that the Department of Justice is far too reticent in reviewing U.S. attorneys that do not perform."

Lawmakers' Letters Led To Lam's Ouster (SDUT)

By Joe Cantlupe, Copley News Service

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 7, 2007

A top Justice Department official said yesterday that San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam was being targeted for dismissal because of "performance-related" issues after his office received letters from several members of Congress complaining about her handling of immigration enforcement cases.

Questioned by Senate Judiciary Committee members, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty repeatedly declined to spell out what Lam's performance shortcomings were, other than to note the complaints.

"What about Carol Lam? Why was she terminated?" committee member Rep. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., asked McNulty.

"I respectfully decline to go into specific reasons," McNulty said.

"I think the committee needs to know why she was terminated," Specter responded.

But all McNulty would say is that "the phone calls made in December were performance-related." He was referring to calls made to Lam and five other prosecutors demanding their resignations. A seventh U.S. attorney, based in Arkansas, was dismissed earlier last year to make way for a former aide to White House adviser Karl Rove, McNulty said.

The forced resignations and secrecy surrounding them have triggered concerns among Democrats that the Bush administration is trying to circumvent the Senate's right to approve or disapprove U.S. attorney appointments.

DOJ_NMG_0128769

Democrats, including California Sen. Dianne Feinstein, have objected to a provision slipped into the USA Patriot Act last year allowing U.S. attorney replacements to be appointed and serve indefinitely without Senate approval. Democrats are preparing legislation to overturn the new presidential power.

"I have observed, with increasing alarm, how politicized the Department of Justice has become," Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said at the start of the hearing. "I have watched, with growing worry, as the department has increasingly based hiring on political affiliation."

McNulty vigorously denied the allegation: "When I hear you talk about the politicizing of the Department of Justice, it's like a knife in my heart."

Separately, he added: "The attorney general's appointment authority has not and will not be used to circumvent the confirmation process."

Schumer noted that Lam "was in the midst of a sweeping public investigation," referring to the probe of former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Rancho Santa Fe, and others. Cunningham is in prison after pleading guilty to conspiracy and tax evasion charges, but investigations are pending for several co-conspirators.

"Was her firing political retaliation? There's no way to know that," Schumer said. But he said he assumed that "politics is involved. The appearance is plain awful."

McNulty denied the assertion.

When questioned about the continued Cunningham-related investigations, McNulty said, "We never have and never will seek to remove a United States attorney to interfere with an ongoing investigation or prosecution or in retaliation for a prosecution."

Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., who supports Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' right to remove the prosecutors, referred to a series of critical letters about Lam from members of Congress who questioned her lack of aggressiveness in immigration-related cases.

Lam had been "subject to a number of complaints," Sessions said.

Last June, Feinstein wrote to Gonzales regarding her concerns about immigration-related prosecutions in Southern California. On July 30, 2004, a group of 14 California representatives wrote to the Attorney General also to express their "concern" about immigration-related cases.

In October 2005, Rep. Darrell Isla, R-Vista, wrote to Lam complaining about "non-prosecution of criminal illegal aliens," and a year later criticized her office about its failure to carry out immigrant-related smuggling cases.

The Attorney General's office was familiar with all the letters, McNulty said. "We received letters from members of Congress," McNulty acknowledged. "I don't want to go into the substance of them.

"We take them seriously," he said. "We give them consideration."

Lam, 47, who has been the top prosecutor in San Diego for more than four years, announced she is resigning Feb. 15. She has declined to comment on reasons for her resignation, but sources said they were linked to Justice Department officials who were concerned about her handling of immigration-related prosecutions.

Lam's office said she had no comment about yesterday's proceedings.

White House Denies Prosecutors Were Sacked In Retaliation (FT)

By Alim Remtulla Inwashington Andbrooke Masters In New York

Financial Times, February 7, 2007

The Bush administration had no complaints about the performance of the US attorney from eastern Arkansas who it forced out late last year to make room for a protege of Karl Rove, a Justice Department official yesterday acknowledged.

But Paul McNulty, the deputy attorney-general, told the Senate judiciary committee that his department had performance-related "reasons" for calling six other top prosecutors in December and ordering them to resign.

Senate Democrats are probing the recent departure of 13 of the 93 US attorneys, asking whether the Bush administration is "politicising" the administration of justice and using the posts to reward political allies.

DOJ_NMG_0128770

The Democrats have been particularly concerned about the removal of Carol Lam, the former US attorney for San Diego, who prosecuted Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a former Republican congressman.

Mr McNulty said Ms Lam's departure was unrelated to the bribery case but he said she was among the group removed for performance-related reasons.

"In this administration, US attorneys are never, repeat, never, removed in an effort to retaliate against them," Mr McNulty testified. He also said Timothy Griffin, Mr Cummins' replacement in Arkansas, was well qualified for his new position.

Democrats are also seething about a 2006 law change that allows the attorney-general to name "interim" US attorneys who can serve indefinitely without Senate confirmation. Until last year, temporary replacements could serve only 120 days before they needed approval from a state's district judges.

Chuck Schumer, the New York senator who chaired the hearing, warned that he might subpoena the performance records of the fired prosecutors if the Justice Department did not turn them over.

"I have never seen the department more politicised and pushed further away from its mission as an apolitical enforcer of the rule of law," he said

Mr McNulty insisted the executive branch was better positioned to appoint temporary prosecutors than judges would be but he also pledged that the administration would fill all the open jobs with nominees who were confirmed by the Senate.

Senators Press Officials On U.S. Attorney Firings (RC)

By Rachel Van Dongen

Roll Call, February 7, 2007

Turning up the heat on the Bush administration on an increasingly touchy issue, Republican and Democratic members of the Senate Judiciary Committee grilled Deputy U.S. Attorney General Paul McNulty on Tuesday over why and how as many as seven U.S. attorneys around the country were dismissed from their posts since June.

Led by Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), the lawmakers aggressively questioned the Justice Department's motives in firing up to six prosecutors in December, including San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam, who is credited with producing the 2005 guilty plea of former Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) to accepting more than $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors. Lam is leaving office Feb. 15, but the probe into Cunningham's activities continues.

"I have observed, with increasing alarm, how politicized the Department of Justice has become," Schumer said in his opening statement. "And now, it appears, even the hiring and firing of our top federal prosecutors has become infused and corrupted with political, rather than prudent, considerations."

Schumer repeatedly pressed McNulty, a former chief Hill counsel during former President Bill Clinton's impeachment proceedings and ex-House ethics committee lawyer, to provide documentation, such as written evaluations of each U.S. attorney's job performance, that would substantiate why the attorneys were fired. If that information is not provided quickly, the Democrat threatened to subpoena that information from Justice. "For six years, there has been little or no oversight of the Department of Justice. Those days are over," Schumer vowed.

In a strong opening statement putting Justice on the defensive, Schumer's comments were echoed by the panel's ranking member, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), a former Pennsylvania assistant attorney general.

"If a U.S. attorney general was fired in retaliation for what was done on the prosecution of former Congressman Cunningham, that's wrong," Specter stated. "And that's wrong even though the president has the power to terminate U.S. attorneys. U.S. attorneys can't function if they're going to be afraid of the consequences of a vigorous prosecution."

Arguing that the executive branch has created an atmosphere of "high-level suspicion" in Congress, Specter said that Senate oversight on the U.S. attorneys issue should move full-steam ahead. "I want to see this inquiry pursued ... I want it pursued in each one of these cases and see what actually went on because there are very serious accusations that are made that, if they're true, there ought to be very, very substantial action taken in our oversight function."

McNulty strenuously denied any political motivation for the dismissal of the prosecutors, explaining that it was part of normal staff turnover. "The indisputable fact is that U.S. attorneys serve at the pleasure of the president," he said. While he refused to confirm the exact number of prosecutors dismissed recently, McNulty did say that several were let go for "performance-based" reasons in phone calls during December 2006. McNulty declined, however, to provide a specific reason for Lam's dismissal, arguing that it would be "unfair" to individual prosecutors to discuss their private personnel records in public.

DOJ_NMG_0128771

"What happened in the prosecution of Congressman Cunningham was a very good thing," McNulty said, describing Justice as "proud" of that outcome. "Any investigation that falls from that has to run its full course."

"Public corruption is a top priority for the president," McNulty added.

McNulty, however, did not dispute Schumer's assertion that another U.S. attorney — Bud Cummins III, the former U.S. attorney for Eastern Arkansas — was dismissed without any specific cause. Democrats allege that Cummins was asked to step aside in order to install Tim Griffin, a former aide to White House adviser Karl Rove.

Sen. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.), a former Arkansas attorney general who testified before the committee, praised Cummins' record and said he did not believe he could support Griffin if his nomination was ultimately sent to the Senate for confirmation.

"As more light was shed on the situation in Arkansas, it became clear that Bud Cummins was asked to resign without cause so that the White House could reward the Arkansas post to Mr. Griffin," Pryor testified.

Led by Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), Democrats have been slamming the administration over the U.S. attorneys issue for several weeks now. Besides arguing that the dismissals are politically motivated, they also charge that the Justice Department is attempting to circumvent the Senate confirmation process by installing interim U.S. attorneys whom it has no intention of ever formally nominating. The Justice Department fiercely denies that charge and says it intends to send all U.S. attorney candidates for nomination to the Hill.

Feinstein lists seven U.S. attorneys recently asked to step aside by Justice: Lam, Cummins, Kevin Ryan of San Francisco, David Iglesias of New Mexico, Daniel Bogden of Nevada, John McKay of Washington and Paul Charlton of Arizona. Besides Lam, none of the prosecutors is involved in identified Congressional cases.

Feinstein and Specter appear to have agreed on compromise legislation to reverse a 2006 amendment to the USA PATRIOT Act that allowed Justice to indefinitely appoint interim U.S. attorneys. The legislation, which is slated to be marked up on Thursday, would allow Justice to install a replacement attorney for 120 days; after that, the authority would be transferred to a district court judge until a permanent replacement was found.

Committee Republicans largely defended the administration while noting that political interference in prosecutions was a serious matter if it were proved true. "U.S. attorneys serve at the pleasure of the president," said Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah). "The president can remove them for any reason ... that's the the law."

Alabama GOP Sen. Jeff Sessions raised the fact that several House Members, including California GOP Rep. Darrell Issa, had complained about Lam's record on prosecuting smuggling and other crimes along the California border. "I think we need to look at these appointments maybe in the future more carefully," Sessions said.

Judiciary Panel Questions Removal Of Arkansas U.S. Attorney (MCA)

By Bartholomew Sullivan, The Commercial Appeal

Memphis Commercial Appeal, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Members of the Senate Judiciary Committee asked Tuesday why the federal prosecutor who oversaw undercover operations that exposed corruption in the West Memphis Police and Crittenden County Sheriff's departments in 2002 was fired last year by the Justice Department.

Sen. Mark Pryor, D-Ark., told the committee that 49 days after H.E. "Bud" Cummins "was ousted without cause," and replaced by interim U.S. Attorney J. Timothy Griffin, he still doesn't know the grounds for the removal. Griffin, a protégé of presidential advisor Karl Rove and a former Republican Party opposition researcher, has not been nominated by the president and has therefore not been subject to the Senate's advise and consent oversight.

"The failure to acknowledge that Bud Cummins was told to leave for a purely political reason is a great disservice to someone who was loyal to the Administration and who performed his work admirably," Pryor testified.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has said that Cummins and six other U.S. attorneys, including the one in San Diego pursuing high-level corruption stemming from the U.S. Rep. Duke Cunningham scandal, were not removed for political reasons.

DOJ_NMG_0128772

"I think I would never, ever, make a change in a United States Attorney position for political reasons or if it would in any way jeopardize an ongoing, serious investigation," Gonzales said last month.

Cummins, a Republican, has said that he understands he serves at the will of the president, and appreciated the opportunity to serve for five years. "I don't have any hard feelings," he told the Arkansas Democrat Gazette last month.

But in Sunday's Washington Post, he elaborated: "I don't think many of us were aware that the administration might want to ask someone to step aside just to give someone else an opportunity," said Cummins. "The precedent was that once you were appointed, assuming you were successful in office, you were there until there was a change in the White House."

Cummins, who successfully prosecuted corrupt West Memphis and Crittenden County sheriff's deputies involved in a drug task force shortly after taking office, could not be reached Tuesday.

Skeptical Democrats on the committee Tuesday hinted they aren't buying it that the removal decisions weren't political. They will be considering legislation to re-establish Senate confirmation of prospective U.S. attorneys within 120 days of an interim appointment. The change permitting indefinite interim appointments was inserted in last year's Patriot Act reauthorization.

When Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., asked Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty whether the Justice Department would support the change, McNulty said it would consider it. McNulty said the department takes the position that a U.S. attorney can be removed for any reason or for no reason at all.

Cummins has said he was told last June that he was being removed to give Griffin the kind of high-profile exposure such a political appointment brings. The U.S. attorney prosecutes federal crimes within all of eastern Arkansas, based in Little Rock.

Cummins found out he was being replaced when he received a phone call while hiking in the woods with his son. Pryor testified Tuesday that he and others intervened to keep him in place until the end of the year. He left office Dec. 15, the day Griffin's appointment became official.

In his testimony, Pryor said Gonzales asked if he would support Griffin for the job, and Pryor said he could not without first seeing him go through the confirmation process. Pryor, a former Arkansas attorney general, said Griffin would not be his nominee for the post "because I just know too many other lawyers who are more qualified, more experienced and more respected by the Arkansas bar."

He continued: "After a thorough review by this committee, I hope that you will reach the same conclusion I have, which is this: No administration should be able to appoint U.S. attorneys without proper checks and balances. This is larger than party affiliation or any single appointment. This touches our solemn responsibilities as senators."

Deputy AG Acknowledges Cummins Was Forced Out (NAMN)

By Aaron Sadler, The Morning News

Northwest Arkansas Morning News, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A Justice Department official acknowledged for the first time Tuesday that H.E. "Bud" Cummins was fired last year as federal prosecutor in Little Rock to make room for a former White House aide.

He denied, however, that politics played a role in that or other U.S. attorney firings across the country.

At least seven prosecutors were forced out by the Bush administration late last year, including Cummins, U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas.

The Justice Department named Timothy Griffin as an interim replacement. Griffin, 38, is a former deputy to White House political adviser Karl Rove and former director of opposition research for the Republican National Committee.

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told the Senate Judiciary Committee that Cummins was informed in a June phone call that he was being asked to resign without cause. At that point, Griffin had already been identified as an interim successor, he said.

Other removals were "performance-related," according to McNulty.

Sen. Mark Pryor, D-Ark., said the Justice Department changed its story regarding Cummins' departure.

"First they said that initially Bud Cummins decided to leave on his own," Pryor said. "It's taken many weeks to get here, but today the Justice Department admitted he was told to leave."

Cummins said in a telephone interview Tuesday that he appreciated Pryor's defense of his service, but that he remained a Bush loyalist who had considered leaving his post regardless.

"In my case, it's fair to say it was handled poorly, because they could just have easily called me and said 'You haven't done anything wrong. You're a champ. You've been a great performer for the president, and we'd like you to cooperate with us and give this other guy a job for two years,'" Cummins said.

Democrats criticized the spate of firings as ways to build the resumes of up-and-coming Republicans by placing them in prosecutor jobs for the final two years of President Bush's term.

Pryor testified at Tuesday's hearing that the Justice Department should acknowledge Cummins was fired for "purely political reasons."

Democrats grilled McNulty extensively about Griffin's appointment, skeptical that the choice was unrelated to his GOP connections.

"It sure doesn't smell too good," Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said "You know that and I know that, but maybe there's a more plausible explanation than the one that seems to be obvious to everybody."

Schumer described Griffin as an "ambitious acolyte" of Rove.

The administration should be allowed to make personnel changes at will without facing attacks from Democrats, unless it is proved the administration is abusing its power, said Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee.

"The atmosphere in Washington, D.C., is one of high-level suspicion," Specter said. "I want to see what actually went on, because there are very serious accusations that have been made."

Among questions Schumer raised was whether Carol Lam was ousted as U.S. attorney in San Diego in retaliation for prosecuting former Rep. Randy Cunningham, R-Calif., and whether Rove pushed to install Griffin in Arkansas.

McNulty said Griffin represented a "fresh start" for the Little Rock office, and that he brought more prosecutorial experience to the job than Cummins when he took the job in 2001.

"The fact that he has political activities in his background does not speak to his qualifications for being the United States attorney in that district," McNulty said of Griffin.

Griffin, of Magnolia, had been a special assistant prosecutor in Cummins' office and prosecuted cases in the Judge Advocate General's corps during a deployment in Iraq last year.

McNulty sidestepped questions about other fired prosecutors, including Lam, saying he would not speak publicly about reasons for the terminations.

Three Democratic senators, including Pryor, are sponsoring legislation to change a provision of the Patriot Act that gives the Justice Department authority to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for indefinite time periods.

Pryor said such appointments would circumvent the Senate's constitutional responsibility to confirm judicial appointments.

In a hearing last month, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the Justice Department intends to put every new U.S. attorney through the nomination process.

But Pryor said the administration has taken the position that prosecutors do not need to be confirmed, citing a recent Justice Department filing in a complaint filed by Little Rock attorney John Wesley Hall.

Hall contends Griffin does not have authority to serve as U.S. attorney without Senate confirmation.

"They have changed their story on a couple points," Pryor said of the Justice Department.

"They've been saying publicly that their intention is to nominate all these U.S. attorneys, however ... they take the position they don't have to have U.S. attorneys confirmed."

Specter and Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., said they support returning to the law as written before last year, setting a 120-day time limit for interim appointments.

Congress Probes Departures Of U.S. Attorneys (USNEWS)

By Chitra Ragavan

U.S. News and World Report, February 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0128774

The departure of nearly a dozen U.S. attorneys–including some overseeing high-profile politically charged criminal investigations–has sparked congressional inquiries as to whether the Justice Department is politicizing the hiring and firing of federal prosecutors. Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty was in the hot seat today answering just that very question before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

One of the U.S. attorney departures that is raising the most eyebrows is that of Carol Lam, who has been overseeing the massive federal corruption probe of former Rep. Randall "Duke" Cunningham. The eight-term Republican congressman is currently serving a long prison term for accepting more than $2.4 million in bribes in exchange for inserting lucrative "earmarks" into defense appropriations and intelligence appropriations budgets on behalf of two defense contractors, including a San Diego-based contractor named Brent Wilkes and two unindicted co-conspirators.

But federal investigators are continuing to investigate Wilkes's ties to Cunningham and to a senior Central Intelligence Agency official named Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, who has since resigned from his post after being named in the corruption probe. The government alleges that Wilkes gave Cunningham more than $630,000 in bribes, gifts, and favors. They also are probing whether Wilkes obtained lucrative CIA contracts from Foggo, a former high school buddy who became the No. 3 official at the CIA. That investigation is still ongoing and could result in further indictments.

Both Wilkes and Foggo have said they are innocent.

To some veteran former Justice Department officials, the departure of Lam before the Cunningham probe is completed harks back to a similar case involving a CIA asset more than 25 years ago, in which the U.S. attorney was fired because of pressure from the agency. In 1982, the feds arrested the former chief of the Federal Security Directorate (Mexico's secret police), Miguel Nazar Haro, after he was indicted by a federal grand jury in San Diego for his involvement in an $8 million car-theft ring that had smuggled about 600 stolen American luxury cars and vans from Southern California to Mexico.

The U.S. attorney in San Diego, William Kennedy, had uncovered the car-theft ring and pushed the Justice Department to indict Haro. Kennedy charged that the CIA was blocking the indictment because Haro was a CIA asset in Mexico City and that the Justice Department was dragging its feet. Kennedy was reprimanded in no uncertain terms–President Ronald Reagan fired the prosecutor, a former Justice official says, after the CIA brought pressure to bear. But Haro–who was forced to resign as the secret police chief because of the car-smuggling allegations– was subsequently indicted and arrested. He posted $200,000 bail and fled, becoming a fugitive. And so he remained, until he was again arrested in February 2004, this time on charges that he had kidnapped a leftist leader nearly three decades earlier during Mexico's "dirty war," against the left.

After Kennedy was fired, Justice sources say, CIA officials used it as a "warning" to other Justice officials not to challenge the agency. Kennedy later became a superior court judge in San Diego.

Fast forward to the Cunningham probe. Former Justice officials say it's ironic that the U.S. attorney's office that the CIA challenged so aggressively in the 1980s is the same office that is now targeting an allegedly corrupt CIA official. The CIA, Justice sources say, has blocked efforts to obtain documents in connection with the Wilkes-Foggo case.

Lam has declined to comment on her imminent departure. McNulty told the Judiciary Committee today that the turnover of U.S. attorneys is not unusual and won't cause any problems.

"The indisputable fact is that [U.S. attorneys] serve at the pleasure of the president," said McNulty. "They come and they go for lots of reasons."

But one former senior justice official says he's skeptical of official explanations.

"If you say there's an innocent reason for the change in San Diego," he says, "I have a bridge to sell in Brooklyn."

Playing Politics With Justice (NYT)

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

The Bush administration has pushed out at least seven United States attorneys recently for what appear to be purely political reasons. Senator Charles Schumer, Democrat of New York, has opened an investigation, and not a moment too soon. The American justice system would be seriously damaged if United States attorneys were stripped of their independence.

United States attorneys, the federal prosecutors who work in the states, are supposed to be respected, independent members of the bar. They have extraordinary power: they can file criminal charges and conduct investigations that can destroy reputations. They are supposed to be confirmed by the Senate, and there is a long tradition that they are not removed during the term of the president who appointed them, except for serious cause.

The Bush administration has broken with that tradition in a way that reeks of politics. One of the dismissed United States attorneys, H. E. Cummins III of Arkansas, has been replaced by a former Republican National Committee opposition researcher who worked for Karl Rove. Another, Carol Lam of San Diego, is in the middle of a sensitive public corruption inquiry that has already brought down one Republican congressman, Randy Cunningham, and is looking at other possible wrongdoers. The White House is taking advantage of a little-noticed provision in the Patriot Act that allows the president to appoint interim United States attorneys without Senate approval.

At a Judiciary Committee hearing yesterday on the dismissals, the deputy attorney general who represented the Bush administration failed to explain convincingly why the United States attorneys had been removed, or to dispel the suspicion that politics was the driving force. Mr. Schumer says he may subpoena the dismissed federal attorneys' performance evaluations if he doesn't get a better explanation. The Senate should keep pushing for answers — and for nonpartisan prosecutors to be placed and kept in these important positions.

Bush Replaces U.S. Attorneys In Power Play (BSUN)

By George W. Liebmann

The Baltimore Sun, February 7, 2007

The news that the Bush administration has replaced seven U.S. attorneys, none charged with or guilty of wrongdoing, with people fairly describable as Washington apparatchiks should give pause to all those concerned with America's working Constitution.

This was made possible by a provision of the Patriot Act allowing the president to make interim appointments of U.S. attorneys, a function previously confined to the federal district courts.

The office of U.S. attorney is far more powerful than it was at the time of the ratification of the Constitution. Its functions are no longer limited to federal specialties such as customs and revenue offenses, but extend to virtually the entire range of criminal offenses. Stringent federal sentencing guidelines have rendered federal prosecutions the prosecutions of first resort, even for certain street crimes. During the tenures of Attorneys General Janet Reno, John Ashcroft and Alberto R. Gonzales, the number of federal prosecutors has greatly increased.

As contemplated by Alexander Hamilton in the Federalist Papers, the requirement of Senate confirmation has operated to prevent the staffing of these positions with pliant presidential cronies. The local senators, particularly those of the president's party, in practice have nominated U.S. attorneys and normally have been concerned not to outrage the local bar. Although the appointees have always served at the president's pleasure, it has been possible to guard against politically motivated removals by vesting the power of interim appointment in federal judges, drawn from both parties. These judges have generally appointed senior career officials pending Senate approval of a new nominee.

The enthusiasts for unlimited executive power and a compliant Congress have changed this. But Article II, Section 2 of the Constitution expressly allows judicial appointing powers. Cases allow Congress to limit presidential removal powers on Justice Louis D. Brandeis' premise that the function of the Constitution was "not to promote efficiency but to preclude the exercise of arbitrary power."

In the wake of Watergate, Congress, at the urging of Attorney General Edward H. Levi, provided the FBI director with a 10-year fixed term to insulate him from presidential whims.

As the sweep of federal criminal jurisdiction widens, it is imperative that Congress thoroughly review the provisions for appointment and removal of all important federal law enforcement officials - not merely U.S. attorneys. The dispersion of police and prosecutorial power is the bedrock of American civil liberty. In all but two or three states, prosecutors are elected for short terms.

We do not want prosecutors to be laws unto themselves, and we do not want an elective dictatorship. Geographic dispersion of prosecutorial power, of which Congress has lately grown careless with its expansions of federal jurisdiction, has historically been the American answer to this problem. The growth of the central office of the Justice Department renders it imperative that old controls be reinstated and new ones devised.

DOJ_NMG_0128776

The residents of the seven judicial districts affected by the new appointments do not yet have reason to remonstrate against an executive who has, in the language of the Declaration of Independence, "sent hither swarms of officers to harass our people and eat out their substance," but the new appointments - and the statute authorizing them - impair the influence of locally elected senators and overly aggrandize the federal executive.

George W. Liebmann, a Baltimore lawyer, is executive director of the Calvert Institute for Policy Research and the author of "The Common Law Tradition: A Collective Portrait of Five Legal Scholars."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

3 Acquitted In Lengthy AOL Trial (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

An Alexandria jury acquitted two former AOL executives on all the conspiracy and fraud charges against them yesterday, dealing a blow to prosecutors and marking a decisive end to one of the longest trials in the federal courthouse.

Jurors spent slightly more than three full days in deliberation before clearing Kent D. Wakeford and John P. Tuli of charges that they helped a Las Vegas software client post fictitious revenue in early 2001. As the court clerk read the verdict, Tuli wept while his mother and his wife gasped with delight. Wakeford trembled, clapped his hands twice and hugged his lawyers.

The six-man, six-woman jury also acquitted Christopher J. Benyo, a former vice president at the Las Vegas company, PurchasePro.com. Defense lawyer Terrance Reed last week appealed to the jury to "set yourselves and Mr. Benyo free" from a case that stretched into a fourth month, a rarity in a courthouse known for dispensing speedy justice.

"You're free to go, gentlemen," U.S. District Judge Walter D. Kelley Jr. told the jubilant defendants. Wakeford and Tuli clasped in a tearful embrace as prosecutors filed out of the eighth-floor courtroom without a word to spectators or opponents.

The case marks the second defeat for the government in its five-year-old investigation into accounting misdeeds at PurchasePro and AOL in the early days of the Internet bust. The same judge acquitted a former top lawyer for PurchasePro in December 2005 after a two-week trial. Once the focus of intense government scrutiny, high-ranking AOL sales and marketing officials ultimately avoided criminal charges, an issue that defense lawyers for their subordinates seized on as scapegoating during the trial.

Chuck Rosenberg, the U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia who joined the office last year, issued a statement praising the government team and concluding: "Sometimes, jurors see things in a different way. We respect their decision."

In the course of the trial, which began in October, Tuli's defense lawyer Mark J. Hulkower assailed nearly every aspect of the prosecution, from the integrity of former PurchasePro employees who pleaded guilty and testified in exchange for leniency to the tactics of the investigators.

The defense teams also heaped blame on Charles E. Johnson Jr., PurchasePro's former chief executive who was severed from the case last fall for reasons that remain secret. Johnson will be retried in August. Defense lawyers stressed that Wakeford and Tuli had not received payments or other direct financial benefits for entering into deals with PurchasePro, and asked jurors to consider whether they had a motive to engage in the alleged fraud.

"We're pleased with the verdict," said Hulkower, who spent a week in the hospital after his appendix burst but returned to deliver an impassioned three-hour closing argument last week. "It's been five years in coming, and now John Tuli can reclaim his life."

Tuli's wife, his brother, his mother and other relatives relocated from the Boston area to occupy a nearby town house for the duration of the trial. Wakeford's parents and friends appeared in the courtroom to support him.

Alone among the three, Wakeford took the witness stand in his defense, testifying emotionally in January -- a move that his attorney, Henry W. Asbill, said followed a gut feeling. "All's well that ends well," Asbill said yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0128777

After the verdict, Wakeford told reporters that the experience had been "hell," and in a telephone interview hours later spoke out against government tactics that he labeled "grossly unfair."

"At what point do the questionable tactics become so unfair that a government body should step in to make sure that innocent people are not wrongly convicted?" he asked.

AOL and parent company Time Warner paid more than $500 million two years ago to settle related charges over accounting practices. Spokesman Andrew Weinstein declined to comment on the jury's decision. AOL, which had been paying millions of dollars in attorney fees for Wakeford and Tuli, may have a difficult time recovering the money in light of the acquittals.

All three men continue to face civil fraud charges lodged by the Securities and Exchange Commission, which delayed its case while the criminal proceedings moved forward.

Defendants Acquitted In AOL-PurchasePro Trial (FINDLAW/AP)

By Matthew Barakat, Ap Business Writer

AP, February 7, 2007

(AP) - ALEXANDRIA, Virginia-Two former midlevel executives at America Online were acquitted Tuesday on all counts of charges that they conspired with a now-defunct Las Vegas software firm to inflate its revenue with secret side deals and backdated contracts.

A third defendant, a senior executive at the Las Vegas company, also was found not guilty on all counts.

The verdicts brought to a close one of the longest trials in the history of the federal courthouse in Alexandria. The trial lasted more than three months; the jury deliberated three full days before reaching its verdict.

All three defendants wept with relief when the verdicts were read.

John Tuli, a former vice president in AOL's NetBusiness unit; Kent Wakeford, a former executive director at AOL's business affairs unit; and Christopher Benyo, a former senior vice president of marketing at PurchasePro, had been accused of deceiving PurchasePro stockholders about the company's revenue in the first quarter of 2001 as the dot-com economy collapsed.

The alleged ringleader of the scheme, PurchasePro founder Charles "Junior" Johnson, is scheduled to go on trial in August.

Several PurchasePro executives had struck plea deals and testified at the trial.

AOL is the online access unit of Time Warner Inc.

Oil Drilling Companies To Pay Record Settlement In Bribery Case (AP)

By JUAN A. LOZANO

AP, February 7, 2007

HOUSTON - Three oil drilling companies - subsidiaries of a British firm - have agreed to pay a $26 million fine for bribing Nigerian officials in order to get preferential customs treatment, Justice Department officials announced Tuesday.

The fine by the companies, subsidiaries of London-based Vetco International Ltd., is the largest criminal settlement of foreign corruption charges, said Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty.

"This case ... confirms our commitment to root out corruption," McNulty said. "The Department of Justice will continue its efforts to assure a level playing field for businesses operating abroad."

During a closed hearing in a Houston federal court Tuesday, the companies - Vetco Gray UK Ltd., Vetco Gray Controls Inc., and Vetco Gray Controls Ltd. - pleaded guilty to violating the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act.

Vetco Gray Controls Inc. agreed to pay a $6 million fine; Vetco Gray Controls Ltd., $8 million; and Vetco Gray UK Ltd., $12 million.

A fourth subsidiary, Aibel Group Ltd., agreed to accept responsibility for similar conduct by its employees.

According to court documents, the four subsidiaries paid Nigerian customs officers $2.1 million from September 2002 to at least April 2005 to speed equipment and employees into the country. At least 378 corrupt payments were made to Nigerian officials, authorities said.

At the time, the companies were providing engineering and procurement services and subsea construction equipment for Nigeria's first deepwater oil drilling project, the Bonga Project.

DOJ_NMG_0128778

The payments were coordinated mainly through Vetco Gray Controls Inc.'s offices in Houston.

This was the second time that Vetco Gray UK Ltd. pleaded guilty to corruption charges.

In July 2004, Vetco Gray UK agreed to pay $5.25 million for bribing Nigerian government officials with more than $1 million for insider bid information on oil and gas construction contracts.

Justice Department officials said their investigation was resolved due in part to Vetco International voluntarily disclosing what had happened and the subsidiaries' agreement to take steps to fix the problem.

In a statement, Vetco International Ltd. said the violations began under prior ownership in 2002 and stopped when discovered by current management in April 2005.

"Vetco International Limited and its subsidiaries fully cooperated with the (Department of Justice) by conducting a lengthy and thorough investigation of the conduct at issue, and took significant remedial action in response to its findings," the company said.

Vetco International officials said they will set up independent compliance monitors for both the Vetco Gray and Vetco Aibel subsidiaries for three years to make sure anti-corruption laws are followed.

The settlement with the Justice Department fulfills a closing condition for the previously announced sale of the Vetco Gray subsidiary to General Electric Co., Vetco International said.

Vetco International has about 10,000 employees in more than 30 countries.

Firms To Pay $26 Million In Nigeria Bribery Case (HC)

By Tom Fowler

Houston Chronicle, February 7, 2007

Three subsidiaries of Vetco International, an oilwell services firm with Houston ties, will pay a record $26 million to settle charges they violated the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act for bribing Nigerian officials.

Vetco Gray Controls Inc., Vetco Gray Controls Ltd., and Vetco Gray UK Ltd. will pay criminal fines of $6 million, $8 million, and $12 million, respectively. Collectively they constitute the largest such fine paid in connection with the act, the Department of Justice said today.

This is the second time in three years a Vetco-related firm has paid fines for bribery. In July 2004 Vetco Gray of Houston and Vetco Gray of Aberdeen, Scotland, each agreed to pay fines of $5.25 million. At the time the companies were owned by ABB of Switzerland.

Last month General Electric Co. said it would pay $1.9 billion to acquire Vetco Gray.

Vetco officials could not be reached for comment.

At a closed hearing this morning before U.S. District Judge Lynn Hughes in Houston, the companies pleaded guilty to violations of the anti-bribery provisions of the FCPA, as well as conspiracy to violate the federal law.

Aibel Group Ltd., another wholly owned subsidiary of Vetco International, also entered into a deferred prosecution agreement with the Justice Department .

According to the government from September 2002 through April 2005 each of the companies used an international freight forwarding and customs clearing company to make at least 378 payments totaling approximately $2.1 million to Nigerian Customs Service officials. The payments were aimed at getting customers officials to give Vetco preferential treatment.

Vetco Gray was providing engineering and procurement services and subsea construction equipment for Nigeria's first deepwater oil drilling project, the Bonga Project.

In addition to the criminal fines, the plea agreements require the companies to hire an independent monitor to oversee the creation and maintenance of a compliance program, complete an investigation of the companies' conduct in other countries and ensure that the agreements are binding to any future purchasers of the companies.

Allied Records Are Subpoenaed In 'Pretexting' Case (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0128779

Federal prosecutors have subpoenaed records of Allied Capital, a business development company that provides financing to smaller firms, in an effort to discover how private investigators it hired may have obtained the phone records of one of its leading critics.

Allied, which had previously denied any involvement, said yesterday in a statement that it has since become aware that an agent of the company obtained the telephone records of David Einhorn, a hedge fund manager, as well as records of calls from his fund, Greenlight Capital, during 2005.

Allied, which is based in Washington, said that it had received a subpoena from the United States attorney in Washington in December.

The statement added that Allied's management had not authorized the obtaining of the telephone records and that the company was cooperating with prosecutors.

In November, The New York Times reported accusations by Mr. Einhorn and other Allied critics that they had been the victims of pretexting — improperly impersonating an individual to obtain confidential information.

Pretexting became part of the national vocabulary after the disclosure by Hewlett-Packard in September that it had hired investigators who obtained the phone records of board members and reporters to discover the source of leaks to the media.

California's attorney general has filed criminal charges against one of Hewlett-Packard's former senior lawyers as well as its former chairwoman, Patricia C. Dunn, and two private detectives. All have pleaded not guilty.

In response to Allied's statement yesterday, Mr. Einhorn expressed frustration that he had brought the pretexting allegations to the attention of Allied's board several times only to be ignored.

"After five years, Allied Capital has acknowledged a tiny piece of its rampant misconduct," Mr. Einhorn said in a statement. "The evidence was clearly always there; the board simply neglected its fiduciary responsibility to supervise the company appropriately."

The Justice Department inquiry raises questions about how far companies may be going to fight hedge funds that have sold their stocks short. In a short sale, an investor borrows shares and sells them, hoping to buy them back later at a lower price to return them to the lender, profiting from the difference in price.

That war between companies and hedge funds has been nasty. Several companies, like Biovail, a Canadian pharmaceutical company and a favorite target of short sellers, have filed lawsuits against hedge funds, accusing them of disseminating false information to drive their stocks down.

Last month, Greenlight Capital and James Brickman, a retired real estate developer in Dallas who has been a vocal critic of Allied on online message boards, turned the tables. Using the "citizen suit" provision of the federal False Claims Act, they filed a lawsuit on behalf of the United States government contending that an Allied subsidiary, Business Loan Express, had submitted fraudulent documents for shrimp-boat loans to the Small Business Administration, which partially guaranteed the loans.

Their lawsuit was filed as a federal grand jury in Michigan handed up an indictment against a former Business Loan Express executive, accusing him of falsifying information on 76 loans with a value of nearly $77 million over six years.

In an open letter to Allied's board released two weeks ago, Mr. Einhorn contended that fraudulent loan activity had occurred in several states and that the current management of Business Loan Express should be removed.

In its response, Allied went on the attack, asking Mr. Einhorn, who has sold Allied's stock short, to disclose fully his financial interests in the company over the last five years and saying that the company and the board are "exploring potential alternatives to address the damage caused by Mr. Einhorn to this company and its shareholders."

In letters written to members of Allied's board in 2005 and last September and provided to The New York Times, Mr. Einhorn detailed his pretexting allegations and asked that an independent investigation be conducted.

Mr. Einhorn says that more than three years ago someone claiming to be his wife contacted his phone company and used her Social Security number to open an online account, sending copies of his home telephone bills to an unknown AOL account.

At least four other individuals, including Mr. Brickman and Herb Greenberg, a columnist for the MarketWatch Web site, said they also discovered that their phone records had been revealed without their knowledge or approval at the same time.

DOJ_NMG_0128780

In a letter to Mr. Einhorn dated Sept. 29, 2006, Anne Torre Bates, the chairwoman of Allied's audit committee, said the board had looked into his allegations that management had played a role in an attempt to access his phone records and found no evidence to support his claim.

Yet, after it received the subpoena from federal prosecutors, Allied said it established a committee, which was advised by its own counsel, to review the documents requested. While gathering documents, Allied became aware that an agent had obtained Mr. Einhorn's telephone records, yesterday's statement said.

The statement does not address the pretexting allegations made by Mr. Greenberg, Mr. Brickman and others. A spokesman for the company said it had no additional comments to make.

Allied Capital Says Its 'Agent' Got Phone Data (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima And David Cho

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Allied Capital, a Washington financial services firm, said yesterday that someone it hired had obtained the phone records of David Einhorn, a hedge-fund manager who has accused the company of fraud, and Einhorn's company, Greenlight Capital.

In a statement, Allied said it had received a subpoena from the U.S. attorney's office for the District of Columbia in late December requesting records regarding the use of private investigators hired by the firm or its agents.

Until yesterday's disclosures, the firm and its board had denied allegations by Einhorn and other Allied critics that the firm had engaged in a practice known as pretexting, which involves posing as a person or family member of that person to trick a phone company into giving out phone records.

"In the course of gathering documents responsive to the subpoena, Allied Capital has become aware that an agent of the company obtained what were represented to be telephone records of David Einhorn and which purport to be records of calls from Greenlight Capital during a period of time in 2005," the firm said.

Allied also said that while gathering the documents for investigators, "allegations were made" that management had authorized the acquisition of its critics' phone records and that it had been "subsequently advised that these records had been obtained."

"The management of Allied Capital states that these allegations are not true," the statement said. "Allied Capital is cooperating fully with the inquiry by the United States attorney's office and will have no further comment concerning this matter until that inquiry has been conducted." The company said its board had established a committee to review the matter.

The incident echoes the case of Hewlett-Packard, the Silicon Valley computer giant whose use of private investigators to obtain personal phone records led to criminal charges filed last year by the California attorney general and a criminal investigation by the Justice Department.

Pretexting for phone records violates wire-fraud statutes, according to some legal experts and former U.S. prosecutors. A new law, signed by President Bush in January, makes the act a crime. It is not retroactive.

Allied, located a few blocks from the White House and whose board includes a former chairman of the Republican National Committee, specializes in lending to and investing in smaller companies.

The firm's disclosures raise new questions in a long-running saga that began in 2002 when Einhorn, known as a short seller of Allied stock, accused Allied of inflating the value of its assets. Short sellers borrow shares and sell them, expecting to buy them back later at a lower price.

"After five years, Allied Capital has acknowledged a tiny piece of its rampant misconduct," Einhorn said in an interview yesterday.

Left unanswered, he said, are questions about who at the firm knew about the pretexting, who hired the agent responsible for obtaining the records and how widespread the activity was.

Several journalists and analysts who were critical of Allied also claim to be pretexting victims. One of those was Herb Greenberg, a senior columnist for Market Watch, who wrote an article in 2003 questioning why Allied employed a convicted felon who had served time for securities fraud. After the story, he said, an unauthorized person opened an online telephone account using his name and got his records.

DOJ_NMG_0128781

Now Greenberg wants to know if other incidents will be investigated by the Justice Department.

"The company is acknowledging that it became aware that one of its agents got records of Einhorn's calls from Greenlight in 2005," Greenberg said. "The obvious question: Anything else in the subpoena?"

The battle between Einhorn and Allied is rooted in how a division of Allied, Business Loan Express, accounted for the loans it made to small businesses. In the past two years, the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Small Business Administration's inspector general opened inquiries into Allied's lending practices. Both agencies declined comment yesterday.

In December, a former Business Loan Express executive, Patrick J. Harrington, was indicted by a federal grand jury on charges that he defrauded the SBA of more than $76 million in guaranteed loans.

Einhorn said yesterday's disclosures suggest that the company had been engaged in a systematic attempt to silence critics to protect its share price. "This was an attempt to intimidate critics, chill free speech and chill investment research," he said.

Allied has long maintained that Einhorn has been deliberately spreading false information. William L. Walton, Allied Capital's chairman and chief executive, told analysts in November that Einhorn's motive is simple: "He makes money if he can drive down the price of Allied Capital stock."

Einhorn first raised concerns that Allied illegally gained access to his phone records in a March 2005 letter to Allied's board. He said that someone posing as his wife directed the phone company to send copies of their long-distance bills to an AOL account. In September 2006, Einhorn reiterated his concerns to the chairman of the board's audit committee, according to copies of letters he sent Allied.

The board dismissed his allegations, stating that it "looked into" it and "found no evidence to support" his claim, according to copies of letters he received.

Allied shares closed yesterday at $29.25, down 32 cents.

Corporate Guidelines On Pretexting Slow To Develop (NLJ)

By Sheri Qualters, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, February 7, 2007

A Deloitte & Touche poll revealed that most companies have not crafted policies to ban pretexting, which exposes them to potential criminal liability if their employees or investigators use deception to gather information in a probe.

In an online poll of 230 executives during a Webcast conducted by Deloitte Financial Advisory Services late last year, 42 percent said their companies had no written pretexting guidelines, and 45 percent said they didn't know if their company had such policies.

Only 8 percent have guidelines they are satisfied with, while 5 percent believe they have unsatisfactory rules on the books.

This lack of corporate attention on pretexting is especially alarming in light of a new federal law that creates criminal penalties for illicitly obtaining or disclosing telephone records.

President George W. Bush signed the bill in January, following civil and criminal charges against individuals involved in a Hewlett-Packard Co. scheme to fraudulently obtain phone records in an effort to discover which board members were leaking stories to the media.

Several detectives and the former chairwoman of the Palo Alto, Calif.-based technology company face criminal charges, and the company paid $14.5 million in civil fines.

DRAWING THE LINE

Beyond prohibiting tactics that are clearly illegal, such as obtaining bank or telephone records under false pretenses, companies need to consider what kinds of information-gathering techniques -- pretexting as well as other methods -- are acceptable at their firms, said Ernie Brod, director of Forensic & Dispute Services for Deloitte's financial advisory services arm.

The problem is that some individuals may see nothing wrong with surveillance, for example, but "others may be appalled," he said.

"Has someone told the people who conduct investigations what they are permitted to do and not permitted to do according to the culture and ethical guidelines of that company?" Brod said.

DOJ_NMG_0128782

Although companies are not detailing what kinds of pretexting tactics their employees or hired investigators can use, corporate counsel say existing ethics policies cover potential problems. Others say pretexting is rare in the daily operations of smaller and midsize companies.

Gabe Miller, the chief operating officer and general counsel of Chestnut Hill, Mass.-based digital media company STORS Digital Retail Networks, said he would be "very surprised if even 10 percent" of a 95-member Massachusetts general counsel listserv group he belongs to had inked a policy.

"It's so remote from their normal course of operations, they wouldn't find the time to deal with it," Miller said.

NOT ENOUGH DISCUSSION?

Watson Wyatt Worldwide Inc. counsel Karl Chen said there hasn't been much discussion about pretexting in the Arlington, Va.-based human resources consulting company.

"We haven't taken steps toward that," Wyatt said. "It was initially a hot issue with the Hewlett-Packard [scandal] but nothing has evolved or erupted."

Brod argued that even the smallest companies investigate or conduct background checks on potential hires, vendors and business partners, and such activities are often scattered across different departments.

Sarbanes-Oxley Act policies requiring public companies to establish reporting channels or a "hotline" for employee complaints about accounting and auditing concerns will also trigger investigations, Brod said.

"It's the same as for other areas of compliance," Brod said. "Companies need these [policies] to protect the reputation of a company. That in turn protects market value."

NO GUIDELINES

Susan Hackett, general counsel of the Association of Corporate Counsel, has attended seminars about the issue, but she said the Washington-based organization hasn't issued any guidelines for companies or undertaken a formal review of the issue.

It's difficult to come up with hard-and-fast rules about what kinds of legal pretexting cross the line into objectionable behavior, Hackett said.

That gray zone makes it even more critical for companies to set guidelines for acceptable behavior, Brod said. A useful gauge may be as simple as considering how public exposure of the pretexting method would affect the company, Brod said.

"The key question is: How will it affect your company if you read about it in the front page of the newspaper?" he said.

Engineered Support Ex-Excutives Accused (AP)

By Marcy Gordon, AP Business Writer

AP, February 7, 2007

SEC Accuses 2 Former Engineered Support Executives of Options Scheme

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Two former top executives of defense contractor Engineered Support Systems Inc. enriched themselves and others in a five-year-long scheme to manipulate the timing of stock option grants, federal regulators charged Tuesday.

The Securities and Exchange Commission filed a civil lawsuit in federal court in St. Louis against Gary Gerhardt, former chief financial officer of the company, and Steven Landmann, the former controller, over the alleged options backdating scheme. Employees and directors of Engineered Support received some $20 million in unauthorized compensation as a result of the backdating, while Gerhardt and Landmann reaped $1.9 million and $518,972, respectively, according to the SEC.

Landmann agreed in a settlement with the agency to pay a $259,486 civil fine and $627,071 in restitution plus interest. He also was barred from serving as an officer or director of, or as an accountant for, any public company. Landmann neither admitted nor denied the SEC's allegations under the accord.

The SEC's case against Gerhardt is still pending. His attorney, Eugene Goldman, said he hadn't yet read the agency's complaint against his client and therefore had no immediate comment.

It was the third case by the agency since last summer involving alleged options backdating, in a scandal in which more than 100 public companies are under investigation by the SEC and the Justice Department, more than $5 billion in profit has been erased by restatements and 18 CEOs have been swept out of office.

DOJ_NMG_0128783

Federal prosecutors issued a subpoena last June in the matter to Engineered Support, a St. Louis-based company that supplies electronics for the military and some government agencies. The SEC also began its investigation around that time.

The SEC said that from 1997 through 2002, Gerhardt instructed Landmann to make company stock options more lucrative by backdating their exercise price to a historically low point in the stock's value. Usually, a stock option's exercise price coincides with the market value at the time of a grant to give the recipient an incentive to drive the price higher.

If companies backdate options without accounting for the move, it can cause profits to be overstated and taxes to be underpaid.

In the Engineered Support case, the improper backdating was worsened by the fact that the options vested immediately -- enabling the recipients to instantly cash in, according to the SEC.

As part of the scheme, the agency said, Gerhardt and Landmann prompted the company to misstate in its regulatory filings that all stock options were granted at the fair market value of the stock on the date of award.

"Gerhardt and Landmann undermined the company's stated goal of using stock options to tie management's compensation to shareholder return," Merri Jo Gillette, director of the SEC's Midwest regional office, said in a statement. "Instead, they granted themselves and others instant compensation that was entirely unrelated to the future performance of the company's stock."

Landmann's attorney, Robert Schultz, declined to comment.

Engineered Support was acquired by DRS Technologies Inc., another defense contractor, in January 2006.

SEC Alleges Fraud At DRS Unit (WSJ)

By CHARLES FORELLE And JAMES BANDLER

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

Federal regulators charged two former executives of Engineered Support Systems Inc. with a long-running scheme to backdate stock options at the defense contractor, saying that the pair improperly increased their own pay and that of other top officials by a total of $20 million.

Yesterday's civil charges by the Securities and Exchange Commission come as the pace of governmental investigations into the backdating matter appeared to be quickening. Criminal charges in other cases are likely to be filed in coming weeks or months, according to people familiar with the matter.

The SEC complaints, filed in federal district court in Missouri, allege that at least 10 option grants at Engineered Support were backdated, in some cases by more than two months, and depict rampant problems with the company's options-granting process. The SEC charged former finance chief Gary Gerhardt and former controller Steven Landmann with securities fraud, misleading investors, and other securities violations. Mr. Landmann settled the SEC's charges and agreed to surrender $518,972 in backdating profits and pay interest and penalties of another $368,000. A lawyer for Mr. Landmann declined to comment.

Engineered Support, St. Louis, was acquired last year for about $2 billion by DRS Technologies Inc., of Parsippany, N.J. The conduct in question allegedly occurred prior to the acquisition.

Federal prosecutors in St. Louis also are investigating Engineered Support's options practices. People familiar with the matter say prosecutors are looking closely at Messrs. Gerhardt and Landmann, and former chief executive, Michael F. Shanahan Sr. and his son, Michael Shanahan Jr., who had been a director.

In one instance, the SEC alleges, Mr. Gerhardt sent a list of potential option recipients to the younger Mr. Shanahan on July 12, 2000. The list indicated that the options' date would be two months earlier, May 4, the day the stock reached a quarterly low.

In other instances, the SEC complaint alleges Mr. Gerhardt instructed Mr. Landmann to cancel already backdated options and reissue them -- backdated a second time -- to land at another low point.

Mr. Gerhardt, the SEC says, "personally selected" the grant dates for many options, and Mr. Landmann was "involved in the selection" of dates. The SEC alleges Mr. Landmann told Mr. Gerhardt that backdating was prohibited by the company's stock-option plan, but that Mr. Gerhardt ordered him to backdate anyway.

A spokeswoman for DRS Technologies said it has been advised by prosecutors that DRS is "neither a subject nor a target" of the federal investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0128784

Mr. Gerhardt's lawyer, Eugene Goldman, said he hadn't seen the complaint and couldn't comment. The SEC said Mr. Gerhardt's excess profit from backdating was $1.9 million. James Martin, a lawyer for the younger Mr. Shanahan, said he did "not see any evidence of fraud by anyone."

Options typically give their recipients the chance to purchase company shares at the price they were on the day the option was granted. By pretending the option was granted earlier than it really was, an executive magnifies the potential profit.

Mr. Shanahan Sr. was "ultimately responsible for authorizing stock-option grants during the relevant period" and received about $8.6 million in extra profit from the backdating, the SEC says. He wasn't charged. Arthur Margulis, a lawyer for Mr. Shanahan Sr., said he hadn't seen the complaint. "I have seen no evidence of any kind, testimonial or otherwise, that indicates there was any fraud by anyone," Mr. Margulis said.

The SEC says the double backdating occurred after the company's share price slid, leaving even already-backdated options unable to be exercised for profit. On June 1, 1999, the SEC says, Mr. Shanahan Sr. told Mr. Landmann to issue 295,000 options; the options were issued with a date of April 21, when the stock had reached its low for the year. But Engineered Support's shares slid in June, and the SEC says that finance chief Mr. Gerhardt told Mr. Landmann on July 15 to cancel the April 21 options and redo them with a date of July 1 -- a new low point.

Nacchio Seeks Trial Delay (AP)

By Sandy Shore

AP, February 7, 2007

Former Quest chief Joe Nacchio's attorneys asked a federal judge Tuesday to delay his insider trading trial, saying prosecutors have been so slow in turning over evidence that his rights could be jeopardized if the trial starts March 19 as scheduled.

Attorney Herbert Stern sought a 60-day postponement to evaluate documents prosecutors have provided in recent weeks, including six CD-ROMs of material that Stern said he was made aware of Monday evening.

He said prosecutors advised if his team wanted to use any of the classified material, they would have to submit them to the court as required by federal law.

"The government has chosen on the eve of trial to place a heavy burden on the defendant - to review voluminous materials and then make applications to the court and we do not even know the full extent of that burden," Stern wrote in a brief filed in U.S. District Court.

Stern said the documents may support Nacchio's contention that he had hope for Qwest's future because he knew about the Denver-based phone company's classified business dealings with the government.

"This request is not of our making, but if not granted will prejudice our ability to mount a full defense as required by the Sixth Amendment," Stern wrote.

Jeff Dorschner, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, declined comment.

Nacchio's attorneys have complained previously about government attorneys being slow to provide evidence, prompting U.S. District Judge Edward Nottingham last week to order prosecutors to step up efforts to turn over such material. At issue are witness interviews and other documents that Nacchio's attorneys say may help his defense, a contention prosecutors have disputed.

Prosecutors have told the judge that the evidence exchange has been hampered because some documents fall under the Classified Information Procedures Act, which sets guidelines for viewing secret government material such as business contracts.

In the brief, Stern said the defense was required to outline its strategy involving the classified documents by Oct. 31 but prosecutors did not provide any evidence involving classified documents from May to October.

Nacchio, who is free on bail, is accused of selling $101 million worth of stock in 2001 based on inside knowledge Qwest Communications International Inc. (nyse: Q - news - people) would be unable to meet revenue targets.

He is charged with 42 counts, each carrying a penalty of up to 10 years in prison and a $1 million fine. He has pleaded not guilty.

DOJ_NMG_0128785

Defense lawyers have said Nacchio believed Qwest would get hundreds of millions of dollars worth of classified government contracts that made him more optimistic about the company's financial future.

The Classified Information Procedures Act which was enacted several decades ago to counter a strategy used by defendants charged with spying who would threaten to expose national secrets unless the charges were dropped.

In order to view the contracts and determine their relevance at trial, attorneys for both sides and the judge received Justice Department security clearances. They must view the documents in secure facilities and debate their merit in a secure courtroom closed to the public.

Separately, Nacchio also is one of several former Qwest executives accused by the Securities and Exchange Commission in a civil case alleging they orchestrated a financial fraud that forced the company to restate billions of dollars in revenue. That case is pending.

SEC Boosts Probe For Wall Street Leaks (WSJ)

By KARA SCANNELL And RANDALL SMITH

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

The Securities and Exchange Commission has asked nearly a dozen brokerage firms for trading and other data in an effort to determine whether there is a leak of inside information across Wall Street.

The inquiry is being driven in part by complaints from mutual funds and others who worry market participants are trading ahead of their trades before they are executed.

The request is an expansion of the agency's continuing "street sweep" investigation of potential insider trading, which has mainly focused on the passing of inside information within a brokerage firm. Now, the agency is expanding the probe to look at information being exchanged between firms in hopes of avoiding detection, according to a top agency official.

'Passage of Information'

The SEC is looking at the "passage of information from one firm to another," said Lori Richards, director of the SEC's office of compliance, inspections and examinations. "It's just fact-finding at this point."

Former SEC commissioner Laura Unger discusses the SEC's insider-trading probe, noting the increasing power of hedge funds in the marketplace.The data request, reported in yesterday's New York Times, was sent by the SEC three weeks ago. The request seeks information on all stock and option orders in the firms' order management system for a 12-day period in late September, as well as a list of customers that use the firms' prime brokerage systems, which are used by hedge funds.

The agency hopes that once it examines the data, it will be able to determine if the concerns are valid and if there is a tipping chain from firm to firm. The sweep is in the information gathering stages and not all examinations result in enforcement actions.

The new take on potential leaking on Wall Street was spurred partly from other enforcement cases. The SEC and Justice Department have cracked down on instances of traders passing information about large pending trades before they are public across the firm's information boxes, known as squawk boxes.

In addition, the SEC has filed enforcement cases against hedge funds and brokerage-firm employees sharing nonpublic information about private investments in public entities, or PIPEs, allowing the hedge fund to profit before the PIPE is public.

Concerns about front-running of trades aren't new. However, worries have built amid the growth in hedge funds. Mutual-fund company executives fret that because hedge funds typically pay higher trading commissions than mutual funds and generally trade more, hedge funds may receive favorable treatment by brokerage firms.

The requests are considered extensive, and officials at some firms have asked about whether the scope could be narrowed. The deadline of late January has already passed, but broker-dealers routinely try to negotiate extensions.

An official of one Wall Street firm said it appears to be aimed at learning whether clients such as hedge funds are getting access to information about orders by other customers such as mutual funds. The request seeks data on how each order was routed.

Firms Protest

DOJ_NMG_0128786

Some of the firms protested the request, questioning whether the SEC would be able to handle the volume of data, according to people familiar with the request.

Ms. Richards responded by telling an official at one firm that she understood the request seemed broad, one of the people said. She explained it was needed to see whether customers who may have obtained information from one firm were trading at others. It isn't unusual for firms and the SEC to negotiate over information to turn over.

S.E.C. Is Looking At Stock Trading (NYT)

By Jenny Anderson

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

The Securities and Exchange Commission has begun a broad examination into whether Wall Street bank employees are leaking information about big trades to favored clients, like hedge funds, in an effort to curry favor with those clients, executives at Wall Street banks said.

The inquiry, these people said, seems aimed at determining how pervasive insider trading, or the illegal use of market-moving nonpublic information, may be on Wall Street. Knowledge about a large trade, like the sale of a big block of stock by the mutual fund giant Fidelity, would tell a trader which way the stock would move.

Trading ahead of client orders, or front-running, has long been an issue on Wall Street. Large mutual fund companies have often complained in the past that Wall Street brokerage firms were front-running their trades, using information about the funds' plans to buy or sell to make a risk-free bet on a stock's direction.

But the latest S.E.C. investigation appears to have a new twist: Rather than examine whether a bank is trading ahead of its own client by using knowledge of the customer's trade, the scope of the investigation will allow regulators to see if banks tip their valued customers who then go trade at another bank, making the paper trail harder to detect.

The commission sent out letters in mid-January to the major Wall Street banks, including Merrill Lynch, Morgan Stanley, UBS and Deutsche Bank. The commission, according to one Wall Street employee, is requesting a wide swath of information: all stock and option trading data, for themselves and their customers, for the last two weeks of September. Those weeks are the close of the third quarter and investigators may be looking to see any pickup in trading activity as money mangers sought to dress up their returns.

Representatives for the Wall Street banks declined to comment on the investigation.

"Mutual fund traders have long complained that their big trades may be being front-run by market participants with inside information about their trades, and they believe the price on those trades suffers as a result," said Lori Richards, the director of the Office of Compliance Inspections and Examinations at the S.E.C. "We are looking into these allegations in a systemic way. It is fact-finding and too early for any conclusions."

The S.E.C. confirmed the existence of the investigation but declined to comment further.

Concerns about insider trading have escalated as mergers and buyouts have boomed and the use of complex derivatives has soared. Studies of various markets — including those for stocks and credit default swaps — have pointed to an unusual amount of trading ahead of announcements for deals.

The growing power of hedge funds — and their opaqueness and the wide range of trading strategies they employ — is feeding those concerns. Hedge funds control an estimated 30 percent to 50 percent of trading on most major markets. They are also Wall Street's best customers. Hedge funds trade, borrow and finance more, on average, than other clients And as more hedge funds enter a crowded field, the premium on information has never been higher.

With data on millions of trades from most major Wall Street banks, the S.E.C. will try to examine whether outside traders like hedge funds or internal traders like those inside the firm who are trading with the bank's money may be getting tips from the bank handling the mutual fund's trade and using the information to place a trade elsewhere.

"If an investment bank is tipping a hedge fund on a trade we are doing on Dell, those people all need to go to jail," said Andrew M. Brooks, vice president and head of equity trading at T. Rowe Price, the mutual fund company. "We are absolutely concerned and worried and paranoid about information leakage, information that would allow someone to know about our trades and run ahead."

DOJ_NMG_0128787

If the commission finds any evidence of possible insider trading, it would then commence a formal investigation. The S.E.C. could ultimately bring civil charges against individuals or firms.

Regulators and law enforcement officials have pursued other cases related to the sharing of information about trades. In what became known as the squawk box case, brokers from institutions, including Merrill Lynch, Citigroup and Lehman Brothers, were accused of allowing traders to listen in on the public outcry system — the squawk box on the trading floors — to glean tips about customer orders coming in.

The S.E.C. sued the A. B. Watley Group and 16 people in the case. Next month, the United States attorney's office in Brooklyn will bring to trial a case against seven people. Two have pleaded guilty to insider trading. While the accusations in the squawk box case involve an obvious dissemination of insider information, detecting whether traders were illegally tipped in huge, fast-moving markets is much harder.

When Linda Chatman Thomsen, head of enforcement at the S.E.C., testified before Congress in September about insider trading, she outlined some of the problems inherent in such cases.

"Piecing together an insider trading case can be a complex and painstaking process," she said. "It is rare to find a 'smoking gun'; virtually all insider trading cases hinge on circumstantial evidence. It is quite common for insider traders to come up with alternative rationales for their trading — rationales that the staff must refute with inferences drawn from the timing of the trades, the movement of the funds and other facts and circumstances."

There are many gray areas. If Mr. Brooks of T. Rowe Price wants to sell stock in the XYZ Company and he hires a bank to do that, the bank has to call clients to gauge interest in the stock. That is not tipping, but legitimate work for the bank to do.

And detecting any trades will be difficult. If a trader received a tip about a stock whose price was set to rise, that trader could enter into trades that are harder for regulators to detect — like derivatives transactions that are not traded on any exchange and whose value may be linked to a change in a stock price rather than the stock itself or an option on the stock.

Here's how a questionable trade might take place: If Fidelity asked brokerage firm X to sell a large part of its stake in I.B.M., and traders at that brokerage firm told its favorite clients to expect a drop in I.B.M.'s price as a result, that favorite client could go to another brokerage firm — or group of banks or trading venues — and sell I.B.M. shares short, betting on a decline and making money when Fidelity's order went through. The trader could pay back the source of the tip by directing more business to his bank.

"The information is going to the bank as an agent, and the bank is only supposed to use the information for the mutual fund's benefit," said Larry E. Ribstein, a professor of law at the University of Illinois. "If it uses it for someone else's benefit, you might have a concern."

The hedge fund business has long argued that it is unfairly tarnished with suggestions of insider trading. Amid increased scrutiny by regulators into hedge funds' use of information in the loan market, the Managed Funds Association said in a statement last year, "We reaffirm our collective commitment to promote fair and competitive markets in which inappropriate use of material nonpublic information is not tolerated."

Some money managers disagree.

"Hedge funds pay a lot in commissions," said Mr. Brooks of T. Rowe Price. "They are smart and work hard, but they can't be that smart and work that hard to get some of the advantages they have gotten."

"There are too many conflicts of interest between those who serve hedge funds and hedge funds themselves."

SEC Pores Over Trading Data To See If Hedge Funds Are Being Tipped Off (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, February 7, 2007

Federal regulators have embarked on a fact-finding mission on Wall Street to determine if hedge funds are being routinely tipped off about buy and sell orders placed by mutual funds.

The Securities and Exchange Commission, which is conducting the probe, has asked approximately 10 major Wall Street banks for trading information from the last two weeks of September 2006, at the close of the third quarter.

DOJ_NMG_0128788

Over the next few months, SEC examiners will try to determine whether big buy and sell orders placed with the banks by mutual funds in that period triggered any suspicious front-running activity in those same stocks by hedge fund managers or other traders.

Lori Richards, director of the SEC's Office of Compliance, Inspections and Examinations, confirmed that her office was looking into the matter. "We're always concerned about information leakage in the market which could harm investors," she said.

Details of the investigation first appeared Tuesday in The New York Times, which said that the SEC request for information had gone out in mid-January.

According to people with direct knowledge of the probe, who don't want to be identified because the investigation is ongoing, the banks being examined include but are not limited to: Merrill Lynch, Credit Suisse, Morgan Stanley, Deutsche Bank and UBS. None of those banks would comment on the matter.

For years, mutual fund executives have complained that financial intermediaries have used sensitive information about their buy and sell orders to disadvantage them in the marketplace.

Representatives of the mutual fund industry applauded the SEC's decision to conduct the examination. "This issue is of paramount importance to mutual fund shareholders," says Edward Giltenan, a spokesman for the Investment Company Institute, a trade organization for funds. "Mutual funds represent 20% of U.S. equities, and north of 10% of the daily volume of U.S. stocks traded."

Harold Bradley, who recently moved from American Century Funds to become chief investment officer of the $2.1 billion Kauffman Foundation, says so much money has been plowed into hedge funds in recent years that it's become extremely difficult for hedge fund managers to make money without access to sensitive information.

"People are looking for an edge any way they can get it," he says. "Whenever there is too much money chasing too few ideas, people push the envelope. The hedge funds have got more money and fewer ideas, so they have to take bigger risks and cheat more."

Bradley has criticized the SEC for not being more aggressive on this front in the past, but he saluted this latest initiative. "When Lori Richards starts looking for trouble, she has been extremely effective at rooting it out and fixing it," he says.

The Class-Action Market (WSJ)

By JOSEPH A. GRUNDFEST

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

Litigation is booming in the U.S. Courts complain of burgeoning dockets. Lawyers collect record fees. Legislators, regulators and academics either grouse that litigation is driving business offshore and should be contained, or that economic injustice still pervades our economy and that the courthouse doors must be kept wide open to help right wrongs.

But few policy makers or scholars seem aware that a highly controversial component of the litigation market -- the class-action securities fraud litigation business -- is shrinking faster than a polar icecap. The interesting question is why this decline has occurred and what it means for the future of U.S. securities regulation.

The modern history of securities fraud litigation begins with the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act of 1995. That law tightened the requirements for filing securities claims and was expected to reduce litigation activity, but it had no such effect. According to data collected by Stanford Law School and Cornerstone Research, the number of companies sued in plain vanilla class-action fraud claims has averaged about 193 per year from 1996 through 2005, not much different from pre-reform levels. But halfway through 2005 filing activity took a sharp drop, and in 2006 only 110 companies were named as defendants in securities-fraud class actions.

A closer look at the data suggests that the decline is even more remarkable because 20 of these lawsuits allege options backdating activity. Backdating is a one-time event, and if we subtract these 20 cases we arrive at a "core" litigation rate of 90 companies per year.

The decline is even more dramatic if we measure the dollar amounts at stake. The most inflated measure of the amount at issue in these lawsuits looks at the total decline in a company's stock market capitalization over the period of the alleged fraud. Typically, only a fraction of this decline is caused by the fraud and plaintiffs recover a very small percentage of this loss, if anything at all. After averaging $683 billion from 1996 through 2005, and peaking at $2.07 trillion in 2002, the maximum dollar loss in 2006 declined to $294 billion. Excluding the backdating cases reduces the 2006 figure to only $198 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0128789

Why have these declines occurred? Some claim that the criminal prosecution of the Milberg Weiss firm, long the dominant plaintiff firm in the field, caused a cutback in filing activity. However, there is no shortage of plaintiff class-action lawyers in America, and the barriers to entry in class-action securities fraud are quite low. The lawyers who abandoned Milberg in droves haven't forgotten how to file class-action complaints, and their incentives to sue every firm in sight remain as strong as ever. The Milberg explanation doesn't hold much water.

Last year's strong equity markets, combined with low market volatility, offer a second explanation. Although it will take several years of additional data to determine statistically whether reduced volatility has throttled the class-action market, I am skeptical because the change in the litigation market is rather sudden in comparison to a relatively smooth shift in the larger stock market patterns.

To be sure, the remarkable boom-bust cycle of the late 1990s created a happy hunting ground for plaintiff lawyers. The resolution of boom-era claims without another boom-bust cycle following quickly on its heels would naturally depress the volume and size of class-action fraud filings. Nonetheless, current activity levels are low even when measured by pre-boom standards.

The remaining explanation is more interesting and profound: Perhaps fewer companies are being sued for fraud because there is less fraud. Under this theory, the government's aggressive criminal and civil enforcement strategy following the Enron and WorldCom frauds has caused corporate boards and management to "get religion" when it comes to complying with the securities laws. Executives are acutely aware that a major accounting or disclosure fraud is more likely than ever to leave them fired or indicted. They respond to this new regime like rational economic actors: If you increase the penalties for engaging in fraud then you reduce the incentive to commit fraud. Nothing complicated here at all.

In this new world, private securities fraud claims generate no meaningful deterrence because it's the fear of the feds that's driving boardroom and executive behavior. A large body of academic literature also confirms that these lawsuits are virtually useless as means of compensating investors for their losses. Sarbanes-Oxley also now gives the SEC authority to collect funds that can be distributed to shareholders harmed by fraud. When plaintiffs' attorneys recover funds for the class, they collect contingent fees that can consume up to a third of any recovery, but the SEC doesn't take a nickel of the recoveries it collects on behalf of investors. So, if we want to keep the litigation engine running in order to reimburse investors, investors could come out ahead if they simply allowed the SEC to control the process and eliminated the private bar's cut of the action.

From this perspective, class-action securities litigation is in decline because there is a new, tougher and superior enforcement mechanism in place. The SEC and the Department of Justice now insist that any corporation suspected of a sufficiently serious fraud conduct an internal investigation that will finger the executives responsible. The corporation must also cooperate in prosecuting these executives. This enforcement technique is stunningly effective, if often overbearing. It eliminates the government's need to conduct expensive and lengthy investigations and provides the authorities with extraordinary leverage over every executive suspected of wrongdoing. Private litigation doesn't have an equivalent deterrent effect because it can't threaten executives with jail and because damages are almost always paid by corporations and insurers, not the executives who cause the fraud.

As long as the government's enforcement activities remain sufficiently vigorous, the private class-action securities fraud lawsuit can be viewed as an expensive, wasteful and unnecessary sideshow that generates little deterrence and offers questionable levels of compensation. The question then is not why these lawsuits have been shrinking so rapidly in recent months, but when and whether they should exist at all.

CRIMINAL LAW:

NBC Reporter To Testify At CIA Leak Case (NSDY/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

Long Island Newsday, February 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0128790

WASHINGTON -- NBC News reporter Tim Russert should find the format familiar: An interviewer, a television screen and a gauntlet of pointed questions.

Unlike his seat as host of "Meet the Press," however, Russert won't be asking the questions. He'll be in the witness box, fielding questions from prosecutors about his conversation with former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby and from defense attorneys who want to undercut his credibility.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald says he expects Russert to be his final witness Wednesday in Libby's perjury and obstruction trial. Libby is accused of lying to authorities investigating the leak of CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity.

Russert and Libby tell two very different stories about a phone conversation they had in July 2003.

Both agree Libby called to complain about one of Russert's colleagues. Russert says the call ended there. Libby says Russert brought up the subject of an outspoken war critic, Joseph Wilson, a former ambassador who accused the Bush administration of doctoring prewar intelligence on Iraq.

"Did you know that Ambassador Wilson's wife worked at the CIA?" Libby said Russert asked.

"No, I don't know that," Libby said he replied.

"Yes, all the reporters know it," Russert responded, according to Libby's grand jury testimony.

Russert is expected to testify that exchange never happened. Fitzgerald believes Libby learned about Plame's identity from government officials, passed it on to reporters, then concocted the Russert conversation to cover it up.

Libby acknowledges learning about Plame from his boss, Vice President Dick Cheney, but says he forgot it. He says he learned it from Russert a month later as if it were new and only discussed Plame with other reporters based on that conversation.

Defense attorneys, working to reveal inconsistencies in government witnesses, often show quotes, notes or other documents on a courtroom big-screen television and ask witnesses to explain discrepancies. It's a technique Russert has made famous on "Meet the Press" and one he may find himself facing Wednesday.

Though most jurors in the case said they were not regular "Meet the Press" viewers and did not have an opinion of Russert, Fitzgerald is counting on him to wrap up his case for the jury.

So even though he won't be in charge, when he takes the stand, Russert will still be the star of the show.

Court Hears Libby Describe Cheney As 'Upset' At Critic (WP)

By Amy Goldstein And Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Vice President Cheney and other senior White House officials regarded a former ambassador's accusations that President Bush misled the nation in going to war in Iraq as an unparalleled political assault and, early in the summer of 2003, held daily discussions about how to debunk them, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby told a federal grand jury.

In grand jury audiotapes played yesterday during Libby's perjury trial, the vice president's then-chief of staff said Cheney had been "upset" and "disturbed" by criticisms from former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV that Bush had twisted intelligence to justify the war. And Libby said that Karl Rove had been "animated" by a conversation with Robert D. Novak, in which the conservative columnist told Rove he "had a bad taste in his mouth" about Wilson and was writing a column about him.

Libby is charged with lying to the grand jury as it investigated a leak by administration officials of the identity of Wilson's wife, an undercover CIA officer named Valerie Plame. The sound of Libby's clear, measured voice in the tapes -- filling a courtroom in U.S. District Court here for six hours over the past two days -- buttresses the prosecution's case in two significant ways.

Libby's portrayal of the zeal to discredit Wilson's claims, reaching to the White House's highest echelons, reinforces Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald's assertion that the criticism of war provoked such a political crisis among Bush's top aides that it is unlikely the defendant simply forgot his role in the leak, as defense attorneys contend.

In addition, the tapes display the specific gaps between Libby's version of events and those of government officials and journalists who, as prosecution witnesses, have testified about conversations they had with Libby about Plame.

Repeatedly, Libby told the grand jury that he did not recall various conversations about Plame. His account conflicts with those of a former White House press secretary, a former undersecretary of state, Cheney's former public affairs director, two CIA officials and a pair of journalists.

DOJ_NMG_0128791

Libby told the grand jury "it seemed to me as if I was learning it for the first time" when, according to his account, NBC's Tim Russert told him about Plame on July 10 or 11, 2003. Only later, when looking at his calendar and notes, Libby said, did he remember that he actually learned the information from Cheney in June 2003.

After the jury hears the final two hours of tapes today, Russert, host of "Meet the Press," is scheduled to testify before the prosecution concludes its case this week.

Libby, 56, the only person indicted in the leak investigation, has not been charged with actually disclosing Plame's CIA role. He faces five felony counts that he lied to FBI agents and the grand jury and that he obstructed the investigation. His lawyers are arguing that Libby had a notoriously bad memory -- and that he innocently but incorrectly remembered his interactions with journalists.

The prosecution alleges that, as part of the White House's strategy to discredit Wilson, Libby deliberately revealed Plame's identity to selected reporters, because her CIA job implied that Wilson was chosen for the Africa mission because of nepotism, not his expertise.

In the tapes, Libby also describes Cheney's eagerness to use what had been a 2002 National Intelligence Estimate, a secret summary of the evidence of whether Iraq posed a threat, to rebut Wilson. The NIE was declassified just after Wilson's criticism emerged. Yesterday's tapes made it clear how many of Bush's most senior aides had been unaware of that decision, even as they were arguing for the document to be released.

According to Libby's testimony, during two volatile weeks in July 2003, Cheney and Bush were the only people who knew the president apparently had authorized Libby to use portions of the NIE. Left in the dark were many aides, including then-White House chief of staff Andrew H. Card Jr., then-CIA Director George J. Tenet, and then-national security adviser Condoleezza Rice.

In response to methodical questioning by Fitzgerald during two grand jury appearances in March 2004, Libby said that he did not remember discussing Plame with a former CIA official, Robert Grenier. Two weeks ago, Grenier testified that Libby telephoned him out of the blue to ask about a CIA-sponsored mission to the African nation of Niger -- and was so eager to find out that he called back three hours later and pulled Grenier out of a meeting with Tenet.

Similarly, former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer has testified that Libby disclosed Wilson's wife's identify to him over a lunch in the White House mess. But in the tapes, Libby told the grand jury, "I do not recall discussing Mr. Wilson's wife at all with Ari." Libby said, however, that he distinctly remembers talking with Fleischer about the Miami Dolphins, because it was the only conversation he had that week about the team.

Libby Testimony Details Plot To Discredit Critic (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON — Former White House official I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby told a grand jury in 2004 that Vice President Dick Cheney was upset by an ambassador's public questioning of the Iraq war and that President Bush, Cheney and Libby were involved in a plan — kept secret from other senior White House officials — to leak previously classified intelligence to reporters to counter the criticism.

Libby's audiotape testimony, played for jurors in federal court here, offered new details about how the White House orchestrated a campaign to discredit the Iraq war critic, former envoy Joseph C. Wilson IV. Wilson's wife, undercover CIA operative Valerie Plame, was subsequently exposed in the media, triggering a criminal investigation.

As Libby sat silently in the courtroom, jurors heard his recorded voice describe how he was instructed to leak intelligence secrets to select reporters, even as other White House officials were expressing concern over the leaks and debating whether the administration should formally declassify intelligence reports on Iraq to combat criticism of the case for war.

At one point, Special Prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald can be heard on the tapes expressing disbelief that Libby would take part in those meetings without disclosing that the president had effectively already declassified key portions of one of the main prewar pieces of intelligence on Iraq, a national intelligence estimate on Saddam Hussein's alleged banned weapons programs.

"Was that unusual for you to have the national security advisor, the director of Central Intelligence, the White House chief of staff among others in the dark as to something that you had done regarding declassification?" Fitzgerald asked.

DOJ_NMG_0128792

"It is not unusual for the vice president to tell me something which I am not allowed to share with others," Libby replied.

Libby's remarks came during a day in court devoted entirely to playing audiotapes of the former Cheney aide's grand jury testimony, allowing jurors to listen to the defendant's voice as he made a series of statements that prosecutors have labeled lies.

Libby faces five felony counts alleging perjury, making false statements and obstruction of justice for what he told investigators about his role in the campaign to discredit Wilson.

The tapes offer an intriguing window into the reaction within the White House to mounting criticism of its crumbling case for war with Iraq, as well as a chance to witness Fitzgerald's method as he sparred with Libby during eight hours of grand jury testimony.

Libby can be heard describing in a low voice how Cheney was "upset" when Wilson went public with allegations that the White House had twisted intelligence to make the case for war. In an op-ed article, Wilson said he had been sent to investigate a key claim — that Iraq was seeking uranium from the African nation of Niger — and found it untrue months before Bush included the assertion in his 2003 State of the Union speech.

"It was a serious accusation," Libby said. "It was a very serious attack." It also quickly became a "topic that was discussed on a daily basis" in the White House.

Libby said that Cheney "thought we should get some of these facts out to the press. He then undertook to get permission from the president to talk about this" to reporters.

Libby said that Cheney's lawyer, David S. Addington, had advised him that merely getting such permission from the president rendered the intelligence declassified. Bush has publicly acknowledged doing so.

Libby's subsequent conversations with reporters and other White House officials are at the center of the perjury trial. Prosecutors have produced a series of witnesses over the last week, including former White House Press Secretary Ari Fleischer, to say that they learned of Plame's identity from Libby.

Libby has testified that he learned about Plame from Cheney in June 2003, but then forgot that detail and didn't share it with others until he heard it from NBC News reporter Tim Russert in a phone call on July 10 or 11.

Recounting that conversation, Libby said in taped testimony that Russert asked him, " 'Did you know that Ambassador Wilson's wife works at the CIA?' and I was a little taken aback by that.... And I said, 'No, I don't know that,' intentionally because I didn't want him to take anything I was saying as in any way confirming what he had said."

Russert, who is expected to testify this week, has said he did not tell Libby about Plame.

Libby's testimony also puts him at odds with other former White House officials. At one point, Fitzgerald asks if he recalled sharing Plame's name with Fleischer, as the former press secretary testified.

"Isn't it a fact, sir, that you told Mr. Fleischer over lunch that this was hush-hush or on the Q.T.?" Fitzgerald asked.

"I don't recall that," Libby replied.

Prosecutors are expected to continue playing remaining portions of Libby's taped testimony today.

---

greg.miller@latimes.com

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

Back story

The CIA leak affair began to unfold in July 2003, around the time former Ambassador

Joseph C. Wilson IV wrote an opinion article in the New York Times attacking the Bush administration as twisting the intelligence it used to go to war in Iraq. In his January 2003 State of the Union address, President Bush said Iraq had sought uranium for nuclear weapons from Niger, in West Africa. Wilson wrote that, during his CIA-sponsored trip to Niger in 2002, he had found no evidence to support Bush's claim — and that the administration knew it. The White House soon afterward admitted that it should not have included the claim in Bush's speech.

Eight days after Wilson's article appeared, syndicated columnist Robert Novak wrote that Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame, worked at the CIA and may have played a role in sending him to Niger. Disclosing the identity of an undercover CIA operative is illegal, and a criminal investigation was launched to find out who leaked the information.

DOJ_NMG_0128793

No one was charged with leaking Plame's identity. But in October 2005, a grand jury indicted then-White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby on charges of perjury and obstruction of justice.

Prosecutors said Libby told three reporters — including

Judith Miller, then a New York Times staffer, who spent 85 days in jail for refusing to disclose her source — about Wilson and Plame, but lied to investigators about it. Libby's defense is that he didn't lie but simply forgot the conversations because, as Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff, he had been focused on more important national security matters at the time.

Libby Speaks On Tape, But May Not In Court (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6 — The jurors deciding the perjury case against I. Lewis Libby Jr. listened to his voice on audiotape for hours on Tuesday as his lawyers quietly explored a surprise strategy, keeping him off the witness stand, that would ensure that the jurors never hear his voice in person.

The audiotapes played in the courtroom were of Mr. Libby's two grand jury appearances in March 2004, in which he repeatedly testified under oath that he had no recollection of several conversations about Valerie Wilson, a Central Intelligence Agency operative. His denials were in sharp contrast to the testimony over the last two weeks of reporters and government officials who were colleagues of Mr. Libby, the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney.

Out of the jury's presence and beyond the courtroom, Mr. Libby's lawyers appeared to be engaging in some gamesmanship over the possibility of Mr. Libby's not testifying in his own defense. They had previously suggested that he would testify.

Theodore V. Wells Jr., Mr. Libby's chief lawyer, filed a motion with the court on Monday evening asking about the consequences of keeping his client off the stand. Mr. Wells argued that, even if his client decided not to testify, he should be able to argue that any misstatements Mr. Libby made to the grand jury and investigators about Ms. Wilson were caused by confusion due to Mr. Libby's pressing schedule of important issues.

Judge Reggie B. Walton had asserted earlier in the trial that Mr. Libby's "faulty memory" defense would require that he take the stand to testify about his distractions.

While testifying could be perilous for Mr. Libby, a decision not to testify is almost by definition a risky strategy for any defendant in a white-collar criminal case. Lawyers assume the jury, especially in a perjury case, wants to hear a personal and plausible explanation directly from the defendant about the statements that prosecutors have charged are false.

But Mr. Wells has had success with that strategy. He won much-lauded acquittals for Mike Espy, agriculture secretary for President Bill Clinton, and Raymond J. Donovan, labor secretary for President Ronald Reagan, without putting either man on the stand.

Mr. Wells would not comment on the possibility that Mr. Libby might not testify. Nor would Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the chief prosecutor, who has yet to file a response.

The four hours of audiotape played Tuesday in Federal District Court were intended by the prosecutors to underscore how much Mr. Libby's sworn testimony varied from the accounts of other trial witnesses. Mr. Fitzgerald was heard questioning Mr. Libby closely before the grand jury about a lunch he had on July 7, 2003, with Ari Fleischer, who was departing that week as President Bush's press secretary.

Mr. Fleischer already told the jury last week that, at the luncheon in the White House mess, Mr. Libby made a point of telling him that Valerie Wilson, also known as Valerie Plame, worked at the C.I.A. and that the information was "hush-hush and on the q.t."

But Tuesday, the jury heard Mr. Fitzgerald patiently draw from Mr. Libby a different story, one in which he never discussed Ms. Wilson with Mr. Fleischer. Mr. Libby was heard on the tape telling Mr. Fitzgerald that it did not make sense that he would have mentioned Ms. Wilson because he remembered being surprised when he learned that fact in a conversation three days later with Tim Russert, the Washington bureau chief of NBC News.

DOJ_NMG_0128794

It was among many references Mr. Libby made before the grand jury to Mr. Russert and their conversation on July 10 or 11, 2003. One of the pillars of Mr. Libby's defense is that he did not discuss Ms. Wilson's identity with the witnesses the prosecution has presented because he learned about her from Mr. Russert.

But Mr. Russert, who is likely to testify Wednesday, has said his conversation with Mr. Libby never included any mention of Ms. Wilson.

Ms. Wilson's name was first disclosed in a column by Robert D. Novak on July 14, 2003, days after The New York Times published an Op-Ed article by her husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV. Mr. Wilson, a former ambassador, wrote that he went on an intelligence mission to Africa in 2002 and that the Bush White House had willfully distorted his findings — that Iraq had not tried to acquire uranium in Niger — to bolster the case for invading Iraq.

In his questioning of Mr. Libby, Mr. Fitzgerald's voice turned suddenly abrupt when he asked, "Isn't it a fact that you told Ari Fleischer the information about Ms. Wilson was hush-hush and on the q.t.?"

Mr. Libby's voice seemed to have lost much of its strength as he replied, "I don't recall."

It may be that kind of cross-examination from Mr. Fitzgerald that the defense hopes to avoid if it keeps Mr. Libby off the stand. In addition to Mr. Fleischer's conflicting testimony, the jury has heard that Mr. Libby was told about Ms. Wilson by Mr. Cheney's press spokesman, Cathie Martin, and the under secretary of state at the time, Marc Grossman. The jury has also heard testimony that Mr. Libby discussed Ms. Wilson with two separate C.I.A. officials.

The audiotapes also provided more detail about Mr. Libby's July 8, 2003, meeting with Judith Miller, then a reporter for The New York Times. Mr. Libby told the grand jury that his meeting with Ms. Miller was approved directly by the vice president. Mr. Libby said that in order to convince Ms. Miller that Mr. Wilson's article in The Times was filled with inaccuracies, Mr. Cheney first went to President Bush directly to declassify a National Intelligence Estimate. Mr. Libby said that he used the intelligence estimate in the Miller interview to counter Mr. Wilson's claims that there was no Iraqi effort to obtain uranium from Niger.

"The vice president instructed me to go and talk to Judith Miller and lay this out for her," Mr. Libby told the grand jury. He said he did not discuss Ms. Wilson in the interview. But Ms. Miller, who went to jail for 85 days before talking to prosecutors about her interviews with Mr. Libby, testified last week that he spoke to her in detail about Ms. Wilson at the July 8 breakfast meeting.

He lamented that Ms. Miller did not write anything from the interview. At the time, Ms. Miller's editors had tried to prevent her from reporting on this subject because of criticisms of her coverage about Iraq and unconventional weapons.

Judge Walton, early in the day, denied a motion by The Times to quash a subpoena for the testimony of David Sanger, its chief Washington correspondent. Mr. Sanger interviewed Mr. Libby on July 2, 2003, about Iraq's nuclear intentions and has said there was no discussion of the Wilsons. The defense has contended that Mr. Sanger's expected testimony will show that Mr. Libby was not peddling a story about the Wilsons.

Libby Says He Thought Bush Authorized Unmasking Plame (CNN)

CNN, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- On a tape played at his trial Tuesday Lewis "Scooter" Libby told investigators he thought President Bush authorized him to give a reporter information about CIA agent Valerie Plame.

"If the president tells you to talk about a document, it's declassified," Libby told Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald on March 24, 2003, during testimony before a grand jury that would eventually indict Libby for perjury and obstruction of justice.

Libby is charged with lying to investigators trying to find out who leaked Plame's identity as a CIA operative. Her identity was revealed after her husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, alleged in an editorial that the Bush administration twisted facts to support an invasion of Iraq. Wilson said his intelligence-gathering work -- which concluded Iraq had made no serious effort to obtain nuclear weapons material in Niger -- had been ignored by the administration.

The audio recordings, made nearly four years ago, shed light on how Libby handled the controversy over Wilson's allegations.

Libby said White House Counsel David Addington told him the president has the power to declassify material on his own. Libby said he asked Addington, "Can the president declassify a document just by telling us to talk?" and Addington said he could.

Libby quoted that response to Fitzgerald on the stand.

DOJ_NMG_0128795

Fitzgerald asked Libby whether he was present when Vice President Dick Cheney asked Bush to declassify the material, whether anyone else was present, and whether issues were raised about how going public might overrule CIA Director George Tenet.

To each question, Libby answered no.

Libby, who was Cheney's chief of staff at the time, also testified he had no knowledge of when or how Cheney got the okay from President Bush and concluded only the three of them were aware the material could be disclosed to New York Times reporter Judith Miller when Libby met with her for coffee at a Washington hotel.

Prosecutors are trying to portray Libby as someone who used lies and deception in his ranking position at the White House to try to discredit Joseph Wilson.

Libby's lawyers blame bad memory for any discrepancies in what he told investigators and the grand jury about revealing Valerie Wilson was a CIA operative.

Libby apologized for his poor memory in the audio recordings played Tuesday.

"I get a lot of information during the course of the day. I probably get, you know -- I tried to take a census of how many, and I tend to get between 100 and 200 pages a day," Libby explains on the recordings.

"When a lot of stuff comes to me, I'll gather my staff together and say, 'what happened here?' and we'll sort of pool our recollections of it, and that almost always brings me a fuller recollection of what's happened. I haven't done that here.

"I apologize if my recollection of this stuff is not perfect," Libby said. "I apologize if there's some stuff that I remember and some I don't."

In audio recordings played earlier Tuesday, Libby said he was "surprised" to hear from NBC "Meet the Press" moderator Tim Russert that Joseph Wilson's wife worked for the CIA.

"Is it your testimony under oath, you don't recall Wilson's wife working for the CIA -- between the sixth (of July) and your conversation with Russert?" asked Fitzgerald.

"That's correct, sir, I don't recall discussing it. I do recall being surprised when I talked to Russert on the 10th or 11th," Libby told Fitzgerald.

Libby and Russert talked on July 10, 2003; Russert has denied he told Libby anything about Wilson's wife.

Wilson's article appeared on July 6, 2003. His wife's CIA connection was revealed in a column written by Robert Novak, eight days later.

Novak's column caused a political firestorm, and two months later prompted an FBI probe.

In the past two weeks of testimony and evidence, prosecutors tried to establish Cheney as the first source of Libby's knowledge that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA and sent him on the trip.

Presenting on Thursday, Libby's defense team is expected to argue that any discrepancies in what Libby told investigators stem from his difficult role as a busy government official distracted by urgent national security matters.

CNN's Paul Courson contributed to this report.

Powerful Pa. Senator Indicted (NSDY/AP)

By Maryclaire Dale, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, February 7, 2007

PHILADELPHIA -- State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo, one of the most powerful and controversial figures in Pennsylvania politics, was indicted Tuesday on federal charges he used a nonprofit group for personal and political gain and defrauded the state out of $1 million.

Many of the 139 charges stem from Fumo's ties to a nonprofit agency in his South Philadelphia district.

Authorities had been investigating the Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods for more than four years. The group was started by Fumo aides in 1991 to serve the neighborhood where he grew up.

Prosecutors said he used state employees and the nonprofit group to fulfill his every whim -- including cleaning his 33-room mansion, spying on his ex-wife, and fighting a dune project that might block his view of the ocean.

The charges included fraud, obstruction of justice, conspiracy and tax offenses.

DOJ_NMG_0128796

Fumo is to surrender to the FBI on Wednesday, the U.S. attorney's office said.

U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan said Fumo spent about $1 million in state money and another $1 million from the nonprofit. Prosecutors said Fumo also engaged in a systematic cover-up through the destruction of e-mails and other electronic records.

The Philadelphia Democrat beat two previous indictments. In 1973, authorities dropped vote-fraud charges against Fumo, while a 1980 conviction for his role in an alleged ghost-worker scheme was eventually overturned.

Fumo, anticipating the indictment on Monday, temporarily stepped down as the ranking Democrat on the Appropriations Committee but remains in the Senate.

"I know in my heart that I have not done anything illegal," the 63-year-old lawyer and banker said.

In Pennsylvania, Fumo's name has come to be synonymous with power during his nearly three decades in the Legislature.

He quickly maneuvered into leadership posts after arriving in 1978, and takes credit for producing more than $8 billion in economic benefits in the Philadelphia region. Federal investigators said he controlled more than 90 state employees.

"If an extraterrestrial came down here, it wouldn't say, `Take me to your leader.' It would say, `Where's Vince?'" former state Rep. Gerard Kosinski once said.

The Case Against Fumo (PHI)

By Craig R. Mccoy And John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 7, 2007

State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo used taxpayer and charity money to pay for everything from political polls to power tools, from cars to farm equipment, from errands to shopping sprees, a grand jury charged yesterday.

Among the more than $2 million in allegedly illicit spending: Fumo (D., Phila.) hired private detectives to tail ex-girlfriends and dig up dirt on political rivals - including Gov. Rendell.

"Sen. Fumo didn't just step over the line," U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan said yesterday. "He completely ignored it."

The grand jury indictment - 267 pages, 139 counts, carrying a possible 10-year prison sentence - came out one day after Fumo delivered a dramatic speech in the Senate in which he dismissed the pending charges as "falsities and half-truths."

Yesterday, Fumo was silent. Today, he will be fingerprinted and appear before a federal magistrate. Tomorrow, his lawyers have promised to hold a news conference to discuss the charges.

Fumo, 63, who has served as senator since 1978, was depicted by Meehan as a "greedy, manipulative" politician angling for ways to make the public and charities pay for his lavish lifestyle.

The indictment says Fumo once told a confidant that he had an acronym for one goal in his life - spending "OPM," that is, "other people's money."

"Because he was delivering large amounts of money to his Philadelphia constituents with one hand," Meehan said, "Vincent Fumo felt entitled to reach deeply into the pockets of Pennsylvania taxpayers with the other hand."

Fumo is charged with fraud, conspiracy, and with directing a cover-up - ordering computers scrubbed of e-mails after The Inquirer broke the news that the FBI was investigating him.

The indictment says Fumo exploited his Senate budget and power; the South Philadelphia charity he helped fund, Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods; and the Independence Seaport Museum for his personal and political use.

Grand jurors said Fumo:

Funneled more than $60,000 from the charity into an effort to block a dune-rebuilding project in South Jersey. The indictment says Fumo feared the project would ruin the ocean view at his Margate home.

Assigned one Senate aide to work for 18 months as "project manager" overseeing renovations at Fumo's 33-room mansion in Spring Garden, and paid another aide to clean the house.

Put other taxpayer-paid aides to work organizing political fund-raisers; putting together campaign mailings; paying Fumo's personal bills; driving Fumo's daughter to schools; driving his shirts to be laundered; fixing his TV; and packing boxes of Fumo bobblehead dolls.

Doled out fat state contracts to political consultants and others who did little or no state work.

DOJ_NMG_0128797

Repeatedly cruised on museum yachts at a cost to the museum of more than $100,000. One trip included a $2,539 bill for a French meal.

Fumo was a driving force behind the funding for Citizens', striking deals with Peco Energy under which the power company gave the charity $17 million.

No criminal charges were brought in connection with Fumo's interaction with Peco. At a news conference yesterday, Meehan said the destruction of e-mails by Fumo staff likely meant the full story of the Peco donation would remain unknown.

Yesterday's indictment also claimed Fumo sought $100 million from Verizon, of which $15 million was to go to Citizens' Alliance. The communications company refused to put up any money.

Also charged in the indictment was Ruth Arnao, 51, former executive director of Citizens' Alliance and one of Fumo's closest friends. She was charged with 45 criminal counts and was said to have taken part in the fraud and obstruction. Her lawyer, Edwin J. Jacobs Jr., declined to comment yesterday.

Two former computer technicians on Fumo's staff, Leonard P. Luchko, 50; and Mark Eister, 30, were previously indicted on such obstruction charges - and now will go on trial with Fumo and Arnao. U.S. District Judge William Yohn had scheduled that trial for May, but yesterday's superceding indictment is likely to trigger a delay.

In another count in the new filing, Fumo is charged with aiding Arnao in filing a false tax return to the IRS on behalf of Citizens' Alliance in 2002.

On the tax form she signed, Arnao pledged that the charity had not been used for political purposes. It is illegal for nonprofit organizations to engage in political activity.

In part, the indictment levels charges that have previously surfaced. As has been reported, it noted that Citizens' Alliance spent $250,000 to pay for political polls and also secretly financed a lawsuit against a foe of Fumo's in the state Senate.

One new allegation is that Fumo had detectives trying to dig up dirt on Rendell, city union leader John Dougherty, and Fumo's ex-wife and former girlfriends.

Detectives researched Rendell's purchase of a home in Ocean City, N.J., the indictment says.

At the time of the detective work, Fumo was supporting another candidate for governor.

One expert in Pennsylvania politics said the spying was "political dynamite" that, more than anything else, could cost Fumo support among his fellow legislators.

"In all my years of studying and writing about state government I have never heard anything that even remotely sounds like this," said G. Terry Madonna, a pollster and analyst at Franklin and Marshall College. "It's mind-boggling."

Rendell declined through a spokeswoman to comment.

"He won't comment. No way. Nice try," spokeswoman Kate Philips said.

Also new was the indictment's wholesale portrait of Fumo as an imperial boss who used Senate and charity workers as personal errand boys and girls.

Fumo had Citizens' Alliance employees at "his beck and call" to handle chores, the indictment says. Senate staffers, too, were available to "serve him in any manner he desired... to further his political goals and attend to his personal wants."

When Fumo bought a working farm near Harrisburg, state workers were assigned to set it up. While holding down a Senate job, these staffers allegedly bought feed for horses, hired hands to mend fences, and pondered the precise breed of goat to buy.

To underscore what they called Fumo's greed, prosecutors took pains to highlight his considerable wealth.

Aside from his substantial income as a banker, Fumo has served as "of counsel" to the prominent Philadelphia law firm Dilworth Paxson. The indictment revealed Dilworth paid Fumo "as much as $1 million per year."

The indictment also cites Fumo's mansion in the Spring Garden section of Philadelphia; a beach-block home in Margate, N.J; a bayside condo in Ventnor, N.J.; a 100-acre farm outside Harrisburg; and a multi-million-dollar house in Florida.

The indictment reads in part like a catalog of Fumo's wide-ranging passions and love of gadgets. It says Citizens' Alliance spent more than $75,000 buying tools that ended up in Fumo's four houses.

A licensed electrician, Fumo liked having the same set of tools in each house, the indictment says.

According to the indictment, $6,500 went to buy 19 Oreck vacuum cleaners - one for each floor of his four houses.

DOJ_NMG_0128798

Citizens' Alliance spent $600,000 to refurbish and furnish Fumo's legislative office in South Philadelphia. The charity owned the building housing the legislative office but collected only $18,000 a year in rent for it.

The indictment says the charity's money was also tapped for shopping sprees. Fumo and Arnao would meet at Sam's Club, Home Depot and Lowe's outlets near Atlantic City to "stock up on thousands of dollars of goods for their summer residences."

Grand jurors said the pair used Citizens' Alliance credit cards for such purchases as $3,900 in mosquito magnets and a $450 meat grinder destined for use on the Harrisburg-area farm.

The indictment said a charity minivan was regularly driven by Senate employees to Martha's Vineyard to be used by Fumo, Arnao and their friends on summer vacations. His Senate drivers did Fumo's personal shopping, drove his daughter to school, and regularly delivered packages.

And Fumo, who held no official title with the nonprofit, allegedly received a $55,000 SUV for his use.

Though he is one of only five state senators from Philadelphia, Fumo has long had an outsize impact on policy in the Capitol and in Philadelphia.

He is renowned and at times feared for his smarts, his mastery of the art of the deal, his network of appointees and allies, and his ability to build effective political coalitions.

Yesterday's indictment marks the third time Fumo has been criminally charged.

In 1973, five years before he became a senator, he was arrested on charges of voter intimidation, but the charges were quickly withdrawn.

In 1980, a federal jury convicted him of putting "ghost" employees on the state payroll, but a judge threw out the conviction.

Fumo has promised a vigorous fight to clear his name one more time.

"If there is anyone who has shown the capabilities of overcoming legal and ethical challenges, it's Vince Fumo," said Chris Borick, a professor of politics at Muhlenberg College.

"But I can see no obvious way that he can come out from under this one. From a political sense, these are some really deep scars that have been inflicted upon him."

Mayor Street said Fumo would "remain an influential force for Philadelphia," even though Fumo has stepped down from his key post as minority chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee.

"My thoughts and concerns now are with Sen. Fumo and his family," Street said in a statement.

Founded in 1991 by Arnao and two others with ties to Fumo, Citizens' Alliance has helped charter schools, rehabbed storefronts in South Philadelphia, televised the Mummers, and helped fight AIDS.

Though the probe that resulted in yesterday's indictment began in 2003, investigators started focusing on Citizens' Alliance in 2004 after The Inquirer reported that Peco had secretly agreed to give the charity $17 million and reduce its rates as part of a legal settlement with Fumo, who had opposed the utility's business plans.

The paper also disclosed that Fumo had arranged for the Delaware River Port Authority to give $10 million to Citizens' Alliance. The port authority is largely funded through bridge tolls and the PATCO commuter train.

Citizens' Alliance also has received more than $4 million in state and other government grants.

The indictment says Fumo also asked Verizon to steer $2.5 million in legal business to Dilworth Paxson. A partner in the law firm could not be reached for comment last night.

If convicted, Fumo likely faces at least two years in prison, though he could be sentenced to 10 years or more if he is found guilty of the most serious charges, including conspiracy to defraud state taxpayers.

Fumo is scheduled to surrender to the FBI agents this morning who investigated him, Kathleen McAfee and Vicki Humphreys.

At 1:30 p.m., he is to appear briefly for arraignment with his lawyer before a federal magistrate and prosecutors John Pease and Robert Zauzmer. Fumo has already made routine bail arrangements, including surrendering his passport and firearms. Fumo owns a collection of more than 100 weapons.

To accommodate the expected media and political interest, today's arraignment has been moved from the small magistrate courtroom to a larger one. There, Fumo and Arnao will appear with other people federally charged yesterday - including an accused bank robber and a fugitive from justice.

DOJ_NMG_0128799

Indictment Is In The Details (PHI)

By Emilie Lounsberry

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 7, 2007

The 267-page federal indictment of State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo is a portrait of greed and entitlement that prosecutors hope will be a road map to persuading a jury that one of the state's most resilient political figures engaged in fraud and other crimes.

And it was the talk of the legal community yesterday, as lawyers across Philadelphia - and beyond - marveled at the level of detail and predicted a raging courtroom battle.

One lawyer said the indictment was a bit like a poker game - with an extremely confident player.

"It's like the government saying, 'We're so confident of our hand, we'll show you our hand,' " said former federal prosecutor Robert E. Goldman.

E-mail. Bank documents. Payroll records. Even a table of contents. And a list of potential witnesses so tough to follow that another lawyer said it reminded him of the cast of characters from Crime and Punishment.

Indeed, the narrative is dotted with expletives used by the senator, dozens of references to girlfriends or ex-girlfriends, and more than 30 instances of double exclamation points!!

"It's like an edict of what the government is going to establish - in detail - at trial," said Goldman, now a lawyer with a Center City law firm.

Veteran defense lawyer Nicholas J. Nastasi said he was struck not just by the level of detail of the charges, but also by the level of apparent corroboration. "I think there's a great deal of documentary evidence," he said.

Fumo, in a speech Monday on the Senate floor, said he had done nothing wrong.

"I know in my heart that I have not done anything illegal," said Fumo, who vowed to fight the charges.

What a fight that is likely to be.

John P. Pucci, a former federal prosecutor in Philadelphia who now practices law in Massachusetts, predicted a showcase of "movers and shakers" on the witness stand at the eventual trial - and Fumo's life under a microscope.

"His life is going to be laid out for all the world to see," said Pucci.

Some defense lawyers said that Fumo, in his speech Monday, seemed to foreshadow a defense to charges that he used Senate staff to perform personal work for him: They work extraordinarily long hours at their Senate jobs, so it's no big deal if they do a few personal chores for him in between.

"When you put the two things together, it could be an interesting defense," said William A. DeStefano, a Center City lawyer who represented a number of witnesses called before the grand jury.

DeStefano said he, too, was struck by the breadth of the indictment.

"The amount of detail is boggling," DeStefano said, though he noted that much of that detail seemed to be more embarrassing to Fumo than incriminating.

It didn't have to go on and on, he said.

"From a legal perspective, it could have been done in five or 10 pages," DeStefano said.

Former Camden County Prosecutor Edward F. Borden Jr. said the sheer number of charges - 139 counts - gives prosecutors an edge.

"They only need to convince the jury to convict on some of the significant offenses to provide the basis for a very substantial sentence," he said.

But sometimes, he said, a complex indictment poses problems for prosecutors.

"You start to run into questions about what evidence is admissible," said Borden, who now practices law in Center City and Cherry Hill. "You run the risk that you're not able to prove significant portions."

Nastasi said the case was reminiscent of the federal indictment of one his clients, former State Sen. Buddy Cianfrani, who - like Fumo - was charged with numerous counts of mail fraud, tax violations and obstructing justice.

But Nastasi said Cianfrani, who represented the same Senate district and like Fumo was on the powerful Appropriations Committee, was the sole defendant and was charged only with violations involving public money.

And, he said, Cianfrani lived a more modest lifestyle than Fumo - so there was no mention in the Cianfrani indictment of any vacation homes, estates or yachts.

But Cianfrani pleaded guilty - and Nastasi sees no such outcome for Fumo. "The charges are going to be vigorously contested," Nastasi predicted, in a long trial. "This will be a full courtroom - standing room only."

A South Jersey defense lawyer, Rocco Cipparone Jr., said he, too, expected Fumo to mount a strong defense.

"He's not an individual who's afraid of a fight," he said.

Staffer's E-mail: DSL Lines, Special Errands and More

On or about Aug. 24, 2003, Leonard P. Luchko, a computer technician in State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo's Tasker Street office, e-mailed his supervisor complaining that Fumo had found out that staffers in Harrisburg were aware of a new DSL line given only to that office. According to the indictment, the e-mail stated in part:

It saddens me that some of our people don't think of [Person No. 1] and me as members of the SDCS [Senate Democratic Computer Services] team. I am sure at times it must seem to them that we are premadonnas down here because we seem to get everything we want and don't have to deal with any of the red tape that goes along with requests for hardware and software. I just wish they could see all of the bullshit [Person No. 1] and I have to go through every single day then they would understand why we get the so called special treatment. This of course is not possible because what happens at Tasker Street stays at Tasker Street!

Yes I would like to see their reaction when they are told to support the Senator his family, girlfriends and business associates along with the staff their friends and their kids 24 hours a day.

I would like to see their reaction when they are told to drive cars back from Martha's Vineyard on a Sunday.

I would like to see their reaction if they had to go to Florida for a week and stay in the middle of nowhere and work 12 hours a day.

I would like to see their reaction when they are told to drive people to get their hair done.

I would like to see their reaction when they are told to take out the trash or unload a tracker trailer.

I would like to see their reaction if they had to wrap 150 VJF bobble head dolls and mail them.

I would like to see their reaction when they go on vacation and have to take a phone, Blackberry and a laptop with them and are required to check email a minimum of 4 times a day.

I would like to see their reaction when they have to inform the Senator that they will not be available between the hours of 7 and 10 on a Saturday night because they want to go to the movies.

Yes I would like to see their reaction when they are told to be available to drive to the shore and wire a yacht for internet access on Labor Day weekend but are not told which day just be available and ready to go.

And I would REALLY like to see their reaction when they get screamed at for something that they have absolutely no control over like the internet being down. Then maybe just maybe they would understand why we have a DSL line.

PS I love my job and wouldn't trade it for any job in the Senate!

A FEDERAL CASE (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 7, 2007

STATE Sen. Vince Fumo touts his membership in the American Mensa Society, a society for people with very high IQs.

But Fumo wasn't smart enough to avoid being charged yesterday with 139 felonies by a federal grand jury.

The feds said Fumo, 63, one of the state's most influential power brokers, used his Senate workers to clean his house and provide personal services, and tapped a charity he helped organize to provide him with cars, tools and other goodies.

The charges include conspiracy, mail fraud, wire fraud, obstruction of justice, and aiding and assisting the filing of a false tax return.

If convicted of all charges, Fumo, a state senator since 1978, could face from five to 15 years behind bars, sources said.

Ruth Arnao, 50, a longtime aide and former executive director of the Fumo charity, Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, also was indicted.

She is charged with 45 counts of conspiracy, mail fraud, wire fraud, obstruction of justice and filing a false tax return.

The 267-page indictment painted Fumo as a man who "abused" his power to "build an empire" of Senate and charity employees who catered to his personal needs, U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan said.

Fumo used Senate employees, government-paid contractors and the charity workers "to serve [Fumo's] sense of entitlement," Meehan said.

And, then, when Fumo realized investigators were onto him, he orchestrated a coverup by directing aides to destroy e-mails and other electronic evidence to scuttle the federal investigation, Meehan said.

Prosecutors said Fumo expressed a philosophy of using "other people's money," which was called "OPM." It was this philsophy that underlay the fraud.

Fumo will fire back tomorrow when his attorneys hold a press conference at the office of his attorney, Richard A. Sprague, to address the charges.

In remarks Monday on the floor of the state Senate, Fumo said he had not done anything illegal and that he and his staff had "produced" more than $8 billion in benefits for the city and the region.

Joel Frank, an attorney for Arnao, said she "categorically denied" engaging in any illegal activity.

"We intend to fight these charges and present the facts in court," Frank said.

Fumo and Arnao are scheduled to be arraigned before a federal magistrate today.

Two former Fumo computer aides, Leonard Luchko, 50, and Mark Eister, 37, were again charged with 29 counts and five counts, respectively, of conspiracy and obstruction of justice.

Both were indicted last June on obstruction charges, pleaded not guilty and are to stand trial in May.

Meehan took issue with Fumo's assertion Monday that the feds' suggestion that his Senate staffers were used as political operatives or personal assistants reflected an "amazing ignorance" of the legislative process.

"When you commit to public service you accept that there is a line," Meehan said, "and that that line is clear: The people's assets and resources... cannot be used for private benefit. Sen. Fumo just didn't step over the line; he completely ignored it."

The indictment alleges that Fumo's "fraudulent and extensive use" of Senate resources for his own benefit resulted in a loss to the Senate of more than $1 million.

Here are some examples of how prosecutors say Fumo stepped over the line:

• Fumo observed no distinction between public and private tasks for Senate staffers.

Staffers in his Philadelphia district office allegedly worked on Fumo's campaigns and campaigns of City Council candidates he favored.

The indictment alleged that Senate staffers in Harrisburg spent more time attending to Fumo's personal needs than the public's business.

A former Senate staffer served an 18-month stint as "project manager" overseeing the "restoration and refurbishment" of Fumo's 33-room mansion on Green Street in the Fairmount section.

Senate aides were routinely dispatched during regular working hours, the feds said. Among their duties: cleaning Fumo's homes, overseeing the 100-acre farm he bought in 2003 near Harrisburg and even driving luxury cars supplied by Citizens Alliance to Martha's Vineyard, Mass., so Fumo and his guests could arrive by private jet and have cars and luggage waiting for them.

Martha's Vineyard is a favored summertime playground for the rich and famous.

The feds said Fumo even gave a $40,000-a-year, taxpayer-financed contract to a private eye, ostensibly to do research for the Appropriations Committee.

But the detective's main job was to dig up dirt on Fumo's political enemies, and follow his ex-wife and ex-girlfriends and their new boyfriends.

Meehan characterized this as "scary."

• Fumo used Citizens Alliance for his personal benefit, the indictment charged.

Fumo and Arnao routinely skimmed from Alliance accounts to pay for personal goods and services.

The charity bought $75,000 worth of tools and other items for use in Fumo's four homes, including 19 Oreck vacuum cleaners, the feds charged.

DOJ_NMG_0128802

Citizens Alliance paid for shopping sprees during summer months down the shore when Fumo and Arnao would meet to stock up on thousands of dollars worth of household items for their summer homes.

Citizens also bought a loaded-to-the-max, $55,000 SUV for use by Fumo's drivers at his Tasker Street office.

Fumo got a $38,000 minivan and Arnao a $25,000 Jeep for their personal use, courtesy of the charity, the indictment charged.

Laborers hired by Citizens Alliance were routinely dispatched to his homes and farm to do repair work, clear snow and pick up trash.

Citizens Alliance also provided heavy equipment it purchased - a bulldozer, a backhoe and a dump truck - for use at Fumo's properties, free of charge, the feds said.

And Arnao filed false tax returns with Fumo's assistance to mask the political spending and other improper use of Citizens Alliance's funds, the feds charged.

• Fumo is also alleged to have exploited his position as a board member at the Independence Seaport Museum.

The feds said the museum provided a free yacht for Fumo's use at Martha's Vineyard on his vacations from 1996 through 2003.

The yacht was supposed to be used to drum up contributions for the museum, the feds said, not as a plaything for Fumo.

The indictment charged that when neither of the museum's boats was available in 2001, the museum rented another yacht for $13,775 and let Fumo have it for his summer vacation.

The indictment added that Fumo did not repay the museum for the cost of this trip until April 2004, after the federal probe was well under way.

Finally, the indictment alleges that Fumo directed Luchko, Eister and others, with Arnao's backing, to destroy e-mails and other electronic evidence on Fumo and Citizens Alliance computers in order to keep it from the FBI.

Supporters of Fumo stood by the embattled senator yesterday.

Senate Democratic leader Robert J. Mellow, D-Lackawanna, said Fumo could depend on his "continued support and friendship during this difficult time."

Mayor Street issued a statement saying Fumo had served the city with "energy and passion" for three decades and Street was "saddened" that Fumo had stepped down as minority chair of the Senate Appropriations Committee.

Editorial | Fumo Charged (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 7, 2007

Among the many dubious perks that federal prosecutors allege state Sen. Vincent J. Fumo engineered through his Pennsylvania Senate office and a Philadelphia community nonprofit was the free use of a bulldozer at Fumo's farm near Harrisburg.

Well, right now that bulldozer should come in mighty handy.

The powerful South Philadelphia Democrat and veteran Harrisburg lawmaker will have to move earth - and maybe heaven, as well - to bury the acres of criminal charges lodged against him yesterday.

Fumo will have his day in court and is entitled to the presumption of innocence, of course. Indeed, he sought to preempt the indictment Monday by declaring in a Senate speech that he had "not done anything illegal."

Across the broad expanse of a 267-page indictment, though, Fumo is accused of using taxpayer and charitable funds not merely to feather his own nest, but also to clean it.

The indictment's cast of characters includes a Senate staffer who allegedly served as Fumo's once-a-week housekeeper, and others who jumped at the senator's call to drive his cars, maintain his computers, and even serve as a gumshoe to shadow his old loves.

From the Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, a nonprofit that Fumo created, came the bulldozer, agency-paid handymen, $75,000 worth of power tools, and 19 Oreck vacuum cleaners, the indictment said.

The charges resulting from a four-year probe by U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan paint a portrait of an elected official who let his unofficial title as the prince of Philadelphia politics go to his head.

If the allegations are proven - including the serious-as-a-heart-attack charge of obstruction of justice - it would be truly sad that one of the brightest, most accomplished members of the General Assembly could have been so foolhardy.

What a contrast to Fumo's savvy track record as a state lawmaker, one who shaped countless budget deals and policies that provided handsome benefits to his state, his city and his constituents.

Whether Fumo can take sole credit for the nearly $8 billion brought home to Philadelphia for worthy public projects over the past two decades, he was a major player without a doubt.

The seeds of his current troubles, though, appear to have been planted by making one deal too many. That was the agreement in the late '90s to settle challenges to the state's electricity-deregulation efforts. One outcome of those negotiations was that PECO Energy Co. agreed to donate $17 million to lavishly fund the Citizens' Alliance.

The alliance did good works - street cleaning, business development, charter schools. Yet funds from a regional utility's ratepayers should have been used to benefit the region, not just one senator's district.

And how much more good could this money have done if it were distributed to true, and truly effective, nonprofits - not one so intent on enhancing the reputation, clout and comfort of one politician?

INDICTED: THE CURRENT CULTURE IN HARRISBURG (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 7, 2007

A HARRISBURG hand grenade rolled into the room a few weeks ago with the news of $4 million in bonuses paid to legislative aides in the House and Senate.

U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan just pulled the pin yesterday, when he released the indictment of state Sen. Vincent Fumo.

That explosive 267-page document paints a picture of entitlement, a lack of accountabilty and a stunning disregard for the public trust that, if true, indicts not just a single senator, but an entire culture of arrogance, secretiveness and corruption that must be cleaned up.

The General Assembly's legislative bonuses - lists of which are now being released by both caucuses -may in the end be defensible, though just looking at how widely they range, from $65 to $40,000, and how quickly some leaders suspended the practice, gives a foul smell to them all.

The attorney general may be investigating whether or not those bonuses were used to pay for campaign work, which is illegal.

And the bonuses may be small potatoes compared to the 139 counts the government outlines on how Fumo "systematically, routinely, and improperly used the funds and resources of the Senate for his personal and political benefit... [directing] that Senate employees and contractors employed by the Senate serve him in any manner he desired throughout the regular workday and at all hours of the day and night, to further his political goals and attend to his personal wants."

But both suggest something is very wrong in Harrisburg: a disconnect not only from the reality of the lives of taxpayers, but also from the jobs these lawmakers are supposed to be doing: working on behalf of the public.

The Fumo indictment is a stunning document that says Fumo had Senate staffers handle his personal life, such as cleaning his house and organizaing the renovations on his Green Street mansion.

It says he defrauded the nonprofit group he established, Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, by using $1 million from that group for a wide range of unrelated spending. The indictment lays out in excruciating detail purchases made by Executive Director (and Senate-paid staffer) Ruth Arnao, also under indictment. Numerous shopping sprees bought household items, food, clothing, DVDs, tools and an inexplicable 19 Oreck vacuum cleaners using Citizens Alliance funds. It says Fumo also used Alliance funds for political work, including polling.

Fumo also engaged in a coverup after the FBI and IRS began to investigate him, the indictment says. And it questions his free use of yachts owned by the Seaport Museum, on whose board he sits, during his Martha's Vineyard vacations.

The indictment paints a picture of a man whose boundaries between his personal life and professional responsibilities have completely dissolved.

And while that may feel familiar to some workaholics, the charge that taxpayers footed the bill for a shocking amount of personal comforts and political benefits is a sickening outrage. (Daily News sources say Fumo could face up to 15 years in jail.)

DOJ_NMG_0128804

Harrisburg lawmakers have lately made a lot of noise about their new reform efforts. Indeed, Fumo himself not long ago released his list for reforming the way laws are heard and passed.

But all that is a light dusting compared to the thorough house-cleaning that must be done.

Citizens should demand a clean house in Harrisburg. And we know just where they might find a few extra vacuum cleaners to do the job.

Loudoun Land Deals Subject Of U.S. Probe (WP)

By Michael Laris And Sandhya Somashekhar

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Federal prosecutors have launched a far-reaching investigation into potential public corruption in Loudoun County, where officials have overseen billions of dollars' worth of development projects in one of the nation's fastest-growing areas.

Loudoun Commonwealth's Attorney James E. Plowman announced a joint investigation yesterday with the U.S. attorney's office in Alexandria, which will take the leading role. "It's kind of a waste of resources if we're both independently reviewing the same matters," Plowman said, adding that the combined federal-local effort "brings about a greater aspect of neutrality."

The announcement follows months of quiet interviewing by FBI agents, who have queried county figures about possible abuses of power by officials, and represents a major escalation of the scrutiny facing Loudoun, the officials with the power to approve lucrative development projects and those in the real estate industry with the most at stake.

It also came shortly before Loudoun's Board of Supervisors passed ethics measures designed to increase government transparency. As part of the reforms, the board voted to discourage supervisors from accepting campaign donations from developers and others with pending projects, and it agreed to disclosure guidelines that could expose potential conflicts of interest.

The investigation and board action come after reports by The Washington Post last month that detailed how major land-use decisions in Loudoun have been dominated by a small network of public officials and their allies in the development industry. Developers, landowners and others profited as they coordinated with public officials to influence land-use decisions in the county, e-mails and other records showed.

Plowman, who last month said his office was focusing on eight or nine areas of inquiry, said in a statement that the joint group "will be tasked with reviewing any potential issues of public corruption within Loudoun County." It was unclear which individuals or specific actions are being investigated.

U.S. officials would not discuss their role in the probe. A spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, Jim Rybicki, said, "Department of Justice policy does not allow us to confirm or deny the existence of an investigation." An FBI spokeswoman declined to comment.

People interviewed by the FBI in recent months said agents asked them in wide-ranging interviews if they had knowledge of any improper dealings by public officials.

The Post reported on the actions of Lawrence Beerman II, the former head of Loudoun's Planning Commission, who voted favorably on projects brought by companies with which he had business ties. They were a firm run by Peter J. Knop and his son, Peter R.Q. Knop, who operate a construction waste dump, and the home-building arm of Greenvest L.C. Beerman's activities have drawn the attention of the FBI, according to two people who were interviewed.

Beerman and the Knops were interviewed for The Post's report but declined to respond to additional written questions. A lawyer representing Greenvest said the company did nothing improper.

"The fact you have local law enforcement working with federal law enforcement is an indication of the seriousness of the probe," said Eric H. Holder Jr., a former deputy attorney general and U.S. attorney in the District. The investigation will now appear to be in "a quiet period, but just because federal officials are not commenting on what they are doing, that does not mean the investigation is not very active. . . . These things often take months, if not years, to resolve themselves."

Some Loudoun officials have argued that they forged close links to people in the real estate industry in an effort to serve residents and said that their votes and other public actions reflected what they thought was best for the county. Supervisor Bruce

DOJ_NMG_0128805

E. Tulloch (R-Potomac) was among the officials who, records and interviews show, worked closely with individuals who stood to benefit from his position.

"I embrace the investigation and look forward to the outcome," Tulloch said. "The sooner, the better." The allegations "need to be brought forward and people's names cleared," he said.

Supervisor James Burton (I-Blue Ridge) said that because of Plowman's ties to other Republican officials, Burton is "glad that someone other than the commonwealth's attorney is involved. . . . The public trust has been severely damaged. We need something to clear it up as soon as possible."

Chairman Scott K. York (I) asked that the board hold a closed meeting this month to discuss whether to sue a real estate agent and others over the purchase of 101 acres in Ashburn from the Islamic Saudi Academy Inc., a company affiliated with a conservative religious school in Fairfax County funded by the Saudi government. The county paid $13.5 million for the land with the urging of Tulloch, who had close ties with the broker.

The Post's series reported that the purchase price was substantially more than what another buyer said he was under contract to pay for the land.

Tulloch defended his actions and those of his friend Dale Polen Myers, a former supervisor who represented the Saudis in the sale.

"I'm proud of everything I've done on this board," Tulloch said. The land purchase "was a good deal for the county, and I don't regret that vote," he added, noting that the purchase had been approved unanimously by the board.

Supervisor Stephen J. Snow (R-Dulles), whose actions were also part of The Post's reports, defended his close communications with developers as proper and in the service of the community. Evoking his years in the Army, he said he lives by the strict code of ethics of a soldier and an officer.

"I don't take life casually," Snow said. "I don't take all of what we do here frivolously. A lot of blood, sweat and tears goes into this job."

More Indictments From Operation Big Coon Dog Investigation (TRI)

By Kathy Still

TriCities.com, February 7, 2007

A South Carolina resident and a North Carolina contracting firm were indicted Tuesday on corruption charges stemming from the Operation Big Coon Dog investigation that rocked Buchanan County after a 2002 flood nearly wiped out the Hurley community.

James Frederick "Rick" Byrd, 56, of Landrum, S.C., and Byrd Brothers Inc., of Wilson, N.C., were indicted by a federal grand jury in Abingdon, both on two counts of program fraud and money laundering conspiracy, according to a news release issued by the U.S attorney's office in Roanoke.

The corporation and Byrd are the latest charged in the public-corruption investigation that nabbed 16 Buchanan County officials, residents and business owners for taking and offering bribes to land lucrative contracts to clean up Hurley. The flood killed two people and caused millions of dollars in damage to the Buchanan County community.

Federal prosecutors got 16 convictions following the investigation.

The federal government spent more than $9 million to rebuild some homes, roads and bridges in Hurley following the May flood. However, court proceedings revealed that many of the contracts for cleanup work were awarded after some local officials received bribes for favorable treatment.

Expensive televisions, NASCAR race tickets and expensive coon dogs were among the bribes offered, prosecutors said. The coon dog bribes gave the investigation and subsequent prosecution its catchy name.

During the federal hearings, prosecutors said the Federal Emergency Management Agency allowed the Board of Supervisors to take responsibility for the cleanup efforts. The contracts were never awarded by public bid, they said. Instead, contractors were selected primarily through bribes, according to prosecutors.

According to Tuesday's indictment, Byrd Brothers was the subcontractor in charge of the cleanup for nearly 30 days before the Buchanan County officials and business owners got involved in the corruption.

DOJ_NMG_0128806

The indictment alleges that Rick Byrd is the agent for Byrd Brothers. He is accused of paying two bribes to Ray Blankenship, the former chairman of the Buchanan County Board of Supervisors. Prosecutors say the bribes bought Blankenship's favor when it came time to determine who got the contracts, according to the news release.

The bribes allegedly paid to Blankenship were hidden and disguised as legitimate payments to Byrd Brothers' subcontractors, prosecutors said in the news release.

The charges carry a maximum penalty of 30 years in federal prison, a $750,000 fine, or both.

Special Agent Phillip Barnett with the Internal Revenue Service and Special Agent Tom Snapp with the Federal Bureau of Investigation conducted the probe. Thomas Bondurant Jr. will prosecute the case.

Bondurant could not be reached for comment Tuesday evening.

FBI: 19 Bonano Crime Family Members Busted (WABC)

WABC-TV, February 7, 2007

The acting underboss and the elderly acting consigliore of the Bonanno crime family were among 19 reputed mobsters busted by federal authorities Tuesday morning, officials said.

Authorities say acting underboss Nicholas "Nicky Mouth" Santora, 73-year-old acting consigliore Anthony "Fat Anthony" Rabito and 17 others were arrested during the raids.

Officials say they will be arraigned in Brooklyn federal court on charges that include racketeering, racketeering conspiracy, conspiracy to commit murder in aid of racketeering, illegal gambling, extortion, extortion conspiracy, loansharking, securities fraud and narcotics distribution.

It is reportedly the fifth time since 2003 that FBI agents busted the Bonanno crime family.

Officials say the repeated busts have come after former Bonanno boss Joseph Massino began cooperating with authorities.

The U.S. Attorney's Office in the Eastern District has prosecuted more than 100 members and associates of the Bonanno family.

Since March 2002, three Bonanno family bosses or acting bosses have been convicted in this district on racketeering and racketeering-related charges, which include murder or murder conspiracy as a racketeering act. A fourth reputed Bonanno family acting boss, Michael Mancuso, is awaiting trial.

Rabito, the alleged "street boss" of the Bonanno crime family, is a Korean War veteran who lives on a quiet street in the East Williamsburg section of Brooklyn.

Alleged Bonanno Crime Family Under Boss Busted (WNBC)

By Ap MOB ARRESTS PDF: Rabito Indictment PDF: Rabito Detention Memo PDF: Rabito Press Release First On WNBC.com: POSTED: 1:11 Pm EST February 6, 2007 UPDATED: 6:27 Pm EST February 6, 2007 Email This Story | Print This Story Sign Up For Breaking News Alerts

WNBC-TV, February 7, 2007

19 Charged in FBI Mafia Sweep

NEW YORK -- Federal prosecutors charged 19 reputed members and associates of the Bonanno crime family Tuesday, including alleged acting under boss Nicky "Nicky Mouth" Santora and alleged acting consigliore Anthony "Fat Anthony" Rabito.

In addition to the reputed under boss and consigliere, 17 other reputed soldiers, members and associates are charged.

Investigators said other charges will include drug trafficking, extortion, illegal gambling and securities fraud. They will be arraigned in Brooklyn federal court this evening.

FBI agents conducted raids and made the arrests Tuesday morning. Investigators said this is the fifth time since 2003 that FBI agents have arrested reputed leaders and their replacements inside the Bonanno crime family.

Former boss Joseph Massino has cooperated with authorities since his arrest, even having worn a recording device to help build a case against his former associates.

Among those arrested today and some of the charges they will face:

Jerome Asaro - Racketeering Conspiracy

DOJ_NMG_0128807

Tracy Badget - Gambling
Giacomo Bonventre - Gambling
Joseph Cammarano- Racketeering, Murder in Aid of Racketeering
Christopher Merz - Racketeering, Marijuana Distribution
Anthony Rabito - Racketeering, Gambling Extortion
Joseph Rossetti - Securities Fraud
Nicholas Santora - Racketeering, Gambling, Extortion
Robert Schwichraft - Securities Fraud
Paul Spina - Racketeering, Murder in Aid of Racketeering
Patrick Parsio - Racketeering, Gambling, Extortion
Anthony Vivelo - Racketeering, Gambling

Feds: Top Bonanno Mobsters Busted (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer
Long Island Newsday, February 7, 2007

The aging men believed to be the current leadership of the decimated Bonanno crime family were arrested Tuesday in an FBI sweep that netted 19 people.

Grabbed by agents at their homes were Nicholas Santora, 64, the crime family's reputed acting underboss, and Anthony Rabito, 73, the acting consiglieri, officials said.

Both men are considered by the FBI to be the latest patchwork of leaders of a crime family that in the past five years has seen more than 70 of its members, including former boss Joseph Massino, convicted of federal charges.

Santora, known by the moniker "Nicky Mouth," and Rabito, whose nickname is "Fat Anthony," were the lead defendants in a massive indictment that charges various defendants with racketeering, loansharking, extortion, gambling and a murder conspiracy. A charge of securities fraud is also listed in the indictment.

Also indicted were reputed Bonanno captains Jerome Asaro, 48, Joseph Cammarano Jr., 47, and Louis DeCicco, 60. Cammarano is the son of reputed Bonanno crime captain Joseph Cammarano Sr.

The 37-count indictment also levied additional charges on three other defendants who had been previously accused of shaking down Howard Beach housewife Yvonne Rossetti. Those charged in the Rossetti case and included in yesterday's indictment were reputed Bonanno soldiers Michael Cassese and Michael Virtuoso. The indictment added Santora and Rabito to the Rossetti extortion allegation. Rossetti's husband, Vincent, became a cooperating witness for the government and is believed to be the source of some of the information used in the latest round of charges, court records indicate.

Joseph Rossetti, 38, who a law enforcement source said was Vincent's younger brother, was arrested Tuesday as well on charges he was involved in securities fraud from 2002 to 2004 with Cassese and another defendant.

The case is the latest salvo in a continuing offensive by the U.S. attorney's office in Brooklyn, which began focusin g on the Bonanno family earlier in the decade. Brooklyn U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf said in a prepared statement that more than 70 crime family members and associates have been convicted since March 2002.

The murder conspiracy charges involved Cammarano and another defendant named Paul Spina. No one was harmed as a result of that conspiracy, according to court papers.

Untouched by the latest charges is Salvatore Montagna, reportedly the new acting boss of the Bonanno crime family. A snippet of information about Montagna's reputed status came out in a letter submitted by prosecutors to the court Tuesday. In a secret tape recording made by a government informant, Cassese said that "Sal 's the acting boss; there is nobody in between. That is it."

Rabito was indicted in 2005 by Queens County prosecutors in a gambling case and was free on bail. He was also convicted in 1982 of federal narcotics charges in a major racketeering case against the Bonanno family. Santora also was convicted in that case of conspiracy, but that judgment was overturned on appeal. Santora was sentenced to prison for other charges and was released after 15 years.

DOJ_NMG_0128808

Magistrate Lois Bloom Tuesday ordered Rabito, Santora and Spina held temporarily pending bail arguments later in the week. Rossetti, Cammarano, Asaro, DeCicco and most of the other defendants were released on bonds. Cassese and Virtuoso were already in custody.

City Briefs (NYDN)

New York Daily News, February 7, 2007

Bonanno gangsters nicknamed Fat Anthony, Nicky Mouth and Fat Paul are charged with living up to their names by shaking down New York City restaurants in the latest federal indictment against the beleaguered crime family. Anthony Rabito, 73, is charged with extorting a $6,000 annual payment from Via Oreto on the upper East Side, Nicholas Santoro with shaking down the Bistro restaurant on Staten Island and Paul Spina with demanding payoffs from the Napa & Sonoma Steakhouse in Queens. All pleaded not guilty in Brooklyn Federal Court.

John Marzulli

Breast-feeding push

The city's Health Department is serious about getting more new moms to breast-feed. Nurses and other health workers will be trained by lactation counselors from the Healthy Children Project as part of a new Health Department initiative starting in March.

Lisa L. Colangelo

8 years for kid porn

A state transportation worker serving 15 years in prison for raping a young child was sentenced to eight years yesterday in a related case for keeping child pornography on his Queens office computer. Vinod Patel, 49, of East Meadow, L.I., was spotted on March 2, 2006, storing a picture of an adult having sex with a child on his computer at the Department of Transportation field office in Bayside, Queens, prosecutors said. The prison terms will run concurrently.

Scott Shifrel

Dead in Bronx drive-by

A man in his 20s was killed in a drive-by shooting in the Bronx last night, cops said. The victim, whose name was not released, was hit several times in the chest about 8:30 p.m. on Burke Ave. in Baychester, authorities said.

The gunman fled in a dark-colored vehicle, police said. "Always kids hanging out here," said a woman who lives nearby. She said she went outside after hearing three or four shots and saw the victim lying in the road.

Oren Yaniv

Samsung fined $90M

ALBANY - Samsung Electronics Co., the world's largest memory-chip maker, agreed to pay $90 million to settle a lawsuit charging the company and others with price-fixing, New York Attorney General Andrew Cuomo said yesterday.

The suit, filed in July, claimed Korean-based Samsung and numerous other companies made secret arrangements to raise the prices of dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, chips.

The Associated Press

BONFIRE OF THE BONANNOS BUSTS 19 (NYPOST)

By Stefanie Cohen

The New York Post, February 7, 2007

Two top Bonannos got unpeeled yesterday when feds arrested the reputed acting underboss and the reputed acting consigliere of the notorious crime family.

Acting underboss Nicholas "Nicky Mouth" Santora and acting consigliere Anthony "Fat Anthony" Rabito topped a list of 19 Bonanno capos, soldiers and other associates collared on extortion, loan-sharking, gambling and murder-conspiracy charges.

Prosecutors have brought down three successive Bonanno family bosses since 2002: Joseph "Big Joey" Massino, Anthony "Tony Green" Urso and Vincent "Vinny Gorgeous" Basciano.

A fourth reputed boss, Michael Mancuso, is awaiting trial.

The two high-ranking mobsters were named in a 39-count indictment in Brooklyn federal court yesterday, which made use of wiretaps and the recordings of a canary who is working with the government.

Santora rose to family underboss after Mancuso was arrested in January 2005. Rabito was named the acting consigliere after the 2004 arrest of Joseph Cammarano, who had the top-advisor job before him.

The indictment is part of a probe that has prosecuted more than 100 Bonanno members and associates over the past five years.

stefanie.cohen@nypost.com

Fighting Crime Tops GOP Priorities (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, February 7, 2007

House Republicans yesterday outlined a legislative package to curb drug crime, gang violence and child pornography -- pushing domestic safety issues they say will help them win back a majority.

Republican members of the Judiciary Committee criticized the Democratic leadership for leaving measures against violent crime off its publicized "first 100 hours" agenda last month.

"If you listened very carefully, there was a deafening silence when it came to dealing with violent crime," said Rep. J. Randy Forbes, Virginia Republican.

Democrats, upon taking leadership of the House, gave top priority to implementing more of the September 11 commission's recommendations, raising the minimum wage and increasing federal funding for embryonic-stem-cell research.

Republicans, holding 202 seats in the 435-member House, plan to push their own priorities as they look toward the 2008 elections.

"We are taking an activist approach, we are taking initiative, coming up with our own agenda and our own ideas," said Rep. Lamar Smith of Texas, the ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. Smith said he expects bipartisan support on the bills. "Crime is simply too important to leave to partisan politics," he said.

The Republican Law and Order Agenda, formally introduced yesterday, lists nine proposals. Several were passed in the House in previous Congresses but stalled in the Senate.

Among the Republican proposals were bills to make the Internet safer for children, target identity theft and other cyberspace crime, and reduce fraudulent claims with the Federal Emergency Management Agency. They also give law enforcement more tools to crack down on drug trafficking and gang crime.

"One thing is crystal clear: If we are going to do something about the skyrocketing murder rate, we have to break the back of the drug traffickers," said Rep. Ric Keller, Florida Republican, whose hometown of Orlando has recorded a 122 percent increase in the homicide rate.

His bill would impose "stiff penalties" on drug dealers.

Republicans said gang problems are inextricably linked to a spike in the number of illegal aliens, and stressed the need for legislation to strengthen border security.

Another proposal would bolster counterterrorism tools and require the death penalty for terrorist killers.

Mr. Forbes said Republicans may not have the House votes to pass their agenda, but "if we don't have them now we'll get them two years from now."

"I'm glad to see, it's important to notice who's talking about ideas in this Congress and I certainly hope that they will get a fair hearing and markup," said Rep. Adam H. Putnam of Florida, the Republican Conference chairman.

Mr. Putnam said the Republicans on the Judiciary Committee "are not using being in the minority as an excuse not to produce good legislation."

Democrats have introduced bills this year to address methamphetamine use, gang problems and Internet safety issues.

Rep. Bart Gordon, Tennessee Democrat, will hold a press conference today on his legislative efforts to clean up methamphetamine labs.

DOJ_NMG_0128810

GOP Revives ISP-tracking Legislation (CNET)

By Declan Mccullagh

CNET News, February 7, 2007

All Internet service providers would have to keep track of what their customers are doing online to aid police in future investigations under legislation introduced Tuesday as part of a Republican "law and order agenda."

Employees of any Internet provider who fail to store that information will face fines and prison terms of up to one year, the bill says. The U.S. Justice Department could order the companies to store those records forever.

Rep. Lamar Smith of Texas, the top Republican on the House Judiciary Committee, called it a necessary anti-cybercrime measure. "The legislation introduced today will give law enforcement the tools it needs to find and prosecute criminals," he said in a statement.

A second requirement, also embedded in Smith's so-called Safety Act (click for PDF), requires owners of sexually explicit Web sites to post warning labels on their pages or face imprisonment. This echoes, nearly word for word, an earlier proposal from last year that was approved by a Senate committee but never made it to a floor vote.

Even though both requirements are central to a Republican-led effort, neither data retention nor Web labeling are that partisan. A Senate committee approved a telecommunications bill that included Web labeling by a 15-7 vote in June. And Rep. Diana DeGette, a Colorado Democrat, has been the most vocal proponent of data retention in the entire Congress.

Other bills in the Republicans' "law and order" agenda are related to terrorism, the death penalty, gangs, computer data breaches and drug trafficking. ISP snooping timeline

The legislative fusillade marks the renewal of a political tussle that began in earnest last April, when Attorney General Alberto Gonzales called on Congress to target Internet providers with new regulations, which have been generally opposed by telecommunications companies and civil liberties organizations. CNET News.com was the first to report that the Bush administration has been pushing for such a rule privately since mid-2005.

Until this week, however, no formal bill had been introduced in the U.S. Congress.

Supporters of the proposal say it's necessary to help track criminals if police don't respond immediately to reports of illegal activity and the relevant logs are deleted by Internet providers. They cite cases of child molestation, for instance. Industry representatives respond by saying there's no evidence that Internet providers have dragged their feet when responding to subpoenas from law enforcement.

Details about data retention requirements would be left to Gonzales. At a minimum, the bill says, the regulations must require storing records "such as the name and address of the subscriber or registered user to whom an Internet Protocol address, user identification or telephone number was assigned, in order to permit compliance with court orders."

Because there is no limit on how broad the rules can be, Gonzales would be permitted to force Internet providers to keep logs of Web browsing, instant message exchanges, or e-mail conversations indefinitely. (The bill does not, however, explicitly cover search engines or Web hosting companies, which officials have talked about before as targets of regulation.)

That broad wording also would permit the records to be obtained by private litigants in noncriminal cases, such as divorces and employment disputes. That raises additional privacy concerns, civil libertarians say.

The American Civil Liberties Union is skeptical of data retention and Web labeling. "It's going to be very difficult for Web sites to know whether they fit into this," said ACLU legislative counsel Marv Johnson, referring to the labeling rules. "And then when you throw in the 'sexually explicit materials' definition, does that include safe sex Web sites?"

"Preservation" vs. "Retention"

Currently, Internet service providers typically discard any log file that's no longer required for business reasons such as network monitoring, fraud prevention, or billing disputes. Companies do, however, alter that general rule when contacted by police performing an investigation--a practice called data preservation.

A 1996 federal law called the Electronic Communication Transactional Records Act regulates data preservation. It requires Internet providers to retain any "record" in their possession for 90 days "upon the request of a governmental entity."

DOJ_NMG_0128811

Because Internet addresses remain a relatively scarce commodity, ISPs tend to allocate them to customers from a pool based on if a computer is in use at the time. (Two standard techniques used are the Dynamic Host Configuration Protocol and Point-to-Point Protocol over Ethernet.)

In addition, Internet providers are required by another federal law to report child pornography sightings to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, which is in turn charged with forwarding that report to the appropriate police agency.

When adopting its data retention rules, the European Parliament approved U.K.-backed requirements saying that communications providers in its 25 member countries--several of which had enacted their own data retention laws already--must retain customer data for a minimum of six months and a maximum of two years.

The Europe-wide requirement applies to a wide variety of "traffic" and "location" data, including the identities of the customers' correspondents; the date, time, and duration of phone calls, voice over Internet Protocol calls, or e-mail messages; and the location of the device used for the communications. But the "content" of the communications is not supposed to be retained. The rules are expected to take effect in 2008.

Three Plead Guilty To Fraud In Katrina Debris Removal (BSH)

Biloxi Sun Herald, February 7, 2007

GULFPORT - Three people, including a Florida contractor, have pleaded guilty to conspiracy to defraud the government by falsifying records of debris clean up from Hurricane Katrina and billing the federal government $716,677 for the work.

Allan Kitto, 24, of Dundee, Fla., whose company was a subcontractor for debris cleanup in Pearl River County; Clinton K. Miller, 28, of Carriere; and Lauren Robertson, 23, of Picayune, entered the pleas Tuesday in Gulfport federal court, U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton said.

Lampton said the three will be sentenced May 7. The maximum penalty is five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

According to a federal indictment, Robertson allegedly signed false debris load slips misrepresenting that debris was loaded onto trucks on the roadway when Robertson was not present at the loading site.

The false debris load slips misrepresented that certain trucks, belonging to and under the control of Kitto, were hauling loads of debris at a time when the trucks identified on the debris load slips were not in operation on the roadway or at the dump site listed, Lampton said.

The false debris load slips also misrepresented that loads of debris were delivered to a designated dump site in Pearl River County when no debris was delivered to the dump site.

Lampton said Miller allegedly collected the false load slips and submitted them to the debris monitoring company, which would submit the false load slips to the prime contractor for payment to Kitto.

The indictment also charges that Kitto, in an effort to conceal the conspiracy, would deposit the funds into a bank account opened in the name of one of his employees and then write a check to an unindicted coconspirator who would then pay Kitto and Miller.

Miller would then pay Robertson for completing and signing the false load slips, according to the indictment.

U.S. Wants US$309 Million In Katrina Hurricane Aid Returned (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, February 7, 2007

(AP) - NEW ORLEANS-In the neighborhood President George W. Bush visited right after Hurricane Katrina, the U.S. government gave US$84.5 million (â,¬65.3 million) to more than 10,000 households. But official figures show fewer than 8,000 homes existed there at the time.

Now the government wants back a lot of the money it gave out across the region.

The Federal Emergency Management Administration has determined nearly 70,000 households improperly received US$309.1 million (â,¬239 million) in grants, and officials acknowledge those numbers are likely to rise.

In the chaotic period after two deadly hurricanes, Katrina and Rita, slammed the Gulf Coast in 2005, federal officials scrambled to provide help to hard-hit areas.

But an Associated Press analysis of government data suggests the government might not have been careful enough with its aid as it gave out nearly US$5.3 billion (â,¬4 billion) to storm victims. The analysis found the government regularly gave money to more homes in some neighborhoods than the number of homes that actually existed.

The pattern was repeated in nearly 100 neighborhoods damaged by the hurricanes. At least 162,750 homes that did not exist before the storms may have received a total of more than US$1 billion (â,¬774 million) in improper or illegal payments, the AP found.

The AP analysis discovered the government made more home grants than the number of homes in one of every five neighborhoods in the wake of Katrina. After Rita roared ashore, there were more home grants than homes in one of every 10 neighborhoods.

In one neighborhood, at least one person gave an address as a cemetery.

In St. Bernard Parish, close to where Katrina made landfall south of New Orleans, Martina Wiggins said she was denied aid because someone had already applied using her address.

"They gave away the money too fast," Wiggins said bitterly. "A lot of people got money who didn't deserve it."

"We don't dispute that more households received expedited assistance in certain zip codes than are listed in the 2000 Census," said David Garratt, FEMA's deputy director for recovery. But he called this "not only justifiable, it's defensible."

Officials say a large number of those payments - they cannot say precisely how many - were made legitimately to homes where family members were separated after the storm, such as emergency workers who stayed behind as spouses and children fled. In such cases, a single family could qualify for more than one aid package. Garratt said officials were in a no-win position.

"We were faced with a situation where we had individuals who needed assistance, and needed it now," he said. "If we'd followed the standard procedures, it would have taken weeks."

The Justice Department so far has prosecuted more than 400 people for storm-related fraud, and US$18 million(â,¬14 million) has been returned to FEMA or the American Red Cross, according to a recent report by the department's Katrina Fraud Task Force.

In some cases, FEMA is still trying to collect refunds from individuals who improperly received more than one grant or who were ineligible for assistance. But for people like Keshian Mitchell, a 17-year-old Katrina refugee living in a dismal apartment complex in west Houston, it is small comfort.

"They ain't no help now," said Mitchell, who didn't find her parents until six months after Katrina laid waste to New Orleans. "Nobody's getting any more help - they already spent all the money."

Crystal Dixon, who lives near Mitchell, agreed. Dixon, 25, said she saw people defraud taxpayers while she fought for basic assistance to help feed and clothe her five children, ages 1 to 10.

She met one woman who had moved to Houston two years before the storm but kept her Louisiana driver's license. The woman, who had no children, got cash assistance before Dixon was helped, Dixon said.

"I try to understand how confused things got," said Dixon. Her children played outside and chattered excitedly about nearly falling off a roof into flood-swollen streets, being rescued by a Coast Guard helicopter and scrounging for food and water at the overcrowded Superdome. "But I thought everyone should have been treated equally."

Cedric Miller, a 34-year-old busboy at a New Orleans restaurant, said FEMA officials seemed to be reacting as best they could to the devastation. But Miller also said: "There was a lot of fraud going on. ... There was a whole lot of that going on. It was a big ol' way-drawn-out mess."

Frank Bass reported this story from Washington, Houston and New Orleans. Michelle Roberts reported from New Orleans.

On the Net:

Federal Emergency Management Agency: http://www.fema.gov

Former Manager Gets 1 1/2 Years For Theft (MIDP)

By Jeff Mill, Press Staff

DOJ_NMG_0128813

Middletown (CT) Press, February 7, 2007

HARTFORD - A longtime bank official who embezzled more than a half-million dollars from Liberty Bank was sentenced Tuesday to 18 months in federal prison.

Mary Kuskey, 51, who now lives in Portland but who formerly lived in Middletown, pleaded guilty in May 2006 to a single count of bank embezzlement.

Kuskey had worked for Liberty Bank in a variety of positions from 1974 until 2005, when she was fired after the bank uncovered a complex scheme to divert bank funds for her personal use.

During her 31-year career with Liberty Bank, U.S. Attorney Kevin J. O'Connor said, Kuskey steadily rose up through the hierarchy of the bank, from teller to assistant manager, manager and finally regional manager.

In 1995, she was promoted yet again, to the post of branch manager at Liberty's Durham branch.

Two years later, O'Connor said, Kuskey began her fall from grace.

From 1997-2001, Kuskey "created several fraudulent loans in the names of bank customers who had large deposit account balances," O'Connor said. But, she "kept the loan proceeds for her own use, he added.

She concealed the scheme by repaying the loans within 90 days, O'Connor said. That prevented the bank from sending the customers a loan statement, which might have revealed the flimflam.

To cover the existing loans, Kuskey created new loans in increasing amounts, the U.S. Attorney said. Eventually, Kuskey was able to generate more than $261,000 that she diverted for her own use.

But after four years of switching the loans, Kuskey abandoned that scheme and began a new and more ambitious scheme, O'Connor said.

She began making unauthorized withdrawals from the jumbo certificate of deposit account of a bank customer.

At first, she withdrew $261,244 to pay off the outstanding loans from her previous scheme. Then, O'Connor said, she went back to the same account and continued to make withdrawals that she diverted for her own use.

From January 2001 to May 2005, Kuskey "made unauthorized withdrawals totaling $497,792.26," O'Connor said.

But that required still another dizzying effort to conceal what she was doing, O'Connor said.

"The customer's CD accounts typically matured every 30 days," he explained, "and to induce the customer to roll over the CD into a new CD, Kuskey gave the customer a much higher interest rate than what the bank was offering."

"To conceal the scheme, Kuskey gave the customer false certificates and related documentation," which Kuskey fabricated.

Those false documents "reflected the inflated balance that the customer believed was in the account, based on the false interest rates," O'Connor said.

In addition to her guilty plea, Kuskey is also required to repay the bank for what she stole.

To date, O'Connor said, she has made restitution of $190,148. However, she still owes Liberty another $410,799 "in order to fulfill her restitution requirement," O'Connor said.

Once she completes her sentence, Kuskey will then still have to serve three years of supervised release under the sentence imposed Tuesday by District court Judge Christopher F. Droney.

O'Connor commended Liberty Bank for uncovering the fraud and for what he called the bank's "valuable assistance" with the subsequent FBI investigation.

To contact Jeff Mill, call him at (860) 347-3331, Ext. 221, or e-mail him at jmill@middletownpress.com.

Trio Convicted In Bank Robbery Scheme (FWST)

By Bryon Okada

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, February 7, 2007

FORT WORTH — James Edward Geske, Kevin Michael Smith and Alicia Nichole Frazier face up to life in federal prison without parole after a Fort Worth jury found them guilty of plotting to orchestrate three simultaneous bank robberies in downtown Hamilton, including using military explosives to blow up 15 police cars.

DOJ_NMG_0128814

Geske, 27, was the ringleader of the plot that was planned in great detail during October and November. Smith, 37, and Frazier, 25, played lesser roles, but all are equally guilty of participating in the conspiracy to commit the crimes, the jury found.

All three were arrested on Nov. 8, the same day the bank plan was being finalized. On that day, Geske traded a stash of fake methamphetamine for guns with an undercover federal agent. The plan as a whole was largely brought down by two undercover law enforcement officers.

"The Arlington Police Department and ATF (Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives) and this jury took three dangerous criminals off the streets, as well as a cache of weapons," federal prosecutor Bret Helmer said. "The end result could have been catastrophic for a lot of people in Hamilton, Texas."

Defense attorneys attempted to portray their clients as small-time street characters who talked big but meant little.

The jury disagreed, taking two hours to bring back guilty verdicts on all four counts against the three defendants.

Geske, Smith and Frazier are scheduled to be sentenced at 9 a.m. May 25 in U.S. District Judge John McBryde's court.

Government Wants Former Coke Secretary Jailed (AP)

By HARRY R. WEBER

AP, February 7, 2007

ATLANTA - The government said in court papers Tuesday it believes a former Coca-Cola secretary convicted of conspiring to steal trade secrets from the beverage giant should be jailed immediately because she poses a flight risk.

In a motion filed in U.S. District Court in Atlanta, Assistant U.S. Attorney Byung J. Pak said clothing, prescription medication, papers and other personal items were found in Joya Williams' Mustang during a search after a fire destroyed her apartment Friday.

The fire, which has been ruled accidental by local officials in Norcross, occurred nearly 90 minutes after the guilty verdict was reached in federal court in Atlanta.

"With no place to live, with no money, with a significant amount of debt, and with the prospect of a lengthy prison sentence, the defendant poses a serious risk of flight," Pak argued in the motion.

Pak also indicated that while local fire investigators deemed Friday's fire was caused accidentally by an unattended candle igniting some curtains in a bedroom of Williams' apartment, the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives continues to investigate the incident.

"Residents from the Hunters Point apartment complex reported that they heard what sounded like an argument from Williams' apartment and items may have been thrown through her apartment windows," Pak wrote.

Pak also said that Williams made inconsistent statements to investigators regarding her location and actions during the fire.

He added, "Regardless of whether the fire was intentionally or accidentally set, the fact remains that the defendant no longer has a residence at which the pretrial release supervision can be maintained."

The government motion is seeking to force Williams to prove why she should not be remanded to the custody of federal marshals, and if she fails to do that, asks the court to order her jailed immediately.

Williams, who was out on bond during her trial, currently remains free pending sentencing.

Williams, 41, faces up to 10 years in prison for conspiring to steal trade secrets from Atlanta-based Coca-Cola in an effort to sell them to rival PepsiCo Inc. No sentencing date has been set.

Water Deal Exposes Secret Iraq Contracts (AP)

By Katherine Shrader And Allison Hoffman

AP, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON, (AP) -- CIA officers operating in northern Iraq bought drinking water from a bottling plant there for years prior to the 2003 invasion that ousted Saddam Hussein.

That changed soon afterward. A CIA officer handling logistics for the Middle East and other regions recommended that an American company provide water and other supplies, according to former government officials.

DOJ_NMG_0128815

The U.S. contractor that benefited from the multimillion-dollar deal wasn't just anyone. The company had personal ties to the officer, Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, who would soon leave his logistics post in Frankfurt, Germany, and move to Washington to become the CIA's third-ranking official.

In at least one written communication, a Baghdad CIA officer complained about the no-bid contract. According to one official, the officer believed the deal was simply unnecessary because safe water was available commercially but he was ignored.

The water contract, while small on the scale of the billions that flowed into Iraq, raises questions about why U.S. taxpayer dollars went to well-connected businessmen rather than Iraqis who could have benefited from a share of postwar reconstruction business. And the case provides a window into the murky world of covert government business arrangements.

Foggo retired from the CIA last year. He is now at the center of a federal investigation, nearing completion, into whether he improperly steered contracts to companies controlled by his best friend, San Diego defense contractor Brent Wilkes.

Federal prosecutors in San Diego are preparing to seek indictments against Foggo and Wilkes on charges of honest services fraud and conspiracy, two government officials familiar with the investigation told The Associated Press last week.

Those officials and others spoke on condition that they not be identified because the charges have not been finalized and because CIA contracting is classified. Justice Department and law enforcement officials in San Diego and Washington declined to comment.

Honest services fraud is a charge combining mail and wire fraud often used in public corruption cases involving officials who have engaged in a pattern of improper activities, such as accepting gifts, trips or promises of future employment from private individuals.

The probe of Foggo and Wilkes stems from a broader federal investigation involving at least five federal agencies into how associates of former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham directed government business to a favored network of national security contractors. Cunningham, a San Diego Republican elected to eight terms in Congress, is currently serving more than eight years in jail for taking at least $2.4 million in bribes. Another defense contractor has pleaded guilty to paying some of them.

In June 2002, Wilkes created a government contractor called Archer Defense Technologies, which was registered to the address of his flagship, Wilkes Corp., in Poway, Calif. The company also used the name Liberty Defense Technologies. At the beginning of 2004, his nephew and apprentice, Joel Combs, formed a new company called Archer Logistics, run out of a small Virginia office.

Despite the short history of Wilkes' company, Foggo recommended that the CIA buy water from it, current and former officials said. He was a supervising officer at the CIA supply hub in Germany, and the purchasing officer there went along.

Foggo didn't tell the purchasing officer about his personal ties to Combs or Wilkes, a government official says. With CIA officers literally under fire and other large issues to deal with, the CIA station didn't put up a fight, former officials say.

The issue in the investigation isn't the price but that the contract was awarded without competitive bidding and that Foggo had an obligation to disclose his personal connections, according to these officials.

Foggo's former attorney publicly acknowledged before he died last summer that the investigation includes Archer, but he said his client had no idea that the company was associated with Wilkes. Foggo's current attorney, Mark MacDougall, declined to comment, as did Wilkes' attorney, Mark Geragos.

CIA spokesman Mark Mansfield declined to comment citing the investigation, which includes the spy agency's inspector general. "As a rule, we don't comment publicly about which firms may or may not have a contractual relationship with the agency," he said.

From the beginning of the Iraq invasion, the CIA was forced almost constantly to revise its game plan. Early predictions were that the CIA station set up in Baghdad would move to a peacekeeping mission by fall of 2003 and need less than 100 officers, with the Army handling most key functions.

Instead, the CIA had a station of more than 500 that fall, the former officials said. Sorting out where the water came from had never been a top priority, they recalled.

A veteran officer who served in Central America, Foggo rose through the ranks to become a leading logistics officer for the CIA based in Frankfurt, one of a few CIA bases of its kind in the world. In that position, he handled shipments of supplies on C-130 cargo planes to nearly a third of the CIA's overseas operations — outfits in Central Europe, Africa, the Balkans and the Middle East that required everything from food and water to phones and computers.

DOJ_NMG_0128816

Foggo, 52, was described as a guy who could get things done. When the U.S.-led coalition invaded Iraq in 2003, Foggo was in charge of ensuring CIA personnel in the war zone had what they needed, including bottled water.

The officials say the CIA turned to Foggo's friends, including Wilkes and his nephew, Combs. Wilkes, also 52, was Foggo's best friend from high school, and the two football teammates named their sons after each other. Combs used an address at an office park called Thunderbolt Place in Chantilly, Va., which was also used by other Wilkes' companies. The space in a two-story brick office park has now been vacated.

The review of the logistics operations in Iraq did not begin until after Foggo had been tapped by then-CIA Director Porter Goss to be the agency's No. 3 — the executive director — who would run the agency's day-to-day operations.

Such a significant promotion for a logistics officer came as a surprise to many in the agency.

Observers said Foggo embraced the role. He started sending out memos to agency personnel, signed "Yours in Service." He had a nickname for everyone, and he could be seen glad-handing his way through lunch at the CIA's seventh-floor executive dining room.

He and Wilkes also dined at a Washington steakhouse at the foot of Capitol Hill frequented by lobbyists, which caught the attention of a House Intelligence Committee investigator looking into ties between defense contractors and Cunningham. Foggo and Wilkes kept a private wine locker at the restaurant stocked with Cunningham's favorite, a pricey California cabernet.

The meteoric rise ended with a crash.

Foggo retired from the agency in May under investigation by five agencies: the FBI, the IRS, the Defense Criminal Investigative Service, the CIA's inspector general and the U.S. attorney's office in San Diego. A local news helicopter circled his house in the Northern Virginia suburbs as agents sifted through his belongings.

Wilkes' business and personal fortunes have also suffered. In the past two months, his wife has filed for divorce, and he has defaulted on a $7.5 million personal mortgage loan. His company, the Wilkes Corp., defaulted on $12.1 million owed on another note.

Associated Press writer Allison Hoffman reported from San Diego.

Wider Death Penalty Sought (USAT)

By Emily Bazar

USA Today, February 7, 2007

At least a half-dozen states are considering broadening the death penalty, countering a national trend toward scaling back its use.

Lawmakers have proposed legislation that would increase the range of crimes eligible for execution. In Texas and Tennessee, for example, legislators want to include certain child molesters who did not murder their victims.

"The hope is that these monsters will see that Texas is serious about protecting children," says Rich Parsons, spokesman for Lt. Gov. David Dewhurst. Dewhurst, a Republican, is working with state senators to draft legislation that would make repeat offenders subject to capital punishment in some cases. "If they understand they could face the ultimate punishment," they might "think twice," Parsons says.

Virginia is considering bills that would make accomplices to murder, as well as killers of judges and court witnesses, eligible for the death penalty.

"I'm a believer in the deterrent effect of the death penalty," says Republican Delegate Todd Gilbert, a state prosecutor who sponsored two of the measures. "I know a number of states are reconsidering their position on the death penalty. … I feel confident Virginia's system is set up to work."

Lawmakers or courts have temporarily halted all executions in 11 states in the past year, most of them over concerns that lethal injection is cruel and unusual punishment, says Richard Dieter of the Death Penalty Information Center, which he says takes no position on the death penalty but has been critical of how it is applied.

DOJ_NMG_0128817

In December, a convicted killer in Florida took 34 minutes to die and had chemical burns on his arms after a lethal injection procedure. After the execution, then-governor Jeb Bush created a commission to study possible improvements and halted executions until the commission releases its report.

Other states with proposals to expand the death penalty:

•Missouri. Gov. Matt Blunt said in his State of the State address last month that he wants a mandatory death penalty for the murder of law enforcement officers. Blunt, a Republican, says the state must protect its public servants and the death penalty would be a deterrent. "This is the type of crime that calls for the death penalty," he says.

Robert Blecker, a law professor at New York Law School who specializes in the death penalty, says the Supreme Court has found mandatory death sentences unconstitutional because they don't allow defendants to present mitigating evidence. Blunt says his measure will take that into account.

•Georgia. GOP state Rep. Barry Fleming has introduced a bill to allow a judge to impose the death sentence if at least nine of 12 jurors — not all 12, as now — voted for it.

•Utah. The House passed a bill Tuesday making murder of a child under 14 subject to execution.

State Rep. Paul Ray, a Republican, introduced a bill to allow the death penalty for killing a child during abuse, sexual assault or kidnapping, even if prosecutors cannot prove intent to kill. He expects the House to vote later this week.

"We're going to send a message that if you kill our kids in Utah, we're going to kill you," he says. "In Utah, I don't think we use the death penalty enough."

6 City Police Officers Suspended (BSUN)

By Gus G. Sentementes

The Baltimore Sun, February 7, 2007

Six Baltimore police officers were suspended Tuesday as part of an internal affairs investigation into possible "irregularities" with their overtime pay, a department spokesman said.

The officers -- two sergeants and four detectives -- worked in criminal investigations in the department's Eastern District when they filed for overtime that is now being reviewed by internal affairs investigators, police said. One of the sergeants was recently transferred to the Northeastern District, police said.

Matt Jablow, a Police Department spokesman, declined to release the names of the officers or say how much overtime was in question.

He said that questions about their overtime -- which consisted of money paid out for court and investigative time -- arose as part of an internal audit last summer.

Their law enforcement powers have been suspended, but the officers will continue to work in administrative positions, Jablow said.

According to a document obtained by The Sun, the suspended officers are Sgt. Darryl Massey, Sgt. Raynard H. Jones, and detectives Sandra D. Forsythe, Dave P. Peckoo, Kerry D. Snead and Kevin R. Turner.

The suspensions come amid a push by the department this year to curtail overtime spending.

As of Dec. 31, the Police Department had spent $21 million on overtime -- more than twice the $8.7 million budgeted for fiscal year 2007, which ends June 30. The department regularly exceeds its allotted overtime, but some say it is because city leaders budget an unrealistically low figure each year.

Mayor Sheila Dixon recently pledged to reduce Police Department spending on overtime. In recent weeks, each of the city's nine police districts have been told to rein in overtime spending.

Department leaders have set a target of $30,000 in total officer overtime per two-week pay-period.

"I believe an allegation was made against these officers, and everybody should consider them innocent until proven guilty," said Paul M. Blair Jr., president of the city police union. "People shouldn't jump to conclusions just because allegations are made. It comes with the job. It comes with the job every day."

Blair said he was concerned about the impact that the reduction in overtime might have on public safety, since the department remains short about 165 officers.

DOJ_NMG_0128818

CIVIL LAW:

Relatives Sue FBI, Say Club Sting Was Bungled (BERGREC)

By Douglass Crouse, STAFF WRITER

Bergen Record, February 7, 2007

Relatives of three of the four people gunned down in a Paterson after-hours club sued the federal government Monday, claiming the deaths resulted from a bungled FBI sting operation.

Three men and a woman were massacred inside the illegal gambling club during an early-morning robbery Dec. 14, 2005.

"The FBI violated their own policies on undercover cases: to make sure that the safety of unrelated civilians is not in jeopardy," said the families' attorney, Rosemarie Arnold. "You have a virtual casino operating in a known dangerous neighborhood without any security. That to me is an invitation to robbery."

Four co-defendants are now behind bars, with the Passaic County Prosecutor's Office preparing a death penalty case against the alleged gunman.

FBI officials have declined comment and did not return a call Monday.

Based on police files, the lawsuit says the FBI set up the sting four months before the shootings to investigate drugs and arms trafficking by the Latin Kings gang. It claims the agency paid a former convict $3,500 a month to run the business -- known as Kings Court -- atop a warehouse on Railroad Avenue, but failed to properly train or supervise him.

The nine-count complaint filed in federal court in Newark names as defendants the U.S. government, three FBI agents and the four criminal defendants.

The victims' relatives say they hunger for accountability.

"I'm left wondering: Does the FBI realize what actions they set in motion when they opened this place?" said the sister of victim Tara Woods of West Paterson. "Somebody messed up and they have to be held accountable."

She asked that her name not be published for safety concerns.

Law enforcement sources say the club manager was a federal informant, and he had opened the club on the night of the shootings without notifying the FBI.

But the sister of Woods, a 29-year-old mother of two, isn't satisfied by that account.

"We want to know exactly what happened and why," she said. "This has devastated us. And that's one family. Multiply that effect by four."

Carmen Suarez of Paterson, who lived for 20 years with victim Ralph Hernandez, 53, said, "I want the people responsible for his death to pay."

Relatives of Jesus Antonio Gonzales, 31, also of Paterson, also are plaintiffs but could not be reached. The fourth victim was Johnny Melendez, 39, of Newark.

Investigators say the conspirators had envisioned an in-and-out robbery that would never get reported to police. Instead, they say, gunman David Baylor of Passaic snapped and shot the cowering victims point-blank.

"However solidified the [robbery] plan had been, at that point it went out the window," said John Latoracca, chief assistant prosecutor for Passaic County. "Baylor had effectively elevated the stakes a thousand times."

After the shootings, rumors spread quickly about FBI involvement in the illegal club.

Latoracca confirmed the club was the "subject of an undercover operation by the FBI." He was not aware of any armed guards, but said patrons were "wanded."

Baylor's death-penalty trial is tentatively set for September.

Baylor's attorney, Harley Breite, has attacked some of the state's witnesses as "people with lengthy criminal records."

"Is that the type of credible testimony we can rely upon to send somebody to death?" he said.

Baylor's co-defendants are Reginald "Khaddafi" Barris of Clifton; Beatriz Hernandez, 24, address unavailable, and Hamid Shabazz, 30, of Passaic.

DOJ_NMG_0128819

All four have been indicted on felony murder, robbery and weapons charges.

Baylor, 27, and Barris, 25, are in the county jail in lieu of $5 million bail each. Shabazz is in prison for an unrelated robbery, and Hernandez is in undisclosed custody.

FBI Sued By Relatives Of Victims In Club Shooting (MH)

The Miami Herald, February 7, 2007

NEWARK, N.J. - A mishandled FBI sting at a Paterson after-hours club led to a massacre in which four people died, according to a lawsuit filed by some of their families.

The FBI failed to properly train or supervise the former inmate it paid $3,500 a month to operate the illegal casino, according to the lawsuit filed Monday in U.S. District Court.

"Kings Court" was opened in a warehouse to investigate weapons and drug trafficking by the Latin Kings gang four months before the fatal shootings, the lawsuit said.

"The FBI violated their own policies on undercover cases: to make sure that the safety of unrelated civilians is not in jeopardy," a lawyer for the families of three victims, Rosemarie Arnold, told The Record of Bergen County in Tuesday's editions. "You have a virtual casino operating in a known dangerous neighborhood without any security. That to me is an invitation to robbery."

Three men and a woman were shot to death inside the club during an early morning robbery on Dec. 14, 2005. The manager escaped the carnage, called 911, and said he worked for the FBI, according to a transcript of his call obtained by The Record of Bergen County and its sister paper, the Herald News of West Paterson.

An FBI spokesman, Special Agent Steven Siegel, on Tuesday declined to comment on the lawsuit or on whether the manager was working for the agency.

Four people were arrested and indicted on murder charges. Prosecutors said they will seek the death penalty for the accused gunman, David Baylor, 27, of Passaic.

Radio Star's Fatal Air Crash Blamed On Radar Lack (CHIT)

By Matt O'Connor, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, February 7, 2007

An air-traffic controller admitted Tuesday that he had no idea of a Cessna's location when he instructed its pilot to turn, a maneuver that less than two minutes later resulted in a midair collision that killed radio star Bob Collins and two others.

Testifying at a federal trial stemming from lawsuits filed by the families of the three victims, air-traffic controller Gregory Fowler said the crash of the two small aircraft would have been prevented if the Waukegan Regional Airport had been equipped with radar at the time.

A radar system was installed at the airfield five months after the February 2000 collision that killed Collins, a passenger in his Moravan Z242L plane and the student pilot at the controls of the Cessna 172P, Fowler said.

Fowler's testimony highlighted the first full day of testimony in the bench trial before U.S. District Judge John Darrah. Lawyers for the victims have sued the U.S. government, contending the Federal Aviation Administration was responsible for the crash, even though the Waukegan airport is operated by a private company. Other defendants reached settlements before the trial, which is expected to last about two weeks.

Relatives of two victims also testified, including Ed Hock, who struggled to keep his composure as he spoke about his daughter, Sharon, the student pilot, who he said had a vibrant personality. Evan Luscher, 19, whose father, Herman, died in Collins' plane, said he thinks of his dad every day.

Attorneys for Collins played audiotapes of the transmissions between Fowler and the pilots in the minutes before the fatal crash.

Collins, 57, at the time Chicago's top-ranked morning-radio personality on WGN, could be heard calmly identifying his airplane before he announced: "Just had a mid-air."

WGN is owned by Tribune Co., which also owns the Chicago Tribune.

DOJ_NMG_0128820

Collins' plane crashed onto the roof of the Midwestern Regional Medical Center, and Hock's plane plummeted to a Zion street.

The planes were approaching the Waukegan tower in order to land, but a hazy sky made it difficult for the pilots to see one another and for Fowler to observe the planes, he said. The airfield is near Lake Michigan in the north suburb.

Under questioning by Kevin Durkin, a lawyer for Collins' widow, Christine, Fowler acknowledged it was important that Hock had Collins' plane in sight before she was instructed to turn her plane on the approach to the airfield.

Yet Fowler admitted that he asked Hock three separate times if she saw Collins' plane and each time she responded no, the last time seconds before he told her to make the turn.

"Have you passed the shoreline?" Fowler then asked.

"Gettin' there," the transcript quoted Hock as replying.

It was then that Fowler instructed Hock to turn the plane, even though under questioning he acknowledged that Hock's answer hadn't been precise enough for him to so act.

Durkin asked Fowler if he had issued that instruction "without having any real idea of where [Hock] was?"

"Correct," Fowler replied.

"And you couldn't see [Collins' plane]?" Durkin asked.

No, Fowler said.

Less than two minutes later, Collins' plane rear-ended Hock's Cessna, even though Collins was supposed to be the first to land.

Fowler, who then managed the tower, said radar would have given him "the tools" to prevent the crash.

On cross-examination by Jill Dahlmann Rosa, a Justice Department lawyer, Fowler agreed that the collision could have been avoided if Collins hadn't misreported his location seconds before Fowler instructed Hock to turn her plane.

The government has blamed Collins for the collision, saying he missed the mark by about 1? miles when he reported to the tower that he was "just crossing the shoreline."

"If Mr. Collins had been crossing the shoreline when he said he was, would this accident have happened?" Rosa asked.

"I don't believe it would have," Fowler replied.

But under questioning by another plaintiff's lawyer, Fowler acknowledged that if Collins had in fact been on the shoreline when he said he was, his plane "in all likelihood" would have been visible to Fowler about a minute and a half later, just be fore the collision.

"And you didn't see him?" asked Mark Fineberg, who represents the damaged hospital's insurer.

"No," Fowler said.

mo'connor@tribune.gov

AmeriDebt Founder Accused Of Hiding Funds Meant For Debtors (FINDLAW/AP)

By Stephen Manning, Ap Business Writer

AP, February 7, 2007

(AP) - GREENBELT, Maryland-The founder of a credit counseling firm accused of cheating thousands of debtors is hiding assets even though he agreed to contribute millions of dollars to help repay the debtors, a court-appointed receiver told a federal judge Tuesday.

The receiver, Robb Evans & Associates, wants Andris Pukke held in contempt of court, alleging the former head of now-defunct AmeriDebt is using friends and families to hide substantial assets - including an online betting venture, a California mansion, a development in Belize and bank accounts in Latvia.

Hiding the assets would violate the terms of a 2006 settlement with the Federal Trade Commission that set up a restitution fund of up to $35 million (â,¬27 million). So far, only about $10 million (â,¬7.7 million) of Pukke's money has been turned over to the FTC, which had sued him and AmeriDebt for allegedly charging customers $172 million (â,¬133 million) in hidden fees.

"There has been utter lack of cooperation on Mr. Pukke's part," Gary Caris, an attorney for Rob Evans & Associates, told U.S. District Judge Peter Messitte in a hearing on the contempt request.

But in testimony Tuesday, Pukke claimed the attorney was overstating his control over money, such as the Latvian bank accounts held in his father's name. Pukke also said he no longer had a major stake in the Belize operation despite Caris' efforts to prove Pukke was still a part of the project.

AmeriDebt once was one of the largest U.S. firms meant to help debt-laden customers pay off their loans. But in its lawsuit, the FTC claimed AmeriDebt collected upfront fees that customers thought were going to pay down their debt but instead went to AmeriDebt. Pukke allegedly used that money, collected from about 300,000 people, to fund a lavish lifestyle.

The FTC and Pukke settled in January 2006 before the case was to go to trial. Pukke admitted no wrongdoing but agreed to disclose his assets for the restitution fund. The judge had already frozen Pukke's holdings a year earlier to keep him from hiding money.

Caris, however, claimed Pukke kept working on the project to build multimillion dollars homes near a Belize game preserve without telling the receiver, a project Caris estimated was worth $20 million (â,¬15.5 million) as of July 2005.

Pukke said he invested $3 million (â,¬2.3 million) in the deal, but that his participation was limited after he declared personal bankruptcy in 2005.

He also disputed allegations that he controlled the Latvian accounts, even though Caris detailed several payments of $100,000 (â,¬77,190) to pay Pukke's legal fees. Pukke said he asked, not directed, his father to make the payments.

Caris questioned Pukke about $3 million Pukke's companies spent in the late 1990s to pay for advertising at an online gambling company run by a friend. It later generated millions of dollars when it was sold to a British firm. Pukke said he never had a stake in the gambling venture, saying his friend repaid him in ways that left no paper trail, including large sums of cash.

"It never crossed your mind why you were fronting millions of dollars for advertising?" asked Caris.

"That's correct," Pukke replied.

The receiver also alleges that Pukke's childhood friend, Peter Baker, helped Pukke conceal his ownership of a $6.45 million (â,¬5 million) Laguna Beach, California, house. Baker also faces a possible contempt charge.

Pukke's lawyer said Pukke merely advised Baker on the investment, but did not take part.

The FTC hopes the receiver can find more money for the restitution fund. Of the $10 million that has been disbursed so far, much of it has gone to settle claims against Pukke by the IRS and to cover attorney fees for a related class action lawsuit.

Lucy Morris, an FTC attorney, said she expects more of Pukke's assets will be uncovered and put into the fund. She said only about $4 million (â,¬3.1 million) currently remains for restitution, an amount too small to allow any substantial payments to former AmeriDebt customers.

"There is not enough in the fund at this point to make a redress program cost effective," she said.

Two Hospitals Allege RICO Violations By UnitedHealth (AP)

By Joshua Freed

AP, February 7, 2007

MINNEAPOLIS - Two New York hospitals said they sued insurer UnitedHealth Group Inc. on Tuesday alleging "a pattern of racketeering activity."

The lawsuit by Flushing Hospital Medical Center and Jamaica Hospital Medical Center was brought under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations law and filed in federal court in the Eastern District of New York, according to Idan Sims, a spokesman for the hospitals. It claims at least $50 million in punitive damages, along with millions more in actual damages. The same hospitals sued under a similar set of facts last year in state court in New York.

Both lawsuits claim UnitedHealth cost them business by repeatedly telling patients that Flushing was not in its network and that Oxford Health, which was bought by UnitedHealth, did the same thing to patients at Jamaica Hospital. The lawsuit also claims Oxford postponed signing contracts with both hospitals to avoid paying them higher negotiated fees.

The new lawsuit claims that UnitedHealth has been providing inaccurate information about who's in its network at other hospitals, too, including a 2003 case related to a health plan for New York civil service employees, and similar allegations by the Nebraska Department of Insurance.

DOJ_NMG_0128822

"This behavior persists to this day. And the consequence of that is the patients pay more for the services that they purchased in their health care coverage," said David Rosen, chief executive of Flushing and Jamaica hospitals as well as their parent company, MediSys Health Network.

He said that just last month UnitedHealth denied a patient's appeal for in-network coverage for a surgical procedure at Flushing, and billed the patient for $1,100 more than she should have had to pay.

"It's $1,100 on the case I just described, and $1,000 on the next case. These are things that are inappropriately enriching the company," he said.

Rosen said the federal case would supercede the state case, which he said was headed for arbitration.

UnitedHealth spokesman Tyler Mason pointed out that both hospitals ultimately remained in the network. He said he had not seen the new lawsuit, but said the company believes arbitration is the best way to work out the dispute.

All Parties In Jet-noise Lawsuits Sent To Mediation (VAPILOT)

By Susan E. White, The Virginian-pilot

Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot, February 7, 2007

VIRGINIA BEACH - A federal judge Tuesday ordered all parties involved in nearly 2,100 jet-noise lawsuits back to mediation.

Judge Victor J. Wolski of the U.S. Court of Federal Claims in Washington set a tentative date in September for a two-week trial for the first group of lawsuits, should negotiations fail.

Wolski also granted a motion by the Justice Department that the court not review a recently submitted report from plaintiffs' lawyers, which included details of the original settlement agreement.

Government attorneys argued that the information was improperly disclosed and could potentially sway the court if the lawsuits went to trial.

At stake is a proposed

$38 million deal that was tentatively reached in October between the federal government and 2,098 homeowners who live near Oceana Naval Air Station in Virginia Beach and Fentress Naval Auxiliary Landing Field in Chesapeake. The median payment to homeowners who agreed to the deal would have been $5,000.

The property owners sued between 2001 and 2004, claiming that the arrival of the Navy's F/A-18 Hornets in 1998 and 1999 subjected their homes to substantially louder noise and devalued their property.

Appraisers said the plaintiffs' properties did not appreciate as fast as similar properties outside jet-noise zones. Homeowners said this resulted in the government taking their property without compensation.

On Monday, plaintiffs' lawyers said they had gathered the necessary signatures of support for the initial settlement.

Then, they said, they recently learned that government attorneys were demanding a change in the deal to give plaintiffs who sold their homes after July 1999 less money than other property owners.

Plaintiffs' lawyers said the government is trying to renege on the initial agreement.

Plaintiffs' attorneys did not return phone calls Tuesday.

Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman with the Justice Department, said the government was pleased with the court's order.

In a statement, Magnuson said "by granting the government's request to appoint a mediator, the United States remains hopeful that the parties can reach agreement on the terms still in dispute and resolve this case without further litigation."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Review Lays Out Lags In State Hospital Improvements (AP)

By Lisa Rathke, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 7, 2007

MONTPELIER, Vt. -- The state hospital is behind in improving patient treatment, assessment, discharge and planning but has made progress in other areas, as part of a settlement with the U.S. Department of Justice, according to a six-month review.

DOJ_NMG_0128823

The report by two out-of-state psychiatrists outlines numerous areas where the psychiatric hospital was not in compliance with the terms of the four-year settlement.

"This is the first time that we're going through this and we'll be going through this again and every time we should in be greater compliance," said Michael Hartman, the new deputy commissioner for mental health. "Obviously if there weren't problems then we wouldn't be in this place in the first place."

The 70-page report released Tuesday noted progress in the hospital's reduced use of restraint and seclusion of patients, improvements to the building, creation of a full-time psychiatric team, hiring a staff neurologist, working with the University of Vermont medical school and certain areas of training, Hartman said.

But the report said the hospital needs a more organized system to better integrate documentation, treatment, assessment, use of medicine and therapy.

"We can hit timelines but a lot of time the content of that paperwork is not up to the criteria that they would like us to meet," said Hartman.

The documentation may not go deep enough, be updated or connect the different levels of treatment.

"In some areas we have significant gaps," he said.

The Justice Department investigated the hospital in September 2004 after the facility lost its federal certification and millions of dollars in funding following two patient suicides.

The DOJ found the hospital used excessive seclusion and restraints and provided inadequate psychiatric and psychological services.

Rep. Anne Donahue, R-Northfield, who has long pushed for a changes at the state hospital, said the report recognizes the need for a shift in culture at the hospital and points out that medication is not being monitored for adverse affects and effectiveness.

"It's a sickening recognition that what I've been saying for the past year is taking place," she said. "I'd much rather be dead wrong."

The state has different deadlines to meet each of the settlement goals.

Human Services Secretary Cynthia LaWare said the systemic nature of some of the improvements will take a significant amount of time to complete. Certain improvements would be hastened by replacing the hospital.

"It's critically important that we move forward with the next phase of more in depth planning for a replacement hospital," she said.

New Task Force Formed To Fight Human Trafficking (KLAS)

KLAS-TV, February 7, 2007

"She told me dogs have more rights than you," said Esperanza.

"She sold me to him for $200," said Maria.

Terry Miller is the Southern Nevada director for the newly launched Anti-Trafficking League Against Slavery -- ATLAS for short.

Local agencies announced Tuesday morning a massive task force has been formed, aimed at combating the problem of human trafficking.

Dozens of agencies, including Metro, Henderson police, Nevada child seekers, Salvation Army, the AGS office, TSA, and the FBI are working together to identify people who are bring forced to work in the sex industry or as laborers.

The federal government says Southern Nevada is one of 17 comunities at high risk for human trafficking.

U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden said, "Trafficked victims are often difficult to identify and therefore we must work together in our communities and neighborhoods to identify and assist those among us who may be victims of these horrible crimes."

The Department of Justice granted Southern Nevada $370,000 to launch a task force to fight the problem.

Human trafficking is what many call a modern day form of slavery. It hits so close to home it could be a brothel next door or the landscapers who maintain your yard. They are children, women, and men -- coerced or kidnapped.

"She sold me to him for $200," said Maria.

DOJ_NMG_0128824

Some were taken to other communities or other countries while some, like Esperanza, are forced to work in sweat shops.

"She told me dogs have more rights than you," said Esperanza.

Others, like Maria, are exploited in the sex industry.

"He told me that he had bought me. That I was his slave. He paid $200 for me, and I was there to do whatever he want," said Maria.

Like many other trafficking victims, the psychological chains can be more powerful than any walls or locks.

"He threatened me. He hit me and tells me that he's going to go and kill my family, which was killing me little by little," said Maria.

Maria is a survivor of human trafficking. She is also an advocate for the Coalition to Abolish Slavery and Trafficking or CAST for short. Based in California, CAST uses a video to alert people to the problem of human trafficking. Kay Buck is the executive director.

"Trafficking is such an underground crime that often times traffickers go undetected by law enforcement and what we have learned as a nation is that we need to employ very innovative strategic ways to find more victims," said Buck.

Before now, local law enforcement did not have a division targeting human traffickers. CAST is one agency that uses educational tools like a video, to help train officers in identifying traffickers and their victims.

Terry Miller is the Southern Nevada director for the newly launched Anti-Trafficking League Against Slavery -- ATLAS for short.

"Victims need to be rescued," said Miller.

Her job is to work with dozens of local agencies to prosecute traffickers and help the victims become survivors.

"They're a very unique victim. They often times need legal representation from the immigration clinics. They need medical attention, they need dental attention they need social services, and therapeutic services, housing, food clothing," said Miller.

Around the world, more than 800,000 people are victims of human trafficking. As many as 18,000 are in the United States. Some are right in our backyard.

Buck said, "You have to remember that in most cases, survivors of trafficking have nothing more than the clothes on their back. So it's important that we have safe, safe shelter to help them heal from the trauma and also help them become better witnesses for the case."

Now that CAST has helped train Southern Nevada's first responders, the Anti-Trafficking League Against Slavery will work to educate the public. Then everyone can work to help people like Maria and Esperanza.

Victim advocates say it is important to understand children involved in prostitution are considered human trafficking victims, not simply child prostitutes.

They say anyone under the age of 18 being pimped or exploited in the sex industry is a trafficking victim, even if they are working in their own neighborhood.

Fellow Inmates Beat An Imprisoned Border Patrol Agent (MCT)

By Dave Montgomery

McClatchy Newspapers, February 7, 2007

One of two Border Patrol agents who were sentenced to a decade in federal prison for the shooting of a Mexican drug smuggler in Texas was beaten by five fellow inmates at a medium-security prison at Yazoo City, Miss., lawmakers and members of his family said Tuesday.

Fellow inmates surrounded Ignacio Ramos on Saturday night and struck him with their fists and prison work boots, said his father-in-law, Joe Loya of El Paso, Texas. Family members learned of the attack Monday when they reached Ramos by phone to celebrate his 38th birthday, Loya said.

Rep. Walter Jones, R-N.C., one of a group of lawmakers who are seeking presidential pardons for Ramos and fellow agent Jose Compean, said prison officials had confirmed the assault and were investigating, according to Jones' office.

Public affairs officers at the U.S. Bureau of Prisons didn't comment on the case immediately. Prison officials told Jones' office that a doctor had examined Ramos, who had bruises and abrasions.

DOJ_NMG_0128825

Reports of the incident circulated on the Internet and accelerated grass-roots efforts that already were under way on behalf of the two agents. Ramos and Compean's supporters contend that overzealous prosecutors victimized them, but federal authorities say the two abused their authority and were properly sentenced.

An El Paso jury found them guilty in a Feb. 17, 2005, shooting incident involving Osvaldo Aldrete-Davila, who was trying to flee back into Mexico after abandoning a van near Fabens, Texas, that contained 743 pounds of marijuana. The agents fired a total of 15 shots at Aldrete-Davila, who was struck once in the buttocks and escaped into Mexico.

An investigation found that the agents had attempted to dispose of empty shell casings and had filed a false report. They told authorities that they'd thought Aldrete-Davila was armed.

Loya, in a telephone interview, said Ramos had told his family that a group of inmates surrounded his bedside in the dormitory-like facility where they were being held and kicked him in the head, face and mouth. The attack occurred after inmates watched an episode of "America's Most Wanted" that featured the shooting case, Loya said.

Ramos identified only one of his assailants but thought that the group included illegal immigrants who were serving criminal sentences for drug trafficking and other offenses, Loya said.

"They were able to identify him," Loya said. "A bunch of them just ganged up on him while he was sleeping."

After the attack, Loya said, a fellow inmate took Ramos to security guards. He was placed in isolation, away from the other prisoners, Loya said.

Former Border Agent Assaulted In Prison (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 7, 2007

A former U.S. Border Patrol agent sentenced with his partner to prison for shooting a drug smuggling suspect suffered "minor" injuries when he was assaulted Saturday night by fellow inmates at a federal prison in Mississippi, the White House said yesterday.

White House spokesman Tony Snow, reading a statement from a Bureau of Prisons official at the Federal Correctional Complex in Yazoo City, Miss., said a "thorough investigation" has been ordered into the incident.

Agents Ignacio Ramos, 37, and Jose Alonso Compean, 28, surrendered to federal authorities Jan. 17 to begin 11- and 12-year prison sentences, respectively, for shooting the suspect in the buttocks after he abandoned a van with 743 pounds of marijuana along the Mexico border in Texas.

Ramos was sent to Mississippi and Compean to the Federal Correctional Institution in Elkton, Ohio.

In the one-paragraph statement, bureau spokesman Charles Smith said that Ramos reported to prison officials at 10:15 p.m. Saturday, that he had been assaulted and that an evaluation by the facility's medical staff determined that he sustained "some bruises and abrasions."

"The injuries sustained were minor in nature," Mr. Smith said. "Inmate Ramos was subsequently placed in the special housing unit, pending a thorough investigation of the incident. He will remain in the special housing unit until the conclusion of this investigation. No further information is available at this time."

Spokeswoman Traci Billingsley said in Washington that the bureau has "a long history of safely housing sentenced law-enforcement officers in general population," adding that the assault occurred immediately after the airing of a television show that described Ramos' case.

"It is regrettable that Mr. Ramos was assaulted, and the Bureau of Prisons will take appropriate actions to determine an appropriate housing status and ensure his ongoing safety," she said. "The Bureau of Prisons is vigorously investigating the matter and will pursue all appropriate sanctions against the assailants."

Rep. Duncan Hunter, a California Republican who has been critical of the government's prosecution of the agents, said the incident "clearly demonstrates the severe risk involved with incorporating Border Patrol agents into general prison populations.

"An overwhelming number of federal inmates are non-U.S. citizens who have been apprehended by the Border Patrol," Mr. Hunter said. "The danger to agents Compean and Ramos was immediately apparent, and the attack against agent Ramos could have been prevented."

DOJ_NMG_0128826

Last month, Mr. Hunter recommended that the agents be segregated. He said he had been assured that they would be removed from the general population and that close attention was being paid to their personal safety.

Mr. Hunter called on President Bush yesterday to investigate the attack and order Bureau of Prisons Director Harley Lappin's termination "should it be ascertained that the proper precautions were not taken."

Compean's wife, Patty, said her husband was offered a choice of general population or isolation, and chose isolation for his safety.

"Last week we were offered a chance for him to be placed in the general population, which we rejected immediately as a family, because of the high risk and fear for his safety," she said. "This attack only reinforces why they must be kept isolated from a prison's general population."

Former Border Patrol Agent Convicted Of Shooting Drug Smuggler Beaten By Fellow Prison Inmates, Authorities Say (FINDLAW/AP)

By Alicia A. Caldwell, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 7, 2007

(AP) - EL PASO, Texas-A former U.S. Border Patrol agent who was convicted of shooting a drug smuggling suspect and then lying about it has been beaten by fellow inmates in prison.

Prison officials on Tuesday confirmed assertions by a congressman and relatives of Ignacio Ramos. He was attacked Saturday night after his case was described on the TV show "America's Most Wanted," the officials said.

Ramos suffered minor cuts and bruises, U.S. Bureau of Prisons spokeswoman Traci Billingsley said in a statement.

Ramos has been moved to the special housing unit at the medium-and low-security federal prison in Yazoo City, Mississippi, where he is serving his sentence, Billingsley said.

The convictions of Ramos and fellow former agent Jose Alonso Compean sparked outcry from critics who argued that the men were merely doing their job defending the border against criminals.

Republican U.S. Rep. Tom Tancredo of Colorado, a vocal supporter of the agents and opponent of illegal immigration, criticized the Bush administration Tuesday for failing to protect Ramos and demanded a full presidential pardon for the two men.

"Not only did the administration choose the side of a foreign dope runner over the agents who stopped him from smuggling a load of drugs into the county - now they've failed to protect that agent while his case is on appeal," he said in a statement.

The incident is being investigated, and the four inmates believed to have been involved have been separated from other inmates, Billingsley said.

Ramos and Compean, who reported to prison in January, were each sentenced to more than a decade behind bars. Compean is serving his sentence at the Elkton Federal Correctional Institution in Ohio; no problems have been reported with his detention.

The agents were convicted last year of shooting Osvaldo Aldrete Davila in 2005 near El Paso and then trying to cover up the incident. Davila was shot once in the buttocks.

Ramos' wife, Monica Ramos, told The Associated Press on Tuesday that her husband described being attacked late Saturday, when he "let his guard down." She said the attackers kicked and stomped him for several minutes.

He was able to identify one man in the group, Monica Ramos said.

Ex-Border Patrol Agent In Prison For Shooting Mexican Drug Runner Assaulted By Inmates (FOX)

By Liza Porteus

Fox News, February 7, 2007

One of two former Border Patrol agents sentenced to more than a decade in prison for shooting and wounding a suspected Mexican drug smuggler was beaten by a group of inmates last weekend, a Texas congressman confirmed Tuesday to FOXNews.com.

DOJ_NMG_0128827

Ignacio Ramos, who was transferred to the Yazoo City Federal Correctional Complex in Mississippi last month to begin serving his 12-year sentence for the February 2005 shooting of Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, was placed in a special housing unit after the incident pending an investigation, according to T.J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council.

"We received verbal confirmation from the prison folks that he was assaulted and went to the infirmary and was treated for injuries," Rep. Ted Poe, R-Texas, told FOXNews.com, adding that he has requested a written report of the incident.

Another agent, Jose Compean, is serving 11 years in another facility for the same border shooting.

Prison authorities, in a statement issued Monday, said that Ramos reported to the staff on Saturday around 10:15 p.m. ET that he was assaulted and that he sustained some 'minor' bruises and abrasions, Bonner said.

Some members of Ramos' family claim the assault happened after the airing of an "America's Most Wanted" segment featuring both Ramos and Compean. They say the attack happened after Ramos fell asleep.

"Nacho was assaulted Saturday night by about five illegal immigrants who were yelling at him in Spanish, 'Maten a la migra' — which means 'kill the Border Patrol agent,'" one family member said, according to Grassfire.org, a group that has petitioned President Bush to pardon the two agents and has been working with the agents' families.

Grassfire.org and Ramos' family dispute the prison report saying he suffered minor injuries. Grassfire.org in a press release says Ramos suffered "multiple and severe injuries." The release also said that a family member claims Ramos' attackers beat him with repeated blows and kicks and that he suffered wounds to his back, shoulder, arms and head. There also is concern from Ramos' family that he was not given medical treatment immediately after the incident and may not have received medical attention for up to 48 hours, the group said.

"Our government has betrayed these agents," said Grassfire president Steve Elliott. "And now they have put these men in mortal danger. I am frightened for the lives of these two family men. This is beyond outrage, and I am calling on grassroots Americans to express their outrage directly to the White House — demanding the president pardon agents Ramos and Compean before it's too late."

Bonner said Ramos believes that he was assaulted by four or five people and that his injuries are more than 'minor."

"I believe him more than I believe the Department of Justice and its attempt to minimize this," Bonner said. "After all, this is the same Department of Justice that's tried to cover up the facts surrounding the" case, he added.

The two agents' supporters — which include a slew of lawmakers on Capital Hill — claim the Justice Department and prosecutor Johnny Sutton did not appropriately handle the case.

Ramos and Compean were found guilty by a jury of not only shooting Aldrete-Davila, but also of trying to cover up the incident. Supporters say it was wrong for Sutton to go after the border agents and not the drug dealer who was given immunity for testifying against them, and that the Justice Department has been less than forthcoming about certain facts surrounding the case.

The transcripts of the trial have not yet been released by the court.

In response to the reports of the prison assault, Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., wrote to President Bush requesting an investigation into the incident. The letter also requested that Bureau of Prisons Director Harley Lappin be discharged from his position if it's discovered that the proper precautions were not taken to protect Ramos.

"Placing these two agents in general population, especially when assuring Congress it would not happen, constitutes an enormous dereliction of duty by the Administration and the Bureau of Prisons," said the Feb. 6 letter to Bush. "The families of agents Compean and Ramos deserve an immediate response. Further, please ensure that segregation from general population occurs immediately."

On Jan. 17, Hunter requested that both agents be put in isolation for their own safety. He and others were concerned that if jailed with many of the illegal immigrants and drug runners they helped put away, the safety and well-being of Ramos and Compean would be threatened.

"The assault against agent Ramos clearly demonstrates the severe risk involved with incorporating Border Patrol agents into general prison populations," Hunter said in a statement Tuesday. "An overwhelming number of federal inmates are non U.S. citizens who have been apprehended by the Border Patrol. The danger to agents Compean and Ramos was immediately apparent and the attack against agent Ramos could have been prevented."

DOJ_NMG_0128828

Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., said he spoke to several of Ramos' family members Monday night. The Ramos family wasn't aware of the situation until late Monday, when they called him to wish him well on his 38th birthday. Ramos told his family that he was attacked by five men who beat him severely for being a former law enforcement agent.

Tancredo said one of the assailants has been identified by Ramos and is now being charged with assault.

"The administration has for too long turned their back on law enforcement and left them to fend for themselves," Tancredo said. "These men have been the victims of what the Bush administration's border enforcement policy has always been. Mr. President, pardon these men now."

Bonner said Ramos likely asked to be put in general population because when in isolation, inmates are only allowed one phone call a month. Isolated prisoners also normally are in lockdown for 23 hours a day and only allowed out for one hour.

"Why they couldn't bend that rule given the fact they have law enforcement agent in custody … you kind of go stir crazy" in isolation, Bonner said.

"I don't blame him [Ramos], I blame the folks in charge for not being reasonable about that. One phone call a month sounds like punishment to me for someone who's been acting up. But here's a guy you're putting in isolation because you need to protect him."

Poe agreed, saying that it's Ramos' choice whether he wants to be put in isolation or general population, but wherever he is, it's the job of the federal government and the prison to ensure his safety.

"It's just another example that the federal government doesn't protect Border Patrol agents on the border and doesn't protect them in prison," Poe said.

"The prison authorities, especially the federal prison system, are experts at protecting inmates from harm from other inmates ... they've been doing this for years. Why aren't they protecting Ramos?"

Poe, who said he speaks to the wives of Compean and Ramos regularly, said Compean is in isolation. According to the Federal Bureau of Prisons, Compean is serving his sentence at the Federal Correctional Institution in Elkton, Ohio, a low-security facility housing male offenders.

Appeals Court Sends Wal-Mart Women Bias Case To Trial (FINDLAW/AP)

By David Kravets, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 7, 2007

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-A federal appeals court ruled Tuesday that Wal-Mart Stores Inc., the world's largest private employer, must face a class-action lawsuit alleging as many as 1.5 million female employees were discriminated against in pay and promotions.

The ruling by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upholds a 2004 federal judge's decision to let the United States' largest class-action employment discrimination lawsuit go to trial, possibly exposing the Bentonville, Arkansas-based retailing powerhouse to billions of dollars (euros) in damages.

"Plaintiff's expert opinions, factual evidence, statistical evidence and anecdotal evidence present significant proof of a corporate policy of discrimination and support plaintiff's contention that female employees nationwide were subjected to a common pattern and practice of discrimination," the court wrote in a 2-1 decision.

Wal-Mart said it would ask the court to rehear the case with the same three-judge panel or with 15 judges, a move likely to idle the case for months. Tuesday's ruling came 18 months after the case was argued.

"This is one step of what is going to be a long process," Wal-Mart attorney Theodore Boutrous Jr. said. "We are very optimistic of obtaining relief from this ruling."

He said Wal-Mart's own review found no significant disparity in pay between men and women at 90 percent of its stores.

Wal-Mart, which currently employs 1.3 million workers, claimed that the conventional rules of class action suits should not apply in the case because its 3,400 stores, including Sam's Club warehouse outlets, operate like independent businesses, and that the company did not have a policy of discriminating against women.

U.S. District Judge Martin Jenkins, the San Francisco trial court judge who said the case could proceed, had ruled that anecdotal evidence warranted a class-action trial. Wal-Mart took the case to the San Francisco-based appeals court.

DOJ_NMG_0128829

Jenkins said if companywide gender discrimination is proven at trial, Wal-Mart could be forced to pay billions of dollars (euros) to women who earned less than their male counterparts. Jenkins rejected as "impractical" Wal-Mart's suggestion of having individual hearings for each plaintiff and he planned to use a statistical formula to compensate the women if they won.

Wal-Mart said the judge's scenario was an unprecedented denial of its rights and sought to dismiss the case. The company said women who allege discrimination could file lawsuits against individual stores.

The women's lawyers said the idea was ridiculous, and would clog the federal judiciary.

"Although size of this class action is large, mere size does not render a case unmanageable," Judge Harry Pregerson wrote for the majority, which upheld Jenkins' decision in its entirety.

But Judge Andrew Kleinfeld wrote in a dissent that women should perhaps file individual lawsuits to safeguard Wal-Mart from paying those who do not deserve money, and would also ensure women get the compensation they deserve.

The appellate court's decision, he wrote, "threatens the rights of women injured by sex discrimination. And it threatens Wal-Mart's rights."

Brad Seligman, one of the attorneys who represented the women suing Wal-Mart, said the decision would hurt the company's reputation.

"No amount of PR by Wal-Mart is going to allow it to deal with its legacy of discrimination," Seligman said.

David Nassar, executive director of Wal-Mart Watch, a group critical of Wal-Mart policies, said the decision vindicates "victims of the company's illegal and immoral gender discrimination."

David Nassar, executive director of Wal-Mart Watch, a group critical of Wal-Mart policies, said the decision vindicates the "victims of the company's illegal and immoral gender discrimination."

Wal-Mart shares rose 6 cents to close at $48.58 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Wal-Mart Loses Bid To Block Group Bias Suit (WP)

By Amy Joyce

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

A federal appeals court ruled yesterday that the largest sex discrimination lawsuit in U.S. history could proceed as a class action against Wal-Mart, which is accused of paying female workers less than men and giving them fewer promotions.

The ruling will allow about 2 million women who have worked for Wal-Mart since 1998 to seek compensation for discrimination as a group.

Wal-Mart said it will ask the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit in San Francisco to reconsider its decision. Barring that, the company will ask the U.S. Supreme Court to overturn the certification. A lower court originally said the case could proceed as a class action in June 2004, and the company first appealed the decision in August 2005.

"We think its analysis is much too deferential to plaintiffs and erred in not taking into account Wal-Mart's evidence," said Theodore J. Boutrous Jr., an attorney for Wal-Mart. He said the court's ruling does not address the merits of the plaintiffs' claims, but whether the case meets the technical requirements to move forward as a class action.

The 2-to-1 ruling took no position on the case's merits, but agreed with the lower court ruling that the case Dukes v. Wal-Mart, originally filed by six women in 2001, could proceed as a class action against the retailer.

With nearly 2 million women, the lawsuit is the nation's largest sex discrimination case filed against a business. Most large discrimination cases are settled out of court. The suit claims that Wal-Mart's female employees receive lower pay and fewer promotions than male employees. But Wal-Mart's lawyers argued that there is no pattern of discrimination.

The women who filed suit are represented by the Impact Fund, a nonprofit group in Berkeley, Calif.

"No amount of PR or spin is going to allow Wal-Mart to avoid facing its legacy of discrimination," Brad Seligman, a lawyer and executive director of the Impact Fund, said in an interview. "Now two courts have ruled this trial should go forward. I expect they will attempt to further appeal, but I have great confidence the women will get their day."

A class-action lawsuit allows a small number of plaintiffs to sue on behalf of a much larger group in a similar situation.

The judge in the original case ruled that the attorneys for the six named women presented sufficient evidence for a class-action suit, calling it "largely uncontested descriptive statistics which show that women working in Wal-Mart stores are paid less than men in every region, that pay disparities exist in most job categories, that the salary gap widens over time even for men and women hired into the same jobs at the same time, that women take longer to enter into management positions, and that the higher one looks in the organization, the lower the percentage of women."

The company has two opportunities to overturn the decision. It will first ask the three-judge panel to reconsider yesterday's ruling and a panel of more than a dozen Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals judges to rehear the panel decision. If the court does not overturn its decision, the company will petition the U.S. Supreme Court.

"And then we have a trial, which is where we think we're headed," said Joseph M. Sellers, a Washington-based civil rights and employment lawyer, who represents the plaintiffs. "What Wal-Mart has tried to do so far is derail the case procedurally. The evidence, we think, is very strong. We have a number of clients who would like to have their day in court."

The company said its stores are mostly run by managers who have autonomy over hiring, pay and promotion. Boutrous argued that decisions by thousands of managers at 3,400 stores during a six-year period were "highly individualized and cannot be tried in one fell swoop in a nationwide class action."

Richard Drogin, a statistician at California State University at East Bay hired by the plaintiffs, said that it took women an average of 4.38 years from the date of hire to be promoted to assistant manager, while it took men 2.86 years. It took 10.12 years, on average, for women to become managers compared with 8.64 years for men. He also found that female managers made an average salary of $89,280 a year, while men in the same position earned an average of $105,682 a year. The results for hourly workers show that women were paid 6.7 percent less than men in comparable positions.

Several business groups, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, have filed amicus briefs calling for a reversal of the class certification.

In 1996, Texaco paid a $176.1 million settlement on behalf of black employees who sued for racial discrimination. Home Depot settled a sex discrimination class-action suit in 1997 for $104 million. That same year, Publix Super Markets paid $81.5 million for discriminating against female workers. Coca-Cola paid $192.5 million in 2000 to employees who sued for racial discrimination. Morgan Stanley agreed to pay $54 million in 2004 to settle claims it underpaid and did not promote women, and a few days later, aircraft manufacturer Boeing agreed to pay up to $72.5 million to settle similar allegations.

Wal-Mart Faces Sex Bias Lawsuit (FT)

By Patti Waldmeir In Washington

Financial Times, February 7, 2007

Wal-Mart on Tuesday lost a bid to block the biggest employment lawsuit in US history after a federal appeals court ruled that at least 1.6m current and former female employees could sue the company as a group.

The ruling, by a narrowly divided panel of the ninth circuit federal appeals court in California, upheld a lower court ruling granting class-action status to a lawsuit accusing Wal-Mart of paying women less than men and promoting them less often. The plaintiffs include almost all women who worked at Wal-Mart stores from December 1998 to the present.

“Expert opinions, factual evidence, statistical evidence and anecdotal evidence present significant proof of a corporate policy of discrimination,” the panel said in its 2-1 ruling.

The US Chamber of Commerce condemned the ruling. “The suit includes a hodgepodge of claims, it’s huge, it’s unmanageable, and it’s difficult if not impossible to defend,” said Robin Conrad of the National Chamber Litigation Center, the chamber’s legal arm. “Class actions like this are almost extortionate.”

Though the women still have to prove their claims in a trial, the decision to allow the lawsuit to proceed as a class action could substantially increase pressure on Wal-Mart to settle, legal experts said. But Wal-Mart said on Tuesday it would appeal the ruling to the full appeals court and if necessary to the US Supreme Court. “This is just one step in a long process,” said Theodore Boutrous, of the law firm Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, who will handle Wal-Mart’s appeal.

Judge Andrew Kleinfeld, who dissented from the ruling, said it violated Wal-Mart’s constitutional right to due process. “Plaintiffs’ only evidence of sex discrimination is that around two thirds of Wal-Mart employees are female, but only about one third of its managers are female,” he wrote, adding “not everybody wants to be a Wal-Mart manager.”

DOJ_NMG_0128831

The Wal-Mart suit is seen as a test case of the rules for “certifying” a class action lawsuit – the quintessentially American kind of legal action designed to empower individuals by allowing them to sue in groups.

The Wal-Mart plaintiffs argue that they should be able to sue as a group, claiming that even though individual store managers had broad discretion over pay and promotion decisions for the women concerned, the pervasive corporate culture of Wal-Mart has promoted sexism throughout the company.

Final Teen Gets Probation In Long Beach Hate Crime (LAT)

By Tami Abdollah, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

A black teenager was sentenced to probation in the Long Beach hate attack today, the last of a group to be punished in the Halloween night incident.

Judge Gibson Lee put Allyson Stone, who is now 18, on probation, ordered 250 hours of community service and racial tolerance training.

The sentence was similar to that given the eight other teenagers convicted in the attack. Most of the youths also received a sentence of house arrest.

One of the 10 defendants was acquitted in the case.

Darrell Goss, the lawyer for Stone, said he has already filed an appeal, the first in what is expected to be continuing legal action from the attack on a street in the Bixby Knolls neighborhood of Long Beach.

Laura Schneider, 19, Loren Hyman, 21, and Michelle Smith, 19 were injured in the attack.

tami.abdollah@latimes.com

Dallas Has 3 Months To Fix Jail (DMN)

By Kevin Krause, The Dallas Morning News Kkrause@dallasnews.com

The Dallas Morning News, February 7, 2007

Understaffing may force county to pay millions to send inmates elsewhere

Dallas County officials soon may have to shut the doors to their crowded and understaffed jail and pay millions of dollars to send inmates to other counties if they can't get the inmate population under control.

The county has three months to meet the state's minimum staffing requirement of one guard per 48 inmates – something it has consistently been unable to do – or the state probably will order the crowded jail not to admit any more prisoners.

If that happens, the county would have to pay to transport and house its prisoners in other jails across the state, at an annual cost of up to $18 million.

Such a scenario would result in "mayhem," Chief Public Defender Brad Lollar said. Defense attorneys may not have time to visit clients in distant jails, and inmates would have to be bused back and forth to court hearings.

The Texas Commission on Jail Standards summoned county and sheriff's officials to its meeting last Friday for a status update on the troubled jail. The commission staff had been prepared to recommend the remedial order that day to close the jail but reconsidered after hearing about improvements in the works, said Allen Clemson, the Commissioners Court administrator.

County officials are now in emergency mode, having given themselves a 30-day deadline to reduce the jail's population of more than 7,000 by 1,000 inmates, which they said will bring them in compliance.

The state jail commission "told us we were subject to an inspection at any time and that midnight unannounced visits are not out of the question," said Commissioner John Wiley Price, who attended the jail commission meeting. "We take them very seriously."

The Dallas County Jail system – the seventh largest in the nation – has failed state inspections three years in a row, primarily because of inadequate staffing. Dallas has the highest incarceration rate among Texas' five largest counties.

The Sheriff's Department spent more than $9 million in overtime in the jails last fiscal year. But a surprise state inspection in October revealed the jail still wasn't meeting the minimum staffing requirement.

"We are both in agreement that you cannot go on like this forever," said Adan Munoz, executive director of the Commission on Jail Standards. "Remedial orders have to be put in place."

DOJ_NMG_0128832

Mr. Munoz said a U.S. Justice Department report on the jail was the main reason he asked Dallas County officials to appear last week before the commission in Austin. The federal investigation concluded in December that the county is violating inmates' civil rights with dangerous and unsanitary jail conditions.

The district attorney's office, defense attorneys and criminal court judges have agreed to work together to dispose of cases quicker.

Judges will release nonviolent low-level offenders with lower bonds, personal recognizance bonds or a notice to appear in court at a later date. A similar move was taken to free up space in the Decker jail for Katrina evacuees in 2005.

For example, 125 people are in jail charged with prostitution who could be released, Mr. Clemson said.

County criminal courts manager Mikah Mitchell said that in the misdemeanor courts, inmates will be released if they meet certain conditions such as no immigration holds and no history of bond forfeitures.

Judge John Creuzot, who presides over the county's felony courts, could not be reached for comment Tuesday. But Lena Levario, one of the new Democratic judges who was elected in November, said she will begin calling defense attorneys to ask them to show up in court and dispose of their clients' cases.

"I will ask them to come in and take care of it," said Judge Levario, of the 204th Criminal District Court. "We will not be releasing anyone who we think will be a threat to the community."

Reducing crowding

District Attorney Craig Watkins said his office began pulling the oldest state jail felony cases this week and will make more reasonable plea bargain offers so the defendants can be moved out of the county jail to begin serving their sentences in state jails.

Mr. Lollar, the public defender chief, said his office is already seeing better plea bargain offers.

Mr. Price, who heads the county's jail population committee, said some inmates can be given community service while others can wear electronic monitors while awaiting trial.

If such measures to reduce the jail population fail, Sheriff Lupe Valdez will move some of her deputies from patrol, warrants and other divisions into the jail as a last resort, Mr. Price said.

The jail-crowding problem is a result not only of the county's crime rate but also of its own policies.

The Dallas County Jail has the highest percentage of inmates awaiting trial on low-level, nonviolent charges in Texas – almost double that of Harris County, according to recent numbers sent to the state.

Most inmates are there because they cannot afford bail. Others, arrested on drug charges, are in jail awaiting drug test results before their cases can even go before a grand jury. That was a policy former District Attorney Bill Hill enacted in 2002 to prevent a repeat of the fake-drug scandal in which dozens of innocent people were arrested.

Under the policy, drugs must be sent to a lab for analysis before drug offenders' cases can move. The turnaround time was lengthy at first because of staff shortages at the county's crime lab, but it has since improved to about 20 days.

In Tarrant County, defendants are not admitted to the county jail until the drugs are tested.

Mr. Watkins said during a recent jail population committee meeting that he plans to re-evaluate that policy and possibly ask arresting agencies to hold offenders until drug testing is complete.

A decision several years ago to dismantle the pretrial release program has come back to haunt Dallas County. The program identifies low-risk inmates charged with minor crimes who are allowed to pay reduced bail to get out of jail.

The county is working to reinstate the program, which is expected to be up and running by next month.

In Dallas County, it takes longer to see a judge after an arrest. Police have up to 72 hours to file a case with the district attorney, not including weekends, Mr. Lollar said. As a result, inmates can sit in jail from five to 12 days before going before a judge, he said.

"We can't do anything with those cases," he said.

In Harris County, prosecutors work shifts around the clock and can immediately accept or reject a case from an arresting officer, Mr. Lollar said.

Stretched thin

As Dallas County's inmate population swells, the jail staff is being stretched thin.

More guards are leaving the jail to transport inmates to Parkland Memorial Hospital because of the increased trips ordered by the hospital, which is now in charge of jail health. Guards also are needed to watch the inmates at the hospital.

County commissioners recently approved 100 more jail guard positions to help transport inmates to the hospital, as well as 85 new positions for the Decker jail, but it could take months to fill them.

Mr. Price said the Sheriff's Department is having difficulty finding enough recruits who can pass the physical and psychological tests, as well as the background checks.

Mattye Mauldin-Taylor, the county's human resources director, said she needs 1,500 applications to fill 200 guard positions. Recruiting is not easy because of the nature of the job, she said.

The starting salary for a jail guard is $31,158, with a guaranteed 5 percent raise after one year, she said.

Mr. Clemson said that reducing the jail population by 1,000 inmates will not be easy but that he doesn't think it will strain the system.

State officials "expect us to take immediate action to get into compliance," he said.

More Than Words (WP)

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

The Democratic leadership needs to act on D.C. voting rights.

NATIONAL Democratic party leaders are on record with their unequivocal endorsement of the District's bid for full voting rights in the House of Representatives. Support is always welcome, but what's needed is action. It's time for the Democrats who control Congress to act on legislation to end the disenfranchisement of citizens living in the nation's capital.

The Democratic National Committee voted last weekend to support the measure, promising a grass-roots lobbying campaign. It's a welcome boost for a bill that has languished too long. Sponsored by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) and the District's nonvoting delegate, Eleanor Holmes Norton (D), the measure would add two seats to the House -- one for the heavily Democratic District and the other for largely Republican Utah. The bill enjoyed widespread bipartisan support in the past Congress but was never scheduled for a floor vote, to what should be the everlasting embarrassment of the Republican leadership.

Democrats are in a position to push the bill for approval, but internal party squabbling has slowed its movement. Some Democrats balked at doing anything for Utah until they were convinced that the District seat wouldn't have a chance unless balanced against Utah, which probably would get an extra seat anyway after the next census reapportionment. In recent days, Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) has raised the concern that the bill would give Utah an extra electoral college vote in the 2008 presidential election and could hurt Democrats in a close race. The question is whether Democrats will allow that highly remote and partisan concern to stand in the way of their claimed support for fair representation for District residents.

Party insiders are confident that the disagreements will be ironed out, and they stress that, unlike the Republican leadership, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) are genuinely committed to voting rights for the District. We have no reason to doubt that. But the strength of the bill crafted by Mr. Davis and Ms. Norton is that it takes into account the self-interest of both parties while weighing the needs of the people of the District and Utah. Tinkering with that formula could doom the bill, and no matter how good the intentions of lawmakers, the District deserves results.

ANTITRUST:

Deal Raises Concerns About Antitrust Issues (SLPD)

By Rachel Melcer, ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, February 7, 2007

A pair of biotech agribusinesses wants to go head to head with Monsanto Co. in creating a better cotton seed, but they may never get there.

At issue is Monsanto's proposed $1.5 billion purchase of Delta & Pine Land Co. Swiss firm Syngenta AG and Pioneer Hi-Bred International Inc., a DuPont company, had planned to partner with Delta, combining their genetic traits with D&PL's seed.

DOJ_NMG_0128834

The Monsanto deal is pending an antitrust review by the Justice Department. If it goes through, Syngenta and Pioneer will have to turn to rival Monsanto as their cotton seed partner.

All of the companies involved say the plans for partnerships are proceeding until the deal closes. They don't know what the future will hold, though Monsanto promises to work with its competitors.

But many cotton farmers say they were hoping increased competition would bring down prices and result in greater service and product choices. Now, they worry that won't materialize.

"This is a real issue. If Monsanto can't work out an agreement to develop the DuPont and Syngenta technology in Delta & Pine Land (seeds) … that's a problem," said Steve Verett, executive vice president of Plains Cotton Growers Inc., which represents farmers in 41 counties around Lubbock, Texas.

Monsanto, the world leader in developing biotech crop traits, said bringing competing technology to market is a common agribusiness practice that it is open to continuing with Syngenta and Pioneer. Monsanto's traits, for example, were planted on nearly 86 percent of U.S. cotton acres last year, yet Monsanto's Stone-ville brand of seed grew on just 12 percent of those acres, according to the U.S. Agriculture Department.

Biotech seeds contain two profitable parts: The seeds themselves and the genetic traits that are added to protect those seeds from herbicides and pests. While the agribusiness ideal is to own both parts — and that's Monsanto's primary motivation in buying D&PL — Monsanto still would make money by selling the D&PL seed it owns with another company's genetic traits.

"There definitely will be competition, if (Pioneer and Syngenta) choose to be in that market," said Monsanto spokeswoman Lori Fisher. "But that's not within our domain at Monsanto to decide — it's up to the owners of those technologies."

Verett, whose family grows about 2,500 acres of cotton, said he's inclined to believe Monsanto. And he trusts regulators, who are sure to be focusing on these partnerships in considering whether the deal is anti-competitive.

Senate Panel Probes Gas Trades For Possible Market Manipulation (WSJ)

By JOHN J. FIALKA And ANN DAVIS

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

The Senate Energy Committee is investigating whether futures traders are manipulating markets that set natural-gas prices for consumers, farmers and industries.

Sen. Jeff Bingaman, the panel's chairman, has sent letters to two federal market regulators, asking them what they know about unusual price fluctuations that may have taken place, which could have the effect of artificially raising indexes used to establish market prices for natural gas.

The congressional investigation aims to explore how federal agencies monitor such trades, and if possible, to identify the agents and motivations behind the alleged illegal trading.

Amaranth Impact

In separate letters sent yesterday to the Commodity Futures Trading Commission and the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, Sen. Bingaman said the panel's probe was partly triggered by a Wall Street Journal article. The Jan. 30 article said one factor behind last year's $6 billion failure of Amaranth Advisors LLC, a hedge fund, may have been rapid or unanticipated fluctuations in futures-trading prices on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Both agencies monitor aspects of trading of natural-gas futures and related contracts.

A FERC spokesman said the agency had no comment on the Bingaman letter. Ianthe Zabel, director of external affairs for CFTC, said it was preparing to work with the committee. She said her agency "routinely monitors large positions and trading in the Nymex natural-gas futures markets and vigorously investigates instances of possible wrongdoing."

The energy committee is interested in trading flurries in the final minutes before the contract for September gas delivery expired in August, which sent prices sharply up. It asked the regulators how they follow such trades and what they know about "suspected anomalies" in the natural-gas market in 2006 that could have affected indexes used to set gas-supply contracts.

'Just and Reasonable' Trades?

The letter to FERC said the agency was given responsibility by Congress under the 2005 Energy Policy Act to ensure "just and reasonable" natural-gas prices by monitoring futures trades. It asked agency regulators how they carry out their duties.

DOJ_NMG_0128835

The two agencies, and the Securities and Exchange Commission, have been investigating the collapse of Amaranth. Investigators have requested information from Nymex and the Atlanta-based IntercontinentalExchange, which trades in contracts that are closely related to futures.

They are asking questions about Amaranth's trading activities, as well as those of some other large, natural-gas traders, said traders and attorneys who are involved in, or were briefed on, the questioning. But it is unclear whether they have found evidence of possible wrongdoing or manipulation.

In addition, the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations has recently been interviewing large natural-gas trading companies about hedge-fund participation in the natural-gas markets, said two lawyers familiar with its actions.

Samsung To Pay $90 Million To Settle 41 State Claims (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo

Bloomberg, February 7, 2007

Feb. 6 (Bloomberg) -- Samsung Electronics Co., the world's biggest memory chipmaker, agreed to pay $90 million to settle claims by California, New York, Illinois, 38 other states and consumers that it conspired to fix prices on some chips.

The accord resolves claims that the unit of Seoul, South Korea-based Samsung Group and other chipmakers drove up prices, inflating the cost of computers and other electronics for consumers and state governments. Samsung agreed to help state officials pursue claims against other chipmakers.

Samsung, Infineon AG and six other companies were sued by U.S. states in July on claims that the companies added billions of dollars to chip costs by fixing prices of dynamic random access memory, the most commonly used semiconductor memory product. So-called DRAM is used by Dell Inc. and Hewlett-Packard Co. in making personal computers, laptops, printers, mobile phones, digital cameras and digital music players.

``Consumers, states and localities were the victims of an international conspiracy that artificially raised the price of memory chips," New York Attorney General Andrew Cuomo said today in a statement. ``This settlement is a major step in recovering the overcharges that Samsung and its co-conspirators illegally foisted on consumers and taxpayers."

Shares of Suwon, South Korea-based Samsung fell 0.2 percent to 586,000 won at 10:35 a.m. in Seoul today.

Consumer Payout

About $80 million of the accord will go to reimbursing consumers and $10 million will go to states and localities, Cuomo said. The lawsuit grew out of a global price-fixing investigation by the U.S. Justice Department that led to claims against four companies and 16 individuals who have been fined $731 million. Samsung paid $300 million in the U.S. probe, the second-largest U.S. criminal antitrust fine at the time.

``These latest settlements effectively put the DRAM antitrust matter behind us," said Samsung spokeswoman Chris Goodhart in an e-mailed statement.

The U.S. criminal case spawned civil lawsuits by direct and indirect purchasers of DRAM chips, including litigation by manufacturers, computer repair companies and individual states. The price-fixing conspiracy lasted from 1998 to 2002, according to the lawsuit.

Two Samsung Electronics Inc. executives were accused by the U.S. in October of participating in the global price-fixing scheme.

Today's settlement resolves claims by California, which didn't include Samsung in the lawsuit it filed against other chipmakers in July, said Nathan Barankin, a spokesman for California Attorney General Jerry Brown.

Samsung Settles Price-fixing Suit For $90m (FT)

By Chris Nuttall In San Francisco

Financial Times, February 7, 2007

Samsung, the world's biggest memory chipmaker, is to pay $90m to settle a price-fixing lawsuit brought by 41 US states.

The South Korean company also agreed to assist the states in litigation against other memory chip manufacturers who had taken part in the conspiracy.

DOJ_NMG_0128836

The class-action suits filed in July last year arose from a justice department investigation begun in 2002. It uncovered one of the largest price-fixing schemes on record.

It led to $730m in fines and guilty pleas by Samsung and three other major manufacturers of dynamic random access memory (Dram) chips – Elpida, Hynix and Infineon. A fifth, Micron, admitted taking part but avoided federal criminal charges through its co-operation with the authorities.

The price-fixing suits had charged that Samsung and others reached secret agreements to inflate the prices of memory chips commonly installed in consumer desktop and notebook PCs.

"Consumers, states and localities were victims of an international conspiracy that artificially raised the price of memory chips, and thus illegally boosted the price of computers and popular hi-tech products," said Andrew Cuomo, New York attorney-general.

Five Samsung executives have pleaded guilty in the US to price-fixing and have agreed to each pay $250,000 fines and serve prison time.

Samsung To Pay $90 Million To Settle Price-fixing Lawsuit (AP)

By MARK JOHNSON

AP, February 7, 2007

ALBANY, N.Y. - Samsung Electronics Co., the world's largest memory chip maker, agreed to pay $90 million to settle a lawsuit charging the company and others with price-fixing, New York Attorney General Andrew Cuomo said Tuesday.

The suit, filed in July, claimed Korean-based Samsung and numerous other companies made secret arrangements to raise the prices of dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, chips. The memory chips are the most commonly used product for storing and retrieving information in computers and electronic devices.

A spokeswoman for Samsung, a top producer of flat-screen televisions, mobile phone handsets, MP3 players and laptop computers, did not immediately return a call for comment.

About $80 million of the settlement will go to consumers nationwide while $10 million will cover losses suffered by states and local governments, Cuomo's office said.

The settlement is subject to approval in federal court in San Francisco. New York, California and Illinois were the lead plaintiffs in the case.

The lawsuit was one of several filed following a U.S. Justice Department investigation that began in 2002 into whether computer chip companies conspired to manipulate the number of DRAM chips released to market in a scheme to inflate prices. The investigation resulted in more than $730 million in fines and guilty pleas from four companies - Samsung Electronics Co., Elpida Memory Inc., Infineon Technologies AG and Hynix Semiconductor Inc.

Companies such as Dell Inc., Hewlett-Packard Co., Apple Computer Inc., International Business Machines Corp. and Gateway Inc. had to raise PC prices or reduce the amount of memory installed on their systems to compensate for the higher costs, prosecutors said.

Cuomo said the case is continuing against Micron Technology Inc., Infineon Technologies, Elpida Memory Inc, Hynix Semiconductor Inc., Mosel-Vitelic Corp., Nanya Technology Corp. and NEC Electronics America Inc.

Bush Talks About Fiscal Responsibility At Company Accused Of Price-fixing (AP)

AP, February 7, 2007

MANASSAS, Va. President Bush preached the virtues of fiscal responsibility today at a company in Manassas, Virginia that recently settled a class-action lawsuit alleging it had engaged in price-fixing and violated antitrust laws.

Bush went to computer chip-maker Micron Technology Incorporated to talk about the budget he unveiled yesterday. He said Congress needs to set priorities in spending taxpayer money.

Micron Technology, based in Boise, Idaho, settled a federal class action lawsuit last month that was filed in 2002 on behalf of computer manufacturers who bought dynamic random-access memory chips, or DRAM from suppliers between April 1999 and June 2002.

The lawsuit is one of several filed after a U-S Justice Department investigation into whether computer chip companies conspired to manipulate the number of DRAM chips on the market to inflate prices.

The Justice Department granted Micron immunity from criminal charges in exchange for its cooperation. But the amnesty did not shield the company from lawsuits.

Apple Calls To End Online Copy Protection (FT)

By Chris Nuttall In San Francisco

Financial Times, February 7, 2007

Steve Jobs, Apple chief executive, on Tuesday called on the four major record companies to start selling songs online without the copy protection software known as digital rights management.

Apple has been under pressure in Europe to make its iTunes Music Store compatible with players other than the iPod. Consumer groups and agencies in Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Norway, the Netherlands and Sweden have made antitrust complaints against Apple in recent months.

"Perhaps those [European countries] unhappy with the current situation should redirect their energies towards persuading the music companies to sell their music DRM – free," he said in a rare statement published on Apple's website.

The songs sold on the service are protected by Apple's proprietary FairPlay software, which prevents users from making multiple copies for distribution. Mr Jobs said Apple had concluded that if it licenses FairPlay to other companies it could no longer guarantee to protect the music it licenses from the major labels – Vivendi's Universal Music, Sony BMG Music Entertainment, EMI and Warner Music Group.

Instead, he favours abolishing DRM entirely so any MP3 player could play music purchased from any online store. "This is clearly the best alternative for consumers and Apple would embrace it in a heartbeat," he says.

Richard Stice, analyst at Standard & Poor's equity research, said Tuesday's statement appeared to be an attempt to combat the negative publicity Apple had been receiving in Europe.

"He's been getting a lot of heat from several countries. In some ways, this could get consumers on his side and stop Apple looking like the bad guy."

Mr Stice said the removal of copyright protection from online music downloads was likely to benefit Apple as the number one player, more than rivals such as Microsoft and Sony.

"I think it's a pretty smart thing for him to say. If you use [Microsoft's] Zune, you can't use iTunes – for Apple, if there's no DRM, it would open up the market much more."

In being so public with his views, Mr Jobs may also be trying to put pressure on the major labels where private negotiations have failed. The music industry has been implacable in insisting on copyright protection for downloaded music.

Mr Jobs argues that "DRMs haven't worked and may never work to halt music piracy."

More than 20bn songs were sold completely DRM-free in 2006 on unprotected CDs by record companies. This was more than 10-times the number of DRM-protected songs sold worldwide by online stores, he says, while only around 3 per cent of the music on the 90m iPods sold to date had been purchased from iTunes.

Mr Jobs' argument was somewhat at odds with Apple's complaint last year that a proposed French law making music DRM-free would be tantamount to "state-sponsored piracy."

Jobs Pitches Dumping Anti-piracy Software (LAT)

By Michelle Quinn

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

Steve Jobs, the chief executive of Apple, wrote an open letter today asking the music industry to consider giving up anti-piracy software on the digital music it sells.

The letter, which can be seen at www.apple.com/hotnews/thoughtsonmusic, walks through the problems of anti-piracy software, also known as digital rights management, that is supposed to prevent consumers from copying digital music.

DOJ_NMG_0128838

Jobs lists the problems with the software, which is often hacked and needs updating and prevents consumers from listening to their music wherever they like. He also points out that consumers are already buying compact discs and copying them digitally without facing controls to stop them.

What the letter doesn't spell out is how Apple and Microsoft were advocates for DRM use so that the music they sold through their online stores could only be played on their devices. Convincing record labels "to license their music to Apple and others DRM-free will create a truly interoperable music marketplace," wrote Jobs. "Apple will embrace this wholeheartedly."

The letter comes as the music and film industries are actively talking about dropping the use of DRMs, which force consumers who buy music on Apple's online store iTunes to use the music only on the company's products. Many in the entertainment industry have expressed frustration with DRM and have talked about other ways to protect content without forcing consumers to stick with one kind of device.

"Rhetorically, he's been disingenuous," said Aram Sinnreich, managing partner at Radar Research in Los Angeles. "He's been metaphorically ramming it down their throats. To be fair, Apple has never been as DRM insane as Microsoft. Apple has put it in enough DRM to make it a pain in the butt for consumers to buy music on iTunes….and use it on non Apple devices."

"This is good for consumers and it's ultimately good for everyone," said Sinnreich.

Jobs's New Tune Raises Pressure On Music Firms (WSJ)

By NICK WINGFIELD And ETHAN SMITH

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

A movement to pressure the music industry to drop its primary weapon against online piracy has gained a high-profile convert: Steve Jobs, the man who helped build the market for selling music via the Internet.

In an 1,800-word online essay, Apple Inc.'s chief executive said the world's major music companies should consider allowing Apple and others to sell songs unfettered by anticopying software that prevents them from being shared or played however a consumer chooses.

Mr. Jobs contends that the recording industry isn't solving piracy with the technology, and could spur the market further if music lovers could buy music online without the restrictions. Many consumers resent the curbs on how they can listen to what they buy from online stores. Songs from one company's catalog, for example, won't work on another company's player -- a gridlock that has frustrated some consumers. Getting rid of the antipiracy software could make downloaded music as widely compatible with digital players in the market as compact discs are with CD players.

While Mr. Jobs is positioning his proposal as a consumer-friendly step, it isn't clear whether the biggest music companies -- Warner Music Group Corp., EMI Group PLC, Vivendi SA's Universal Music Group, and Sony BMG, the joint venture of Sony Corp. and Bertelsmann AG -- will embrace his recommendation. Allowing online music sales without anticopying software would amount to a radical about-face for the recording industry, which several years ago viewed the technology as a remedy to rampant online piracy through file-sharing networks like the original Napster and Kazaa. Music heavyweights have long required Apple and others to use the technology -- known as digital-rights management, or DRM, software -- if they wish to sell their songs online.

QUESTION OF THE DAY

Would you pay more for legal digital-music downloads without copy restrictions?Nor is it clear whether such a shift would deliver a further blow or a potential boon to the music industry, which has endured a spiral of declining sales and rising piracy since the advent of Internet-enabled copying and transmission of music. According to the Recording Industry Association of America, the value of recorded music shipped to U.S. retailers plunged 16% from a $14.5 billion peak in 1999 to $ 12.2 billion at the end of 2005 -- a slide the industry blames in part on online piracy. Record companies decided that one way to keep this from worsening was to let legitimate companies sell music in a format whose distribution could be more tightly controlled.

Apple quickly took the lead several years ago by selling music through its iTunes Store for 99 cents a song. The digital music files are essentially padlocked by a layer of software that makes them playable only on iPods and on computers using iTunes software. Other companies use competing copy-protection software, though, limiting users of digital-music players to purchasing songs online through compatible song catalogs.

DOJ_NMG_0128839

Yet for all the limits such software places on copying music, Mr. Jobs said, the technology doesn't effectively deter piracy because more than 90% of music world-wide is purchased on CDs -- which don't contain antipiracy software and are therefore easily copied to a computer and then traded online.

In his essay, posted yesterday on Apple's Web site, Mr. Jobs suggests the music industry might see better growth by abandoning its protective approach. "If such requirements were removed, the music industry might experience an influx of new companies willing to invest in innovative new stores and players," he wrote. "This can only be seen as a positive by the music companies."

Sales of digital downloads have continued to rise, but at a slower rate than in previous years. That, combined with an accelerating downturn in CD sales, has meant the music companies have been harder pressed than ever to find new sales wherever they can. Some executives in the technology and music industries have argued that sales of digital music are being held back by the lack of compatibility between hardware devices and music services. These people believe the market could grow more strongly if iTunes competitors can sell music that can be played on iPods.

Aside from sales, dropping the technological barriers also could also eliminate pressure Apple is facing from consumer-protection agencies in several European countries. They want Apple to modify its two most popular music products -- iPods and iTunes Store -- to make them compatible with online music services and hardware offered by others.

And since Apple thoroughly dominates the market -- with more than 85% of online song sales in the U.S., and more than 70% of digital-music-player sales -- many consumers have chafed at the problems associated with using the company's hardware and music store with offerings from competitors. Those limitations have helped spawn a growing movement within the technology and entertainment industries against the use of DRM.

Ken Hertz, a prominent lawyer who does extensive work in the digital-music business, said Mr. Jobs's letter could be viewed as "a cynical attempt" to place the blame for incompatibility of hardware and services on the music industry, rather than on Apple itself. Some executives have suggested that the Cupertino, Calif. , company has used encryption technology to deliberately lock consumers into its music products by discouraging those with large iTunes music collections from switching to new gadgets that won't play their songs.

"Apple has been more of a beneficiary of DRM than a victim," Mr. Hertz added.

Mr. Jobs discounted such criticism, estimating that 97% of the music on most iPods is from sources other than the iTunes Store, such as personal CD collections. "It's hard to believe that just 3% of the music on the average iPod is enough to lock users into buying only iPods in the future," he wrote in his essay.

One of the more vocal opponents of the technology, Terry McBride, chief executive of the management company and independent record label Nettwerk Music Group, said the support of Mr. Jobs will significantly increase the potency of calls to abandon it.

"If anyone can make this happen, Steve can," said Mr. McBride, whose clients include the music group Barenaked Ladies and singers Avril Lavigne and Sarah McLachlan.

Music companies said it is too soon to say how and whether they would respond to Mr. Jobs's essay, but a few acknowledge some of the consumer issues the Apple CEO described. "The lack of operability between a proliferating range of digital platforms and devices is more and more becoming a real issue for music consumers," said Jeanne Meyer, an EMI spokeswoman.

The digital revolution has caused big problems for music labels. Because music on CDs is recorded in digital form, without anticopying technology, Web sites that enable people to share copyrighted songs illegally have cut into profits.

Mr. Jobs helped change the situation, brokering deals with major record labels to allow their songs to be sold on iTunes for 99 cents each. As part of those negotiations, he says, the labels insisted that Apple use software that prevented their songs from being played on unauthorized devices.

Apple developed software known as FairPlay, which works with iTunes and the iPod and enforces certain restrictions, such as allowing consumers only to play protected recordings on up to five computers.

Other companies such as Microsoft Corp. developed their own solutions to the antipiracy requirement. So while CDs represent a standard format -- playable on hardware made by a wide array of companies and sold by countless retailers -- there is no single DRM standard. Copy-protection systems have been developed by many companies and, in some cases, are tightly integrated with specific devices and online services -- leading to incompatibility problems.

DOJ_NMG_0128840

The music industry has begun to experiment with the online sale of unprotected music using the popular MP3 format that works with virtually all digital music players, including Apple's iPod. Yahoo Inc., for instance, has sold MP3 songs by Norah Jones, Jessica Simpson and other artists. Another music-retail site, eMusic.com, offers more than two million songs for sale in the MP3 format from independent music labels, which means they can be played on iPods and other music players.

Most popular music from major recording companies, though, hasn't been available without anticopying software. David Goldberg, general manager of music for Yahoo, said the company is making progress in discussions with major music companies about offering songs without DRM and, by Christmas, expects to have significant portions of Yahoo's catalog of two million songs available in the MP3 format.

Mr. Goldberg said he was pleased to hear Mr. Jobs propose that music companies abandon the antipiracy protection. "We've been vocal about that, and we're glad to hear it from him," he said.

Ms. Meyer of EMI added that the response from fans to EMI's limited MP3 sales has been "very enthusiastic."

Mr. Jobs proposes three paths the digital-music business might follow, including its current course of using multiple incompatible anticopying systems. A second option, he said, would be for Apple to license its antipiracy system so other companies can make their hardware and online services work with Apple's music products.

Mr. Jobs said that scenario -- which competitors and music-industry executives have proposed before, and Apple has resisted -- is problematic because sharing its encryption software with others could compromise the security of the system and slow Apple's ability to repair breaches of the software.

Mr. Jobs made it clear in the essay that he favors a third scenario, abolishing the use of DRM, in large part because he says it doesn't prevent piracy.

Besides worries about European regulators and record labels, Mr. Jobs's letter could reflect a desire to counter more-credible competition from Microsoft, said Talal Shamoon, chief executive of Intertrust Technologies Corp., a DRM software maker that is jointly owned by Sony, Philips Electronics NV and Stephens Bank. Microsoft has long offered its own antipiracy software to other companies, and now is emulating Apple's formula with a proprietary format tied to its new Zune player -- which could become stronger as Microsoft exploits connections to its new Vista operating system and Xbox 360 game console, Mr. Shamoon said.

This isn't the first time Mr. Jobs has launched a public broadside against the music industry, in an apparent attempt to sway public opinion. In 2005, amid calls from record labels for iTunes to sell music for a wider range of prices than 99 cents per track, he blasted the labels as "greedy."

Mr. Jobs's suggestion yesterday was applauded by rival Rob Glaser, chairman and CEO of RealNetworks Inc., owner of the Rhapsody music service. He recently called on major labels to drop DRM for digital-music purchases. "Doing so would be the right thing for consumers and would also be good for everyone in the industry," Mr. Glaser said. "It's great to see other industry leaders support this message."

Jobs Wants Fewer Download Limits (USAT)

By Kevin Maney

USA Today, February 7, 2007

Apple CEO Steve Jobs is trying to start a stampede to make music downloaded from iTunes or any online store playable on any device without restrictions.

In a major pronouncement that joins a growing chorus of discontent about copy restrictions, Jobs on Tuesday posted a manifesto, " Thoughts on Music," on Apple's website.

It argues that digital rights management (DRM) technology, which record companies require in digital music files to limit where and how songs can be played, has failed to stop piracy and impedes development of the online music industry.

COMMENT: What do you think?

Within minutes, the essay was picked up by bloggers and circulated worldwide.

DOJ_NMG_0128841

Jobs asked Europeans to pressure major Europe-based music companies — Universal, EMI and Sony BMG (half-owned by Germany's Bertelsmann) — to end DRM. "Convincing them to license their music to Apple and others DRM-free will create a truly interoperable music marketplace," Jobs wrote. "Apple will embrace this wholeheartedly."

Apple, which dominates the legitimate digital download market, uses DRM called FairPlay. Songs bought at iTunes can play only on PCs using iTunes software or on Apple's iPod. Songs with DRM from other companies such as Microsoft and RealNetworks won't play on iPods.

Apple has been accused of using FairPlay to lock consumers into iTunes. Jobs contests that, noting that just 3% of songs on an average iPod were bought through iTunes and have DRM. Songs copied from CDs and music files in the MP3 format can be played anywhere.

Bloggers, tech execs and some musicians jumped in to side with Jobs. "I see 2% of DRM as protecting copyright and 98% annoying consumers," music artist Moby said.

RealNetworks CEO Rob Glaser said he "gave a speech on this exact topic advocating this exact position ... two weeks ago."

The key is whether record labels will give up DRM. "We'll continue experimenting" with DRM-free releases, says Adam Grossberg, spokesman for EMI. The label has put out songs by Norah Jones and Relient K with no DRM. Warner Music Group and Sony BMG spokesmen didn't respond to requests for comment.

Another question is whether lifting DRM will lead to more piracy and fewer royalties to musicians. "If it increases piracy, everybody loses," says John MacFarlane, CEO of Sonos, which makes a home digital music system.

Jobs Calls For End To Music Copy Protection (NYT)

By John Markoff

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 6 — Steven P. Jobs, Apple's chief executive, jolted the record industry on Tuesday by calling on its largest companies to allow online music sales unfettered by antipiracy software.

The move is a gamble for Apple. Its iPod players and iTunes Store have defined the online music market, and they have much at stake in the current copy-protection system.

Under terms reached with the major record labels, online music stores embed software code into the digital song files they sell to restrict the ability to copy them. Because Apple uses its own system, the songs it sells can be played only on the iPod. That limitation has drawn increasing scrutiny from European governments, pressure that Apple has recently begun to acknowledge.

Mr. Jobs's appeal, posted on the company's Web site Tuesday, came in the form of an essay titled "Thoughts on Music," but in essence it was a letter to the "Big 4" music companies: Universal, Sony BMG, Warner and EMI.

While he said that "customers are being well served" by the current approach to digital rights management — with online music retailers using incompatible antipiracy systems but nonetheless offering "a wide variety of choices" — the subtext clearly pointed to the prospect of change.

He dismissed one possible alternative, in which Apple would license its own system, FairPlay, allowing competing digital players to play iTunes songs and letting other stores sell copy-protected music for the iPod. Mr. Jobs said that approach would only complicate enforcement of digital rights management, as myriad companies would have to coordinate software and hardware updates.

Instead, he proposed that labels could shed digital rights management altogether. Mr. Jobs pointed out that only 10 percent of all music sold last year was through an online store and that music is already easily loaded onto digital players from CDs, with no antipiracy features. Attaching digital rights management to music bought online has only limited the number of online music stores, he wrote.

"This is clearly the best alternative for consumers, and Apple would embrace it in a heartbeat," he wrote.

Mr. Jobs's move comes as the music industry appears to be facing a crisis. Sales of its mainstay product — the album — continue to sink, and sales of digital music, including individual songs, have not increased fast enough to offset the decline.

DOJ_NMG_0128842

With a paucity of hit releases to start the year, industrywide album sales are already down more than 15 percent from last year, the worst January performance since computerized sales tracking began in 1991.

At a forum in France last month, Rob Glaser, chief executive of RealNetworks, which operates the Rhapsody digital music service, predicted the widespread availability of unrestricted digital music within a few years. He said it was "an idea in ascendance and whose time has come."

But Mr. Jobs is clearly the most powerful voice raised so far in support of a change. With the clout built on his company's market share for both players and music, he has already prevailed against the labels in disputes over pricing.

Facing pressure to bolster digital sales, the four major music companies have only toyed with the idea of selling unprotected files — most notably with a personalized version of a Jessica Simpson song and the first single from the new album of Norah Jones. MySpace, the social-networking giant that is host to pages for countless independent and major-label acts, has embraced the unrestricted MP3 format for artists who choose to sell music there.

More recently, the industry has been abuzz with rumors that one or more of the major companies is preparing to lift restrictions on some portions of their digital catalog.

Jeanne Meyer, a spokeswoman for EMI, said, "The lack of interoperability between a proliferating range of digital platforms and devices is increasingly becoming a real issue for music consumers."

The Universal Music Group, the Warner Music Group and Sony BMG Music Entertainment declined to comment. But several industry executives said they viewed Mr. Jobs's comments as an effort to deflect blame from Apple and onto the record companies for the incompatibility of various digital music devices and services.

There is a general sense that the industry is still unwilling to do away completely with copy protection, and no contracts have been signed yet to change the systems of distribution by any of the players.

A senior executive at one company, who requested anonymity to avoid straining relations with Apple, said that while labels might experiment with other forms of copy-protection software, "we're not going to broadly license our content for unprotected digital distribution."

Another digital music industry executive said that the record companies — many of them part of larger media companies involved in movie and television production — were concerned that lifting restrictions on digital music might have perilous effects on the parallel market for copy-protected video content.

Several consumer electronics and music industry executives said that if the music industry moved away from copy protection, it could potentially make it easier for competing music players. Mr. Jobs seems to be betting that anything that stimulates the sale of digital music can only help his company.

"It's a bold move on his part," said Ted Cohen, managing partner of TAG Strategic, an industry consultancy; he is also former senior vice president for digital development and distribution for EMI Music. "If anything can play on anything, it's a clear win for the consumer electronics device world, but a potential disaster for the content companies."

The global music trade group, the International Federation for the Phonographic Industry, based in London, has long pushed for "interoperability," saying Apple should license its digital management system so that iTunes music plays on devices other than the iPod. But the industry has also stuck with the idea of some kind of digital control to prevent wholesale copying of musical tracks.

Officially, the industry chose to respond Tuesday by seizing on one idea that Mr. Jobs raised — licensing Apple's own copy-protection system — even though he went on to reject it. "Apple's offer to license FairPlay to other technology companies is a welcome breakthrough and would be a real victory for fans, artists and labels," the Recording Industry Association of America said.

Mr. Jobs's statement drew criticism from some competitors, who argued that he was simply trying to get in front of a shift in industry strategy and claim credit for it.

Jason Reindorp, marketing director for Zune at Microsoft, said Mr. Jobs's call for unrestricted music sales was "irresponsible, or at the very least naïve," adding, "It's like he's on top of the mountain making pronouncements, while we're here on the ground working with the industry to make it happen."

DOJ_NMG_0128843

“He’s certainly a master of the obvious,” Mr. Reindorp said, adding that “the stars were already aligning” to loosen the restrictions.

In Norway last month, after a yearlong investigation, the government’s consumer ombudsman ruled that iTunes violates national law by restricting playback to iPods. The government gave Apple until Oct. 1 to make changes.

Consumer agencies in six other European countries are looking into the legality of limiting how legally purchased songs can be played.

Late last month, as consumer groups across the region began banding together, Apple issued a statement that said, “Apple hopes that European governments will encourage a competitive environment that allows innovation to thrive, protects intellectual property and allows consumers to decide which products are successful.”

In 2005, France lobbed the first legislative volley in the European effort to fight digital restrictions, but by the time the law was adopted last summer, most of the teeth were gone from the proposal. Now, the French are putting together a government commission that will rule on the legality of digital rights restrictions case by case.

Jobs Calls For Open Music Sales (WP)

By Mike Musgrove

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Apple chief executive Steve Jobs yesterday called on record companies to let online music stores sell digital music files without anti-piracy controls, an idea that some analysts say has merit.

"This is clearly the best alternative for customers and Apple would embrace it in a heartbeat," Jobs wrote in a column titled "Thoughts on Music," which was posted on Apple's Web site yesterday.

Critics have complained that digital rights management, or DRM, software built into tracks sold on the company's iTunes music store locks users into Apple's iPod. Such competitors as Real Networks, as well as some European countries, have called on Apple to share its software code or otherwise open its protected music file format. Doing so would allow devices other than iPods to play music downloaded from iTunes and would allow music purchased elsewhere on the Internet to be played on iPods.

But Jobs wrote that Apple sells music solely for the iPod because that's what the music industry insisted on when he was negotiating deals years ago -- even though "DRMs haven't worked, and may never work, to halt music piracy."

"A key provision of our agreements with the music companies is that if our DRM system is compromised and their music becomes playable on unauthorized devices, we have only a small number of weeks to fix the problem or they can withdraw their entire music catalog from our iTunes store," Jobs wrote.

The problem, he said, is "there are many smart people in the world, some with a lot of time on their hands, who love to discover such secrets and publish a way for everyone to get free (and stolen) music."

Phil Leigh, senior analyst and president of Inside Digital Media, said Jobs's comments were legitimate, albeit a bit self-serving.

"Jobs is trying to show that Apple is not the bad guy when it comes to proprietary formats," Leigh said, noting that the open letter was an aggressive public-relations tactic by a company that eventually will have to renegotiate with the record companies. "I think he's taking the offensive here."

Chris Castle, a music-industry lawyer who represented the original Napster, said the shift from CDs to digital music has hurt the music industry enough that it might be willing to consider Jobs's points.

"I think the labels are finally starting to come around to this," he said. "There's more willingness to entertain this sort of thing than there ever has been."

Jobs noted that eliminating DRM software is only one alternative. Another, he said, would be for Apple to license its FairPlay DRM technology to competitors -- for a fee. But, he said, releasing the secrets of the technology could lead to leaks, which can spread around the world in an instant over the Internet.

DOJ_NMG_0128844

The Recording Industry Association of America, which has battled music piracy for years, called Apple's offer to license FairPlay "a welcome breakthrough and would be a real victory for fans, artists and labels. There have been many services seeking a license to the Apple DRM. This would enable the interoperability that we have been urging for a very long time."

In its statement, the RIAA did not address Jobs's idea of eliminating DRM software.

In his letter, Jobs noted that EMI and Universal, two of the big four CD labels, are both owned by European companies while 50 percent of a third, Sony BMG, is owned by Bertelsmann, a German company. The fourth, Warner, is based in the United States.

"Much of the concern over DRM systems has arisen in European countries," Jobs wrote. "Perhaps those unhappy with the current situation should redirect their energies towards persuading the music companies to sell their music DRM-free. . . . Convincing them to license their music to Apple and others DRM-free will create a truly interoperable music marketplace."

In Equity Office Battle, A Matter Of Scale (WSJ)

By JENNIFER S. FORSYTH And HENNY SENDER

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

With only hours until shareholders of Equity Office Properties Trust are to decide whether to sell the company to private-equity firm Blackstone Group, the outcome was still up in the air last evening.

If Vornado Realty Trust comes in with a higher offer before the vote at noon EST today, it would likely delay the tally -- at least until the Equity Office board has time to consider whether any new offer resolves its reservations that Vornado's previous bids have had too many uncertainties.

At stake in this high-noon gunfight is the nation's largest office portfolio and bragging rights to pulling off one of the largest leveraged buyouts in U.S. corporate history -- valued at $23 billion, not including the assumption of Equity Office's $16 billion in debt. But the risk for the eventual winner is considerably higher than when the bidding battle began in November with Blackstone's initial bid.

In addition to the size, the bidding battle involves two longtime kings in the commercial real estate world -- with Equity Office led by chairman Sam Zell and Vornado led by chief executive Steven Roth -- and a relative newcomer in Blackstone. Blackstone has become a huge player in real estate with acquisitions within the last 24 months, reflecting the aggressive strategy of Jonathan Gray, the 37-year-old head of its real estate group.

What's clear is how much both Blackstone and Vornado desperately desire Equity Office's stake in more than 500 buildings at a time of rising rents and falling vacancies in many markets, with neither firm yet raising a white flag.

Since Jan. 17, when Vornado first weighed in with a higher offer, Blackstone has moved up its all-cash bid first to $54 a share from $48.50 and then, yesterday morning to $55.50. Meanwhile, Vornado has increased the total amount of its cash-and-stock bid to $56 a share and promised to pay the cash portion before a shareholder vote. But at the same time, Vornado reduced the cash portion of its offer to 55% from 60% and didn't offer to pay Equity Office shareholders a fee if its own shareholders decline to approve its bid.

As of late yesterday afternoon, Vornado had no comment. If Vornado doesn't come in with a higher offer addressing Equity Office's concerns, Equity Office shareholders are expected to decide that Blackstone's bid is superior. Even if Vornado does increase its price, most shareholders say they want a price above $58 to make the decision a no-brainer.

Equity Office's board is urging its shareholders to accept Blackstone's offer. Even with Vornado's agreement to offer the cash portion up front, the remaining merger would still be subject to approval by Vornado shareholders, which could take four to six months, according to a statement issued yesterday by Equity Office.

Perhaps more frustrating to Equity Office's board is that Vornado's weekend offer came in the form of a two-page letter, not a definitive contract that could help the board assess whether the offer was truly superior to Blackstone's.

In its statement, EOP said despite repeated requests, "Vornado has failed to address significant contractual issues identified by the board."

DOJ_NMG_0128845

Moreover, Equity Office agreed yesterday to raise the breakup fee -- the amount that Blackstone would receive if EOP accepts a competing offer -- to $720 million, up from $500 million last week and $200 million when the deal was announced by Equity Office in November. Any offer from Vornado would have to factor in that payment.

That puts Blackstone in a seemingly enviable position. Either it cements its reputation as a determined investor that just sealed the biggest private-equity deal ever by many measures, or it walks away with a $720 million consolation prize to share with its investors.

But some shareholders wonder if Equity Office directors are focusing too much on the risk instead of seeing the upside opportunity of accepting an offer from a company with a reputation at increasing shareholder value. Dean Frankel, domestic portfolio manager of Urdang Securities Management, an Equity Office shareholder, says he is disappointed the Equity Office board agreed to allow Blackstone to raise its breakup fee. "Blackstone is being treated as the brother and Vornado is treated as a stepbrother," he says.

Those familiar with the transaction say the higher breakup fee had a strategic role: trying to force Vornado to put a definitive contract on the table or to let Equity Office close the deal by the end of the week.

Shareholder Vote Today Could Settle Fight For Office REIT (NYT)

By Terry Pristin

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

The feverish competition over Equity Office Properties Trust, the nation's largest office landlord, appeared to be nearing an end yesterday, with the original suitor, the Blackstone Group, leading the bidding.

Real estate investors waited yesterday to see if Vornado Realty Trust would try to top Blackstone's latest all-cash offer of $55.50 a share, which was approved during the night by Equity Office.

Equity Office shareholders are scheduled to vote today on the $39 billion bid by Blackstone, a private equity company.

"I'm hearing that it's over," said Barry Vinocur, the editor of REIT Wrap, a daily newsletter about real estate investment trusts. "Vornado has gone radio silent and has been that way all day."

Mr. Vinocur said he had been told that Blackstone had amassed the votes necessary for shareholders to approve the merger. Blackstone has said it could close the deal on Friday. If the Blackstone bid is not approved today by a majority of eligible shareholders, the merger agreement would be terminated and the bidding could continue.

If Vornado fails to raise its bid to win the deal, many investors will be surprised. Vornado's chief executive, Steven Roth, has said that buying Equity Office would make his company the dominant real estate investment trust in the office sector, with a strong portfolio of "irreplaceable assets" in the markets where it is hardest for developers to put up new buildings. In addition to office buildings, the company owns shopping centers and showroom space.

"The Vornado team views this as a transformative transaction for their company," said Keven S. Lindemann, the director of real estate for SNL Financial, a research company in Charlottesville, Va. Equity Office owns interests in 543 buildings across the nation.

Mr. Roth said he would keep most of the Equity Office buildings that are in coastal cities, strengthening Vornado's portfolio in the hot Manhattan market, adding to its holdings in Washington and instantly establishing a strong presence in three new markets: Los Angeles, San Francisco and Boston.

About $10 billion worth of property would be sold to two private equity companies, the Starwood Capital Group and Walton Street Capital. The two were Vornado's partners in its original bid.

If Blackstone prevails, it is considered likely to sell much of the Equity Office portfolio within months of the transaction.

Whichever suitor is successful, the transaction will be the largest leveraged buyout ever.

Though Vornado's bid is higher at $56 a share, it would be paid in cash and stock. Analysts say Blackstone's offer is superior because the deal could close as soon as Friday.

Green Street Advisors, a research company in Newport Beach, Calif., which earlier recommended a vote in favor of Vornado, endorsed the Blackstone bid yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0128846

On Sunday, Vornado offered to pay the cash portion of its bid several weeks — instead of several months — after a merger agreement is signed. Vornado said its new bid would address Equity Office's concerns that the original deal posed too much risk for shareholders. Though Vornado shareholders would still have to approve the issuance of stock, the tender offer portion of the transaction would not need their approval, the company said.

Equity Office said Vornado had not allayed all its concerns. It said Vornado needed to agree to pay Equity Office hundreds of millions of dollars if the deal fell through.

Documents filed yesterday with the Securities and Exchange Commission revealed that on Monday, Equity Office pressed Blackstone to come up with more cash. Several major investors had made it clear that they preferred Vornado's richer offer and thought the risks had been exaggerated.

Later that day, Jonathan D. Gray, a senior managing director at Blackstone, told Richard D. Kincaid, the president of Equity Office, that he would be willing to pay $55.25 a share, provided that the breakup fee that Vornado would have to pay Blackstone was increased to $700 million from $500 million.

Pushing for more, Mr. Kincaid asked Mr. Gray if Blackstone would add another 25 cents a share. It would, Mr. Gray told him, but only if the breakup fee rose to $720 million and the company did not postpone today's shareholders' meeting.

Advertisement TODAY'S MOST POPULAR 1. Beijing Gets Rid Of Bad Translations 2. A Shoelace Obsession Goes Online 3. Kodak's Printer Strategy: Cheaper Cartridges 4. Should Bond Investors Watch The Thin Ice? 5. Steve Jobs Raises Pressure On Music Firms MORE C (WSJ)

By Mike Barris

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

MGIC Investment Corp., a provider of insurance on low-down-payment mortgages, said Tuesday it agreed to acquire Radian Group Inc., a global credit-risk management company, in a stock swap valued at about $4.9 billion.

Under the agreement, Milwaukee-based MGIC said it will exchange 0.9658 share of its stock for each share of Radian. The terms don't appear to offer Radian shareholders any premium. Radian shares closed Monday down 44 cents at $60.84, while MGIC's offer was valued at $60.78 at Monday's close.

Shares of both companies jumped sharply in early afternoon trading Tuesday. Radian shares were up 9.3% at $66.47, while MGIC shares rose 11% to $69.70.

The combined company, a mortgage and credit-risk insurer to be called MGIC Radian Financial Group Inc., will have assets of nearly $15 billion and primary mortgage insurance in force of more than $290 billion, the companies said. The combined company will have "a broad and balanced mix of businesses including domestic mortgage insurance, financial guaranty, financial services and international credit enhancement," the companies said.

MGIC Chief Executive Curt S. Culver will head the company until 2009, when he will cede the CEO job to Radian Chief Executive S.A. Ibrahim. Mr. Culver will pass the chairman post to Ibrahim in 2010. The board initially will be tilted 6-5 in MGIC's favor, but will add a sixth Radian director soon after the deal closes.

MGIC is the parent of Mortgage Guaranty Insurance Corp., a provider of private mortgage insurance serving about 5,000 lenders nationwide and in Puerto Rico. MGIC had $176.5 billion in primary insurance in force covering 1.3 million mortgages as of Dec. 31. The company reported last month that its fourth-quarter earnings fell to $121.5 million from $128.1 million a year ago, as revenue slipped 1% to $367.2 million.

Radian, Philadelphia, provides private mortgage insurance coverage to protect lenders from defaults by borrowers who put down a deposit of less than 20%. It offers primary insurance, which provides protection on individual loans and covers unpaid loan principal and delinquent interest; it also provides pool insurance, which covers unlimited exposure on groups of loans.

Radian reported last month that its fourth-quarter earnings rose to $158.4 million from $104.5 million the year before, as revenue rose 16.5% to $347.9 million.

In a conference call Tuesday discussing the acquisition, MGIC officials fielded a number of questions related to credit risk in both companies' books of business and to challenges from the weaker housing market overall.

DOJ_NMG_0128847

Mr. Culver said MGIC looked at Radian's credit exposure quite carefully -- notably its exposure to so-called Alt-A mortgages, which are made to borrowers with high credit scores but less than full documentation. While acknowledging that he isn't "a huge fan" of that segment, Mr. Culver said in general lenders seem to be showing more discipline in their underwriting.

Midwest Flies In The Face Of Takeover Effort (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams

USA Today, February 7, 2007

As the USA's biggest airlines jostle to get bigger and more powerful, little Midwest Airlines is happy to be itself: an anachronism.

But things could soon change for Midwest as a result of an ongoing hostile takeover effort being waged by Orlando-based AirTran Airways, the USA's third-biggest discounter.

Milwaukee-based Midwest, which most East and West coast residents have probably never heard of, has no desire to get rich quick, swallow other airlines or be swallowed itself. It flies to cities in America's heartland that the major carriers would just as soon fly over.

Only Midwest, for example, flies non-stop from Omaha to Reagan Washington National, or from Kansas City non-stop to New York LaGuardia. Along the way, flight attendants bake chocolate chip cookies that are served free, still warm and fragrant. It recently completed its first full year of profit since 2000.

The airline "has built up an amazing love affair with its passengers that I've never seen the likes of," says Midwest's marketing chief, Scott Dickson. If AirTran succeeds, he says, "There will be no vestige of Midwest Airlines left."

Over its objections, AirTran has launched a $345 million tender offer to acquire Midwest's shares directly from shareholders in hopes of forcing the board to sell. AirTran undertook the offer after Midwest's management rejected outright an earlier offer to buy the airline.

AirTran, which owns a few hundred Midwest shares, has gone to court to try to get Midwest's full shareholder list and is lobbying Midwest's institutional investors, who own up to half of Midwest's shares. Shareholders' deadline to tender shares is March 8, extended from an earlier deadline of Feb. 8.

"We think we're making progress with them," says AirTran CEO John Leonard.

Even if AirTran gains traction with shareholders, Midwest's board could launch a "poison pill," diluting its shares to make the deal too costly.

AirTran has offered $13.25 in stock and cash for every Midwest share, a 46% premium over the share price on Dec. 12, the day before the offer became public. That's up from an offer of $11.25 in December.

"It's nice to be wanted," Midwest CEO Tim Hoeksema says with deadpan wit. But Hoeksema, who has run the airline for 23 years, says the offer would take the company down the wrong path.

Midwest's directors decided unanimously that the offer was too low and that the airline doesn't need a partner to succeed. Because of cost-cutting in recent years, "We are in the strongest competitive position we have ever been in," Hoeksema says. "We think we have a lot of value here."

With US Airways' withdrawal of its hostile bid for Delta Air Lines last week, the AirTran proposal becomes the only proposed merger still on the table among domestic airlines. And it is much smaller than the $10 billion US Airways offer, which would have created the USA's biggest domestic carrier. AirTran is the 12th-biggest U.S. airline, and Midwest is No. 23.

AirTran flies mainly out of Atlanta, the world's busiest airport. It competes head on with Atlanta-based Delta, the USA's third-biggest airline. Aside from some of their airplanes — both fly Boeing 717s — the airlines have little in common.

What is now Midwest Airlines began in 1969 as a corporate jet service for executives of paper manufacturer Kimberly-Clark out of Appleton, Wis. In 1984, the company began scheduled service and went public in 1995.

Midwest's passengers seem to love their homey little airline with its two-across, four-to-a-row leather seats on many flights. Like other airlines, Midwest started charging for meals and wine in the post-9/11 travel downturn. Even now, the food is better than most. It has won awards from Travel & Leisure magazine, Condé Nast travel publications and food reviewer Zagat.

DOJ_NMG_0128848

Midwest loyalist Judy Schweikart, an Omaha lawyer, flies the airline whenever she can, and dreads the thought of a takeover.

"If they make Midwest into AirTran, they're going to lose something unique," she says. "I hope the shareholders turn it down."

Meanwhile, AirTran executives can't fathom Midwest's rejection and its refusal to even sit down for talks. Leonard, the CEO, says Midwest is profitable only because Minneapolis-based Northwest, which serves Milwaukee, has cut flights while in bankruptcy protection. Midwest disputes that assertion.

Leonard says Midwest is so small and dependent on Milwaukee that it would be crushed if Northwest set its sights on that market. Northwest still has six gates at Milwaukee Mitchell airport, and could add flights and put pressure on Midwest after exiting bankruptcy, he says.

If AirTran and Midwest merged, both would be stronger, Leonard says. AirTran would go from serving 52 cities to more than 70 overnight. AirTran could increase flights to lucrative destinations Midwest also serves, such as New York, Boston and Los Angeles.

But Hoeksema says AirTran is simply "desperate" because it has "all these airplanes coming" and needs to expand. AirTran is scheduled to receive 60 new planes between now and 2010, and needs places to put them. The merged carrier could put new Boeing 737s on routes Midwest is now serving with aging MD80s and smaller 717s.

AirTran has even offered to keep serving free chocolate chip cookies on the merged carrier if the deal goes through. But they would not be baked onboard.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

US Farmworkers, Environmental Groups Reopen Lawsuit To Quicken Pace Of Pesticide Ban (FINDLAW/AP)

By Anne Kim, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 7, 2007

(AP) - SEATTLE-Farmworkers and environmental groups have reopened a lawsuit against the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency in an attempt to force it to more quickly phase out a pesticide they say has been poisoning fieldworkers for decades.

The federal lawsuit challenges a decision by the EPA last November to set a 2012 timetable for phasing out the pesticide azinphos-methyl, known as guthion or AZM.

"These pesticides put thousands of workers at risk of serious illness every year," Erik Nicholson of the United Farm Workers of America said Monday in a news release. "It is inexcusable for EPA to allow AZM to continue poisoning workers for six more years."

The pesticide has been used on apples, cherries, pears and other crops since the late 1950s.

The farmworkers and environmental groups, represented by the environmental law firm Earthjustice, sued the EPA in federal court in Seattle in 2004, arguing that the agency was wrong to continue allowing the use of a pesticide that could cause dizziness, vomiting, seizures, paralysis, loss of mental function and even death. The lawsuit was put on hold when the EPA agreed to reconsider the use of AZM and another pesticide, phosmet, which is used on orchard crops and blueberries.

Last November, the EPA decided to end the use of AZM on nursery stocks and Brussels sprouts by Sept. 30, 2007. The phase-out for nuts was extended until Oct. 30, 2009, and for apples, blueberries, cherries, pears and parsley until Sept. 30, 2012.

The EPA decided to lengthen the phase-out time but also progressively limit the amount of AZM that would be available during the period, Enesta Jones, an EPA spokeswoman, said Monday.

"This allows sufficient time to facilitate the transition to safer alternatives," she said. "Public health is still our top priority and the agency will implement several risk mitigation measures to reduce exposure and ways to minimize harm if the public is exposed as this phase-out occurs."

DOJ_NMG_0128849

In January, the EPA decided to lengthen - for some uses of phosmet - the amount of time workers are restricted entry into areas treated with the pesticide and added other restrictions to nine uses of phosmet, such as lowering the maximum amount of phosmet that can be applied each season.

But that does not adequately protect workers, said Patti Goldman, managing attorney for Earthjustice.

Earthjustice also wants to end the use of the pesticide chlorpyrifos, used on corn and orchard crops, and seeks to add it to the reopened lawsuit, Goldman said.

Gore Says Bush Administration Paying Scientists To Dispute Global Warming (CNN)

CNN, February 7, 2007

MADRID , SPAIN (CNN) -- Former Vice President Al Gore said in an interview on Tuesday the Bush administration is now paying scientists to dispute global warming since the administration can no longer argue against it.

During an interview with CNN affiliate Cuatro in Madrid, Gore said, "they've lost the argument and they don't want to stop dumping all this pollution into the Earth's atmosphere. The only thing they have left is cash and now they're offering cash for so-called skeptics who will try to confuse people about what the science really say. But it's unethical because now the time has come when we have to act."

Gore was the Democratic nominee against Bush in the 2004 presidential election. His film, An Inconvenient Truth, is up for the best documentary Oscar.

China Says Rich Countries Should Take Lead On Global Warming (NYT)

By Jim Yardley

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

BEIJING, Feb. 6 — China said Tuesday that wealthier countries must take the lead in curbing greenhouse gas emissions and refused to say whether it would agree to any mandatory emissions limits that might hamper its booming economy.

Jiang Yu, a spokeswoman for the Foreign Ministry, said China was willing to contribute to an international effort to combat global warming but placed the primary responsibility on richer, developed nations that have been polluting for much longer.

“It must be pointed out that climate change has been caused by the long-term historic emissions of developed countries and their high per capita emissions,” she said, adding that developed countries have responsibilities for global warming “that cannot be shirked.”

Ms. Jiang’s comments, combined with another briefing on Tuesday by the country’s leading climate expert, represented China’s first official response to a landmark report issued last week by a United Nations panel of scientists that declared global warming is “unequivocal” and warned that immediate action must be taken to prevent harmful consequences.

China is the world’s second largest emitter of the greenhouse gases contributing to climate change, trailing only the United States. Last November, the International Energy Agency in Paris predicted that China would pass the United States in emissions of carbon dioxide in 2009. China had been expected to surpass the United States as late as 2020, but its soaring consumption of coal has rapidly increased the country’s emissions.

China derives nearly 70 percent of its energy from coal-fired power plants, many of them equipped with substandard pollution controls.

Chinese officials have long noted that China’s per capita emissions remain well below the averages in wealthier countries, including the United States. Officials also argue that China remains a developing country without the financial resources or technological prowess to make a rapid shift to cleaner, more expensive energy technology.

China has not disputed the scientific rationale behind global warming or denied the potential harm it could cause. Later this year, China is expected to release broad policy goals on how it can reduce emissions and respond to global warming. In December, it issued a report warning that climate change posed a serious threat to the country’s agricultural output and economy.

“The Chinese government is taking climate change extremely seriously,” Qin Dahe, chief of the China Meteorological Administration, told reporters at the briefing. “President Hu Jintao has said that climate change is not just an environmental issue but also a development issue, ultimately a development issue.”

DOJ_NMG_0128850

Indeed, even if Chinese leaders acknowledge the problem, they remain resistant to any sweeping measures that could threaten the country's development. Some efforts are already meeting with uneven results.

Mr. Qin, who served as a co-chairman of the United Nations panel that issued the global warming report last week, noted that China had set an ambitious five-year goal of improving energy efficiency by 20 percent. But last year, the country failed to meet the initial target in that schedule.

China's standing as both a huge developing country and as one of the world's fastest-growing economies has given it prominence in the global warming debate. Along with India, China is exempt from the requirements of the Kyoto Protocol, the agreement that calls on industrial nations to reduce emissions by 2012. (The United States signed the agreement, but has not ratified it.)

Asked if China would agree to mandatory, specific targets to reduce emissions, Mr. Qin did not answer directly.

"As a developing country that's growing rapidly and has a big population, to thoroughly transform the energy structure and use clean energy would need a lot of money," Mr. Qin said, according to [a news agency].

Ms. Jiang, the Foreign Ministry spokeswoman, said China recently ordered a shutdown of dirtier coal-fired power plants that emitted 5.4 million tons of sulfur dioxide a year.

Meanwhile, China has been experiencing record warm temperatures this winter that scientists attribute at least partly to global warming. Temperatures in Beijing have soared into the 50s in February, a month when the historical average is just below freezing.

Legacy Of Radiation Illness Stirs Objection To Nevada Bomb Test (WP)

By Sonya Geis

Washington Post, February 7, 2007

ST. GEORGE, Utah -- When the baby boomers of St. George were children, radioactive ash from nuclear test explosions in Nevada regularly drifted toward the red bluffs of their town and fell like snow. They played in it and wrote their names in it on car windows.

The federal government reassured the townspeople they were in no danger as it detonated 952 bombs in Nevada over four decades. But thousands of people who lived downwind of the test site got radiation-related cancer, and the town of 50,000 has its own cancer-treatment center today.

So when word got out recently that the government wants to test a huge conventional bomb in Nevada, sending a mushroom cloud thousands of feet in the air, people in St. George felt an unwelcome blast from the past.

At a series of emotional meetings last month in Las Vegas, St. George, Salt Lake City and the Idaho capital of Boise, people who live downwind of the Nevada Test Site expressed fear that if the government goes ahead with its code-named Divine Strake test, radioactive dust from previous tests will blow their way.

"People here have been exposed to radiation already. We don't need any little extra push," St. George native Michelle Thomas said in her home last week.

Thomas, 54, has had cancer twice, in the breast and in a salivary gland, and had a pre-malignant ovary removed. She suffers from polymyositis, a muscle-degenerating autoimmune disease. Ever since she became too sick to work as a teacher, she has spent her time on anti-nuclear activism.

"Fool me once, shame on you. Fool me twice, shame on me," she said.

The Pentagon plans to test a 700-ton ammonium-nitrate-and-fuel-oil "bunker buster" weapon on the Nevada Test Site, a 1,375-square-mile chunk of desert. Divine Strake will demonstrate the impact on deeply buried tunnels should a U.S. complex be attacked, or should the United States attack a bunker in another country. No date for the test has been set.

The Defense Threat Reduction Agency (DTRA) planned to conduct Divine Strake last June, but a Reno lawyer got an injunction to stop it. Robert Hager filed suit in April in federal court on behalf of the Western Shoshone tribe and people living downwind of the test site. A status hearing on the suit is scheduled for March 2.

Prompted by the lawsuit and outcry by lawmakers in Nevada, Utah and Idaho, the DTRA held a series of meetings and released a new environmental assessment.

DOJ_NMG_0128851

Its studies predict a mushroom cloud will rise about 4,500 feet above the desert and then settle back in place. The amount of radiation that might be released at the boundaries of the test site will be equivalent to the amount released by a smoke detector, authorities said.

"The Nevada Test Site is one of the best-studied areas in terms of meteorology," said Darwin Morgan, a spokesman for the Nevada Site Office. "We know the volume of dust picked up from the explosion. We took the weather for the worst time period: January, with the highest winds. When you model to that, it stays on the test site.

"Now, will every single microscopic atom stay on the test site?" he continued. "No, you can't do that. But the bulk of the dust will remain on the test site."

Defense officials have looked at moving the test to another site, but they say the alternatives would cost $100 million and take three years of planning. Holding it in Nevada could be done this year for $5 million.

"My personal feeling is, rather than have people completely discombobulated, like they're doing, it would be better to have it somewhere else," Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) said. "If it costs $100 million more, that's better than having people scared to death and worrying they're going to suffer the same afflictions their families did."

Besides citing health concerns, Hager's lawsuit also charges the test would be held improperly on tribal land, and that the government is really seeking to test the effects of a nuclear bomb.

James Tegnelia, director of the DTRA, has acknowledged there is now no way to transport a single conventional bomb of the type Divine Strake will test. Also, budget documents from 2005 and 2006 say Divine Strake will simulate a "low yield nuclear weapon ground shock environment." But the agency has since disavowed the word "nuclear," and DTRA officials said they have no plans to test nuclear weapons in the future.

Rep. Jim Matheson (D-Utah), whose district includes St. George, is not convinced.

"There's no such thing as a 700-ton conventional weapon," Matheson said in an interview. "Make no mistake about it, there's an effort to move into creating new nuclear weapons."

Matheson's family suffered personally from fallout, and he is just as skeptical as some of his constituents about Defense Department assurances. Matheson's father, former Utah governor Scott Matheson, died of multiple myeloma, a rare cancer that can be linked to radiation exposure.

Like others in southern Nevada, he speaks bitterly of declassified documents that show the government did not detonate nuclear bombs when the wind blew toward Las Vegas. They waited until the wind blew toward St. George.

"The people in Utah have long memories," Matheson said. "They've been lied to before. The people in Utah are so patriotic, they're among the most supportive of the government in the nation, and the government has taken advantage of that. So I'm always skeptical when someone tells me not to worry about the testing of weapons."

Democrats Rip EPA Chief Over Reforms (AP)

By Erica Werner

AP, February 7, 2007

The head of the Environmental Protection Agency faced down hostile critics Tuesday in his first committee appearance before the Democratic-led Congress, denying accusations that agency decisions last year rolled back environmental safeguards.

"These decisions and actions all accelerate the pace of environmental protection. They all deliver environmental results," EPA Administrator Stephen Johnson told the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee.

"Nobody's fooled by this," responded the new committee chair, Democratic Sen. Barbara Boxer of California.

"EPA has gone too long without meaningful oversight," she said, contending the changes "benefit polluters' bottom line and they hurt our communities."

At issue were a number of changes EPA made last year, including a new policy that reduces the role of scientists in setting air pollution standards; a move to raise the threshold for reporting releases of toxic chemicals; and the shuttering of five agency libraries where the public could look at scientific and health documents.

DOJ_NMG_0128852

A Government Accountability Office study released Tuesday said that EPA did not adhere to its own rule-making in making the changes to toxic chemicals reporting. The Toxic Reporting Inventory changes, said GAO, "will likely have a significant impact on information available to the public about dozens of toxic chemicals" at facilities nationwide.

Johnson said the new rule encourages businesses to adopt better waste management practices by allowing them to reduce emissions reporting if they do so. "My interest is to do anything I can to encourage businesses to reduce emissions," he said.

The EPA libraries were closed, Johnson said, because they got barely any visitors and the information they housed was being put on the Internet.

Boxer confronted him with internal agency e-mails and Web postings indicating more libraries were closed than he seemed to be aware of and suggesting EPA staff was ordered to throw away scientific journals at one library.

Johnson said some journals were discarded after they were contaminated by mold in a flood, and that in some cases documents were destroyed if there was more than one copy of them.

"Mr. Johnson, you're reading those notes very well, but you're unaware of what's happening in the agency," Boxer said.

Several Republicans on the panel defended Johnson, praising him for streamlining agency regulations and ridiculing the idea that poorly attended libraries were necessary.

Sen. James Inhofe, R-Okla., held up a series of books and videos he said were at EPA libraries. One was "The Lorax" by Dr. Seuss. Another was called "Fat Chicks Rule! How to Survive in a Thin-centric World." There was also a pilates exercise video and a computer software guide from 1983.

Senator Grills EPA Chief Over `environmental Rollbacks' (MCT)

By David Whitney

McClatchy Newspapers, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON - Sen. Barbara Boxer, the new chair of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, lambasted the head of the Environmental Protection Agency over "environmental rollbacks" in a hearing on Tuesday that was equal parts political theater and substance.

Conducting her first oversight hearing since becoming the panel's head last month, the liberal California Democrat detailed six areas where she said the agency's decisions have benefited industries at the expense of public health.

"EPA has gone too long without meaningful oversight," Boxer said. "I want to send a clear signal to EPA and to this administration: We are watching . . . and no longer will EPA rollbacks quietly escape scrutiny."

EPA Administrator Stephen L. Johnson defended the agency's actions, telling the committee that the Bush administration has a solid record of environmental achievement, including new rules on diesel fuel that he touted as the "single greatest achievement in clean fuel since lead was removed from gasoline."

"Regardless of rhetoric, our environmental record is clear," he said. "America's air, water and land are cleaner today than it was a generation ago, and under the Bush administration this progress continues."

Boxer focused the hearing on rules or policy decisions that the EPA proposed over the last six months or so, many of them in December before the Democrats took control of Congress.

Among the changes were reducing the requirements for some big industries to detail their release of toxic pollutants; weakening the role of scientists in air quality decisions; proposing to revoke the standard for lead emissions; and other changes on industrial air pollution.

Boxer and other committee Democrats complained that the changes were often at the behest of industry, resulting in less public awareness of the health threats in people's communities. Another policy they attacked was the closure of five of 26 EPA libraries and reduced hours at others.

"The pattern of these year-end actions is striking," Boxer said. "The public interest is sacrificed and environmental protection compromised."

DOJ_NMG_0128853

But Johnson, a 25-year EPA employee, said each of the rules Boxer raised was subject to misinterpretation. For example, he said, only companies that had eliminated or reduced other harmful emissions wouldn't have to report certain toxic pollutants in detail.

That change was one of the most controversial taken up at the hearing because those company reports become part of the national Toxic Release Inventory, a registry that allows people to look up on the Internet the toxic substances that plants vent in their neighborhoods.

The EPA regarded the change as an incentive for industry to cut pollution, Johnson said.

"The result is a cleaner environment for us all," he said.

Boxer zeroed in on the closure of the EPA libraries and employees' reports that large amounts of material was being discarded. Johnson insisted that only reports and journals of which the EPA had multiple copies were being pared.

When Boxer began grilling Johnson on the details, however, he quickly retreated, saying he had no information to answer her questions. But when the panel's senior Republican, Sen. James Inhofe of Oklahoma, asked Johnson about specific children's books and outdated computer manuals in the library collections, Johnson knew not only the titles but also the number of shelved copies.

Boxer said she was amazed by Johnson's knowledge of those books, but also that he was unaware that, as one agency staffer told her in an e-mail, 700 linear feet of journals, 25 percent of them "irreplaceable," were thrown out.

"E-mails have given us a story you apparently are unaware of," she told Johnson.

Republican committee members attempted to portray Boxer's concerns as trivial and the policy changes as prudent efforts at modernizing and streamlining.

"We are focusing on the wrong things," said Sen. Christopher "Kit" Bond, R-Mo.

"I appreciate that you consider these small in comparison to other things," Boxer retorted. "That's why we have two (political) parties."

Mining Heat From The Earth? New Technology Shows Promise. (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

Christian Science Monitor, February 7, 2007

Here's one vision for easing America's energy and emissions woes: Hundreds of drilling rigs are deployed throughout the country. But they're not prospecting for oil; they're looking for underground rock hot enough to produce steam-driven electricity. The potential? Enough power to provide 10 percent of US electricity by 2050 – with near-zero emissions of greenhouse gases.

That's the promise of "enhanced geothermal systems," or EGS, says a recent report by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in Cambridge, Mass.

There are just two major catches. First, about $800 million in research and development is needed over the next decade to make the drilling technology cost-effective. Second, the Department of Energy is trying to kill the program by ending its funding.

On Monday, the DOE unveiled a $24.3 billion fiscal 2008 budget with more funding for nuclear power, alternative fuels, and science programs – but nothing for geo- thermal.

"The department will conduct our own internal review and assessment of the [MIT] report and its recommendations," DOE spokesman Craig Stevens said in an e-mail. But geothermal energy has "already entered the mainstream," he added. The DOE aims to fund new technologies.

Some parts of the technology are indeed mature. For years, conventional geothermal technology has been tapping mostly hot springs formations in a few isolated locations in the Western US, providing about 0.3 percent of the nation's electricity. The newer, enhanced approach identified by MIT could be developed virtually anywhere.

"It appears that large areas of the United States are suitable for future geo- thermal exploitation in the near term that have not been considered in the past," states the recent report, sponsored by the DOE and written by an 18-member panel convened by MIT. "Most of the key technical requirements to make [it] work economically over a wide area of the country are in effect, with remaining goals easily within reach."

DOJ_NMG_0128854

The report, released Jan. 22, corroborates other reports – by the National Renewable Energy Laboratory last year and the Western Governors Association in 2005 – of a massive "deep geothermal" resource.

"We should give strong credence to the MIT report," says Dan Reicher, former assistant secretary for energy efficiency and renewable energy in the Clinton years. "With these deep resources, we have the potential to access new energy over most of the country, including the East Coast. This is the moment to be adding to, not cutting, the geothermal R&D budget."

Since the 1970s, a few EGS systems have been tested in a half-dozen places in the US, and test systems are now being developed in France and Australia. The EGS promise has grown along with advances in oil and gas drilling technology and US-industry research partnerships.

Unlike drilling for oil, often done in softer, permeable rock, the enhanced geo- thermal approach requires boring down one to six miles into solid rock. Power plants would inject water down one well, passing it through crevices in the hot rock, then extract steam through another well. Federal research should focus on drilling, rock fracturing, and thermal energy conversion technologies, advocates say.

That's because the cost of digging wells can be as much as 60 percent of the total capital investment of a 25- to 100-megawatt geothermal plant, the MIT study says. Today, drilling a 23,000-foot-deep well into New Hampshire granite would cost about $15 million and take nearly half a year, the report estimates. By contrast, drilling a 15,800-foot-deep oil well in 2004 cost $7.5 million on average, the report says. Advocates say more research could dramatically reduce drilling costs.

"One and all, these recent reports agree there is an enormous resource out there [that] we're still learning how to use," says Karl Gawell, executive director of the Geo- thermal Energy Association, a Washington trade group. "That's why it's so ironic when the White House and DOE say, 'Hey, we're done. There's nothing out there left to learn.' It totally contradicts what the studies are saying."

Geothermal's research budget at DOE was $24 million in fiscal 2006 – the smallest among major federal renewable energy research. But at White House budget office urging, the department eliminated geothermal funding for 2007.

In response, Congress last fall voted to restore at least $5 million to keep the program alive. Last week, Congress moved to add $300 million to the DOE's Office of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy – but left it up to the department to allocate some of those 2007 funds to geothermal. Now there is growing concern it won't happen.

"The administration has been surprisingly hostile to geothermal energy research development and deployment," Senate majority leader Harry Reid wrote in a Feb. 1 letter to Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman, obtained by the Monitor. Calling the zero budget for EGS in fiscal 2007 "counterproductive," Senator Reid asked the DOE to restore funding to at least 2006 levels and to assure Congress of continued funding. "Geothermal has the potential to cleanly and renewably satisfy the new electricity needs of the West," he wrote.

With such funding, the cost of enhanced geothermal power could fall from 8 to 9 cents a kilowatt hour today to less than 5 cents as the technology is deployed, making it competitive even with big coal-fired power plants, the MIT report says. Because EGS emits little carbon dioxide, it could become competitive with coal power if regulation makes carbon emissions costly.

One possible result: Geothermal plants could supply about 100,000 megawatts – the equivalent of 200 big coal-burning power plants – by 2050, according to the report. That power could help replace the 50,000 megawatts of coal-fired power and 40,000 megawatts of nuclear power that the US is expected to lose over the next 25 years as it closes old power plants.

Tax Break With A View (WSJ)

By Rachel Emma Silverman

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

Muscoe R.H. Garnett Jr.'s farm in Loretto, Va., hasn't changed much since the family acquired it in the 1600s. Now, the retired insurance executive has made sure it will stay that way.

Encouraged by recent tax legislation, Mr. Garnett has placed a "conservation easement" on much of his property, located about 80 miles from Washington, D.C. The move permanently shields the rolling pastures, timber forests and croplands from being turned into a housing subdivision or business park. Under the easement, which is a binding agreement typically made with a land trust, the Garnett family still owns the land and can continue to use it for farming and timber but most of it can never be developed.

DOJ_NMG_0128855

Landowners who place conservation easements on their scenic, environmentally sensitive or historic properties have long been able to get tax breaks from the federal government, and some states have also begun offering tax incentives. Now, a little-noticed provision in the wide-ranging pension law Congress passed last summer has made the federal tax breaks even more generous. Conservation groups say this has spurred a sharp increase in the number of landowners interested in placing easements on their property.

"The incentives are fantastic, and I don't think a lot of people realize it," Mr. Garnett says.

But the expanded federal incentives, backed by some influential lawmakers from agricultural states, are due to expire at the end of this year, unless Congress acts to extend them. (A bill recently introduced in the Senate would make the changes permanent, and President Bush also called for them to be made permanent in this week's budget proposal.) For now, landowners might need to act quickly, since conservation easements can take several months to put together.

Here's how it works: A landowner typically donates a conservation easement to a land trust, a type of non-profit organization that helps put together the easement and monitors its restrictions over time. The value of the donation for income-tax purposes generally is the difference between the land's unrestricted value and its new value with limited development or usage rights.

Be careful, though. The Internal Revenue Service and Congress in recent years have been concerned with easement abuses in which donors have taken inflated deductions or placed restrictions on land with little conservation value, such as golf courses. The new law includes stiffer rules and penalties regarding appraisals, to prevent donors from overstating the deduction for their land. The IRS says it is currently auditing hundreds of easements.

But the law is designed to encourage easement donations by allowing larger tax deductions. Landowners can now deduct the value of a donation up to 50% of their adjusted gross income per year, up from the previous ceiling of 30%. That means if your adjusted gross income is $100,000, you are now eligible for as much as a $50,000 tax deduction a year, instead of $30,000. And if your income is too low to deduct the full amount of your gift in one year, you can now carry forward the deduction for 15 additional years, up from five years previously.

Property held in family limited partnerships, limited liability companies and some types of corporations may also be able to take advantage of the increased deduction limits, says Stephen J. Small, a Boston tax lawyer who specializes in conservation easements.

The law is even more generous for career farmers and ranchers who earn at least half their income from their land. These property owners, who are often land-rich, but cash-poor, can now deduct up to 100% of their income. "If you're a farmer you could pay no federal income taxes for 16 years," says Rand Wentworth, president of the Land Trust Alliance, a coalition of 1,600 land trusts across the country.

Colorado rancher Jay Fetcher in recent years placed conservation easements on two large parcels of his 2,000-acre cattle ranch near ski resort Steamboat Springs. The first donation, on 1,350 acres, was worth about $1.1 million for tax purposes. But Mr. Fetcher, limited at the time to deducting a small portion of his income, was able to take only about $60,000 of that donation in deductions over six years. "We left almost all of the donation on the table," he says.

Mr. Fetcher is planning this year to make another easement donation on 270 acres to a Colorado land trust. He expects the value of the donation will be about $1.2 million, and thinks he will be able to recoup roughly half that amount because of the higher federal tax deductions and an increase in state tax credits. "The changes helped us," says Mr. Fetcher. Still, he says the financial incentives are secondary to his desire to preserve the land, in his family since 1949, with its sweeping views of mountains and pine forest. "Our family has no desire to ever see the ranch developed. That's at the beginning of it all," says Mr. Fetcher.

The tax-rule change has generated sharply increased interest in conservation easements, say land trust officials from Washington and Wyoming to Georgia. "Some landowners whom we've been talking to for five or almost 10 years say that now it makes economic sense for them," says Laurie Wayburn, president of the Pacific Forest Trust in San Francisco.

Conservation easements can generate other tax benefits, too. They can cut estate taxes, because the land is considered to be worth less under an easement. A growing number of states offer a range of income tax breaks. Colorado and Virginia, for example, give donors state income tax credits that are transferable, which means that landowners who don't need the tax credits can sell the credits to other taxpayers for instant cash. You may even get a property tax break, depending on where you live.

DOJ_NMG_0128856

Conservation easements can vary. A farm owner, for instance, could still retain the right to farm the land and to build a couple additional homes or barns, but could limit the land from being further subdivided. Property owners can sell their land, but buyers are obligated to honor the easement.

Peter Bance recently placed a conservation easement on 65 acres of the Virginia farmland that has been in his family since 1840. The property was zoned to allow construction of six housing sites, and he donated the rights to five of those sites to a state-run land trust. (He kept one site in case a descendant wanted to build a house in the future.) "We think we have a piece of heaven and we hope to keep it that way for generations to come," says Mr. Bance, 55, who is an executive with Wachovia Corp.

If you're thinking of doing a conservation easement, it's best to contact a land trust in your area to find out if your property qualifies. (Try www.lta.org, the Web site of the Land Trust Alliance.) There's no minimum size, but in order to get a tax deduction the property has to meet certain criteria, such as having significant environmental, scenic or historic value. Also, be sure to work with a tax and legal adviser familiar with local applicable laws.

The land has to be appraised (try www.appraisers.org, the Web site of the American Society of Appraisers) and may need to be surveyed, which can cost a few thousand dollars. There are also legal fees to draw up the easement, which can cost several thousand dollars, depending on the complexity of the deal. Some land trusts also recommend landowners make cash donations to the land trust to help fund the organization's future monitoring of the easement.

Because easements are placed in perpetuity, a family has to be sure it wants to permanently restrict development -- and the potential for a big windfall -- before committing.

Several months ago, after discussions with his wife, children and grandchildren, Eslick Daniel placed a conservation easement on his 200-acre farm in Columbia, Tenn., near Nashville. The easement on the farm, called "Sweet Easy," limits development, except for a couple of building sites that Dr. Daniel's descendants could use for housing. For Dr. Daniel, 65 years old and a retired orthopedic surgeon, the tax incentives weren't a factor. "We wanted to keep it where it would be open land for our family and for other people," he says.

Write to Rachel Emma Silverman at rachel.silverman@wsj.com

House Committee Approves Bill To Combat Indian Meth Use (AP)

AP, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A House subcommittee on Tuesday took a step toward helping Indian communities battle crisis levels of methamphetamine use.

A House Judiciary subcommittee passed legislation sponsored by New Mexico Rep. Tom Udall, a Democrat, that would allow territories and Indian tribes to receive law enforcement grants to battle meth use.

Udall said larger meth legislation passed by Congress last year "unintentionally left out" Indian tribes as possible applicants for some grant programs. This legislation would clarify that law so the tribes would be eligible.

He noted that meth use has been disproportionately worse in Native American communities, citing a 2005 National Survey on Drug Use and Health. That study reported a "past year methamphetamine use" rate of 1.7 percent for American Indians and Alaska Natives and 2.2 percent for Native Hawaiians.

Ben Shelly, vice president of the Navajo Nation, also testified at the hearing.

"The escalating problem of methamphetamine is affecting the entire nation and has reached epidemic levels," Shelly said. "Methamphetamine use and production places tremendous burden on the already severely underfunded Indian health care system and law enforcement."

The full committee will consider the legislation Wednesday. It is expected to pass the bill, which will then move to the House floor.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

DOJ_NMG_0128857

Combating Threat Of Cross-border Gangs Discussed (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

Rodrigo Avila-Aviles came to Los Angeles from El Salvador this week to discuss an export-import problem that has nothing to do with tariffs or quotas.

As director general of the El Salvador National Civil Police, Avila-Aviles is here to talk to the FBI about what can be done about the number of gang members moving back and forth between Central America and the United States.

Once here, they learn new ways to menace neighborhoods before they are deported, the director general said.

"As a general rule, the guys who have more status in the gangs in El Salvador are the ones who have been deported from the United States, who have been in prison here," Avila-Aviles said Tuesday as he and the heads of police forces for four other Central American nations prepared to discuss the issue today with their U.S. counterparts.

In Guatemala, there are up to 20,000 gang members, about 1,000 of them deportees from the U.S., according to Erwin Johann Sperisen-Vernon, director general of the Guatemala National Civil Police.

"These deportees come to our country and organize and spread their franchises there," Sperisen-Vernon said. "They get more sophisticated in their ways of committing crime."

But the traffic goes both ways, with U.S. law enforcement struggling to deal with an influx of gang members from Central America and Mexico. Los Angeles Police Chief William J. Bratton said the large number of such criminal gang members illegally in the United States is making gang violence worse.

Law enforcement executives hope the three-day meeting at the Universal City Hilton will help them find solutions while learning from one another.

"The effort is to continue to inform, educate and develop relationships so we can have a much more concentrated effort internationally on dealing with our gang problems," said Bratton, who will address the meeting today.

Also attending will be the heads of law enforcement in Mexico, Belize and Honduras, as well as representatives of the FBI, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, the federal Drug Enforcement Agency, and police chiefs from Los Angeles and other U.S. cities.

The extent of the cross-border problem was made clear during a recent raid on gang members involved in violent extortion schemes in one El Salvadoran town. Of the 120 people arrested, 40 had been deported at least once from the U.S., Avila-Aviles said.

Although gangs in El Salvador include some with names tied to the Los Angeles area — the 18th Street and MS-13 gangs for instance — Avila-Aviles is quick to add that he does not blame the U.S. for the problem.

"These guys are Salvadoran," he said. "They learn all this stuff in this country, but I cannot blame the United States for deporting them. However, even though the U.S. is not to blame, we need to look out for new mechanisms so we have more control over these guys."

Cooperative measures announced as part of a four-part plan this week by U. S. Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales include fugitive apprehension, international coordination on deportations, information sharing, and cross-border training and prevention programs.

To better identify, track and apprehend gang members, the FBI will accelerate implementation of the Central American Fingerprinting Exploitation system, Gonzales said.

"This initiative will enable the United States and our colleagues in Central America to share information and coordinate law enforcement efforts as we work in partnership to target and dismantle violent gangs," Gonzales said.

Eighty out of every 100 homicides in El Salvador are gang-related, according to Avila-Aviles.

"If we put it together as a whole, the single most important criminal problem in our country is the gang activity," he said.

The directors general from El Salvador and Guatemala say they want the meeting's discussions also to focus on ways to prevent young people from joining gangs.

"We need some regional initiatives in the prevention area," Avila-Aviles said.

*

DOJ_NMG_0128858

patrick.mcgreevy@latimes.com

Central America's Top Cops In LA For International Gang Summit (MERCN)

By Andrew Glazer

The San Jose Mercury News, February 7, 2007

LOS ANGELES - Not long ago, the U.S. regularly deported convicted gang members to their home countries in Central America without tipping off local police of their criminal past, the director of El Salvador's national police said Tuesday on the eve of an international summit on gangs.

Los Angeles' pervasive and violent street gangs were seen as a local problem and not part of an international criminal web, even as some gangs such as MS-13 and 18th Street, oozed across borders into Mexico, Guatemala, El Salvador and Honduras.

The three-day summit beginning Wednesday in Los Angeles reflects a recent shift in that philosophy. It features top officials from several Central American and local U.S. police departments, along with the FBI.

Seminar participants said gang members have been taking advantage of the lack of information sharing to cross borders unidentified by local police - bringing weapons, ideas for criminal enterprise and rivalries.

"Now it is most important to take advantage of technology, of our shared economic interests and of our information to find new ways to make sure these violent gangs don't continue to find ways of staying in the dark," said Rodrigo Avila Avilez, director general of El Salvador's national police.

Earlier this week in El Salvador, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez announced an initiative to improve anti-gang cooperation between the two countries that will ease the arrest of fugitives, coordinate training and improve information sharing and gang intelligence gathering.

Avila Avilez estimated there were as many as 15,000 gang members in El Salvador, a country of about 6.8 million. There are about 6,000 gang members in Guatemala, a country of 12.3 million, said Ervin Johann Sperisen Vernon, director general of Guatemala's national police.

By comparison, police estimate Los Angeles County has about 40,000 gang members.

The spread of Los Angeles-style gangs to Central America is in part the result of mass deportations of young men indoctrinated in the city's violent streets after fleeing their home countries during the civil wars of the 1970s and 80s. In many cases, gang members raised in Los Angeles have more in common culturally with the city than their home countries, police officials said.

"In El Salvador, they speak Spanglish, or Spanish with a Mexican accent," Avila Avilez said. "It gives them a privileged status among fellow gang members."

Robert B. Loosle, who oversees the FBI's gang investigations in Los Angeles, said crimes committed by gangs in Central America serve as a bellwether for potential criminal enterprises in the U.S.

Particularly noteworthy, Loosle said, was a spike in extortion rackets committed by gangs in El Salvador. Armed members of MS-13 regularly shake down neighborhoods for protection money and demand taxes from bus and truck drivers passing through their turf.

"Since members of gangs travel freely across borders, we need to pay attention to new trends they bring with them," Loosle said.

Sperisen Vernon said gangs in Guatemala are increasingly recruiting young children to deal drugs, stash dirty money and even kill rivals.

"It's much more complicated to jail minors," he said.

He and Avila Avilez both mentioned another disturbing trend: the spread of gang recruitment from the disillusioned poor to children from good homes who are too afraid to remain unaffiliated.

"There is a saying in some El Salvador neighborhoods," Avila Avilez said. "It is, 'If you're not in a gang, then you're against gangs.'"

L.A. Exports Gang Terror (LADN)

By Rachel Uranga, Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0128859

Los Angeles Daily News, February 7, 2007

Bratton to open world summit focusing on links to Central America

Acknowledging that Los Angeles is the epicenter of a global gang crisis, fueling violence from Guatemala to Russia, law enforcement officials from around the world will meet this week to tackle the scourge.

LAPD Chief William Bratton will open a three-day summit today to discuss the migration of gang members from Southern California to their homelands, bringing a culture of violence and terror.

"We are seeing the international gang problem growing by leaps and bounds," said Lt. Gary Nanson, head of the Los Angeles Police Department's Valley gang unit. "They have opened up the door for the local criminal. They are more worldly in their ability to franchise, they can move stolen goods or narcotics or money across boundaries."

The summit will focus on gangs with ties to Central America. Becoming increasingly sophisticated and murderous, these transnational gangs - such as the U.S.-grown Mara Salvatrucha, or MS-13 - are ravaging poor Central American communities and terrorizing Los Angeles neighborhoods.

The techniques are increasingly similar on both sides of the border.

In El Salvador, officials say, gang members commit half of the country's homicides. But there, gang members have derailed the city's infrastructure. In December 2005, Salvadoran gangs demanding "taxes" killed a series of bus drivers, shutting down service.

Local police are afraid some of the more brazen tactics Central American gangs use will emerge in Los Angeles.

"Their tactics are a lot more vicious than other gangs, they are more violent and they are everywhere," said Robert Loofle, the FBI agent overseeing Los Angeles' criminal division. "They use intimidation to get what they want, they will commit a vicious homicide to show their power and the force, then easily cross the border.

"We have to clamp down now so they don't evolve into something stronger and more vicious."

Cooperation needed

Key to slowing gang activity is better cooperation among police agencies in all countries - an item officials will focus on this week. All are clamoring for better intelligence.

Now, local law enforcement agencies contact other countries when they are looking for a suspect to be extradited. With increased cooperation, federal and local authorities hope they can eventually share surveillance on gang members and knowledge of their activities.

"Our fear is that they become franchises and unwittingly help other organizations like narco-traffickers as muscle or transporting money," Loofle said.

In areas of the San Fernando Valley, where transnational gangs such as MS 13 and 18th Street have taken root in North Hollywood and Van Nuys in recent years, violent gang crime has soared.

Most troubling, police say, is the rising level of witness intimidation, which criminal organizations use to keep their members out of jail. In the North Hollywood area, the number of intimidation cases rose 85 percent in 2005-06, from 13 to 24.

"The part that scares us is that the percentage of increase of violent gang crime is higher in the Valley than any other regions ... we need to act fast," Nanson said.

Last year the San Fernando Valley saw a 42 percent increase in violent gang crime and citywide, gang crime jumped 14 percent. There has also been a rise in hate crimes among gang members.

New anti-gang effort

The summit comes a day before Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa is set to release a sweeping anti-gang effort and follows a high-profile report finding the city's gang prevention piecemeal and ineffective.

Community activists have lobbied for intervention efforts such as lengthening school hours and providing job opportunities. But stopping the spread of gangs - who can call on strong family ties and rooted criminal networks in both countries - will prove tough.

"The idea of eradicating them is erroneous and the way of totally severing the ties is misconceived," said Tom Ward, a University of Southern California expert on Central American gangs. "As long as you have migrants coming back, how are you going to determine which one is a gang member or an ex-gang member?

"Gangs are a reflection of society, they are symptom of sick societies, you address the social problems that bred the gangs and they won't necessarily go away but the problems they cause will be significantly diminished," Ward said.

Federal crackdown

Responding to the surge in gang activity nationally, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement in 2005 launched Operation Community Shield targeting gangs across the U.S.

Under the effort, more than 4,302 street-gang members from 442 gangs were arrested, about one-fourth of those on pending criminal charges.

Over the past decade, as hundreds of gang members have been deported - immigration officials have no official estimate of just how many - and others returned home, a new gang culture emerged in their home country.

"It used to be for kids in the poor neighborhoods ... Now it's kids from well-to-do homes," said Rodrigo Avila, El Salvador's top law enforcement official. "They are forced into it, under pressure."

21 In Dorchester, Quincy Arrested (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy And Charles A. Radin, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, February 3, 2007

Called members of drug rings tying Canada to Boston area

They worked out of nondescript little storefronts around Dorchester and Quincy: a flower shop, nail salon, grocery store, and wood floor finishing business. But yesterday law enforcement officials said the unidentified businesses were covers for members of Vietnamese drug rings who had been smuggling ecstasy and marijuana from Canada over the past two years and peddling it throughout Greater Boston.

Four indictments handed down by a federal grand jury Thursday and unsealed yesterday charged 23 people, ranging in age from 22 to 56, with conspiring to sell ecstasy or marijuana, and in some cases both. Three of them were also charged with money laundering.

"This ecstasy was manufactured in clandestine laboratories in Canada, then smuggled into the United States, ending up in Boston and further distributed to gangs and other buyers in the city," said June W. Stansbury, special agent in charge of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration's Boston office.

The alleged drug organization was dismantled from top to bottom by investigators who targeted the Canadian supplier and arrested local gangs that sold the drugs in the Boston area, Stansbury told reporters during a news conference yesterday.

The investigation started when an immigrant, who was facing possible deportation in February 2005 after his arrest on charges involving drugs, guns, and an assault on a police officer, began cooperating with Boston police and the DEA and identified a list of local drug dealers, according to an affidavit filed in federal court.

A task force of federal agents, state troopers, and local police tapped telephones, sifted through trash, made undercover drug buys, and conducted exhaustive surveillance during a 15-month probe dubbed Operation Polar Express that led to the four indictments, according to law enforcement officials.

Investigators seized 85,000 ecstasy pills, worth nearly $2.6 million on the street, 130 pounds of marijuana, five guns, and $25,000.

Law enforcement officials raided houses in Dorchester and Quincy yesterday and arrested 21 of those charged.

The remaining two suspects were being sought last night, officials said.

US Attorney Michael J. Sullivan said the indictments "will have an immediate and positive impact on the city of Boston and the neighboring communities."

Some of the ecstasy pills seized were laced with methamphetamine, which was added by the manufacturer to make the drug more addictive.

Sullivan called the mixture "a dangerous trend" that has been developing across the country over the past few years.

Boston Police Commissioner Edward F. Davis said, "These drugs that were being sold on the streets of our city were destroying the qualify of life for people and driving the crime rate up."

DOJ_NMG_0128861

Among those indicted were a family that lives on Bloomfield Street in Dorchester, including Tiem Trinh , 54; his wife, Anna , 51; and their sons Antwon Trinh , 24, and Quoc Boa Trinh, 27.

Quoc Boa Trinh, an alleged ringleader, is charged in three separate indictments with conspiring to sell ecstasy and marijuana and money laundering.

His parents and brother are charged with conspiring to possess with intent to distribute marijuana.

Boston lawyer Michael C. Andrews, who is representing Quoc Boa Trinh, said his client works at his father's convenience store, T J Variety, and is "a hard-working young man from a good family."

His client is "looking forward to his day in court," Andrews said.

A neighbor of the Trinhs said they "were very nice people."

"I don't know much about them, but we never had any trouble," the neighbor said.

The family had lived in the house for more than two years, the neighbor said.

But affidavits filed in federal court offered a different portrait.

A witness told investigators that Quoc Boa Trinh wore a bulletproof vest, owned a couple of guns, and obtained up to 300 pounds of marijuana a week from his supplier, Tan Dinh Phung, 43, of Dorchester. Phung was also arrested yesterday.

Last night, investigators were searching for Hung Van Le, 37, of Revere and Van H. Nguyen, 25, of Dorchester.

Affidavits also assert that Nguyen and another man indicted , Long T. Vu, picked up 40,000 ecstasy pills in Buffalo in December. They were stopped by Massachusetts State Police, who seized the drugs. Vu, 23, of Christy Lane in Randolph, is in custody.

Newton Man Faces Federal Drug Charges (DNT)

Newton (MA) Daily Tribune, February 6, 2007

BOSTON - A Newton man is among 23 people indicted by a federal grand jury on drug charges stemming from a 15-month investigation known as Operation Polar Express, a U.S. Attorney's Office spokeswoman said.

The four federal indictments and several search warrants were unsealed Friday, following the arrests of 23 men and women on conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute Ecstasy and marijuana, spokeswoman Samantha Martin said.

Vinh Dung Diep, 26, of 197 Linwood Ave., Newton, is charged with one count and faces up to five years in prison if convicted, she said.

Others arrested are from Dorchester, Quincy, Randolph, Revere, Allston, New York, Rhode Island and Connecticut.

Operation Polar Express targeted wholesale and retail illegal drug distributors in Massachusetts and their sources of supply in Canada and other parts of the United States, Martin said.

According to documents filed in the case, a Drug Enforcement Administration task force had been investigating marijuana and Ecstasy distribution in Boston since October 2005.

The investigation included surveillance; wiretaps; undercover drug buys; "trash pulls;" and the seizure of drugs, firearms and other drug paraphernalia, during traffic stops and home searches, documents state.

Martin said about 85,000 Ecstasy pills and 100 pounds of marijuana have been seized.

"Complete cooperation among federal, state, and local law enforcement partners made it possible to dismantle this drug-dealing organization," said U.S. Attorney Michael J. Sullivan. "(These) indictments demonstrate our resolve to make our neighborhoods safer by reducing the availability of drugs in our communities and prosecuting those who peddle their poison."

June W. Stansbury, DEA special agent in charge, said the drugs were marketed using images such as Superman, a bat, a kangaroo and even the Statue of Liberty.

"It's ironic that a group of traffickers who chose to use our symbol of liberty now face losing theirs," she said.

Former Drug Boss Sent To Prison For Life For Cocaine Ring (DDN)

Dayton Daily News, February 6, 2007

DAYTON — An ex-Los Angeles drug boss was sentenced Monday in federal court to life in prison for supplying hundreds of pounds of cocaine to the Dayton area.

DOJ_NMG_0128862

A jury in September convicted Ronald Taylor, 47, on charges accusing him of operating a continuing criminal enterprise and conspiracy to distribute and possess more than 300 pounds of cocaine.

The operation funneled cocaine from L.A. to Dayton, Columbus, New York City, Buffalo, Milwaukee, Detroit, Nashville and Washington, D.C., between September 1999 and July 2001, prosecutors said.

Senior U.S. Judge Walter H. Rice sentenced Taylor.

Prosecutors Tie Kiel Problems To Gambling (SDUT)

By Brent Schrotenboer, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 7, 2007

Attorney says losses at casinos may be addressed in talks

Frequent gambling losses at area casinos apparently led Chargers safety Terrence Kiel to seek other means of income, including the shipping of codeine-based cough syrup that got him arrested last year, law enforcement authorities said.

Officials were told in their investigation that gambling is "exactly what caused the problem, that he was in over his head because he gambles too much," San Diego Deputy District Attorney Damon Mosler said.

Kiel, 26, is due in court today for a trial readiness hearing on five felony charges related to the cough syrup matter. Kiel's attorney, Bob Grimes, said he hoped to reach a deal with prosecutors and the judge, and that it could include Kiel's addressing of the gambling issue.

"The issue of gambling may be addressed," Grimes said. "But we don't know for sure. That's one of the things that could be part of the deal or it could not be."

Law enforcement sources said gambling was suspected because selling codeine-based cough syrup isn't very lucrative and that records show Kiel had dozens of cash transactions of at least $10,000 each at area casinos.

Grimes declined to address the specifics of the gambling issue.

Kiel also has been under investigation by Immigration and Customs Enforcement for transactions involving counterfeit Nike shoes from China. Grimes said he didn't expect charges in that case.

Said General Manager A.J. Smith: "We are very much aware of Terrence's personal and legal situation. We think it's best he addresses them, not us."

While Kiel has one year remaining on his contract, it appears unlikely he will return to the Chargers in 2007.

Smith would not address whether Kiel would be a Charger beyond this month, but he said recently in response to a question about Kiel's status with the team: "We've had a lot of problems this year, and we'll clean up a little bit of our mess."

Gambling issues with players long have been a concern for the NFL, which considers them a threat to its security and integrity.

Kiel's salary was $460,000 last year, his fourth with the Chargers. He signed a six-year, $3.71 million contract as a rookie, which included a $1.25 million signing bonus.

Mosler said prosecutors and the judge could ask Kiel to do community service as part of any deal that is reached. Such community service could include speaking on the dangers of drugs or gambling.

"The idea is not to see him again," Mosler said.

Records show Kiel has struggled with financial problems in the past year. On Sept. 7, a notice of default was filed by a loan corporation against Kiel, seeking payment of $16,610 from a $591,634 mortgage. The property no longer is being foreclosed. In 2005, Kiel obtained a $50,000 home equity line of credit. When $49,438 became due, Kiel "refused to pay," according to the lender. The case was settled in April.

Prosecutors allege Kiel was illegally obtaining codeine-based cough syrup from a friend, Hope Devina Vines, who worked at a San Diego pharmacy and was stealing it from her employer. Vines, a licensed pharmacy technician at Sharp Rees-Stealy in San Diego, has been arrested on felony charges of theft and possession of a controlled substance in connection with the case. Kiel and Vines have pleaded not guilty and both are expected in court today.

DOJ_NMG_0128863

Kiel was arrested in September after Drug Enforcement Administration agents intercepted two express mail packages containing 18 pint bottles full of the drug. Authorities said Kiel admitted to shipping the cough syrup to his native Texas, where it can sell for up to $325 on the street and where it is mixed with soft drinks.

In an unrelated matter, the San Diego city attorney's office has charged Kiel with public urination, a violation of the municipal code. Police cited Kiel in the Gaslamp Quarter in December.

3 Plead Guilty In Drug Ring (CP)

Connecticut Post, February 7, 2007

BRIDGEPORT — The front for the cocaine distribution ring was an auto dealership on Barnum Avenue.

The carriers were often cars packed with cocaine and driven here from New York.

Once unloaded, the cocaine was cut, packaged and distributed throughout Fairfield County and the Naugatuck Valley.

That is, until the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's High Intensity Drug Task Force wiretapped telephones at East End Auto on Barnum Avenue and videotaped drug deals.

Three more ring members — including Luis "Papo" Robles, 42, of Evelyn Road, Derby, who owned East End Auto — pleaded guilty this week, just before the scheduled start of their trial on cocaine trafficking charges.

Robles; Raul Reyes, 36, of Main Street; and Michael Harding, 31, of Karen Avenue, all pleaded guilty to conspiring to possess with the intent to distribute cocaine.

U.S. District Judge Stefan R. Underhill set May 3 for sentencing. Robles and Reyes face a mandatory minimum 10-year prison term and a maximum life sentence. Harding faces a maximum 30-year term.

During his guilty plea, Robles acknowledged that he attempted to obstruct the probe by threatening witnesses.

The three guilty pleas bring to 13 the number of ring members who have admitted their roles in the operation.

Ryan Persad, 44, of Horton Hill Road; Ignacio Vasquez, 31, of Berkshire Avenue; and Isabel Pagan, 30, of Palisade Avenue, have maintained their innocence and are awaiting trial.

The defendants were rounded up last April. At the same time, DEA agents conducted 11 searches in Bridgeport, Derby and Naugatuck in which they seized $125,000 cash, six cars, three and a half pounds of cocaine and 500 grams of crack.

Police from Ansonia, Bridgeport, Derby, Easton, Greenwich, New Canaan, Newtown, Norwalk, Stratford, Stamford and West Haven assisted in the probe.

Assistant U.S. Attorneys H. Gordon Hall and James Smart are prosecuting the cases.

North Dakota Issues First Hemp Production Licenses To 2 Farmers (AP)

By Blake Nicholson, Associated Press

AP, February 6, 2007

DEA still must approve

BISMARCK, N.D. – North Dakota issued the nation's first licenses to grow industrial hemp Tuesday to two farmers who still must meet federal requirements before they can plant the crop.

The farmers must get approval from the Drug Enforcement Administration, which treats hemp much the way it does marijuana and has not allowed commercial hemp production but has said it would consider applications to grow it.

Hemp is a cousin of marijuana that contains trace amounts of the chemical that causes a marijuana high, though hemp does not produce the same effects. The sturdy, fibrous plant is used to make an assortment of products including paper, rope, clothing and cosmetics.

Industrial hemp cultivation is legal in Canada and other countries but is banned in the United States. Law enforcement officials worry that industrial hemp can shield the growing of marijuana, although hemp supporters say that fear is unfounded.

The North Dakota Agriculture Department approved rules late last year for hemp production with the DEA's concerns in mind, State Agriculture Commissioner Roger Johnson has said.

The state issued permits Tuesday to Wayne Hauge and Dave Monson, who is also a legislator. The state Agriculture Department is processing 16 other hemp applications, Johnson said.

DOJ_NMG_0128864

“It's taken us a lot longer than (expected) to get here, and I'm thinking we still have a ways to go,” said Monson, the House assistant Republican majority leader.

Joseph Rannazzisi, an administrator with the DEA, said federal law does not allow the agency to delegate its ability to regulate hemp to state officials. Although the DEA may waive registration requirements, it has done so only for law enforcement officers and other officials, he said.

Johnson asked the DEA in December to waive its $2,293 registration fee, but federal officials rejected that request. Johnson said he will hand-deliver Hauge's and Monson's applications when he meets with DEA officials in Washington early next week to try again to persuade them to relax the annual fee requirement.

North Dakota is one of seven states that have authorized industrial hemp farming. The others are Hawaii, Kentucky, Maine, Maryland, Montana and West Virginia, according to Vote Hemp, an industrial hemp advocacy organization based in Bedford, Mass.

Hemp Farming Licensees Have Different Plans (AP)

AP, February 6, 2007

BISMARCK, N.D. The first two North Dakota farmers to be licensed to grow industrial hemp have different plans for their future crops, assuming the federal government allows them to be cultivated.

Dave Monson of Osnabrock, in northeastern North Dakota, and Wayne Hauge of Ray, in the northwestern corner of the state, on Tuesday received the first two licenses issued under new state rules for growing the crop.

Hemp can be used to make numerous products, from food to clothing, and Monson said he has received calls from potential buyers as far away as Taiwan. Monson, who also is a state lawmaker, wants to sell both hemp seed and fiber.

"I hope to capitalize on every part of (the plant)," he said. "There will be no problem finding a market."

Hauge said he wants to grow and sell registered hemp seed to other farmers.

"I think it's a viable crop," he said. "I think it would work well in rotations in both eastern and western North Dakota."

Hemp is a cousin of marijuana and falls under federal anti-drug rules, even though it does not produce a high. That means farmers licensed by North Dakota to grow hemp must also obtain approval from the federal Drug Enforcement Administration, which is not certain.

The annual federal registration fee is $2,293. Monson said the federal fee to import seed from Canada, where hemp is legally grown, would be an additional $1,147, though he and state Agriculture Commissioner Roger Johnson said one person could import seed for several farmers.

The state license costs a minimum of $202. Monson said with licensing, registration and seed expenses, "before you even get out of the chute you're looking at $400 an acre (in costs)."

Hemp still can be profitable, Monson said.

"You're looking at $500 an acre for seed and whatever you can get for fiber ... $100 per acre for straw would be realistic," he said. Organically grown hemp could fetch as much as $900 per acre, Monson said.

If he gets federal permission, Monson plans to seed 10 acres of industrial hemp this spring to "test the waters." Hauge plans to grow 100 acres.

Both farmers also grow other crops, including the more traditional wheat and barley. Monson also grows canola, and Hauge last year experimented with black beans.

Neither farmer plans to build a fence around his hemp field. A fence is not part of the state licensing requirements, though one would be needed under federal rules.

"They have this additional crazy requirement that is designed for drugs," Johnson said. "Chain-link, razor-wire topped, 10 to 12 feet high, 24-hour surveillance."

Johnson has urged the DEA to ease its rules, and plans to meet with officials in Washington, D.C., again early next week to "request that they work in every way possible with us."

Law enforcement officials worry that industrial hemp crops could shield stands of illegal marijuana. Supporters of legalizing hemp cultivation say that fear is unfounded.

DOJ_NMG_0128865

In a related development, the North Dakota House on Tuesday approved legislation that gives North Dakota State University the authority to import and resell industrial hemp seed. The bill now goes to the Senate.

GOP Lawmakers Press Bush On Afghanistan (LAT)

By Josh Meyer, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

Four leading House members call for new tactics to turn the tide in the fight against insurgents and drugs.

WASHINGTON — Four ranking Republican lawmakers on a committee with oversight of U.S. policy in Afghanistan are calling on the Pentagon and State Department to dramatically change their tactics in that country to better contain its growing insurgency and flow of opium to the rest of the world.

In a letter dated today, the GOP House members are urging the Bush administration to act quickly to counter a host of problems in Afghanistan that they say are being made worse by mismanagement and misplaced priorities. They are calling for the appointment of a special coordinator of overall narco-terrorism policy for Afghanistan to prevent losing the fight against insurgents and drug traffickers.

The letter describes in detail how various U.S. agencies such as the Pentagon, State Department and Drug Enforcement Administration are not working together and essentially are fighting separate wars against insurgents and drugs even though they believe that the booming heroin trade is fueling the insurgency and financing terrorist attacks.

"As we will soon face another massive opium harvest in Afghanistan, and a related spring offensive by anti-coalition militants (ACMs), it is time for some new thinking to ensure that Afghanistan does not fall into a failed narco-state status and become, once again, a safe haven for Al Qaeda. We need to act now to prevent that," wrote Reps. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.), Mike Pence (R-Ind.), Elton Gallegly (R-Simi Valley) and Dana Rohrabacher (R-Huntington Beach), all members of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The letter was sent late Tuesday to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, with copies delivered to the White House, DEA, Office of National Drug Control Policy and the British government, said a senior congressional staffer who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the letter.

The four Republicans say they may introduce legislation to enact and fund some of their proposals, but urge the White House to quickly implement other policy changes on its own. Democrats in Congress also have complained about rising drug trafficking and the growing insurgency in Afghanistan.

White House national security spokesman Gordon Johndroe said he had not seen the letter and could not comment on the lawmakers' requests. But he said the administration had been actively reassessing its policies in Afghanistan in recent months as part of a comprehensive "strategic review," which prompted senior officials to call for at least $10.6 billion in additional funding for Afghanistan over the next two years.

The new funding was a recognition "that we needed to make a larger effort … so that we can help the Afghan government succeed and we can defeat the Taliban," Johndroe said. "But obviously our counter-terrorism and counter-narcotics programs in Afghanistan work hand in hand. This is something that our people are coordinating on the ground."

The additional funding, though much needed in Afghanistan, is virtually worthless without a coordinated policy that ensures that all U.S. counter-terrorism and counter-narcotics agencies are working together, and not against each other, the senior congressional official asserted. "We have so many different views of narcotics within our own government and with our allies that somebody has to bang everybody's heads together and get something done on this," the staffer said. "We are out of time, and losing Afghanistan."

The Republican House members also said the United States must resolve a growing dispute with Britain over how to best fight the booming opium trade. British authorities who are now in charge of much of the counter-narcotics effort in Afghanistan are refusing to go along with a controversial U.S. policy to eradicate entire fields of poppy by aerial spraying.

Britain, as well as the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, which leads the forces battling the insurgency in Afghanistan, believes the U.S. policy is dangerous because it alienates farmers and the population at large and undermines Western efforts to turn them against the narco-traffickers and the Taliban, several U.S. and British counter-terrorism officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0128866

The senior congressional staffer said the four lawmakers didn't want to get into the middle of the dispute over whether poppy eradication should be stopped. Instead, they want the U.S. government and its allies to more forcefully go after kingpins who preside over global narcotics trafficking enterprises that together bring in more than $2 billion a year in wholesale drug profits.

They are urging the Bush administration to force the Pentagon to provide more operational assistance to DEA agents operating in Afghanistan and to order the arrests of senior-level drug traffickers under a provision of the Patriot Act passed last year that allows such suspects to be extradited to the United States for prosecution.

A similar campaign has worked well in Colombia and is urgently needed in Afghanistan because that country has no judicial infrastructure to prosecute drug traffickers, the lawmakers say. "We must establish deterrence where none now exists," their letter says.

They also are urging the Pentagon to make good on a promise to provide at least eight Russian-made Mi-17 helicopters to Afghan authorities and their U.S. counter-narcotics advisors for the drug war, along with qualified pilots and maintenance and operational support.

"We have waited long enough to get this vital air lift…," the lawmakers' letter says. "We need someone put in charge of getting this done now, enough time has gone by already."

Venezuela: Nation Doesn't Need U.S. Aid (AP)

AP, February 7, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela -- Venezuela's foreign minister on Tuesday dismissed the U.S. government's decision to cut anti-drug aid to the South American nation, saying it does not need money from "the devil."

Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said Monday that President Bush's proposed 2007-2008 budget eliminated $2.2 million in counter-drug aid originally requested for Venezuela.

"Venezuela is a sovereign country. (U.S. officials) can take their resources and do whatever they think they need to do," Foreign Minister Nicolas Maduro told reporters Tuesday. "We will continue fighting against drug-trafficking."

Maduro accused the U.S. government of offering aid only to countries that "submit to its commands."

President Hugo Chavez, who often refers to Bush as "the devil," broke off cooperation with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration in August 2005 accusing its agents of espionage, and has refused to draw up a new agreement since.

Venezuela is a major transit route for cocaine headed from neighboring Colombia to the United States and Europe.

Venezuelan officials say they are fighting drug trafficking with increasing success, but Washington claims that because of corruption and a weak judicial system the amount of drugs smuggled through Venezuela is increasing.

Washington also has watched uneasily the close alliance between Chavez and Bolivian President Evo Morales, who have spoken of plans for Venezuela to help its Andean neighbor industrialize coca, the base ingredient for cocaine, into legal products.

Maduro met Tuesday with his Bolivian counterpart, David Choquehuanca, to discuss bilateral cooperation programs.

In comments to the press afterward, Choquehuanca said his country would not permit that "our sacred leaf, the coca leaf, be Satanized."

Troubled U.S. Presence On Ecuador Coast (AP)

AP, February 6, 2007

MANTA, Ecuador (AP) -- The U.S. military's lone outpost in South America is a modest affair -- some 220 Americans share space with a local air force wing and an international airport. They are allowed no more than eight planes at a time.

But these surveillance planes play a vital role in keeping Andean cocaine and heroin from reaching the United States and are responsible for about 60 percent of drug interdiction in the eastern Pacific.

That matters little to newly inaugurated President Rafael Correa, whose rejection of a U.S. military presence in Ecuador reflects widespread resentment over Washington's foreign policy in a region where President Bush's administration now has few reliable allies.

"We've said clearly that in 2009 the agreement will not be renewed because we believe that sovereignty consists of not having foreign soldiers on our home soil," Correa said recently.

DOJ_NMG_0128867

No matter that the planes intentionally avoid Ecuadorean airspace after takeoff, and that U.S. operations at Manta contribute some $7 million a year to the local economy.

Many Ecuadoreans believe the U.S. is trying to draw them more deeply into the Colombian conflict spilling over their borders: Leftist rebels frequently cross into Ecuador, and tens of thousands of Colombian refugees crowd lawless border towns plagued by drug traffickers and child prostitution.

Although U.S. officials deny that Manta's planes spy on leftist rebels in Colombia, they do intercept drug flights and eavesdrop on radio communications there.

"There is a widespread feeling that Washington is carrying out an extensive, mostly security, anti-drug program with Colombia, with little regard for the severe consequences -- growing violence and refugees -- on Ecuador," said Michael Shifter, deputy director of the Inter-American Dialogue think tank in Washington.

The Bush administration's efforts to maintain the U.S. role as Latin America's No. 1 commercial and military partner have suffered badly with leftist presidents winning office from Venezuela to Bolivia and now Ecuador, where many resent Washington's tough bargaining for trade pacts that lock in preferential terms for U.S. industries and seem anything but "free."

Located on the coast some 160 miles southwest of the Ecuadorean capital of Quito, Manta is well situated for its mission. But the U.S. military, which got the Manta lease after it was forced to abandon Howard Air Base in Panama in 1999, would be wise to start looking elsewhere, according to Anna Gilmour, a Latin American analyst with Jane's Defense Information Group.

Colombia is not a good option -- U.S. troops based there would be at great risk of attack from the same leftist rebels Colombian President Alvaro Uribe is fighting with U.S. training, logistics and intelligence support.

Nor are its neighbors: Presidents Hugo Chavez of Venezuela, Alan Garcia of Peru and Luiz Ignacio Lula da Silva of Brazil have shown no interest in basing U.S. military units on their soil.

The region's leftist governments already have turned away from U.S. defense contractors, going instead to Russia, France and Brazil for military hardware. Venezuela said last week it hopes to buy Russian anti-aircraft missiles to protect its oil industry.

The Bush administration upset many in the region when it emphasized bilateral trade pacts and denigrated the Andean Trade Promotion and Drug Eradication Act, a package of trade benefits offered in exchange for cooperation against drugs. The act expired Dec. 31, though the administration extended it for six months.

Colombia and Peru have bilateral pacts, but they have not been ratified and the newly Democratic-controlled Congress has raised objections. Trade talks with Ecuador broke down last year, long before Correa became president, and show no signs of resuming.

Correa, a U.S.-trained economist, has said the Andean Trade Promotion and Drug Eradication Act "isn't charity" but rather "just compensation" for commitments to battling drug trafficking.

Chavez, for his part, has called the drug war "the excuse that imperialism obtained a few years ago to penetrate our countries, to oppress our peoples and to justify its military presence in Latin America."

The State Department has recommended eliminating all drug interdiction aid for Venezuela, which got $2.2 million in the current fiscal year, and slashing overall aid to Ecuador some 30 percent to $20 million.

With the exception of Colombia, drug interdiction funding cuts were proposed across the Andean region.

In mid-2006, the United States had just short of 2,000 active duty military personnel stationed in Latin American and Caribbean countries, more than half at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba.

In all, some 6,000 Department of Defense employees are assigned to the region, many of them in Texas and Florida, where their bosses are headquartered at the U.S. Southern Command.

That is a small sliver of the nearly 1.4 million U.S. troops deployed around the world, mostly in Europe and Asia.

But those 220 Americans in Manta have had an outsized impact against drugs.

In the 1990s, most drug smuggling from the region was by air. That later shifted to the high seas as the so-called air bridge was essentially shut down.

Thanks to the Manta-based U.S. interdiction efforts, more than 275 tons of illegal drugs -- mostly cocaine -- were seized or intercepted last year, said Air Force Lt. Col. Javier Delucca, the base's U.S. administrator.

DOJ_NMG_0128868

Ecuador Assails US Antidrug Funding Cuts (FT)

Financial Times, February 7, 2007

Ecuador criticised Washington on Tuesday for proposing a 40 per cent cut in antidrug aid to the Andean region over the next two years, a move that will be seen as retaliation for the election of leftwing nationalistic governments hostile to the US.

María Fernanda Espinosa, the foreign minister, said: "There are principles of joint responsibility and fairness, and under those principles the US must respond to the efforts Ecuador has made."

She said the Bush administration should recognise "the enormous efforts made by a poor country like Ecuador to combat narcotraffic. Now we need the US to commit itself to supporting those efforts."

In the budget he presented on Monday, President George W. Bush proposed a cut in the Andean counter-drug initiative from $722m last year to $570m this year and $443m in 2008.

The programme supports efforts such as eradicating coca, the plant that is the raw material for cocaine, which is primarily grown in Colombia, Peru and Bolivia. It also helps programmes to combat narcotrafficking in countries such as Ecuador and Panama.

The cuts will be seen in the region as a response to the election of hostile governments in Ecuador and Bolivia, and the failure of others to co-operate fully in the "war on drugs".

The one exception is Colombia, Mr Bush's closest regional ally. His administration has requested that Congress extend the $600m Plan Colombia, the US-funded military counter-narcotics programme, which is due to expire this year.

Last year Evo Morales, a former coca-growers' leader, became president of Bolivia and this year Rafael Correa took office as president of Ecuador, pledging to shut the US military base at Manta, the only one of its kind in South America and an important staging post for interception efforts.

Mr Correa's government has reacted angrily to Colombia's aerial spraying on its border with Ecuador. Last month Quito made an official complaint about the issue to the Organisation of American States.

The cuts will also be viewed in the region as a reaction to what is perceived to be Washington's frustration with antidrug efforts in the Andes. Unlike Colombia, which depends heavily on aerial spraying to destroy the plants, Peru and Bolivia, the second and third producers, rely on manual eradication, since coca is more culturally sensitive in those countries due to its use as a traditional stimulant.

Last month, Pilar Mazzetti, Peru's interior minister, and Romulo Pizarro, head of the antidrug agency, admitted that Peru is fighting a losing battle against trafficking. Officials in Lima estimate that Peru would need $200m a year to provide an effective eradication and interception programme.

Intensifying eradication in Colombia while cutting budgets to other producers will feed concerns about a "balloon effect" in which production crosses borders to avoid antidrug activity.

A US State Department report last year said coca cultivation increased by 38 per cent in Peru in 2005, while the total area rose for the fourth consecutive year in Bolivia, up by 8 per cent to 63,000 acres, the highest figure this century.

IMMIGRATION:

Border States' Burden (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

GEORGE W. BUSH, throughout his presidency, has talked a consistently good game about the federal government's responsibility to take a lead role in dealing with the unique challenges of immigration. But when budget time comes around, he's all talk, and California is once again left holding the bill.

In what has become an annual ritual, Bush is seeking to place the entire burden of jailing criminal illegal immigrants on individual states. His new budget would eliminate the State Criminal Alien Assistance Program, which has provided meager federal assistance to states that house a disproportionate share of the non-federal population of illegal immigrant inmates.

DOJ_NMG_0128869

The administration's argument in favor of killing the program? That reimbursing the states for incarcerating illegal immigrants does not reduce the number of crimes they commit. White House analysts also warn that because illegal immigrants are hard to identify, there's a chance that states actually could be getting more than their due. Heaven forbid.

California's prison system spent $684 million last year to incarcerate and supervise the parole of about 19,000 illegal immigrants, according to the Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation. (That number doesn't include county jails; L.A. County alone processed an estimated 40,000 illegal immigrants last year.) Congress, which funded the State Criminal Alien Assistance Program last year despite Bush's lack of enthusiasm, kicked in $160 million to California. This year, with the state price tag rising to an estimated $865 million, Bush wants to back out.

In all probability, the program will be funded somewhere between the $0 proposed by the White House and the $900 million authorized by Congress last year. The program enjoys bipartisan support, and Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and Sens. Dianne Feinstein and Barbara Boxer say they are prepared to do battle.

Immigration, like free trade, is a boost for the economy and society in general but more challenging in the communities that bear the specific brunt.

California gladly accepts its role as the 21st century Ellis Island, but the Bush administration should be honest about the real costs of illegal immigration. The least the administration can do is provide economic relief to the few states that have to clean up after Washington's mess.

Next Stop: Underground (WP)

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

REPUBLICAN state lawmakers in Virginia have advanced a grab bag of legislation designed to hound, harass and hassle illegal immigrants. The idea, as expressed by the author of one such bill, Del. Jackson H. Miller of Manassas, is "to make Virginia an unwelcome place if you are in this country illegally." Translation: Drive the immigrants out of the state. In this the bills are overwhelmingly likely to fail, since most immigrants are likely to remain near jobs despite official persecution. But the bills do threaten to push undocumented immigrants further underground, forcing them to live in fear, draw their curtains and keep their children indoors even as they fill a niche in the local economy.

Many of the measures are so patently obnoxious that they are unlikely to become law. One bill, Mr. Miller's, would cut off the flow of state and local funds to charities that might assist illegal, and presumably needy, immigrants. Another would make it a crime for an undocumented immigrant even to be in Virginia -- even though immigration is properly the purview of the federal government. There are bills to deny in-state tuition rates at public colleges and universities to illegal immigrants, even to those who have grown up in the state; to withhold business licenses from firms that would employ the immigrants; and to expand the power of state and local police to detain them.

Many of the bills are similar to ones making their way through legislatures across the country, particularly in states whose vibrant job markets have made them magnets for people who are here illegally. Two years ago, 500 immigrant-related bills were introduced in state legislatures nationwide, according to a survey by the National Conference of State Legislatures. No survey is yet available for this year, but it appears, according to the evidence from Virginia and elsewhere, that the number will have grown exponentially.

Not all the Virginia bills are heading for enactment; cooler heads in the state Senate will make short work of some. Still, taken together, the proposals transmit a message of hostility to newcomers. And good luck telling green-card-holders that the state doesn't object to them -- just to their cousins and nephews and aunts who lack the right papers.

The fact is, as many of the same conservative Republicans voting for the anti-immigrant bills know, the primal forces of economics -- hunger, need, the human thirst for self-advancement -- will generally trump official attempts at discrimination. If there is legislation to penalize landlords who rent to illegal immigrants, some will evict their tenants, and others will just demand more money under the table. If employers face sanctions for hiring illegal immigrants, many will nonetheless continue doing so, perhaps through subcontractors willing to assume the risk. Lawmakers who propose anti-immigrant legislation may be responding to the legitimate complaints of their constituents or to the worst instincts in American politics. Either way, their measures could inflict considerable pain while failing to solve a problem whose causes, and ultimate solution, lie with the federal government.

DOJ_NMG_0128870

TAX:

Tax Preparer Barred From Preparing Federal Returns For Others (AP)

AP, February 7, 2007

MINNEAPOLIS A St. Paul tax preparer accused of filing false tax returns that overstated deductions for recent immigrants is now barred from preparing federal tax returns for others.

The Department of Justice said a federal court in Minnesota issued the permanent injunction order against Nash Sonibare, who operated Liberty Financial Group in St. Paul.

The Justice Department lawsuit alleged that the Nigerian immigrant repeatedly prepared returns for his customers containing false or inflated credits and deductions. The complaint alleged that many of Sonibare's customers were from various African countries and had limited English-language skills.

Deadline Nears For 2006 Health-Care Accounts (WSJ)

By Tom Herman

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

Time is running out for many employees to drain their flexible spending accounts for 2006.

More companies are offering these accounts, which let you use pretax dollars to pay for health-care and dependent-care expenses. But there is an important catch: Under what is known as the use-it-or-lose-it rule, you must spend every penny you set aside before the deadline or lose the balance.

The deadline varies among employers. Many have set a cutoff date of March 15 -- only about five weeks from now. That represents a big change from just two years ago, when the deadline typically was Dec. 31. After congressional pressure, the Treasury changed its rules in 2005 and allowed employers to give employees a grace period of as much as 2½ months into the following year.

Initially, many employers were undecided about whether to offer the grace period. Health-care specialists now say most large employers they work with offer the additional time.

"I don't think I have a client who isn't offering the extension," says Blaine Bos of Mercer Health & Benefits in Minneapolis, a unit of Marsh & McLennan Cos.

Separately, a new law may offer additional relief for some FSA participants. Individuals can now make a one-time transfer to a health savings account, which is for people with high-deductible health-insurance plans, from a health-care flexible-spending account or from a health reimbursement plan. Health reimbursement plans allow employees to use employer contributions to pay for medical bills.

This provision is part of a tax bill signed by President Bush Dec. 20.

In a typical flexible-spending account, you tell your employer to set aside a certain amount of your pay -- say $4,000 or $5,000. If you don't spend every penny of that amount by the deadline, the money goes back to your employer. You are allowed to spend the rest on such items as glasses, sunglasses, aspirin, teeth cleaning and other health-care-related items.

Among the companies that offer them is Liberty Tax Service, a tax-preparation firm in Virginia Beach, Va. The company recently added a popular new benefit: Participants were given a debit card with their contribution amount preloaded, says Martha O'Gorman, a Liberty Tax vice president.

"It is very handy," she says, "and makes the plan attractive to those folks who were sometimes hard-pressed to pay for the services rendered -- and then wait for the reimbursement."

Ms. O'Gorman is keenly aware of the use-it-or-lose-it rule. "My first year I left some money in the pool, so I reduced my contribution amount last year and exceeded it by almost $1,000," she says. "This year I've gone back to the same amount I pledged the first year, and I am keeping a close eye on it."

DOJ_NMG_0128871

Some merchants seek to capitalize on the use-it-or-lose-it rule. Mercer's Beth Umland says an eyeglass store in her Brooklyn, N.Y., neighborhood has a sign in the window urging customers to buy soon to avoid forfeiting money parked in health-care FSAs.

Many experts praise the general FSA concept. "I think they're very useful if you have the ability to budget expenses and you understand the tax advantages," Mercer's Mr. Bos says. "They're a very tax-efficient way of using your money."

If you participate, be sure to keep a close watch on your account balances. If your employer gives you until mid-March to drain your 2006 account, make sure your expenses for the first 2½ months of this year are applied against your 2006 account, rather than your 2007 account.

A Mercer survey of employer-sponsored health plans last summer found a record 81% of large employers -- those with 500 or more employees -- offered a health-care flexible-spending account in 2006, up from 77% the prior year and 68% in 2001.

The percentage of eligible employees participating remained about the same: 20% in 2006, 21% in 2005 and 19% in 2001.

* * *

THE APRIL TAX DEADLINE comes two days later this year.

Usually, the deadline is April 15. This year, it is Tuesday, April 17. April 15 falls on a Sunday this year, and the following day is a holiday in Washington, D.C. Thus, "the entire country has an April 17 deadline" this year, the Internal Revenue Service says.

Don't pay attention to the April 16 deadline you will see in various IRS publications, the IRS says. That is now out of date.

The April 17 deadline applies to 2006 federal individual income-tax returns. It also applies to requests for a six-month tax-filing extension. It applies to tax-year 2006 balance-due payments and to tax-year 2006 contributions to individual retirement accounts.

Also, it applies to individual estimated-tax payments for the first quarter of this year, whether made electronically or by check.

* * *

REMINDER: Don't overlook a phone-tax refund on your tax return for 2006.

This year, there is a special one-time refund of the telephone excise tax on long-distance and bundled service. An IRS survey of early filers shows one in three early filers this year are failing to request the refund. To get the refund, you have to file.

Taxpayers can choose a standard refund amount between $30 and $60, depending on the total number of exemptions on their 2006 return -- or, if they kept good records, they can deduct the actual tax paid.

For details, see the IRS Web site (www.irs.gov).

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Cabinet Members Go To Congress To Push The Budget (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6 — One day after the Bush administration proposed deep cuts in domestic spending, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. told Democratic critics in Congress on Tuesday that the proposals for Medicare and Social Security were “a starting point for a discussion” and could be revised.

Democrats, on the other hand, promised to reshape the priorities to some extent, though several said they would take Mr. Paulson at his word, for now, that negotiation was possible.

On Social Security, Medicare and taxes, however, Democrats did not indicate what steps they would take, and that is a source of frustration to administration officials.

If tax increases are to be a part of any budget solution, Republicans want Democrats to propose them. Democrats are reluctant to do so. They distrust the administration’s promises of willingness to negotiate, noting that Vice President Dick Cheney and others seem to have ruled out compromise.

DOJ_NMG_0128872

It was thus hard to tell whether Mr. Paulson's call for negotiations was serious or just an effort to have Democrats make unpopular counterproposals. For the moment, conciliatory talk held sway.

Mr. Paulson appeared before the House Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee, defending the administration proposals on domestic spending cuts, taxes and military outlays.

But he said, "We really welcome everybody's ideas."

He was referring specifically to the proposals to reduce Medicare and Medicaid costs by cutting payments to doctors and hospitals and requiring some recipients to pay out more, but his promise to negotiate extended to other areas, as well.

The comments were echoed in part by those of President Bush at a factory tour at Micron Technology in Manassas, Va. Mr. Bush was more combative in defending the budget, saying it "can work if Congress resists the temptation to raise your taxes."

He also called on Democrats to do more than criticize.

"Now's the time for members of the Congress in both parties to bring their best ideas to the table as to how to solve the problems involved with entitlement programs," Mr. Bush said, referring to Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid.

Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, also defended the budget, before the House Budget Committee. Mr. Portman said that in response to years of criticism the administration had been more open in its projections of military spending and was calling for a slight increase in domestic spending, not an unrealistic freeze.

Possibly recognizing political realities, Mr. Paulson all but invited Congress to reject the cuts for the health program known as S-Chip. It provides health insurance to low-income children.

"It just may be that the Congress believes that that's something that should be funded at a higher level," Mr. Paulson said.

On another hot topic, Mr. Bush's desire to replace Social Security benefits for some future retirees with private investment accounts, a proposal that never came to a vote even when Republicans were in charge of Congress, Mr. Paulson said, "No one should be surprised that personal accounts are in the budget."

"That's his idea," the secretary said, referring to Mr. Bush. "A lot of people share that idea, and there are different views on that and on taxes. But everything's on the table."

Democratic criticism of the budget was tempered by repeated promises to take Mr. Paulson's promise of bipartisanship at face value, at least initially.

"We hope that you're our new best friend," Representative Charles B. Rangel, the New York Democrat who is chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, told Mr. Paulson. "We look forward to working with you."

At another point, Mr. Rangel dismissed the budget proposals as pre-campaign talk.

Health and Human Services Secretary Michael O. Leavitt encountered deep skepticism when he defended the budget at a hearing of the House Energy and Commerce Committee. Democrats accused Mr. Leavitt of favoring spending on Iraq over spending for the poor and the sick.

President Bush Asks Lawmakers To Resist Raising Taxes (NYS/BL)

By Brendan Murray

New York Sun/Bloomberg, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush, a day after sending Congress a $2.9 trillion budget, urged lawmakers to resist raising taxes and to address the unsustainable growth in entitlement programs by restraining spending.

The president said his spending plan will lead to a balanced budget by 2012 while keeping tax rates at current levels and spending a record amount on defense and the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan. Rolling back the tax cuts he pushed through Congress would be a drag on the economy, he said.

"Do tax cuts work? They work," Mr. Bush said yesterday at a Manassas, Va., plant operated by Micron Technology Inc. Boise, Idaho-based Micron is the biggest American memory chipmaker. "Low taxes means economic vitality, which means more tax revenues" to bring the budget in balance.

As hearings on the fiscal 2008 budget got under way in Congress yesterday, members of the Democratic majority greeted Mr. Bush's spending blueprint with skepticism and signaled they will press forward with their own priorities. The party's congressional leaders say they have no plans to repeal all of the tax cuts approved during Mr. Bush's first term.

DOJ_NMG_0128873

Mr. Bush's budget for the fiscal year that begins October 1 would increase federal spending 4.2% over the current year, even as funding for agencies outside defense and homeland security would rise an average of 1% in each of the next four years. That effectively is a cut because it is less than the rate of inflation, which was 2.5% in 2006.

The Senate Budget Committee chairman, Senator Conrad, a Democrat of North Dakota, said yesterday that the president's spending plan is "filled with debt and deception."

The biggest challenge, Mr. Bush and his advisers say, will be dealing with escalating costs for Medicare, Medicaid, and Social Security, known as entitlements because benefits and eligibility are set in the law. Outlays for all three would total $1.2 trillion in fiscal 2008.

"There is now nearly universal, bipartisan agreement that the unchecked growth of these programs presents real long-term threats to beneficiaries, our federal budget and the economy," Mr. Bush's budget director, Rob Portman, said yesterday in testimony to the House Budget Committee.

Mr. Bush proposes to trim the growth of Medicare, which provides health insurance for those 65 and older, and Medicaid, which benefits low-income individuals, by $78 billion over five years. The reductions would come from boosting costs for beneficiaries and cutting payments to some providers.

Mr. Bush's budget doesn't offer a legislative solution for Social Security, the government's retirement assistance program that last year covered about 49 million American retirees with $539 billion in benefits.

As the number of Medicare, Medicaid, and Social Security beneficiaries swells so do outlays. Mr. Portman said mandatory spending programs accounted for 53% of the budget in 2006, up from 26% in 1962.

Mr. Bush has been prodding lawmakers to open a discussion about how to deal with the projected shortfalls in the program as the number of retirees drawing benefits rises relative to the number of workers paying into the system. The trustees of the system project that Social Security will begin paying out more in benefits than it takes in from payroll taxes by 2017.

"We have a fundamental problem when it comes to a program like Social Security," Mr. Bush said. "Now's the time for members of Congress from both political parties to bring their best ideas to the table."

Mr. Bush's effort two years ago to overhaul Social Security and add private accounts for workers never got off the ground because a lack of support from lawmakers and the public.

Micron Plant Provides Backdrop For Bush (WP)

By Cecilia Kang

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Micron Technology's plant in Manassas makes some of the most sophisticated memory chips in the world, semiconductors made from wafers of silicon 300 millimeters thin that run MP3 players, smart phones and satellite navigation systems.

But the finer details of the 650,000-square-foot plant's operations may have escaped the company's most esteemed visitor yesterday, President Bush.

They "tried to explain all the big machines that were there to a history major. I played like I understood," Bush said in a speech to 150 Micron employees.

Bush nevertheless praised the company for its growth, exports and creation of high-skill jobs -- a model, he said, for the nation's economic growth.

"One thing about Micron is that it is clear that the role of government is to encourage investment and enhance educational opportunities," Bush said. "I mean, when you walk through the halls of this innovative company, it's pretty clear to me that you need to know what you're doing in order to make this company survive and thrive like it is."

It was the president's first visit to the Manassas plant, which Micron bought in 2002. The company was lured to Northern Virginia by about $25 million in local and state tax incentives and it has grown impressively since, albeit with a few setbacks along the way.

Micron initially laid off 560 workers but has since undergone a $3.5 billion expansion that has brought in 800 new employees. About 1,700 people work there now.

DOJ_NMG_0128874

More recently, the parent company, with manufacturing plants around the world, was granted immunity for cooperating with a federal investigation into whether some of the biggest companies in the semiconductor industry have fixed prices. Micron agreed to pay $91 million to settle a class-action lawsuit by chip purchasers, and still faces legal action from many states, including Maryland and Virginia. The company overall is now dealing with falling prices worldwide for some chips.

Steven R. Appleton, Micron's chief executive, said the White House approached Boise, Idaho-based Micron about the tour last week, impressed by the firm's decision to expand operations domestically.

"We've been investing here in Virginia for quite some time and have put our most advanced technology here," Appleton said.

About 60 percent of the company's products are exported overseas, he said: "This is a good example of how companies can invest in the U.S -- and we're manufacturers."

Bush came to Micron primarily to promote the $2.9 trillion budget he submitted to Congress on Monday and to preach the importance of fiscal responsibility.

Bush promised to balance the federal budget by 2012 by "keeping taxes low and being wise about how we spend your money." He said his hallmark economic policies -- the promotion of trade and tax cuts -- have helped companies like Micron grow.

"By cutting capital gains taxes and taxes on dividends, it encourages capital flow; it makes it easier for Micron to attract capital to buy new equipment to expand your business and to remain competitive," Bush said.

With just a few days' notice of the president's visit, crews rushed to spruce up the plant. They painted parts of the building and cleared rocks in a parking lot for the four White House helicopters that carried Bush, Secret Service agents and journalists between the District and Manassas. Inside, workers hung blue velvet curtains in the assembly room, played patriotic music through speakers, and set up a large promotional backdrop displaying the various products that use Micron's chips.

"We feel incredible pride, beyond what you can imagine," said Stephen Silberstein, facilities manager at the Manassas plant.

Bush Visits Micron's Manassas Plant (PBJ)

By Jeff Clabaugh

Phoenix Business Journal, February 7, 2007

About 150 employees at Micron Technology's Northern Virginia plant had a morning visit from President Bush.

Bush toured Micron's plant in Manassas and spoke to employees at about 10:30 a.m. Tuesday, telling the audience that Micron is helping support the national economy through continued investment and job creation in states like Virginia.

"On thing about Micron is that it is clear the role of government is to encourage investment and enhance educational opportunities," Bush said. "When you walk through the halls of this innovative company, it is pretty clear to me that you need to know what you're doing for a company to survive and thrive like this."

Bush was accompanied by Micron Technology's chief executive Steve Appleton.

Micron began investing in its memory chip plant on Godwin Drive in 2005. The plant has undergone a $3.5 billion upgrade, and the expansion has created about 1,000 new jobs. The plant manufactures both DRAM memory and NAND flash memory chips, demand for which has surged with the popularity of MP3 players and cell phones with cameras.

Micron actually downsized the facility when it bought the plant from Toshiba in 2002, slashing 560 of its then 1,200 jobs, part of company-wide cost-cutting.

The plant now employees 4,000, according to Micron spokesman Dan Francisco, who describes them as well-paid jobs held by highly-trained technology workers.

Bush Touts Fiscal Responsibilityin Speech At Micron Plant In Virginia (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, February 7, 2007

MANASSAS, Va. — President Bush preached the virtues of fiscal responsibility Tuesday at a company that recently settled a class-action lawsuit alleging it had engaged in price-fixing and violated antitrust laws.

Bush went to computer chip-maker Micron Technology Inc. to talk about the $2.9 trillion budget he had unveiled a day earlier. His spending plan gives the Pentagon a record $50 billion budget boost but squeezes programs cherished by Democrats, including health research and heating subsidies for the poor.

Bush said his plan would lead to a balanced budget in five years after soaring deficits.

He said Congress needs to set priorities in spending taxpayer money.

"The temptation in Washington is to spend your money on everything that sounds good," Bush said. "That's not how you run your family budget. That's not how this company runs its company budget, and that's certainly not how the government ought not to run its budget."

Micron Technology, based in Boise, settled a class-action lawsuit last month that was filed in 2002 in U.S. District Court in San Francisco on behalf of customers, generally computer manufacturers and others, who bought dynamic random-access memory chips, or DRAM, directly from suppliers between April 1, 1999, and June 30, 2002.

The White House knew about the lawsuit when it scheduled Bush's appearance, deputy press secretary Dana Perino said.

The lawsuit is one of several filed following a U.S. Justice Department investigation into whether computer-chip companies conspired to manipulate the number of DRAM chips released to market in a scheme to inflate prices.

The investigation resulted in more than $730 million in fines and guilty pleas from four companies — Samsung Electronics Co., Elpida Memory Inc., Infineon Technologies AG and Hynix Semiconductor Inc.

The Justice Department granted Micron immunity from criminal charges in exchange for its cooperation, but the amnesty did not shield it from lawsuits.

Steven Appleton, chief executive officer of Micron Technology gave $2,000 to Bush and $15,000 to the Republican National Committee during Bush's 2004 re-election campaign.

Appleton escorted Bush on a tour of the Manassas plant.

The recent $3.5 billion upgrade at the plant has created more than 1,000 jobs at the site over the past year.

"It's an honor for Micron to host President Bush at our Manassas site," Appleton said in a statement after the visit.

"We believe in innovation and ingenuity of the American work force, and we continue to invest not only in Virginia, but also our other U.S. locations."

Idaho Statesman reporter Ken Dey contributed to this report.

Budget Talk Venue Carries Baggage (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

MANASSAS, VA. — President Bush promoted his newly released federal budget Tuesday at a company that recently settled a class-action lawsuit over alleged price-fixing and antitrust violations.

Bush used his visit to Micron Technology Inc., a semiconductor manufacturer, to argue that Congress should look to private sector companies as examples of responsible budgeting. His spending plan for next year forecasts a balanced federal budget by 2012.

"I appreciate very much the fact that companies like Micron actually have a budget. It's a concept that the government needs to get used to too," the president said.

Bush called Micron an "innovative company" that is made up of "smart people back there making the products that people want."

In January, Micron settled a class-action lawsuit built on accusations that it had engaged in price-fixing and had violated antitrust laws, along with the other makers of dynamic random-access memory chips, or DRAM.

Bush made no reference to the lawsuit, which was filed after the Justice Department launched an investigation of the company's pricing policies in 2002. The suit was one of several legal actions facing the company that were brought by computer manufacturers, consumers and states.

At the Micron plant, in a suburb about 30 miles west of the White House, Bush promoted the $2.9-trillion budget for 2008 that he submitted to Congress on Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0128876

"By keeping taxes low and being wise about how we spend your money, we actually achieve balance in the budget," he said. "This budget can work if Congress resists the temptation to raise your taxes."

The White House said it was aware of Micron's former legal difficulty before Bush's visit.

"From what we could see, they followed all the procedures in dealing with the Department of Justice and cooperated as required," said Deputy White House Press Secretary Tony Fratto.

A Micron spokesman said the company, which is based in Boise, Idaho, had cooperated with the department's probe, a step that he said protected it from the risk of criminal penalty.

james.gerstenzang@
latimes.com

Paulson: Growth Can Spur Balanced Budget (AP)

By Martin Crutsinger

AP, February 7, 2007

President Bush's $2.9 trillion budget plan on Capitol Hill got a predictably cool reception from congressional Democrats Tuesday, while Bush's GOP allies said it's up to the new majority to come up with an alternative that balances the budget without raising taxes.

House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., said he saw Bush's budget — which appeals to anti-tax GOP conservatives while curbing Democratic priorities — as a missed opportunity for Bush to reach out to Democrats, who for the first time in Bush's presidency control both the House and Senate.

"The president has to be a party to this. He can create a climate that would allow us to move forward in a bipartisan way," Rangel said.

The $2.9 trillion Bush budget for the budget year that begins next Oct. 1 would provide a massive boost for the Defense Department, seek an additional $245 billion in spending on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan for this year and 2008 and restrain spending across a wide swath of the rest of government.

The spending restraints allowed Bush to project gradually declining deficits, with the budget going into surplus in 2012, three years after he has left office.

His budget plan would make his first-term tax cuts permanent, at a cost over the next decade that the administration estimates at $1.6 trillion — which the Bush team says is key to maintaining economic growth.

"We are submitting a budget that includes a surplus in 2012, which is achievable if we keep our economy growing," Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson told the House Ways and Means Committee.

Democrats, however, charged that the president is able to produce a surplus only on paper by using overly optimistic assumptions about how much revenue the economy will generate over the next five years and by leaving out expensive items such as further war costs after 2009 or providing money beyond this year to fix the alternative minimum tax so that it doesn't hit millions of middle-income taxpayers.

House Budget Committee Chairman John Spratt Jr., D-S.C., said the Bush plan shortchanges domestic programs such as heating subsidies for the poor, education and the State Children's Health Insurance Program, which helps children of low-income working families that earn too much to qualify for Medicaid but not enough to afford private insurance.

Democrats said the plant doesn't provide enough money for the program to cover all of the children who are currently enrolled.

"I couldn't believe that the president could be so unthinking as to want to deny poor children health care," said Rep. Pete Stark, D-Calif.

For their part, congressional Republicans rallied around the Bush plan and challenged Democrats to pass an alternative that doesn't raise taxes.

Rep. Adam Putnam, R-Fla., called the budget "a defining issue for ... whether (Democrats) can govern."

Despite requisite calls among all parties to work together, many also expressed pessimism that they could.

DOJ_NMG_0128877

"We hope we can find common ground, but we also find the differences between us are substantial," Spratt told White House budget director Rob Portman.

Paulson and Portman are on friendly terms with many lawmakers, including Democrats, but many Democrats harbor distrust toward Bush and Vice President Cheney, whom they see as less flexible.

Paulson and Portman both disputed contentions by Democrats that the budget achieves its projected $61 billion surplus in 2012 by adopting overly optimistic economic assumptions.

"While no one has a crystal ball, our economic assumptions are close to the consensus of professional forecasters," Paulson said.

Paulson has been given the task by President Bush to see if a consensus can be reached on overhauling the government's huge benefit programs such as Social Security and Medicare. He said he looked forward to sitting down with Democrats and Republicans to see if a bipartisan consensus can be obtained.

He said the reductions in the new budget in spending on Medicare and Medicaid would lay the foundation for more comprehensive reform of the benefit programs.

Portman told the House Budget Committee that while the administration's budget projects balance in the short term, shortfalls in Social Security and Medicare promise to swamp taxpayers in the long term.

"The progress we are making in getting our fiscal house in order short-term must not distract us from this long-term challenge," Portman said. He added that it was possible the government's improving revenue picture could reduce the deficit from the $244 billion projected by the White House for the current year.

Hill Democrats Critical Of Bush's Budget Plan (WP)

By Lori Montgomery And Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Administration officials dispatched to Capitol Hill to defend President Bush's budget received a frosty reception yesterday from congressional Democrats, who argued that the president's proposal to target health care, education and other Democratic priorities suggests a White House more interested in scoring political points than in genuine compromise.

The $2.9 trillion budget blueprint contains little to appeal to, but much to infuriate, the Democratic majority, Democrats said. In a series of hearings, they rattled off a list of their objections: More than $100 billion to be sliced from projected Medicare and Medicaid spending. Further restrictions on the federal food-stamp program. Insufficient cash to maintain health coverage for millions of children. And deep cuts proposed for a range of programs that help communities put police on the street and fund community projects.

When you combine the cutbacks with the large sums the White House is seeking to support the military, the war and tax cuts, "this is not a budget we can support," House Budget Committee Chairman John M. Spratt Jr. (D-S.C.) told reporters after his panel finished grilling White House budget director Rob Portman.

In the House Ways and Means Committee, Chairman Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) told Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson that he was particularly annoyed by the health-care cuts and yet another request from the White House to create private retirement accounts that would allow taxpayers to shift billions of dollars out of the Social Security trust fund.

The proposal went nowhere two years ago, when Republicans controlled Congress. Democrats have refused even to discuss changing Social Security unless Bush backs away from the plan. At a time when the president is trying to engage Democrats in a politically risky effort to restructure Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid, Rangel told Paulson, the budget represents a "missed opportunity."

"They're playing politics at a time that I'm trying to be bipartisan," Rangel said later. "I don't think that I can tell the president what to put on the table and not to put on the table. But I can tell him: Don't pick a . . . fight."

Paulson replied that "no one should be surprised that private accounts are in the budget," because they represent the president's preferred path for restructuring Social Security. But, he said, "everything is on the table" for discussion, and "the president has been very clear and very sincere" about that.

DOJ_NMG_0128878

Despite what they consider unpalatable budget proposals, Rangel and House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) said Democrats remain hopeful that they can work with the administration to rein in spending on the three programs, which threaten to swamp the federal budget as the baby boom generation retires. "We all need a win," Rangel said.

Health care was also a major topic in the House Energy and Commerce Committee, where Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt endured more than 2 1/2 hours of questions from Democrats complaining that the budget request would hurt children and the elderly and shortchange funding for research into cancer and other diseases.

The lawmakers focused on Bush's proposal to increase funding for the state-federal Children's Health Insurance Program by $4.8 billion over the next five years -- too little, experts say, to continue covering the 4.4 million children enrolled in the program last year. Analysts have said the program, which costs about $5 billion a year, would require an increase of $12 billion to $15 billion to keep pace with current enrollment because of rising health-care costs.

Some Democrats want to use the 10-year-old program, which must be reauthorized this year, to extend coverage to some of the nation's 8.3 million uninsured children. Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), the committee's chairman, said Bush's budget "misses an historic opportunity" to do so.

"Seven out of 10 uninsured children qualify for either Medicaid or the State Children's Health Insurance Program but are not yet enrolled. Yet, the president instead makes cuts in the program, ensuring that we will not reach those children, and that more children and their parents will become uninsured," Dingell said.

Democrats also panned the president's proposals to stop enrolling childless adults in the program and to provide less federal matching money for enrolled children whose families earn more than the targeted cutoff of twice the poverty level, or $41,300 for a family of four.

Leavitt called the proposed funding "adequate" and said the program should not be used "as an engine to pull us toward a point where everyone is covered by the federal government."

While Leavitt is an old hand at budget hearings, the hostile audience was a new experience. Both he and Portman, a former congressman from Ohio who served on both the Budget Committee and Ways and Means, handled the long hours of contentious questions with calm assurance.

But Paulson, the former chairman of Goldman Sachs who joined the administration last summer, seemed less comfortable with the interrogation, which ranged over a wide array of topics, not all of them familiar.

In addition to attacks from Democrats, Paulson took fire from Rep. Jerry Weller (R-Ill.), who demanded to know why the administration had chosen to extend the federal unemployment surtax. (Paulson said he did not know and suggested that Weller talk to Labor Secretary Elaine L. Chao.) And Rep. Jim Ramstad (R-Minn.) said that it was "not appropriate" for the White House to recommend cuts to the federal home-heating program at a time when the wind-chill factor back home was 40 degrees below zero. (Paulson thanked him for the question and changed the subject.)

"This is not like running Goldman Sachs," Rep. Richard E. Neal (D-Mass.) joked.

Paulson smiled. "You can say that again," he said.

Gleams Of Hope For '08 Budget Deal (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON

Within hours of the arrival Monday of President Bush's $2.9 trillion budget proposal on Capitol Hill, Democrats dubbed it "disingenuous" and "filled with debt and deception" – not unlike their response to previous Bush budgets.

The chairman of the House Budget Committee, Rep. John Spratt Jr. (D) of South Carolina, questioned if even Republicans would rally around it.

Despite such predictions, GOP leaders have already pledged to rally around one part: tax cuts. "Raising taxes now will not only increase the family tax burden, [but] it will have devastating consequences on our robust economic growth that is creating the new jobs of tomorrow," said House Republican leader John Boehner (R) of Ohio.

But behind the tough talk, conditions exist for a potential compromise in this year's budget negotiations.

DOJ_NMG_0128879

For the first time in Mr. Bush's tenure as president, Democrats control both the House and Senate. Their leaders are convinced that to keep that control after 2008 – and even to take back the White House – they need to show that they can govern. That means avoiding a budget train wreck and completing spending bills for the next fiscal year.

At the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue, an unpopular president is looking to leave a domestic legacy.

"There's an opportunity for compromise this year, because if Bush wants to get anything done in the last two years, he's going to have to work with the Democratic Congress to do it," says Robert Bixby, executive director of the Concord Coalition, a public interest group that aims to balance federal budgets.

"And if Democrats come across as just being obstructionist or tax-and-spend, the public could take offense. Presuming that they both want to accomplish something, there's an opportunity," he adds.

In the run-up to the release of the budget this week, administration officials have taken careful soundings on Capitol Hill and consulted widely with Democrats. Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget (OMB), says he began his consultations on the budget this year by going first to Congress "to hear what they were looking for," and then to the administration.

In response to urging from Congress, especially Democrats, the Bush administration for the first time this year included war costs as part of the regular budget. With war costs, the proposed fiscal year 2008 budget raises military spending 11 percent and nondefense domestic spending by 1 percent. While praising the move, Democrats note that OMB's $50 billion estimate for the Iraq war in 2009 is well below previous spending levels. Administration officials describe it as a "place holder."

OMB officials say they also reined in the number of user fees used to demonstrate "savings" in the budget that have little chance of being enacted by Congress.

In a move that budget watchers say could be significant, Mr. Portman says that he heads into budget negotiations this year with "no preconditions" – which he describes as a "change in position" for the Bush White House.

"Our attempt here is to provide a credible, more transparent budget and one that is more realistic," he said at a briefing on Monday. "And so there are a number of different areas where we tried to be responsive [to Congress]. One is showing more war costs in greater detail."

One flash point in budget negotiations will be Bush's proposal to make tax cuts set to expire in 2010 permanent – at a cost of $1.6 trillion over 10 years. Democrats call the proposal a nonstarter.

But budget analysts note that the White House has already put taxes on the table, with one proposal to reform the alternative minimum tax (AMT) in a revenue-neutral way. The AMT was designed to ensure that the highest income tax payers paid their fair share of taxes, but it now impacts millions of Americans.

"The idea that you do AMT reform in a revenue-neutral way means you're going to have to raise taxes from somewhere else," says Mr. Bixby. "They're implicitly putting tax revenues on the table as a way to pay for something else."

For Democrats, the flash point could be the president's proposal to reduce Medicare benefits for upper-income seniors.

While early discussions with lawmakers over reining in entitlement spending prompted "immediate negative response," Portman says he also heard "a lot of response that says, 'Let's look at this,' on both sides of the aisle."

Analysis: Budget Deal Seems Unlikely (NSDY/AP)

By Andrew Taylor

Long Island Newsday, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Many of the necessary ingredients are there for the budget chefs in Washington to whip up a bipartisan deal.

Take the bountiful revenues that make it much easier to balance the budget. Add in the fact that it's not an election year, so politics shouldn't spoil the policymaking.

Warm with the relationships that have formed between key administration officials and lawmakers. Even having a government divided between a Democratic Congress and a GOP president can be a plus -- especially a president looking for a recipe to establish his legacy.

DOJ_NMG_0128880

But rather than improve prospects of agreement with Democrats, President Bush's proposal for next year seems to have left the budget kitchen in turmoil.

Bush's budget appeals to anti-tax GOP conservatives and advocates of private accounts within Social Security while slighting Democratic priorities like health insurance coverage for children in low-income families.

"I don't think that I can tell the president what to put on the table and not to put on the table, but I can tell him, 'don't pick a damn fight,'" said House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel, D-N.Y. Private accounts, entitlement cuts and less money for the poor aren't the way to win cooperation, he suggested.

The poor start toward agreement on any number of budget issues dismays people like Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad, D-N.D., who's hoping for action on the nation's long-term fiscal problems.

Big budget agreements like a 1997 deal forged by President Clinton and congressional Republicans often occur in odd-numbered, non-election years like this one. Then, like now, tax revenues were surging, and that made it much easier to grease the deal -- as did Clinton's willingness to call for Medicare cuts when submitting his budget that year.

It's often easier to take painful steps such as cutting benefit programs or raising taxes when the government is split between the two parties. That way, both share the political heat. That's what happened in 1990, when congressional Democrats and President Bush's father enacted a major deficit-cutting deal.

But that 1990 deal -- in which the elder Bush broke his "read my lips" pledge on taxes -- had big political consequences for George H.W. Bush, who lost his re-election bid.

And a tax-laden 1993 bill, passed with only Democratic votes, contributed to a Democratic disaster at the hands of voters the following year.

That's the rub: Voters often punish politicians who take difficult steps on the budget. That may be why GOP leaders on Capitol Hill are in no hurry to work with Democrats on the budget.

There's certainly no shortage of budget problems crying out for solutions: tax cuts that expire in four years unless renewed; federal retirement programs like Social Security and Medicare that need to be overhauled to absorb tens of millions of baby boomers, a looming hidden tax hike on the middle class under the alternative minimum tax.

Bush's GOP allies in Congress have made it clear they'll insist on no rollbacks on his tax cuts -- even though such an agreement might make some of the tax cuts permanent instead of expiring at the end of 2010. Even a smallish rollback seems sure to rile core conservative GOP voters.

And if Democrats fall on their faces and are unable to pass a budget blueprint, that may be OK with the GOP, too.

"They have a responsibility to govern," said House Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio. "It's been clear for some time that they're likely to have a balanced budget, but they're going to raise taxes and increase spending."

Since Democrats won back Congress last year, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and White House Budget Director Rob Portman have met repeatedly with Democrats and Republicans alike. They have said repeatedly that there are "no preconditions" for talks on Social Security. That's been interpreted as an openness to increase payroll taxes, something Bush was previously unwilling to do.

"We think everything should be on the table, and that's a change," Portman told the House Budget Committee Tuesday.

But the recent spadework by Paulson and Portman was undercut by Vice President Dick Cheney, who went on Fox News last month to declare, "This president has been very, very clear on his position on taxes, and nothing's changed."

Democrats think Portman and Paulson are more eager for an agreement than Bush and Cheney.

"The president's looking for a legacy and Republicans in Congress are looking to regain power, and it's not clear that compromise on the budget helps congressional Republicans get back the majority," said longtime budget expert Stan Collender, managing director at Qorvis Communications.

Bush Tax Cuts' Fate Hangs In Balance (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0128881

Democrats said President Bush's new budget is a "missed opportunity" to find common ground, but they are left with few good alternatives other than tax increases if they hope to boost spending and match the president's goal of balancing the budget by 2012.

It took an independent, Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, who called for a new "war on terrorism tax," to broach the issue of tax increases.

"People keep saying that we're not asking sacrifice of anybody but our military in this war, and some civilians who are working on it," said Mr. Lieberman, a former Democrat who supports the war in Iraq. "When you put together the [Department of Defense] budgets with Homeland Security budgets, we need to ask people to help us in a way that they know when they pay more it will go for their security."

But he exposed the key question that will lie beneath this year's budget debate: Can the government expand the war in Iraq and continue Mr. Bush's 2001 and 2003 tax cuts while increasing spending and bringing the budget into balance by 2012?

Mr. Bush on Monday sent Congress his $2.9 trillion budget for fiscal 2008, which begins Oct. 1. It includes a 1 percent increase in basic domestic spending, a giant boost for defense spending and a request for more than $93 billion in emergency war spending for the rest of 2007 -- all while bringing the budget into balance in 2012.

Democrats said Mr. Bush makes wrong assumptions on future tax revenue, such as the Alternative Minimum Tax, but admitted they will probably make the same choices when they pass their own budget so they can also show a balance by 2012, and so they can compare "apples to apples" with Mr. Bush.

Democrats also will have to decide whether to show continued costs for the war past 2008 -- something Mr. Bush does in a cursory manner -- and whether to plan on having Mr. Bush's 2001 and 2003 tax cuts expire in later years, which would help government revenue but would put them on a collision course with the president.

Mr. Bush, stumping for his budget at Micron Technology Inc.'s plant in Manassas, said Congress should choose the path of lower taxes.

"Step One to balancing the budget is to keep taxes low," the president told company employees. "As a matter of fact, not only do I think we ought not to raise them, I think we ought to make every tax cut we passed permanent."

Stepping out from behind the lectern and hefting a foot-thick stack of congressional reports, which Congress uses to attach add-ons to spending bills, Mr. Bush challenged lawmakers to drop most pork-barrel spending projects called earmarks.

Meanwhile, the Congressional Budget Office yesterday said if Congress passes the new war-spending bill for 2007, but does not otherwise increase spending before October, the deficit will drop to about $200 billion this fiscal year. That's down from the actual 2006 deficit of $248 billion, and lower than the administration's $244 billion projection for this year.

House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat, said there is a chance to work together with the president, but that Mr. Bush will need an attitude change.

"It sounds to me like this is pre-campaign talk," Mr. Rangel said of Mr. Bush's call to make the tax cuts permanent. "I just want someone at the White House to know that Democrats won and we want to work with Republicans."

Still, Democrats said they see no need to rush to put forward their own solutions to big budget problems such as Social Security, arguing Mr. Bush himself still hasn't come to the table with a serious proposal.

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, challenged Republicans: "Why is it our turn when it was your turn and you didn't do something?"

Still Against Taxes, Bush Embraces User Fees (MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON - The Bush administration may be squarely against new taxes, but its proposed fiscal 2008 budget seeks to raise almost $81 billion in new revenue over the next five years by hiking user fees and other charges on taxpayers and businesses.

Technically, changes to these fees aren't taxes. But for anyone who must pay them - everyone from recreational hikers to war veterans - it's a question of semantics.

DOJ_NMG_0128882

The big revenue gains would come from changes to federal health-care programs.

Bush would raise more than $15 billion through 2012 by allowing the Defense Department to raise enrollment fees and deductibles for medical care provided to military retirees under age 65. It would also raise retail pharmacy co-payments for all military retirees.

He'd raise another $1.6 billion over five years by increasing the pharmacy co-pay for all veterans and another $526 million by raising medical care fees for non-disabled, high-income war veterans. Veterans with household income above $50,000 a year would pay an annual enrollment fee of $250, which would jump to $750 a year for vets with household income above $100,000.

The president also seeks to limit the growth in health care subsidies for high-income beneficiaries of Medicare, the federal health-insurance program for the elderly. His budget estimates collecting $5.5 billion over five years through "reduced subsidies for certain high-income beneficiaries."

Bush also proposes to end the practice of indexing for inflation the income thresholds that determine just how much wealthy Medicare beneficiaries must pay out of their own pockets. Over time, failure to index those income thresholds for inflation would allow more Americans to shoulder a greater share of their health-care costs.

Corporations of many stripes also would have to pay new fees.

The biggest single new revenue generator under Bush's user-fee section is $35 billion he'd collect over five years from airlines for use of the nation's air traffic control system. This would ostensibly eliminate ticket taxes and other charges imposed by airlines on consumers.

But this isn't necessarily good news for flyers, since the airlines would still be expected to pass on the new costs to the flying public. It simply would make funding of the Federal Aviation Administration less vulnerable to swings in passenger traffic.

Businesses that still offer pensions to their employees would get nicked too. The president seeks almost $5.5 billion over five years from increases in the premiums that companies pay to the Department of Labor for defined-benefit pensions. This would help close the $19 billion deficit faced by the Pension Fund Guaranty Corp., which pays worker pensions, at least in part, when employers go bankrupt.

Bush also seeks to raise $325 million in fees from U.S.-based businesses that are seeking certification from the Department of Labor that they cannot find sufficient workers in the United States and need to bring in foreign workers.

And he envisions raising $461 million in user fees to fund regulation by the Commodity Futures Trading Corporation. The CFTC regulates trading of contracts for future deliveries of everything from oil to orange juice, but remains the only federal financial regulator not funded by those it supervises.

No federal activity is too small to escape a fee. Take the Corps of Engineers. Its civil works division manages 4,300 recreation areas, mostly at lakes and reservoirs, on 12 million acres in 43 states. This costs $267 million annually. Bush wants the Corps to charge unspecified entrance fees at some high-use areas. This could raise $65 million in fees collected from ordinary citizens over five years.

The administration also hopes to raise $2 million over five years by charging conference fees for events put on by the Minority Business Development Agency, part of the Department of Commerce. It hopes to raise another $1 million through registration fees at Federal Election Commission events.

Bush's Stealth Tax Increase (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Even President Bush acknowledges that he can't balance the budget without raising taxes.

The president would never put it that way, of course. In fact, his message is exactly the opposite. But the coming tax increase is the unavoidable, unstated subtext of his supposedly balanced-by-2012 budget.

The reason is the governmental cash cow known as the alternative minimum tax. Assume for the moment that the administration could somehow convince the newly Democratic Congress to accede to its pincer-tight domestic spending levels and to significant reductions in entitlement spending.

DOJ_NMG_0128883

Assume also that the administration is right about how much tax revenue the government will take in -- though the Congressional Budget Office says it's too rosy by $155 billion over five years.

Even then, the only way the administration achieves its balance is by assuming that it will continue to rake in billions of dollars in revenue from the alternative minimum tax. More than billions, actually: CBO estimates that if left unchanged, the AMT would bring in an extra $1 trillion through 2017.

So the president achieves balance only with a stealth tax increase in the form of the AMT. If he means, as he says and nearly everyone agrees, to fix the AMT, that revenue has to come from somewhere else.

The AMT, as you may have had the misfortune of discovering, is hitting growing numbers of taxpayers who are further down the income scale. That's because (1) the level at which it takes effect isn't adjusted for inflation, so more taxpayers find themselves covered over time and (2) the Bush tax cuts lowered regular income tax rates, sweeping additional taxpayers into the alternative system.

Figures compiled by the Urban Institute-Brookings Institution Tax Policy Center demonstrate the AMT's dramatic effect. If nothing is done to fix the AMT and the Bush tax cuts are extended as he wants, 89 percent of married families with two or more children and incomes between $75,000 and $100,000 will be hit by the AMT by 2010 -- compared with less than 1 percent in 2006. By 2017, almost half of all taxpayers -- 53 million -- will owe the AMT. The tax will hit two-thirds of those making between $75,000 and $100,000 and 90 percent of those making $100,000 or more.

Looked at another way, what the Bush tax cuts give to taxpayers, the AMT grabs back. By 2012, if it isn't changed, the AMT would take back almost one-third of the Bush tax cuts. As the accompanying chart shows, it would take back more than half of the tax cut for people making between $100,000 and $200,000.

In fact, in an irony that only a tax geek could love, the AMT has been transformed from its original purpose, a means of assuring that the wealthiest pay at least some taxes, into a way of underwriting tax cuts for the wealthiest. Because the AMT hits fewer of those with the highest incomes, the rather comfortable end up subsidizing Bush's tax cuts for the super-rich.

Instead of dealing with the AMT, the administration has simply slapped on another one-year fix. It says it wants a permanent solution but in the context of revenue-neutral comprehensive tax reform. This is Washington-speak for "we have to find the money somewhere, but we're not ready to say how yet."

So where will the money come from? The Tax Gap Fairy isn't going to leave enough under the budget pillow; the administration's calculation of how much owed but uncollected tax revenue can be brought in comes to just $29 billion over the next decade. The working poor don't pay income taxes -- in fact, they get money back through the earned-income tax credit and the refundable child tax credit, and even this administration isn't proposing to do away with them.

That leaves the middle class, the better-off and corporations to divvy up the tab. In that context, does it really make sense to permanently repeal the estate tax? To leave in place lower tax rates for the richest Americans? To continue to tax capital gains and dividends at far lower rates than ordinary income? These are the choices that the Bush budget entails, even if it fails, deliberately, to spell them out.

Dems May Override Bush On Kid Insurance (AP)

By Ben Evans

AP, February 7, 2007

Democrats may try to override a decision by President Bush to leave stopgap children's health insurance money out of his 2007 emergency war spending proposal.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi asked the president last week to propose $745 million in supplemental spending for the State Children's Health Insurance Program, or SCHIP, which primarily covers children in low-income working families.

Bush declined the lawmakers' request in the $93 billion emergency war spending proposal he submitted Monday to cover the remainder of 2007. But Democrats, eager to show policy differences with the White House, are saying they may add the $745 million when the bill comes up in the coming weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0128884

"It's certainly an option," said Drew Hammill, a Pelosi spokesman. "We know the states are running out of money on this. We're exploring all options."

If allocated, the new money would keep 14 states with looming shortfalls from having to cut off coverage until Congress renews the program later this year.

Georgia, for example, insures some 273,000 children under its PeachCare program but could be forced to end coverage in just a few weeks. Iowa's Hawk-I plan, which insures more than 30,000 children, expects to exhaust its budget by the end of June.

"We are putting the health coverage of thousands of Americans in jeopardy," Reid, D-Nev., and Pelosi , D-Calif., wrote in a letter to Bush on Friday. "The cost of filling the funding shortfall is minor in comparison to your other emergency requests."

The move could get significant backing from Republicans, particularly those from states with shortfalls.

"That's certainly something I could support," said Sen. Johnny Isakson, a Georgia Republican. "That would help Georgia."

Dennis Smith, director of Center for Medicaid and State Operations, defended the administration's omission by saying Bush has called instead for forcing states with SCHIP surpluses to give up unspent money more quickly to help states with deficits.

"We proposed a solution," Smith said. "There's plenty of money. It's just in different places."

States — and their representatives in Congress — have strongly resisted giving up surplus money, arguing that they will need it as participation grows and federal budgets tighten.

According to the nonpartisan Government Accountability Office, while some states still don't spend their full individual allotments, state spending overall has outstripped federal funding in recent years. So the pool of unspent money is quickly shrinking.

SCHIP insures some 6 million people nationwide and is aimed at working families who make too much to qualify for Medicaid but not enough to afford private insurance.

Along with Georgia and Iowa, states facing shortfalls are Alaska, Illinois, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Nebraska, New Jersey, Rhode Island and Wisconsin.

Congress passed a temporary fix before adjourning last year, redistributing some unspent money. The federal government released the first installment of that money this week, but state officials say it buys only a few months at best.

Funding Fears To Halt Some Cancer Trials (WSJ)

By Amy Dockser Marcus

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

The 10 federally funded cancer cooperative groups, which enroll nearly half of the patients in the nation who are participating in cancer trials, have begun to shut down trials and stop studying certain cancers amid funding concerns.

Robert L. Comis, president and chairman of the Coalition of Cancer Cooperative Groups, a nonprofit group comprising cancer centers, hospitals and patient- advocacy groups that work to increase participation in clinical trials, said 3,000 patient spots in clinical trials will be eliminated in 2007 at centers around the U.S. Although the decrease will affect all cancers, among the hardest-hit will be rarer cancers such as sarcoma, rare childhood tumors and head-and-neck cancers, Dr. Comis said; some of the cooperative groups are totally eliminating trials in those diseases.

The National Cancer Institute, which provides funding for the cancer cooperatives, had asked the groups to come up with cuts because federal funding for the agency has been flat, and inflation is eating into its spending power. All agencies under the Department of Health and Human Services have been operating under a "continuing resolution," which extended the fiscal 2006 budget levels until Feb. 15, when Congress must either pass the fiscal 2007 budget or extend the resolution. Both the '06 and proposed '07 budgets maintained essentially flat funding levels for the NCI, which is part of the National Institutes of Health.

President Bush's proposed fiscal '08 budget includes an increase of 0.8% for the NIH overall, but a decline of 0.2%, or $9 million, in the NCI's budget, to $4.78 billion. So NCI officials are anticipating further financial constraints.

Many groups are facing hard choices as a result of budget woes. The cuts at the cancer cooperative groups come at a time when, for the second year in a row, the number of people dying from cancer declined. The development of so-called targeted therapies that attack cancer cells but don't damage normal cells has increasingly led to cancer being considered a chronic condition rather than a death sentence. Many of the trials that led to the approval of those drugs by the Food and Drug Administration were sponsored by cancer centers participating in the various cooperative groups.

DOJ_NMG_0128885

The Southwest Oncology Group recently said it was shutting down its sarcoma and head-and-neck cancer trials and no longer will run trials in those diseases. The Eastern Cooperative Oncology Group will be closing its brain cancer and sarcoma trials. Many of the groups also will stop acquiring new tissue samples for their ovarian, endometrial and lung-cancer tissue banks. The tissue is used by researchers to search for new drug targets, among other things.

Dr. Comis said the cooperative groups are postponing by one to two quarters all Phase II clinical trials. This will delay the chance of getting a new drug approved or getting existing ones approved for additional types of cancer. "The cooperative groups are really the engine for establishing new standards of cancer care for the public," Dr. Comis said.

James Doroshow, director of the division of cancer treatment and diagnosis at NCI, said the agency had asked the cooperative groups to "make contingency plans for the worst-case scenario" and that the cuts are the result of the continuing effort to streamline operations. He said the institute is studying ways to ensure that promising studies can go forward even when the patient population is small. "We won't close down our interest in rare diseases," he said.

Deborah Banker, vice president for research communications at the Leukemia & Lymphoma Society, said the organization is studying ways it can support cooperative-group trials, including the possibility of raising private funding.

Can Bush Reach Ethanol Goal With Proposed Spending Plan? (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON -- In his State of the Union address, President Bush set an ambitious goal of cutting U.S. gasoline use 20% in the next 10 years. Now that Mr. Bush has unveiled his blueprint for federal spending, it isn't clear he is putting enough money on the table to accomplish that goal.

Mr. Bush is calling for millions of dollars in new spending to boost development of alternative fuels, chief among them ethanol, the corn-based additive. Targeted alternative fuel programs at the departments of Energy and Agriculture would benefit from increases of more than $250 million in the coming fiscal year, above what the president proposed for the current year. The administration also is proposing to spend another $1.6 billion in the next decade to boost ethanol production, as part of the farm bill to be written by Congress in coming months.

Many industry officials and lawmakers found the Bush plan wanting after sifting through the details yesterday. They said much broader federal action will be needed, especially to meet the president's goal to have the country using 35 billion gallons of alternative and renewable fuels by 2017, quadruple the current federal mandate.

"We have long ago given up relying on this president to act boldly to break the nation's addiction to oil," said Rep. Ed Markey (D., Mass.), a senior member of the House Energy and Commerce Committee. "His rhetoric looks to the future, but his budget proposals are mired in the past."

Tom Buis, president of the National Farmers Union, which represents 250,000 farm and ranch families across the country, agreed: "The rhetoric of the president in the State of the Union doesn't match the reality of what they're proposing here [in the budget]. To hear the president, it sounded like a massive effort, and this doesn't match that effort."

An Energy Department spokesman defended the proposed new spending on alternative fuels, saying it is part of a broader effort to make the U.S. "more reliant on farmers of the Midwest, than on oil sheiks of the Mideast."

At a minimum, the Bush budget looks to offer a down payment on the goal of greater ethanol production. Much of the Bush plan focuses on boosting the range of materials used to produce ethanol, now made principally with corn. Analysts suggest that increasing production of corn-based ethanol would result only in enough fuel to meet half of the president's alternative fuel-usage goal for 2017.

The rest largely would be accounted for with increased production of so-called cellulosic ethanol, which is made from wood chips and switchgrass, among other things. Currently, cellulosic ethanol isn't produced commercially in the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0128886

In the new budget, the president has proposed to spend $397 million next year on renewable energy projects at the Department of Agriculture, representing an increase of $161 million over what has been proposed for this fiscal year. A main focus of the spending would be development of cellulosic-ethanol technologies.

At the Energy Department, the president is proposing to spend $179 million on the department's biofuels initiative, an increase of $29 million. Financing for biofuel-research programs under the department's office of science would rise to $113 million, up $78 million.

Matt Hartwig, communications director for the Renewable Fuels Association, an ethanol trade group, said the president's proposal represents "a step in the right direction." The increased support will help attract private capital, encouraging investments in refineries that produce cellulosic ethanol, he said. "Clearly, the president has indicated he understands there is a need for the government to play a role," Mr. Hartwig said. "But there's certainly more that could be done."

Sweetheart Deal For Airlines (USAT)

By Ed Bolen

USA Today, February 7, 2007

For the giant airlines, Valentine's Day comes early this year. The president's budget, released Monday, is a sweetheart deal for the airlines. It would give them a massive tax cut, to be paid for largely by a "general aviation" industry that serves many of the nation's small and mid-sized businesses and their communities.

In supporting the president's budget, the airlines will likely defend their tax break as an opportunity to provide consumers with cheaper ticket prices. But, if history is a guide, this would be just another empty promise. Twice in the past decade, the airlines' federal taxes lapsed and, according to a 2004 Government Accountability Office report, "carriers generally raised base airfares."

Another driver of the airlines' support for the budget is the advantage it gives them on funding and control of the nation's Air Traffic Control (ATC) system. Considered the best in the world, the system uses an efficient "pay-at-the-pump" approach for fuel and ticket taxes that is consistent with widely accepted international standards. Yet, to hear the airlines tell it, we need a radical change that would, of course, let them pay far less into the ATC system. They propose taxing every aircraft at the same rate, whether it's carrying four passengers or 400.

This argument, made by the airlines for decades, fails the credibility test with experts the world over, because the costs for our aviation system aren't determined by a small airplane crossing an air traffic controller's radar screen over Kansas at midnight. Instead, the system's costs are driven by the airlines' hub-and-spoke network, which moves hundreds of flights through big airports at peak travel times. That requires a massive amount of people, resources and infrastructure, so it makes sense that the airlines bear the costs.

Rather than working to shift their responsibilities onto others, the airlines should lobby for a budget that serves everyone's interests. We hope the carriers will look past their own narrow agenda and join us in supporting a plan to truly modernize our nation's aviation system.

Ed Bolen is president of the National Business Aviation Association, which represents companies that use small planes for business.

Rangel Open To Tax Cuts In Wage Measure (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, February 7, 2007

The chairman of the House taxwriting committee said Tuesday he would be willing to link tax breaks for small business to a hike in the minimum wage but that the $8 billion tax package adopted by the Senate was unacceptable.

The comments by Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, were the first public acknowledgment by a top House Democrat that some tax cuts might be necessary to win approval of an increase in the federal wage floor.

"I'm prepared to send something over there for (the Senate) to be able to attach a tax package," Rangel said in an interview with reporters. "The problem, which I can't answer, is what would I accept."

DOJ_NMG_0128887

The House last month approved an increase in the minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25 over two years. The Senate last week passed the same wage hike but attached tax cuts for businesses that Republicans demanded to win their vote. The two bills would have to be reconciled in a House-Senate conference committee.

House Democrats, encouraged by labor organizations, have been pressing the Senate to pass a "clean bill" without any added provisions. But Senate Democrats argued that they need Republican votes to get the 60 votes required to overcome a filibuster or other procedural delays.

Rangel's view is especially important because constitutional precedents require tax legislation to originate in the House. Without Rangel's cooperation, the Senate tax plan would have a difficult time surviving.

But Rangel left no doubt that he would reject the Senate tax package — worth $8.3 billion over 10 years. He refused to speculate on what types of tax cuts would be acceptable and placed the burden for lowering the tax package on Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, Max Baucus, D-Mont.

"When we start with $8 billion my hearing aid is off," the 76-year-old congressional veteran said. "I see no reason to waste anybody's time."

Baucus said later he would continue to work with Rangel and said he was certain that their goal of raising the minimum wage would overcome differences on other provisions in the Senate bill.

Labor Pushes Dems To Deny Bush Extension Of Authority (HILL)

By Ian Swanson

The Hill, February 7, 2007

The AFL-CIO, United Autoworkers and other groups representing organized labor are pressing Democrats to deny the Bush administration an extension of its authority to send free-trade deals to Congress for up or down votes, partly by reminding lawmakers of the role trade played in Democrats' re-taking of majorities in the House and Senate.

"We're going to be talking to members of Congress extensively about why it would be a huge mistake to give this administration the authority," UAW's legislative director, Alan Reuther, said.

Labor groups already helped organize a letter to House Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) from 39 members of the freshman House Democratic class that said the "vocal stand against the administration's misguided trade agenda" was vital to their electoral success.

AFL-CIO Assistant Director for International Economics Thea Lee said the group is "flat-out opposed" to extending the existing fast-track authority, which expires at the end of June, and sees an extension limited to allowing the Bush administration to finish negotiations on the current World Trade Organization talks, known as the Doha round, as a non-starter.

"I definitely don't trust the Bush administration to negotiate a good Doha round," said Lee, who charged that issues such as labor rights and currency manipulation are not being discussed seriously in the talks.

Lee does not completely rule out fast track for the Bush administration, but said the policy would have to be overhauled fundamentally from the existing authority. Noting the letter from freshman Democrats to Rangel, she said last year's elections have placed labor in a strengthened position for battles over trade policy this year.

Organized-labor groups were among top financial contributors to many of the new Democrats elected in November. For example, labor political action committees (PACs) contributed $247,200 to the campaign of Rep. Betty Sutton (D-Ohio), and $265,500 to Rep. Heath Shuler (D-N.C.). PACs representing labor groups gave $215,000 to Rep. Mike Michaud (D-Maine), who with Sutton helped organize the letter from freshman Democrats to Rangel.

The pressure from labor is important because of possible splits within the Democratic Party on trade, including the possible extension of fast track requested by President Bush last week.

For example, Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) called on Congress to approve a new fast-track law with some modifications in a column in The Wall Street Journal at the beginning of January, and last week described fast track as vital to U.S. trade. Rangel also has been open to considering a fast-track extension, but has stressed that Congress must first receive assurances on how the administration would use it.

DOJ_NMG_0128888

Rep. Sandy Levin (D-Mich.), who chairs the Ways and Means trade subcommittee, has been more explicit in setting out conditions on extending fast track. He told The Hill last week that meaningful discussions on fast track cannot start until after the administration renegotiates labor provisions in three pending deals with Latin American countries to the satisfaction of congressional Democrats. Levin also wants the administration to persuade South Korea to agree in free-trade talks to end practices that he said prevent U.S. autos and auto parts from being exported to that country

"There is no question there are divisions within the Democratic Party over the trade issue," Lee said.

In the end, business representatives are hopeful that Rangel will be the key player on trade among House Democrats. "At the end of the day, if we're going to move the trade agenda forward, Charlie Rangel is going to have to sign off on it," the director of international trade policy for the National Association of Manufacturers, Christopher Wenk, said.

Wenk said House Democrats will want to find some issues, such as trade, where they can work with business.

Another business source noted that tax and healthcare issues could pose even greater problems for Rangel in trying to reach a compromise with committee Republicans and the administration. The source said trade is an issue on which Rangel might be able to forge a middle-ground consensus with Republicans, which would allow Rangel to show he is chairing Ways and Means differently from his predecessor, former Rep. Bill Thomas (R-Calif.), who was charged with shutting Democrats out of the legislative process and passing legislation with all Republican support.

Two committee aides said committee Republicans and Democrats have a shared desire to reach a compromise on trade, and agreed that finding common ground there could be easier than on healthcare and tax policy. They also emphasized, however, that the challenges remain significant.

Some key Democratic figures, including former President Clinton economic adviser Gene Sperling, have already spoken out in favor of at least extending fast track to allow the Bush administration to complete the Doha talks. During a hearing on trade and globalization last week, Sperling warned Ways and Means members that Congress could be seen as killing Doha if it did not extend fast track. Alluding to global warming and the Iraq war, he said this would contribute to international sentiment that the U.S. is intent on taking a unilateral approach to global issues.

Lee said such arguments might sound good to the Brookings Institution, a centrist Democratic think tank, but will not play well in the heartland. She said granting the administration a short-term extension of fast track to conclude Doha should be a non-starter for Congress.

Senate GOP Threatens Filibuster Over Budget (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, February 7, 2007

Senate Democrats and Republicans are headed for a classic game of chicken this week over the nine remaining fiscal 2007 appropriations bills.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) is poised to bring up a joint funding resolution for 13 Cabinet agencies, Congress and numerous independent agencies as early as today, but he has said repeatedly that he will not permit any Senators to offer amendments to the measure.

That stance has prompted Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) to threaten a Republican filibuster, and both sides are waiting to see who will blink before a possible government shutdown upon the expiration of the current continuing resolution on Feb. 15.

"At some point you get to Feb. 15 and something has to give," said Senate Appropriations ranking member Thad Cochran (R-Miss.).

Cochran added that Republicans are likely to call Reid's bluff and oppose his expected efforts to cut off debate, or invoke cloture, on the $463 billion measure. Reid would need 60 votes to prevail on cloture and move the funding resolution toward passage.

"I don't think they can get cloture," Cochran said. "We'll be protesting the process."

DOJ_NMG_0128889

The Senate could vote as early as Thursday on a procedural motion to limit debate on the motion to proceed to the bill. Even if Senators are allowed to proceed to the bill, Republicans indicated that they would require Reid to file another cloture motion on the bill itself. The whole process could bring the Senate dangerously close to the Feb. 15 deadline.

However, Democrats could try to avoid a government shutdown by pushing another short-term continuing resolution in lieu of the larger joint funding resolution that would cover all eight months left in fiscal 2007. A continuing resolution, however, would keep funding at 2006 levels or lower, whereas the joint funding resolution would provide some government agencies with small boosts in funding.

The House already has passed the fiscal 2007 joint funding resolution, and Senate passage without amendment would send the bill directly to the president. Congress already approved fiscal 2007 funding for the Defense and Homeland Security departments last year.

Before Congress resorts to short-term measures, however, Reid said he would move to use Senate procedures to block all amendments, because Republicans already have vetted the bill.

"In getting to the point where we are, there's been total consultation by the majority and minority" on the Appropriations Committee, Reid said on the floor Tuesday. "If there were ever a bipartisan measure, it's the [joint funding] resolution."

But Sen. John Sununu (R-N.H.) said Reid's statements are "not a fair argument for abridging the rights of Senators to offer amendments."

And Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), a member of the Appropriations panel, said, "There's a lot more people in this Congress than just the Appropriations subcommittee chairmen" and ranking members. Gregg added that Republicans are looking to offer only two or three amendments.

"It seems to me that you don't have to bring it up and close down debate," he said. "We know it's got to be done ... on a timely basis. But to bring a $463 billion bill to the floor without amendments would be unprecedented. That's never happened before."

One of the amendments Republicans would like to offer is a restoration of cuts to the Base Closure and Realignment Commission funding, which was used as a way to address shortfalls in veterans' medical care accounts.

But Appropriations Committee member Jack Reed (D-R.I.) said Republicans are trying to have it both ways, considering they had an opportunity last year to pass full BRAC funding in the fiscal 2007 military construction spending bill only to see it blocked by members of their own Republican Conference.

"That was an example of a bill that was held up by Republicans. So to come back and say we want a do-over is a real challenge," Reed said.

What's more, Senate Appropriations Chairman Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) wants to restore funding for BRAC later this year as part of a nearly $100 billion emergency war spending bill.

"Senator Byrd has every intention to work to make BRAC funding whole in the supplemental appropriations bill," said Byrd spokesman Tom Gavin.

In the meantime, Gavin said the Pentagon has $2.5 billion available for BRAC, which is "certainly enough to begin the [BRAC] process."

Democrats Set To Unveil Agenda (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, February 7, 2007

Preparing to return the House to regular order after an initial legislative sprint full of popular bills and closed rules, Democratic leaders said Tuesday they are finally primed to roll out a long-term agenda.

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) confirmed Tuesday that Democrats will unveil their new agenda next week, although he declined to provide specific details.

Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) said the plan will not be an itemized blueprint, but rather would feature "guideposts" and serve as a broad outline of the goals the new majority hopes to complete over the next six months.

DOJ_NMG_0128890

While Hoyer stated at a weekly press briefing the House will address health care and education bills in coming weeks — specifically mental health parity, the No Child Left Behind Act and re-authorization of the Head Start pre-kindergarten program — in a later interview he would not discuss which topics will take precedent under the new agenda, asserting that House committees must first be allowed to act on the measures.

"Obviously the committees are working," Hoyer said. "We just don't know how fast."

Democratic leadership sources suggested, however, that the plan will target broad topics such as environmental protections and health care initiatives that eventually will be translated into bills focused on clean water and spinal injuries, as well as efforts to address the ongoing recovery from Hurricane Katrina.

While Democrats spent their initial weeks in the House majority focused on their "100 hours" agenda — which included a half-dozen bills that Democrats touted during the 2006 campaign cycle — party leaders subsequently gave little indication about what issues would take precedence on House floor aside from must-do legislation, such as the federal budget and appropriations bills.

In the immediate future, the House is scheduled to debate a resolution next week condemning President Bush's proposal to increase troop levels in Iraq. (See story, p. 1.)

While Democratic sources acknowledged the lull prompted some minor grumbling among Members, Republicans more openly criticized the perceived standstill.

"They didn't have a plan. As the saying goes, when you fail to plan you plan to fail," said one GOP leadership aide, who asserted the Democrats' start paled in comparison to how Republicans began their majority in 1995, when the GOP pushed through the "Contract with America."

"They really haven't delivered much more than a few sound bites when you take a look at the legislation," added the aide, who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

But Democrats defended their control of the chamber, noting that in addition to completing their initial agenda, House lawmakers dealt with a continuing resolution to fund the federal government for the duration of fiscal 2007, a necessity given that the Republican-controlled 109th Congress did not complete work on those spending bills.

"It's important to remember that under normal schedule it would only be our second week here," Hoyer spokeswoman Stacey Bernards said Monday, referring to the fact that recent House sessions have begun in mid-January and typically have not produced significant legislation. "Committees are just now gearing up."

A Democratic leadership aide, who asked not to be identified, echoed that argument.

"We got a massive amount done in January and now we're formulating the agenda for the rest of the year," the aide said Tuesday, adding: "Just because we haven't put [our goals] in a one-pager and called them something doesn't mean we don't have a weighty agenda in the coming months."

Financial Services Chairman Barney Frank (D-Mass.) also cited Democrats' vow to move legislation through the chamber's regular order, particularly the committee process of hearings and markups.

"The Republicans say, 'Why isn't anything on the floor?' The answer is we don't want to bypass the committees," Frank said. Among the first items his panel will send to the House floor are bills including terrorism risk insurance and executive compensation.

Rep. Ellen Tauscher (Calif.), who chairs the centrist New Democrat Coalition, also noted that the new majority hopes to eschew the "truncated process" that many Democrats perceived under the then-Republican majority.

"I think we will not be reactive like the former majority was, where you saw a lot of social agenda, a lot of divisive agenda coming forward because something happened out in the real world that caused people to say, 'That's something that's driving our base,'" Tauscher said. "Regular order is a very important thing for us to do. It's also how you get bipartisan support on legislation."

One Democratic operative, who asked not to be named, said the slow development of an agenda also could be attributed to a learning curve for the new majority.

"It's going to take some time to work out which parts of the system we've had for 12 years stay and which get thrown out," the operative said.

DOJ_NMG_0128891

Members Earmarking Without Earmarks (RC)

By Kate Ackley And John Stanton

Roll Call, February 7, 2007

Nobody wants to give up the power of the purse — especially not Members of Congress.

Even though most of the appropriations bills for fiscal 2007 got stripped of practically all Congressionally mandated "earmarks," Members — and the lobbyists who push for funding of specific projects — have turned their attention to the executive branch agencies doling out chunks of money that otherwise would have gone for earmarks.

Members, especially those on the Appropriations and authorizing committees, can wield considerable behind-the-scenes power to make sure their favored projects get funded by executive-branch agencies.

One appropriations lobbyist, who would not be quoted by name, said Members and staffers alike have been calling agency officials to protect their 2007 earmarks.

"I heard Members and staff already made the calls before they put the money in the" omnibus bill, this lobbyist said. "They would say verbally, 'If we have this group submit an application — as long as it is complete and accurate and fits within the parameters of the program — you will honor that, right?' The answer was in the affirmative every time."

And for good reason.

Jim Dyer, a longtime House Appropriations staff member who is now managing director at the consulting firm Clark & Weinstock, said if anyone knows what an agency's spending priorities are, it's the Appropriations committees. And Members can use that power to get their own spending priorities through.

"The agencies recognize that they're up there for the '08 budget," Dyer said. "If they're going to disregard what the Congress wants [for 2007], they're doing it at their own peril. They know they could pay a long-term price for alienating Members."

Michael O'Bannon, president of the budget-focused EOP Group, said that within 30 days of passing the omnibus spending bill, the agencies must provide funding details to Congress.

"To the extent that the Congress does not like what the administration plans to do, obviously when they get that 30-day plan from the agency, they can go back and say we don't really like what you did here," O'Bannon said. "That, too, is an earmark."

Like the unnamed lobbyist, O'Bannon said that the process of calling agency officials is already going on in an informal way, with Appropriations staffers "calling budget officers over at the agency."

And, he said, it's likely that the agency budget officer will do what the Appropriations Committee staffer asks "without any acrimony because of the immense power Congress has" over the agencies' budgets.

But a Senate Appropriations Committee source said that while there may be a push by some Members to bring their clout with an agency to bear, at this point no reports of Senate lawmakers looking to influence how money is spent have surfaced. The aide predicted it likely would take several months before it is clear whether Members have sought to influence agency spending or whether it is a "myth everyone assumes is going on."

However, the committee source did say that Appropriations Chairman Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) was not "happy about turning over the power of the purse" to the executive branch and that the committee would be aggressive in its oversight of the spending process. The aide also said that Byrd and other lawmakers would pay close attention to reports on how federal funds are being doled out.

Nevertheless, Senate aides privately acknowledged that their offices likely would begin contacting agencies to stress their desire that funds earmarked in the appropriations bills passed last year make it to those specific projects.

Gerald Warburg, executive vice president at Cassidy & Associates, one of the biggest appropriations-focused firms, said that one of his clients, the Sacramento Area Flood Control Agency, is fighting to keep funding levels from the Army Corps of Engineers budget, which Congress gave more than $2 billion to give out.

Warburg said a Member of Congress already has had a face-to-face meeting with the agency head to keep the flood-control funding stable. Warburg would not name the Member, but according to published reports, Rep. Doris Matsui (D-Calif.), who represents the Sacramento area, has championed the flood-control programs and met with top officials. A Matsui spokesman did not provide a comment on the issue.

DOJ_NMG_0128892

"The best projects are the ones that have to do with public health and safety," Warburg said. If the agencies don't fund those types of projects, then when agency officials are on the Hill this year "defending their FY '08 budget, the legislators are going to be furious."

Another appropriations lobbyist, who would not be quoted by name, said Members on the oversight committees have a better shot at influencing a particular agency than their rank-and-file colleagues.

"Members are going to treat this like regular earmarks," this lobbyist said. "They are going to help their districts and the lobbyists they like that raise money for them."

Colin Wellenkamp, a vice president at the Washington Linkage Group, represents state and local governments — many of which saw their earmarks derailed in the '07 budget.

Wellenkamp said that because cities and other clients lobbying for earmarks have been making their case to Members and staff for more than a year, "These are projects that Congressional offices are intimately aware of, and they are more than equipped to advocate to the agency on our clients' behalf."

Wellenkamp added that much of the money that would have been used for earmarks will now be given out in the form of competitive agency grants.

"We have several clients that are certainly going to try and take advantage of the grant process, to supplement the loss of earmarks in the bill, absolutely," he said. "The money is still around. It's just going to be channeled differently."

Appropriations lobbyists say they worry that some of their peers will end up getting clients funding while they'll be left saying that no one got earmarks when that's not entirely true — because some of the most plugged-in Members and lobbyists will score agency victories for clients.

"Everyone is looking at ways of getting these FY '07 projects funded, and there is some window of opportunity, and it is going to be abused," said the first appropriations lobbyist.

While there might still be uncertainty about the 2007 budget, one thing remains clear: In the 2008 budget, there is going to be "a tremendous amount of pent-up demand," Dyer said.

Pelosi's Push For Jet Remains Up In Air (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough And Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, February 7, 2007

The Bush administration has agreed to provide House Speaker Nancy Pelosi with regular access to an Air Force passenger jet, but the two sides are negotiating whether she will get the big aircraft she wants and who she may take as passengers, according to congressional and administration sources.

A congressional source said that Rep. John P. Murtha, chairman of House Appropriations subcommittee on defense, which controls the Pentagon's spending, has telephoned administration officials to urge them to give the speaker what she wants.

The congressional source said Pentagon officials complained that Mr. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, is accusing them of sexism for not immediately heeding her request.

Megan E. Grote, Mr. Murtha's press secretary, said, "Mr. Murtha absolutely never said anything about being 'sexist.' We have no further comment."

Meanwhile, Republican Conference Chairman Adam Putnam of Florida said Mrs. Pelosi's request represents "an arrogance of office that just defies common sense" and called it "a major deviation from the previous speaker."

Minority Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri called it a "flying Lincoln Bedroom," and Rep. Patrick T. McHenry, North Carolina Republican, labeled the speaker's plane "Pelosi One."

"This is a bullet point to a larger value -- Pelosi's abuse of power continues," Mr. McHenry said yesterday. "It began when the speaker denied minority rights to Republicans, continued with her 'TunaGate' scandal, and now she's exploiting America's armed forces and taxpayers for her own personal convenience."

"TunaGate" was a reference to Democrats exempting American Samoa from legislation to increase the minimum wage. Star-Kist Tuna, whose parent company Del Monte Corp. is based in Mrs. Pelosi's district, had lobbied against the wage increase.

DOJ_NMG_0128893

An aide to Mrs. Pelosi, who is arguing she needs the jets for security reasons, yesterday referred questions to the Air Force, which is studying the California Democrat's request along with lawyers at the Pentagon and at the White House. "A lot of people are working this," an Air Force source said.

The congressional source said government lawyers are trying to reconcile Mrs. Pelosi's request with Defense Department policy and congressional travel rules.

The Washington Times first reported last week that Mrs. Pelosi's staff was pressing the administration for access to Air Force aircraft. Sources said the request went beyond what was offered to former House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican.

Mr. Hastert used an Air Force commuter-type jet to travel to and from his district. Mr. Hastert gained the access for security reasons after the September 11, 2001, attacks. Previously, the House speaker, who is second in the line of succession to the presidency, used commercial flights for such trips.

Mrs. Pelosi wants a larger aircraft that can fly to her home district of San Francisco nonstop. She also wants to be able to ferry other members of the congressional delegation, family members and her staff.

The speaker's request is being handled by her chief counsel, Bernard Raimo, a veteran Democratic lawyer on Capitol Hill.

"Who she can take is being worked out, outside the Air Force," said Ed Gulick, an Air Force spokesman at the Pentagon.

He said the Air Force is studying what types of planes are available for long, cross-country flights. Currently, three planes assigned to the 89th Airlift Wing at Andrews Air Force Base can make such nonstop flights year-round -- the C-32, C-40B and C-37.

Such VIP planes are in high demand.

"She's effectively taking a bird out of the fleet," said a defense source. "It will most directly impact the House, because they're the heavy users of the large aircraft. Congress looks at that Andrews fleet as their Hertz rent-a-car."

The congressional source said the speaker's office requested an Air Force plane to take her to a weekend Democratic retreat in Williamsburg, but the Pentagon declined.

The source said Mr. Hastert on one occasion used an Air Force plane for such an event. The Air Force later determined it was a mistake, and such flights were not repeated.

The source said the Pentagon will likely give in to Mrs. Pelosi's requests for a large plane and travel entourage, given her and Mr. Murtha's power over defense spending.

Mr. Raimo argues that Mrs. Pelosi needs a military aircraft, as opposed to commercial flights, for security reasons.

The defense source, who asked not to be named, termed her request "carte blanche," saying she wanted a plane that could carry an entourage just like President Bush, who flies on Air Force One, and Vice President Dick Cheney, who also always flies on military planes.

Department Of Peace Bill Off To A Rocky Start — Again (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, February 7, 2007

Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio) may need to stage a sit-in on the House floor before a Department of Peace and Nonviolence is created.

Kucinich, newly empowered as chairman of the domestic policy subcommittee on the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, vowed yesterday to hold hearings on legislation lawmakers have discussed since the dawn of the republic: a bill to establish a Department of Peace and Nonviolence.

It seems that, like the Founding Fathers before him, Kucinich won't get past the talk — even with a bit of Hollywood backing.

Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), whose job is to manage the flow of legislation to the House floor, said that he considers Kucinich a "thoughtful, substantive guy and a good friend," but that "a lot of members have a lot to say about [the bill] and we're going to give them a lot of time to say it."

Perhaps unintentionally, other Democrats slighted the initiative yesterday. The majority governs room assignments, and Kucinich had to hold his peace press conference in a cramped room in the Capitol basement. Meanwhile, a gathering of centrist Republicans, the Tuesday Group, had a better room despite its minority status.

Plus, Hoyer met with reporters while Kucinich was making his announcement. Hoyer's appointment was a regular one — he talks to members of the press at the start of every workweek when Congress is in session — but it perhaps could have been rescheduled. While plenty of cameras showed up at Kucinich's event to get a few frames of "Walk the Line" star Joaquin Phoenix — wearing a black suit and pale green shirt without a tie — few print reporters opted out of the weekly briefing.

Phoenix did not speak; he lent his support, Kucinich said, by his presence.

Several other B-list celebrities were on hand, including actresses Amy Smart and Francis Fisher, as well as Nicole Brown Simpson's sister, Denise Brown, who has founded a charitable organization in her sister's name.

Pointing to Phoenix, Smart and Fisher, Rep. Lynn Woolsey (D-Calif.), a chairwoman of the Progressive Caucus, said, "You humble us because we think we're big shots until you show up."

She thanked the celebrities for bringing attention to the peace movement, saying, "We can't do anything if the people in this country don't care."

Despite the logistical hurdles and legislative roadblocks, Kucinich made history when he said he would hold hearings on H.R. 808, which has 52 cosponsors, including centrist Democratic Reps. Ellen Tauscher (Calif.) and Albert Wynn (Md.).

Tauscher pointed to a letter she and Kucinich wrote in 2002 urging Bush to postpone a vote on going to war until after the midterm election. At least one left-leaning political action committee has suggested finding a liberal Democrat to challenge Tauscher; Wynn nearly lost his primary in 2006 to a more liberal Democrat.

"We have to have a balance. For too long we have had a knee-jerk reaction to overuse the military for things like nation-building and reconstruction," Tauscher said. "Politics is never a factor."

Wynn, a new convert to the bill who has called his 2002 vote for the war in Iraq a mistake, said, "It makes sense to send a signal to the world that we'll at least consider non-violent solutions."

Kucinich said as chairman he would revisit the work of the Kerner Commission, which in 1968 issued a report on the causes of riots and violence in American society.

While the activists and actors in attendance agreed on the need to create a Department of Peace, they did not agree on who should become secretary of Peace.

Phoenix said nothing when asked for an informal nomination.

Wynn suggested Kucinich for the job — if he does not become president, that is.

Rep. Susan Davis (D-Calif.), who questioned President Bush on his handling of the Iraq war on Saturday at the House Democratic retreat, suggested Ret. Gen. Anthony Zinni. The chairwoman of Peace Alliance, Marianne Williamson, said the job should go to Jan Hartke, an environmental activist whose father, while an Indiana senator in the 1960s, introduced legislation to create a Peace Department.

Throughout the hour-long event, Kucinich remained upbeat and positive.

"There will be a Department of Peace," he said, speaking of a department that Jesus Christ, Mahatma Gandhi and Martin Luther King Jr. would have wanted to be a part of government.

"It's not about blaming anyone for anything. We want to capture the human potential … to create peace in our homes to influence peace in the nation," Kucinich said.

Even House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) lavished praise on Kucinich, saying his is the standard by which all other presidential candidates will be judged in terms of their commitment to the peace movement.

The event ended when Kucinich's aide held a hand-written sign from the back of the room that read, "You need to get to the House floor."

White House Wreath Placed In Honor Of Ronald Reagan's Birthday (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0128895

SIMI VALLEY — Former President Ronald Reagan was remembered in a ceremony today on what he would have called another anniversary of his 39th birthday.

Former Attorney General Edwin Meese III and Col. James B. Seaton III, commanding officer of the Marine Corps' Camp Pendleton, placed a wreath of white roses on behalf of President Bush at Reagan's grave at the Ronald Reagan Presidential Museum.

Bush said in a proclamation that the wreath and military honors were sent "in tribute to his distinguished service to a grateful nation."

Two World War II vintage military aircraft flew over the ceremony and Marines offered a 21-gun salute.

Reagan, who died on June 5, 2004, at 93 after a 10-year battle with Alzheimer's disease, was remembered by Meese as a Cold War warrior for his "peace-through-strength" mantra. Meese said Reagan led the United States out of a national malaise and ended the Cold War.

"He had integrity," Meese said. "And he had perseverance.... We celebrate the legacy of Ronald Reagan."

Seaton told the crowd of about 600 seated on a sunny lawn near the grave that Reagan was an inspiration to the Marine Corps during his presidency and that legacy lives on today as the military faces adversaries in Iraq.

"America didn't become great because we took the easy road," the colonel said.

Former first lady Nancy Reagan, reported feeling a bit under the weather and reserving her energy for an evening library fundraiser honoring former President George H.W. Bush, said in a statement that her husband would have enjoyed the tributes.

"It's hard to believe that Ronnie would have been 96 years old today," Mrs. Reagan said. "I know he would have been thrilled to see the military band and color guard, the Naval Academy Glee Club and the flyover at his library today, and he would have been touched that so many of his old friends are coming to celebrate on his behalf."

Tonight, Mrs. Reagan planned to present former President Bush with the 2007 Ronald Reagan Freedom Award during a gala at the Beverly Hilton Hotel.

The award is given to those who "have contributed greatly to the cause of freedom worldwide.'' Past recipients include Colin Powell, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, Jordan's King Hussein, Lady Margaret Thatcher, the Rev. Billy Graham, Bob Hope and Rudolph Giuliani.

"George was not only my husband's dedicated vice president, but he was also Ronnie's loyal friend," Mrs. Reagan said in a statement.

"Working closely with Ronald Reagan was one of the great joys of my life, and receiving this prestigious Reagan Freedom Award is something I will treasure always," former President Bush said in a statement.

The Biggest Secret In Health Care (WSJ)

By HOLMAN W. JENKINS, JR.

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

President Bush might seem a candidate for OCD treatment, what with his insistence that the fix for health care is tax reform. He was at it again in his latest budget proposal, which calls for reforming the unlimited tax break for job-related health insurance.

Where does he get such ideas?

The answer: From every recent president that went before him, including Presidents Reagan, Bush and Clinton. And from all the wonks in wonkdom, who've long understood that the tax code was the problem and who've occasionally even shared this understanding with the public, most recently during the heady days before the Clinton health plan was submitted to a congressional dumpster.

A newspaper we know and love, in 1993, reported as a nearly uncontested fact: "The tax breaks on this enormous transfer of wealth have created a health-care market characterized by inefficiency, ignorance and excess."

The head of Blue Cross & Blue Shield declared: "The most powerful incentive is the tax code. We've been through five decades of teaching the individual that health care is a free good."

DOJ_NMG_0128896

Paul Ellwood, godfather of the Clinton plan, said: "Changing the tax status of health benefits is the glue that holds managed competition together."

Bill Clinton himself said: "There has to be some sort of personal responsibility in this health-care system we set up."

Let the current President Bush give voice to the same analysis, however, and it must be some kind of supply-side hokum.

To rehearse: The tax code is the original hectoring mommy behind our health-care neuroses. It gives the biggest subsidy to those who need it least. It pays the affluent to buy more medical care than they would if they were spending their own money. It prompts them to launder our health spending through an insurance bureaucracy, creating endless paperwork. It prices millions of less-favored taxpayers out of the market for health insurance. It fosters a misconception that health care is free even as workers are perplexed over the failure of their wages to rise.

Clark Havighurst, a Duke University sage, points to one of the many destructive consequences: "With insured consumer-voters generally believing that someone other than themselves is paying for their health care, they see no reason not to approve regulatory and other public policies that raise the cost of that care and foreclose opportunities to economize."

He was thinking of the congressional rage to prevent managed care from saving us money, after Congress and everyone else first championed managed care as a way to save us money.

Others point to a destructive consequence for the practice of medicine itself. Patients, because their only skin in the game is their skin, end up listening to doctors and hospitals who are massively incentivized to expose them to more procedures, more tests and more drugs than patients, quite apart from any consideration of costs, would choose for themselves.

Guess what? The patients are right. Much of this superfluous care is bad for their health. (Such is the finding of a long-running Dartmouth Medical School study of national treatment patterns.)

Much better, in our view, would be simply to do away with the tax break and let businesses and consumers adjust. The insurance industry wouldn't stand around and watch its livelihood vanish. And tax rates could be adjusted to make sure the overall tax burden remains unchanged. You'd be shocked at how quickly the system would right itself.

Alas, there is panic on K Street when anyone suggests doing away with the tax break directly. The health industry goes ape. (Think doctors, hospitals, drug makers, insurers, etc. don't enjoy having a $200 billion-a-year tax subsidy to encourage consumption of their products? Think big business doesn't like having a tax subsidy for a good chunk of its employment costs? Think they don't lobby?)

So Mr. Bush makes peace with the tax code's bias toward health spending in order to do battle with the particular vice of our overreliance on third-party payment. He does so by equalizing the tax treatment of health dollars whether they flow directly from a consumer pocket (the vehicle here is health savings accounts) or through a third-party laundromat.

He would do so by equalizing the treatment of health insurance whether you buy it yourself or your employer buys it for you (his latest plan).

No, hosannas will not be sung to him by left or right. However, keep something in mind as the 2008 debate heats up. The oft-mouthed goal of expanding health insurance to the poor would be far easier to achieve if we stopped subsidizing overconsumption by the non-poor.

There's a lesson in presidential leadership here. Mr. Clinton lost interest in health care after a few months when he discovered health care wouldn't result in a monument to his presidency. In a very pre-postmodern approach, Mr. Bush identified the same basic problem and has worked steadily away at it, showing that a president can accomplish something as long as he's willing not to receive any credit.

The one great and glaring fault in his record is the creation of an unsustainable drug benefit to add to the unsustainable burden of future Medicare spending. Then again, what is unsustainable is unsustainable.

The pattern for that reform is already present between the lines -- towards greater reliance on saving than taxing, towards greater reliance on individual responsibility than on the illusory free-lunchism of government transfers. For the problem of Medicare is the problem health care writ small: The illusion that somebody else is available to pay our bills for us.

Beyond Health-Care Band-Aids (WP)

By Ezekiel J. Emanuel And Victor R. Fuchs

DOJ_NMG_0128897

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

It seems everyone has ideas for health-care reform. President Bush has proposed tax breaks to encourage the uninsured to buy coverage. Massachusetts has approved and California has proposed individual mandates with state subsidies to allow people with low incomes to buy coverage. Maryland wants to raise cigarette taxes to pay for coverage for the working uninsured. John Edwards wants to require employers to provide insurance or pay into a fund that would help individuals buy insurance. Sen. Hillary Clinton has proposed increasing the income eligibility limits for the State Children's Health Insurance Program. And the list goes on.

This profusion of proposals means that health care is getting more attention, and this makes reform more likely. But these proposals are like band-aids and fall far short of what our sick health-care system needs.

They build on what everyone agrees is a broken system. Ultimately, they prop up the sagging employment-based insurance system, with all its inefficiencies and inequities, and preserve the second-class income-tested programs such as Medicaid. By focusing on covering the uninsured, they fail to address either administrative inefficiency or long-term cost control. Consequently, in the short run they require ever more money to cover the uninsured, and in the long run the unabated rise in health costs will quickly revive the problem of the uninsured.

At $2 trillion per year, the U.S. health-care system suffers much more from inefficiency than lack of funds. The system wastes money on administration, unnecessary tests and marginal medicines that cost a lot for little health benefit. It also provides strong financial incentives to preserve such inefficiency.

By building on the existing health-care system, these reform proposals entrench the perverse incentives.

Moreover, even plans that reduce the number of uninsured today may find that those gains will disappear in a few years if costs continue to grow much faster than gross domestic product. As costs rise, many companies will drop insurance and pay the modest taxes or fees that have been proposed. States will find that costs exceed revenue and that cuts will have to be made.

The State Children's Health Insurance Program (SCHIP) provides a good example of the toxic interactions between public and private coverage. When it was enacted in 1997, SCHIP filled a hole, offering insurance to children whose parents earned too much to be covered by Medicaid but not enough to buy private health insurance. By 2005, 6 million children received health coverage through SCHIP. But SCHIP has had only a small impact on the overall number of uninsured children. In 2006, there were nearly 9 million uninsured children, compared with 10 million uninsured in 1997. Why? As costs rose, some companies stopped offering insurance, others dropped coverage for dependents, and others raised employee contributions to the point where some workers preferred covering their children through SCHIP.

Band-aids are not enough. The country needs comprehensive reform. Here are five essential changes:

Â· Get businesses out of health care. Health care is not part of their core competencies but something they use as a part of labor relations. It creates job lock and distorts employers' hiring and firing decisions.

Â· Guarantee every American an essential benefits package. This package -- modeled on what members of Congress get -- should be provided by qualified plans that would receive a risk-adjusted payment for each enrollee. Americans could choose their health plans, with guaranteed enrollment and renewability; "cherry-picking" and "lemon-dropping" would be minimized.

Â· The universal basic package should be financed by a dedicated tax that everyone pays, such as a value-added tax.

Â· Administer the program through an independent National Health Board and regional boards modeled on the Federal Reserve System. They would oversee health plans, define the benefits packages and, through strong incentives, facilitate adoption of patient safety measures and electronic management of medical records.

Â· Establish an independent Institute for Technology and Outcomes Assessment to systematically evaluate new technologies and quantify their health benefits in relation to their costs. These evaluations would be used by the National Health Board and health plans.

Reform based on these measures would eliminate job lock, increase workers' wages and make labor markets more efficient. It would also give Americans -- rather than their employers -- their choice of health plans, doctors and hospitals. And it would eliminate the $200 billion business tax deduction for providing health coverage.

Most important, such measures would improve efficiency and provide cost control for the health-care system. Eliminating employers' vetting of insurance companies and all associated costs would save tens of billions of dollars. Since all Americans would be guaranteed coverage, means testing and determination of subsidies necessary for Medicaid and SCHIP would be eliminated. Finally, the expected consolidation of the health insurance industry would also increase efficiency.

DOJ_NMG_0128898

Only comprehensive change of our broken system can provide universal, portable coverage, reduce inefficiency, control costs and secure health care for all Americans long into the future.

Ezekiel J. Emanuel, chairman of the Department of Clinical Bioethics at the National Institutes of Health Clinical Center, is a co-author of "No Margin, No Mission." The views expressed here are his own. Victor R. Fuchs is a former president of the American Economics Association and the author of "Who Shall Live? Health, Economics, and Social Choice."

Hollywood Takes Its Concerns About Piracy And Taxes To Washington (NYT)

By David M. Halbfinger

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

Hollywood has often been a whipping boy here, but with a new Congress in session, the heads of the major movie studios converged on the capital Tuesday to pitch their industry in the unaccustomed role of good guy: boon to the trade balance, engine of economic growth, polisher of the nation's image and employer of a big, uncelebrated, middle-class work force.

Cheered by the Democratic takeover, the industry's leadership hopes to press its agenda of fighting piracy, obtaining new tax advantages and reining in movie and television production from going abroad.

So the Motion Picture Association of America put on a daylong show for lawmakers, lobbyists and Capitol Hill aides, armed with some A-list talent — the actor Will Smith gave a morning speech, and Clint Eastwood received an award at dinner — and a new study showing that film and TV production accounts for $30 billion in wages, $10 billion in taxes, more than 400,000 jobs and a trade surplus of $9.5 billion.

"When people read about us, they read about celebrity and glitz," said Dan Glickman, the trade association's chairman, who said he learned much about other industries from such programs while he was a congressman. "That's an asset we have, but that's not enough."

Judging from a few panel discussions, the M.P.A.A. had calculated that it would be hard to drum up sympathy for an industry symbolized by its highly paid stars and largely made up of giant conglomerates. So, atop the talking points, apparently, was the idea that the movie business is really made up of middle-class guild and union members who often live hand to mouth.

"It's not just me and Tom," said Mr. Smith, referring to Tom Cruise, one of his peers who can command $20 million a picture. He said his latest film, "I Am Legend," was employing 1,000 local crew members and actors on location in New York.

The director Paris Barclay told of trying to hire one of his favorite technicians recently, and learning that the man had moved his wife and three children to Vancouver, because that is where the work is.

And Taylor Hackford, the director of "Ray," in establishing his credentials, added: "I'm working class."

The conversation often turned to piracy, the existential issue that dominates the association's agenda. Mr. Hackford, who spent more than a decade developing "Ray," told of finding a bootleg DVD of the movie on the day of its theatrical release, and said 42 million illicit copies were sold within five months.

That meant millions of dollars in lost revenue — "and DVDs is how people get their money back," he said of movie financiers. "If they don't, will I be able to sell a hard-to-sell picture like 'Ray'? No."

In a rare moment of newsmaking, Barry M. Meyer, the chairman of Warner Brothers, issued a sharp rebuke to the president of the Consumer Electronics Association, Gary Shapiro, who warned in January that antipiracy efforts could "smother" technological progress and said that "private conduct may be unauthorized, but that does not mean it is piracy."

Mr. Meyer took issue with calling the theft of intellectual property merely unauthorized rather than illegal, and said that Hollywood's promotion of so-called digital rights management technology had made it possible for consumers to rent or buy movies and TV programs at a variety of prices.

"It's easy to demonize it, but without some level of control and order, things don't work," he said. "The only choice we're not offering is free."

He added: "Unlike the technology industry, which can outrun pirates by upgrading their product, there is no 'Gone With the Wind 2.0.' "

DOJ_NMG_0128899

Mr. Glickman took Mr. Meyer and some of his peers — Brad Grey of Paramount and Michael Lynton of Sony Pictures — to the capital for meetings with the new Senate leader, Harry Reid of Nevada; Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the minority leader; and Representative Steny Hoyer of Maryland, the House majority leader. The House speaker, Nancy Pelosi; Mr. Hoyer; Senator Christopher Dodd of Connecticut; and Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York attended an evening reception.

Almost no mention was made of the M.P.A.A.'s movie rating system, which Mr. Glickman recently tweaked. And it was not a Republican, but Senator Dianne Feinstein of California who, departing from a paean to everything else the movie industry stands for, called for the studio chiefs in the room to cut down on gratuitous sex and violence.

More typical of the day, however, was Representative Charles Rangel, the new Ways and Means chairman, promising to press the Bush administration to take a tougher line in trade talks with Russia, China and other countries concerning rampant piracy or barriers to Hollywood movies.

And then there was Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, vowing to press the Justice Department to do more about piracy — moments before rushing over to the actor James Cromwell and complimenting his performance as Prince Philip in "The Queen."

Mystery Solved (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, February 7, 2007

It had been one of the best little puzzles of the 110th Congress so far: Why did Rep. Dan Burton (R-Ind.) miss 19 House votes over four days in mid-January? Where was he?

Burton's office hadn't returned several calls from HOH over the past couple of weeks on this subject, nor did it respond to inquiries from the local press. No one in the Republican leadership seemed to know, either.

Now, when HOH finally learned Tuesday where Burton had been — courtesy of a report in The Indianapolis Star — he kicked himself for not figuring it out earlier. As anyone who has followed Burton over the years should have known, he was playing golf.

Specifically, Burton was at the Bob Hope Chrysler Classic in lovely Palm Springs, Calif., where he played in the pro-am event at four local golf courses over four days.

Keeping with tradition, Burton's office did not respond to HOH's request for comment Tuesday, and his staff didn't return the Star's calls, either.

And really, why should they? Why should an elected official like Burton have to explain his whereabouts to anyone? So what if he just decided not to go to work for a week? Can't you do that at your job? How important was it really to vote on stem-cell research funding, the minimum wage or energy policy when he had the chance to play golf with celebrities such as Yogi Berra, George Lopez, Michael Bolton, Huey Lewis and Maury Povich? This whole story is working HOH into a Lou Dobbs-style populist lather.

Anyway, Burton has been playing in the annual Bob Hope event for several years and often has missed House votes to do so. Sometimes, however, Burton has been able to make his tee time without missing any House work.

HOH's favorite example came in 2000, when Burton, at the time still the chairman of what was then known as the Government Reform Committee, scheduled a panel field hearing in nearby Los Angeles the same week as the Bob Hope event.

The purpose of the hearing — HOH is not making this up — was to study whether Soviet agents had ever hidden secret stashes of weapons in the United States in case World War III broke out. The hearing was definitely NOT an excuse for Burton to fly out to sunny Southern California in the dead of winter on the taxpayers' dime.

"It's my understanding that there are many potential targets for Russian sabotage in California," Burton said at the time. "If there are hidden caches of explosives in the state, that's very dangerous. ... That's why we are here."

Then in 2005, HOH told you about Burton missing an important International Relations Committee vote on UN reform because he was playing at the Booz Allen Hamilton pro-am golf tournament over at Congressional Country Club in Bethesda, Md. That probably didn't do much for Burton in the race for the top GOP slot on the International Relations Committee, a contest he ended up losing to Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (Fla.).

DOJ_NMG_0128900

As for the Bob Hope tournament, the Star reported that Burton may have paid at least part of his annual entry fee — this year's was $12,000 — to the charitable event out of his campaign account, which may not be acceptable given that Federal Election Commission rules allow Members to give campaign funds to charity only if they don't get anything in return.

And the donations Burton did make from his campaign account to Eisenhower Medical Center, the main charity involved with the Bob Hope event, apparently were part of Burton's pledge to give away contributions he had received from incarcerated lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Of course, Burton probably thinks all those rules are kind of overblown anyway. Back on Jan. 4, the House voted 430-1 to sharply restrict gifts and privately funded travel for Members; Burton, of course, was the lone "no" vote.

Maybe HOH is being too cynical about Burton. All this week, the AT&T Pebble Beach National Pro-Am is going on out in scenic Monterey, Calif., and yet the Indiana lawmaker has been right here on Capitol Hill, voting on the House floor. Maybe by skipping the event, Burton is showing that he's changed his ways.

Or maybe he just didn't get an invite.

The Truth About Cats and Dogs. Normally, HOH makes a point of noting when celebrities are coming to Capitol Hill. In the case of an event today, however, he'll just settle for telling you which celebrities are going to be taken to the woodshed.

At 10 a.m. in 1116 Longworth, Reps. Jim Moran (D-Va.) and Mike Ferguson (R-N.J.) will join Wayne Pacelle, president and CEO of the Humane Society, to reveal details of that group's investigation into the ongoing use of cat and dog fur in fur products sold in the United States.

Apparently the Humane Society's tests have shown that fur coats from some high-end designers have at least some dog and/or cat fur in them. Yuck.

What's the celebrity angle? One issue that is expected to come up at the event is the fact that, according to the Humane Society, two of the designers who may be mixing some Fido and Fluffy into their products are none other than Jay-Z, proprietor of Rocawear, and Sean "Diddy" Combs, designer of Sean John (though Diddy has reportedly pledged to pull the offending garments off the shelves).

Tempted as he's been, HOH remains pleased with his recent decision not to buy any of Jay-Z's fur coats.

Government Inside Out (NYT)

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

The United States is quickly becoming a government of the contractors, by the contractors and for the contractors. While the private security personnel in Iraq have attracted the most attention, many day-to-day operations are no longer in the hands of federal employees. Functions as disparate as clerical work and tax collection are handled by private companies, while oversight of this always for-profit work is being sorely neglected.

There are plenty of examples of good contracting. The Interstate highway system was built in large part by contractors. The problem is that the explosion of government outsourcing under the Bush administration has not been accompanied by a sufficient increase in civil service personnel to oversee it and ensure that the work is done properly and without squandering taxpayer dollars.

As Scott Shane and Ron Nixon reported recently in The Times, spending on outsourced contracts has nearly doubled under this administration, to roughly $400 billion last year from $207 billion in 2000, while oversight staff levels have remained flat. At the same time, fewer and fewer contracts are being put up for competitive bids. While 79 percent of contracts were competitive in 2001, the number dropped to 48 percent in 2005. The top contractors are spending millions on lobbying and campaign contributions to ensure that the work keeps coming.

The conventional wisdom — which owes as much to the Clinton administration's emphasis on "reinventing government" as the Bush administration's fealty to the superiority of the private sector — holds that outsourcing saves money because the private sector is supposedly more efficient.

But if there is to be any chance of cutting costs, that will have to come from competitive bidding. In one example from Mr. Shane and Mr. Nixon's story, a group of contract employees at the General Services Administration cost roughly double what the pay and benefits of comparable federal workers would have. What is most needed is a return to pragmatism, where each decision of whether to use government workers or outside companies is dictated by cost, rather than ideology or political favors.

DOJ_NMG_0128901

OTHER NEWS:

Fed Chief Warns Of Widening Inequality (WSJ)

By David Wessel

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke cautioned that widening economic inequality may make Americans "less willing to accept the dynamism ... so essential to economic progress." But he warned politicians to avoid responses that would make labor markets less flexible or create barriers to international trade and investment.

In an unusual speech for a central banker, Mr. Bernanke said a wiser approach to the problem would be to improve education and training and to cushion dislocations caused by technology and globalization. He cited such steps as making health and pension benefits more portable and offering retraining and job-search assistance to displaced workers.

Mr. Bernanke's comments at the Greater Omaha Chamber of Commerce add to a chorus of concern about widening economic inequality from top government officials, including President Bush, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and Mr. Bernanke's predecessor, Alan Greenspan, as well as prominent Democrats.

Wandering beyond the boundaries of monetary policy, his area of responsibility, Mr. Bernanke said: "Although average economic well-being has increased considerably over time, the degree of inequality in economic outcomes has increased as well ... for at least three decades." A text of his speech was released by the Fed in Washington.

In his 15-page lecture, complete with 48 academic references, Mr. Bernanke documented the inequality evident in data on wages, household incomes and even baseball players' contracts. He also examined economic forces behind the trend, from changes in technology that have increased employers' appetite for more-educated workers, to the decline of unions, to the surge in chief executives' salaries, to the impact of globalization. He said the effect of the latter has been "moderate and almost surely less important than the effects of ... technological change."

The Fed chairman noted that in professions ranging from entertainment to investment banking, the forces of globalization and technological innovation have increased the value of the most-talented individuals -- the "superstars" -- over the merely good. "Two decades ago, the highest-paid player for the Boston Red Sox (and in the American League), Jim Rice, earned (in inflation-adjusted terms) just over $3 million. In 2004, the highest-paid player on the Red Sox (and in all of major-league baseball) was Manny Ramirez, who received $22.5 million for the season."

"The number of fans who can fit into Fenway Park has not increased much ... presumably the Red Sox owners believed that Ramirez's highest salary was justified by the increases in broadcast and merchandising revenues he might generate as a result of the confluence of new distribution channels (such as Internet-based broadcasts of games) and a larger and wealthier potential global audience," he added.

Mr. Bernanke spoke explicitly about the degree and causes of inequality, and more carefully about the increasingly loud political debate over what, if anything, to do about it. "Firm conclusions about the extent to which policy should attempt to offset inequality ... are properly left to the political process," he said.

But he offered three principles that he said are "broadly accepted in our society" -- economic opportunity should be as widely distributed and equal as possible, economic outcomes need n't be equal but should be linked to a person's contributions, and people should get some insurance against very painful outcomes.

"We ... believe," he said, referring to Americans generally, "that no one should be allowed to slip too far down the economic ladder, especially for reasons beyond his or her control."

Mr. Bernanke, who served briefly as an economic adviser to Mr. Bush before becoming Fed chief a year ago, avoided any mention of tax policy, a favorite tool of Democrats interested in reducing the inequality produced by market forces. He noted that eliminating inequality altogether would be unwise.

DOJ_NMG_0128902

"Our market-based economy, which encourages productive activity primarily through the promise of financial reward, would function less effectively," he argued. The dynamism that has propelled the U.S. economy for decades brings with it "painful dislocations" for some workers, he added. But he said, "If we did not place some limits on the downside risks to individuals ... the public at large might become less willing to accept the dynamism that is so essential to economic progress."

When Mr. Greenspan was Fed chairman, he occasionally expressed concern about the widening gap between winners and losers in the American economy, though usually in response to questions from members of Congress, rather than in public speeches. At the Joint Economic Committee in June 2005, for instance, Mr. Greenspan observed, "As I've often said, this is not the type of thing which a democratic society -- a capitalist democratic society -- can really accept without addressing."

Mr. Greenspan generally attributed the disparities to the extra wages that employers pay more-educated workers. Mr. Bernanke acknowledged that is a major factor, but not the only one.

Bernanke Suggests Job Skills To Combat Inequality (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, February 7, 2007

The growing income gap is largely the result of disparities in skill and education between the rich and poor, though globalization, trade and the waning influence of labor unions have played a role, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke said yesterday.

To remedy inequality, Congress and the Bush administration should enact measures that ensure all Americans receive an equal opportunity to succeed by receiving good education and job skills, while resisting pressure to erect barriers to trade that will prevent Americans from enjoying the overwhelming benefits and higher living standards afforded by global markets, he said.

"Workers with more education are better positioned to adapt to changing demands in the workplace," and such flexibility has been a hallmark of America's economic success, he said. That has enabled overall living standards to grow steadily, even as the gap has widened between earners at the top and bottom of the income scale.

Congressional Democrats have floated a variety of measures to address the income gap, including raising the minimum wage, increasing taxes on the most highly paid executives, making it easier for unions to organize workers, and requiring negotiators to focus on the job and income impacts of international trade.

Mr. Bernanke acknowledged that growing income disparities are an important problem for Congress to address, and said many approaches can be considered to ensure everyone receives an equal opportunity to succeed and to provide social safety nets for those whose jobs and incomes are cut off by international competition.

"A bedrock American principle is the idea that all individuals should have the opportunity to succeed on the basis of their own effort, skill and ingenuity," he said. "We also believe that no one should be allowed to slip too far down the economic ladder, especially for reasons beyond his or her control."

But he cautioned against remedies that try to eliminate the disparity altogether.

"We do not guarantee equality of economic outcomes, nor should we," he said. "Without the possibility of unequal outcomes tied to differences in effort and skill, the economic incentive for productive behavior would be eliminated" and economic growth would be sacrificed.

People with the best educations and skills have been able to command higher and higher incomes because of the increasing complexity of technology-driven jobs and businesses, while people with minimal education have had to compete with billions of workers around the world who have similar job skills -- keeping their wages relatively flat, Mr. Bernanke said.

Evidence of the dramatic link between education and income is seen in the 75 percent gap between the average wages of college graduates and high school graduates and the 42 percent gap between those with high school degrees and those without them, he said.

Studies have documented that globalization -- including both trade and immigration -- puts pressure on the wages of low- and middle-income earners who compete with foreign workers even while trade and labor flows overall increase jobs and economic growth, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0128903

Lower rates of unionization also accounted for between 10 percent and 20 percent of the increase in wage disparity among middle-income men in the 1970s and 1980s, he said.

But by far the largest factor causing inequality has been the skills gap.

Between 1979 and 2006, because of a combination of forces, the earnings of the top 10 percent of workers soared by 34 percent, while the wages of middle-income workers grew by 11.5 percent and the wages of the bottom 10 percent increased only 4 percent, he said.

Even taking into account extensive tax and spending programs that transfer income from the top earners to the bottom half, the disparities have grown, he said. The share of after-tax income enjoyed by the top fifth of workers grew to 50 percent in 2004 from 42 percent in 1979, while the share of those in the bottom fifth shrank from 7 percent to 5 percent.

Bernanke: Fixing Income Gap Will Take Education (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON — Globalization isn't the main cause of rising U.S. income inequality, and attacking the problem by imposing barriers to trade and technology would "do far more harm than good," Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said Tuesday.

A better way to address the gap between lower- and higher-income Americans — and to ease the sometimes "painful dislocations" of free markets — would be to improve training and education or alter current policies to let workers keep health care and pension benefits when they change jobs, Bernanke told the Greater Omaha Chamber of Commerce.

Bernanke cautioned that without steps to smooth the effects of a changing economy, people could "become less willing to accept the dynamism that is so essential to economic progress." But the Fed chief, who sat at a table with billionaire investor Warren Buffett, stressed that determining the proper balance between free markets and social policy was a job for politicians, not the Fed.

"Although we Americans strive to provide equality of economic opportunity, we do not guarantee equality of economic outcomes, nor should we," Bernanke said. "That said, we also believe that no one should be allowed to slip too far down the economic ladder."

His remarks come as Democrats, who now control Congress, are building an agenda around inequality and middle-class economic concerns. Their initiatives include raising the minimum wage, limiting CEO pay, boosting college aid, making it easier to form unions and addressing labor and trade concerns.

"Despite the growing economy and skyrocketing corporate profits, the typical American family has actually seen its income decrease," says Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee.

President Bush acknowledged recently that income inequality is a problem, but Democrats differ with his economic remedies, which include a focus on tax cuts.

In his speech, Bernanke noted that even though average living standards have risen considerably in recent decades, wealth distribution has become more skewed. The wealthiest fifth of households received 42% of after-tax income in 1979, a figure that rose to 50% in 2004. The share of those in the bottom fifth dropped to 5% from 7%.

There are many reasons for the trend, Bernanke said, including the fact that wages for better-educated workers have risen faster than for their lesser-educated counterparts. Technology seems to have improved the efficiency of highly skilled workers more than of less-skilled workers. The decline of unions has altered pay patterns.

But he warned that erecting barriers to globalized trade would undermine key sources of economic growth and rising living standards. And in any case, Bernanke said, globalization, including trade and immigration, isn't the main culprit.

"Overall, I read the available evidence as favoring the view that the influence of globalization on inequality has been moderate and almost surely less important than the effects of skill-biased technological change," he said.

Markets Quiet While Awaiting Cisco News (USAT)

USA Today, February 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0128904

NEW YORK — Stocks slogged through a day of uneventful trading Tuesday after National Semiconductor issued a profit warning and investors awaited results from networker Cisco Systems.

The Dow Jones industrials rose 4.57 points to 12,666.31, the Standard & Poor's 500 index added 1.01 points to 1448.00, and the Nasdaq composite index climbed 0.89 points to 2471.49.

National Semi, which makes chips used in mobile telephones, dropped 64 cents to $22.68 after it warned late Monday that it expects sales to fall more than previously expected. That sparked a sell-off among chipmakers, including Texas Instruments, off 37 cents to $31.22, Advanced Micro Devices, down 28 cents to $15.32, and Maxim Integrated, off 72 cents to $31.70.

Investors also awaited results from Cisco, often considered a tech bellwether. The report marks one of the last closely watched companies to issue results as fourth-quarter earnings season winds down. After the close, Cisco said its earnings rose slightly more than expected. (Story, 2B.)

Investors have been reluctant to buy into the market without some kind of news that might indicate where the economy or corporate earnings are heading. The market gained some traction during the day Tuesday but drifted lower after a speech by Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke didn't address interest rates. (Story, 5B.)

"The market is not expensive, it's not dirt cheap, and the catalyst over the past few weeks has been earnings," says Matt Kelmon of Kelmoore Strategy Funds. "Everything is really on hold until the market finds something else to talk about, but there's still no huge sign of an imminent pullback."

Highlights:

Las Vegas Sands slid $3.41 to $100.68. The casino operator said fourth-quarter profit rose as it made more money off of losing gamblers. The company earned an extra $30 million in operating profit at table games for high rollers.

•Anadarko Petroleum lost 48 cents to $42.47. The oil refiner said fourth-quarter profit doubled because of a gain from the sale of a Canadian unit.

•IAC/InterActiveCorp lost 55 cents to $38.72. The website company that operates Ticketmaster and Ask.com reported fourth-quarter profit fell 85%.

•Myriad Genetics added 82 cents to $35.87. The biotech company reported its fiscal second-quarter loss widened, but it was able to beat projections.

DJIA Edges Up To 12666.31, 7.37 Points Shy Of Record (WSJ)

By PETER A. MCKAY

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

For a second straight day, the stock market inched upward but finished shy of a record, as investors continued to take a breather from last week's buying spree.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 4.57 points, just 0.04%, to 12666.31, up 1.6% on the year and 7.37 points shy of its record set last Thursday.

Even remarks by Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke couldn't cut through the market's torpor. In a speech to the Greater Omaha Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Bernanke warned that increased wage inequality could impede economic progress. He avoided any pronouncements on interest-rate policy, a more pressing short-term issue for investors.

Wall Street increasingly believes it has figured out the Fed's likely strategy, with many investing pros betting on a long period of unchanged interest-rate targets from the Fed, allowing solid-but-unspectacular growth in corporate profits.

The last holdouts to that guardedly sunny outlook seemed to buy into it last week, as the Dow industrials rallied 166.47 points. This week, it seems players are avoiding any new, big bets.

"The market is digesting the recent gains, waiting to see something bigger on the horizon," said analyst Richard Sparks of Schaeffer's Investment Research.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 1.01 points, or 0.1%, to 1448.00, up 2.1% on the year. The technology-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index was nearly unchanged, up just 0.89 point, at 2471.49, up 2.3% on the year.

DOJ_NMG_0128905

Keith Hembre, chief economist at mutual-fund firm First American Funds, said he expects that a rise in the unemployment rate will eventually prompt the Fed to cut its rate targets, perhaps in the second half of the year. Such a move would lower borrowing costs throughout the economy, prompting consumer spending and investment in stocks and other assets.

"In the meantime, the economic growth we're seeing is still enough to produce real earnings gains," which help the stock market, Mr. Hembre said.

The government released weekly data showing a rise in U.S. inventories of crude oil. Still, a continuing cold snap in the Northeast buoyed prices.

Crude contracts for March delivery inched up 14 cents, or 0.2%, to $58.88 a barrel, off 3.6% this year on the New York Mercantile Exchange but up 17% from its 52-week low less than three weeks ago.

Outside the U.S., stocks rose in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, rose 0.6%, or 1.51 points, to 248.62.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose, as did bond prices. The 10-year Treasury note jumped 11/32 point, or $3.44 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.765%.

The dollar weakened. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 120.12 yen, compared with 120.41 yen. The euro strengthened to $1.2981 from $1.2928.

GOP Views Clinton As Virtually Unbeatable (POL)

By Carrie Sheffield And Jim VandeHei

The Politico, February 7, 2007

What many conservatives regard as the nightmare scenario -- President Hillary Rodham Clinton -- is increasingly seen by veteran Republican politicians and strategists as virtual inevitability.

In GOP circles, the Democratic front-runner is seen as so strong, and the political climate for Republicans so hostile, that many influential voices -- including current and former lawmakers, and veterans of President Bush's campaigns -- have grown despairing. These partisans describe a political equivalent of the stages of grief, starting with denial, then resentment and ending with acceptance.

For now, these Republicans say the party needs good luck, including a change of fortune in Iraq, and a revival of organization and leadership in the conservative movement to avert another Clinton presidency.

"If the conservative movement and Republicans don't understand how massive the Clinton coalition is, she will be the next president," former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay said in an interview last week, after giving a private talk to GOP lawmakers. Clinton will win, he added, "if we don't use everything available to us and motivate our base, the people that believe in us."

In his closed-door comments to conservative House members, DeLay warned of the wealth and political potency of the Clinton fundraising network.

"We do have to get our act together, and I'd agree with Tom DeLay on that," said Rep. Steve King of Iowa. "At this point, short an inspirational Republican nominee, then I would agree that it's going to be very difficult to beat Hillary if she wins the nomination."

Those comments echoed those by former House Speaker Newt Gingrich last month on Fox News: "I think you have to start with the idea that, if we don't get Baghdad solved, and if we continue to drift, that it will be very hard for a Republican to win next year, no matter what our values and what our beliefs. And, second, you have to believe that, at the present moment, she is the odds-on favorite to be the Democratic nominee."

Even some well-connected outside advisers to Bush said in interviews they essentially accept this analysis. These strategists are advising Republicans that it will be next to impossible to win the White House if Bush's popularity remains so low, and public disgust with the war so high. Beyond the polls, some said there are gaps between the organizational prowess of the Clinton operation and any of the Republicans currently competing for the nomination.

DOJ_NMG_0128906

Jack Oliver, former deputy chairman of the Republican National Committee, said Clinton is a prodigious fundraiser who can be beaten only with a specific and optimistic vision. "The challenge for Republicans is to avoid the temptation of just being against her," Oliver said. "It's not enough to keep the White House."

The comments are striking at several levels. The flagging conservative morale about beating Clinton comes at the same time many Democrats regard the New York senator as newly vulnerable because of the competition she faces from Illinois Sen. Barack Obama and skepticism she faces from activists opposed to the Iraq war. On the Republican side, there is a disconnect between grass-roots, red-state Republicans and the mostly Washington-based operatives who surround Bush. While conservative publishers and organizers have made a fortune off the loathing for Clinton among workaday Republicans, people around the president have always expressed a grudging respect for her wiles and willpower and have long warned that she would be a formidable national candidate.

Several top Republicans said the fears that Clinton could be a prohibitive favorite have contributed to overall blahs that activists feel about the GOP field. One presidential adviser said that Clinton dread was actually helping Republican leaders stomach candidates who might otherwise be unacceptable. "People are willing to sacrifice some of their ideological principles to win," the adviser said.

The conservative movement, ascendant for much of the Bush presidency, is now divided and dispirited. GOP leaders report that it is harder than ever to organize Republicans around a common cause and that Democrats have made progress in recent years in rebuilding the infrastructure of their party. In this mood of malaise, the prospect of a Hillary Clinton presidency is one prod leaders use to shock conservative troops into action.

Some Republicans say a Clinton presidency might even be good for Republicans. "If Americans actually have to witness and live through a Hillary Clinton presidency, it will remind us why we are fundamentally traditional conservatives in America. We believe in hard work, strong families," said Rep. Tom Feeney, R-Fla.

Conservatives are slowly starting to organize against Clinton, but the effort lacks the vitality and vitriol of the attacks on former first lady in the 1990s. Dick Morris, the former top adviser to President Clinton, is raising money to help produce a documentary critical of Clinton. Morris has argued publicly that Clinton is poised to win in 2008.

The movie is being made with Citizens United, a conservative advocacy group run by longtime Clinton opponents David N. Bossie and Floyd G. Brown. "Hillary Movie Coming Soon!" says the group's Web site, which solicits credit-card donations to "help finance this movie." The site brags that the film "will expose the truth about her conflicts in the past and her liberal plot for the future."

Former House member John LeBoutillier of New York is heading up the Stop Hillary PAC, which has run an anti-Clinton ad in Iowa. The group has grabbed headlines but not a lot of money for its efforts.

Reflecting the views of many well-known Republicans, DeLay thinks a Clinton juggernaut may provide the flattening the party needs in order to be reborn in Reagan's mold. "Hillary Clinton as president may be the best thing that ever happened to the conservative movement and the Republican Party," says the man known as the Hammer. "I mean, Bill Clinton as president was the best thing that ever happened to the Republican Party. It was because he was president that we gained the majority in 1995." And he would know.

Read more about why circumstances favor the Democratic candidates in '08.

Join The Conversation

You need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

by OnlyChance on 02.06.2007 at 11:16 PM

The only reason Sen. Clinton is seen as unbeatable is because of the money she can raise for candidacy?

I thought there was campaign reform and level playing field on funding. Silly ME!!

Sen. Clinton is beatable when she will campaign for 45% top tier tax rate - which will be necessary to support her proposed health care reform. It will be interesting to see how Sen. Clinton votes on budget for the military that President Bush has submitted. If Sen. Clinton votes for cutting of funding she will appear weak on defense. IF she votes for the current budget, she will appear to be funding the war. Either way. Sen. Clinton will have to explain her position.

DOJ_NMG_0128907

A respectful Good Luck Sen Clinton - we will be listening.

Maybe.

by Lady Bird Johnson on 02.06.2007 at 11:15 PM

Reserve psychology in full effect. If Hillary Clinton gets the nomination it will be like 1980 when President Reagan smoked President Carter. They want to run against Hillary Clinton.

by GGPSmith on 02.06.2007 at 11:15 PM

Unfortunately, Senator Clinton suffers from the 21st Century version of that late 20th Century disorder known as "Ted Kennedy Syndrome" (TKS): No matter what she does (cure cancer, negotiate a Middle East peace, etc.), about 25% of the people in this country will still hate her. I think that any Republican currently seeking their party's nomination in 2008 would like nothing more than to run against Senator Clinton, especially Senator McCain.

However, if Senator Obama is her running mate, then I believe the GOP strategists' currently advertised analysis that Hillary will inevitably win is true. But talk about something to energize soon-to-be-former-president Bush's base! There's nothing quite like Hillary as the opposition's front-runner.

But Senator Obama, especially as Senator Clinton's running mate, will no doubt energize more than enough of the 75% absolutely disgruntled with the status quo to get out there and give America another President Clinton, no matter what the religious right or self-proclaimed "Billary" haters say or do.

by John Galt on 02.06.2007 at 10:45 PM

I think that any talk about someone being inevitable this early in the game is pure foolishness. C'mon were still a year out from anything meaningful happening. I've got to agree with others here. Talk of Hillary as president is more an attempt to revitalize the republican base than anything else. That being said, republicans need to realize a Hillary president is very possible. A fact some still don't want to admit.

by alex forshaw on 02.06.2007 at 09:40 PM

What is with the religion of inevitability? There are a lot of Republicans who fear Hillary, but they don't see her as more "virtually unbeatable" than Edwards or Obama. And they generally underestimate Obama because they still see him as the media's baby to be aborted whenever they feel like it. (They completely underestimate Obama's intelligence. That will change.)

I have also heard tons of life long Republicans say that they would vote for Obama.

I agree with sssidney that the Republicans would rather run against Hillary. She has a crushing amount of baggage.

I see it as the media trying to sucker Democrats into nominating Hillary. I have seen a really, really suspicious amount of "Hillary is THE INEVITABLE CANDIDATE," and whatever your feelings about the Democratic field, "inevitable" is not a word that comes to mind.

Obama is the one to dread. But Hillary has a lot of media friends who like her campaign's nice expense accounts.

by anoodle on 02.06.2007 at 09:25 PM

I think they really are afraid of her. The whole "throw us into the briarpatch" argument I think is nonsense. She has amassed an incredible machine, she will raise much more than anyone in the history of American politics, and the national climate will tremendously favor democrats. Why wouldn't they be afraid? Especially with no sitting VP or anointed nominee on the GOP side, they should be nervous.

by jimmyo on 02.06.2007 at 09:15 PM

Sounds like the inside the beltway "moderates" are using Hillary-fright in an attempt to sucker the base into accepting a "moderate" like Guiliano. Let's see how things develop. If --and it's a very big if -- if Bush can quickly salvage a respectable outcome in Iraq, then the possibility of brother Jeb as a candidate comes into play. If --again a big if -- Iraq gets resolved quickly and reasonably he would be the strongest Republican contender and would beat Hillary or any other of the Dem hopefuls. Otherwise the base needs to find the best true Republican and let the chips fall where they may.

by polarbear on 02.06.2007 at 09:02 PM

Regarding the authors' comments about the electorate being hostile to Republicans, I would add that the local folks to whom I have spoken are pretty hostile about Iraq, but I am hearing distinctions being made between different Republicans. Where there is a strong assocation between the Republican and Iraq, yes, I am hearing strong opposition. For others, especially local Republicans focused on local issues, with distance from the war, there is acceptance. Most folks do not articulate "neocon" in their views, but their vitriol is directed at Republicans who talk the neocon talk.

DOJ_NMG_0128908

In any case, I think it is pretty early in the race to be quite so sure of a Hillary Clinton nomination. Clearly the signs are in her favor, but a lot can happen between now and then.

by wwcat on 02.06.2007 at 08:40 PM

The gop dreams of Clinton getting the nomination because they know it will get all the voters of republicans out and keep half the democrats home. They know the loathing most left of total center despise this woman. I know of so many democrats who would stay home rather than vote for Hillary. And it is her machine that is trying to put out the word that she is inevitable and no one can defeat her. BS. She is peaking now due to name but, once the campaigns get going and voters are more familar with Edwards and Obama I see them both overtaking her. One thing most dems feel if not outright dislike is a cool nuetral to her. Hold your nose. They are excited about Obama and Edwards. So, while the pundit class buys into the Hillary machine spin of inevitability and the gop spin of fear in hopes that we would be dumb enough to vote for her, we, the real democrats will go about supporting our candidate of choice.

by Sidney on 02.06.2007 at 08:21 PM

I wouldn't pay too much attention to the GOP views. They would like her to be the nominee then they would tear in to her....

Anyhow, the race has just started and like most races, the front runners when the race is in the home stretch, it is then the winner shows itself. So I wouldn't place too much attention to the candidates right now.

We still have Gore to look at, should he decide to take another shot.

A dark horse and a long shot could be Sen Jim Webb. I nicknamed him "Boots". If he make that move he could win everything.

by sssidney on 02.06.2007 at 08:03 PM

I think the republicans are trying to sucker the dems. They want to run against Hillary.

Before you start composing please note that you will need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

Iraq War And History Favor The Democrats (POL)

By Roger Simon

The Politico, February 7, 2007

Can the Democrats lose in 2008?

Can they possibly lose the next presidential election considering all they have going for them?

Well, yes. Of course, they can. They're Democrats!

But, seriously, can the Democrats really blow this one?

"I don't care who the Democratic nominee is," Bill Daley told me recently. "He will become president in '08."

Daley, who is backing Barack Obama, is not given to mindless boosterism. He has run both a presidential campaign and a precinct, and he knows a great deal about practical politics.

But go ahead and dismiss his comment as wishful thinking. Then consider this from a Republican:

"I don't want to contribute to my own party's demoralization and it doesn't necessarily mean there will be a Democratic landslide, but I think there is a thumb on their side of the scale that's not going to come off until after the next election," said Vin Weber, a former Republican congressman, who is backing Mitt Romney.

But it is early, right? And anything can happen right?

So try this out:

"The 2008 election is a catastrophe waiting to happen," a senior Republican, who has served in a previous White House, told me. "When Ronald Reagan was leaving office after two terms, everyone said electing George H.W. Bush was Reagan's third term. But is anybody looking for the third term of George W. Bush?"

Now that is a question for you.

DOJ_NMG_0128909

Some think President Bush will work very hard for the Republican nominee for the same reason Ronald Reagan worked hard for Bush's father.

"Reagan felt all along that if a Democrat were elected to succeed him, it would be a repudiation of his eight years," said Ken Duberstein, who was Reagan's chief of staff. "For that reason, he went all-out for the election of George H.W. Bush. And I would anticipate George W. Bush will go all-out for whomever the Republicans nominate."

If the nominee wants him to, that is. If, in the fall of 2008, Bush's poll numbers are still hovering somewhere around freezing, the Republican nominee might want him to stay home and write letters to Eagle Scouts.

The Democrats do have history on their side. My crack research staff (i.e. Wikipedia) tells me that although George H.W. Bush succeeded Reagan after Reagan served two full terms, to find the next example of voters rewarding the same party that way, you have to go back to Rutherford B. Hayes succeeding Ulysses S. Grant in 1877.

Then there is the war. We cannot know what state the Iraq war will be in by Election Day 2008, but President Bush has assured us it will still be going on.

And, as of now, the war looks like a losing issue for Republicans. But Weber sees a small window of opportunity for his party: If the Democratic nominee gets pushed too far to the left during the Democratic primaries, he or she may look like a wimp when it comes to protecting the homeland.

"Obviously, Republicans are afraid of this war as a political issue," Weber said, "but Democratic fears about the war as an issue may grow. They might be dragged into a dangerous political position on the core issue of national security."

Weber is a realist, however.

"I would say that a sober historical analysis would probably lead you to conclude that the Democrat trend exhibited in 2006 is really a two-election trend," he said. "That's not written in the stars, but Republicans should go into 2008 facing that distinct possibility for both the presidency and Congress."

Poll Favors Giuliani In New Hampshire (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, February 7, 2007

New Hampshire residents likely to vote in the Republican presidential primary a year from now think more highly of former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani than any of his rivals, a poll released Tuesday shows.

Giuliani's net favorability rating — the proportion of people viewing him favorably minus the proportion viewing him unfavorably — was 56 percent, well ahead of Sen. John McCain, 32 percent, and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, 26 percent, in the University of New Hampshire poll for WMUR-TV in Manchester.

"He's the lesser-known candidate, but he has that rock star quality," poll director Andy Smith said of Giuliani. "He has a charisma that was built after 9-11."

This long before an election, political professionals pay more attention to favorability than voters' choices if they had to vote today. McCain and Giuliani were essentially tied at about 27 percent on that question among likely GOP primary voters, followed by Romney at 13 percent and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich at 9 percent.

The GOP portion of the telephone poll reached 311 likely voters from Thursday to Monday and had an error margin of plus or minus 5.6 percentage points.

Former Sen. John Edwards and Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama had net favorability ratings ranging from 61 percent to 55 percent, too close to be statistically significant.

When asked for whom they would vote, 35 percent of likely Democratic voters picked Clinton, 21 percent Obama and 15 percent Edwards. Eight percent chose former Vice President Al Gore, who is not running.

The Democratic portion of the phone poll reached 353 likely voters and had an error margin of plus or minus 5.2 percentage points.

Independents may vote in either primary, and 68 percent of them indicated they planned to vote in the Democratic primary compared to 32 percent leaning toward the GOP contest.

"This will hurt Republican candidates who try to appeal to more moderate, independent voters," Smith said.

DOJ_NMG_0128910

___

WASHINGTON (AP) — Democrat John Edwards has joined the growing list of presidential candidates who are skipping public financing of their campaigns.

Edwards' decision, first reported Tuesday in USA Today, applies to both the primary and, if he wins the nomination, the general election. It will allow him to raise and spend unlimited private money.

New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton also is forgoing the public funds, and several other candidates are expected to follow their lead.

Edwards spokesman Jonathan Prince said Edwards supports public financing for presidential campaigns and would require it if elected president. But he is skipping the current system to compete in what is expected to be the most expensive campaign in history.

Strategists from both parties had estimated last year that the 2008 race could cost each nominee $500 million — far more than the Presidential Election Campaign Fund could afford. It is financed through the $3 checkoff on federal income tax returns.

The fund, which is expected to have about $200 million by the end of 2007, still would help pay for party presidential nominating conventions and assist primary candidates who do not raise large amounts of money.

While both President Bush and Democratic challenger John Kerry rejected public funding for their primary campaigns in 2004, they did accept $74.5 million each for the general election campaign. The funding for the general election was expected to reach $85 million for the major party candidates in 2008.

___

CHARLESTON, S.C. (AP) — Republican presidential hopeful Rudy Giuliani will deliver the commencement address at The Citadel in the pivotal primary state of South Carolina, the military college announced Tuesday.

The former New York City mayor was asked to speak to graduates on May 5 "because of his leadership in the wake of the terrorist attacks on New York in September 2001," the school said in a news release.

Giuliani visited South Carolina last weekend, which will hold the first Republican primary in the South.

On Monday, he filed a "statement of candidacy" with the Federal Election Commission, which moved him closer to a full-fledged campaign.

Unlike chief GOP rivals Sen. John McCain of Arizona and Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, Giuliani had thus far been ambiguous about whether he would pursue the Republican nomination, even though he had taken the initial steps.

The event is not open to the public. Tickets are distributed to cadets in April, the school said.

___

LAS VEGAS (AP) — Sen. Hillary Clinton has agreed to attend a Nevada forum for Democratic presidential candidates later this month, state party officials said Tuesday.

Clinton joins five other presidential hopefuls already confirmed for the Feb. 21 event in Carson City: Sens. Joe Biden of Delaware and Chris Dodd of Connecticut, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson and former Alaska Sen. Mike Gravel.

Billed by as a kickoff to Nevada's new early 2008 caucus, the forum faced some resistance from top-tier candidates.

Representatives for Clinton, Sen. Barack Obama and 2004 vice presidential nominee John Edwards complained last week to national party officials about the number and early timing of forums and debates scheduled in Nevada and other key states.

Nevada's caucus was moved to Jan. 19, between Iowa's first-in-the-nation caucus and the New Hampshire primary, as a way for minority and union voters in the West to get a say in picking the Democratic nominee. However, the state has not yet been showered with attention from the candidates.

Nevada Democratic Party spokeswoman Kirsten Searer said some candidates also had expressed concerns about the format of the forum, and the party agreed to accommodate them. Candidates will appear on stage individually, give a statement and answer a series of questions posed by a moderator, Searer said.

Clinton Lifts Fund-Raising Stakes (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON -- In a show of financial muscle, Sen. Hillary Clinton today kicks off a fund-raising effort of volunteers working to direct donations from $25,000 to $1 million to her presidential campaign.

The million-dollar target for some fund-raisers demonstrates the overheated pace of the 2008 money race and raises the stakes for Sen. Clinton's competitors. Her allies will be able to generate that level of giving by soliciting checks of as much as $4,600 -- the maximum allowed for the primary and general election -- from friends and family, and recruiting others to become money raisers for their account.

"We'll do what we can to be competitive," said Blake Zeff, a campaign spokesman.

Though party caucuses and primaries are still a year off, the money race begins in earnest this month, as candidates try to generate big numbers for the first quarterly financial disclosure report due on March 31. Advisers to Mrs. Clinton and Republicans Mitt Romney and Rudy Giuliani have said their campaigns are shooting for about $30 million in that first report.

This strategy -- designed to minimize the number of challengers and to solidify front-runner status -- worked for the Bush campaign in 2000 when it was entering a crowded, wide-open primary field. One notable difference this year may be Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, whose appeal to voters may help him keep pace with Mrs. Clinton even if he isn't first in the March tallies.

On July 1, 1999, Mr. Bush reported raising a record $36 million in six months. Within days, two Republican hopefuls, former Ohio Rep. John Kasich and New Hampshire Sen. Bob Smith, dropped out of the race. By the end of the year, former Vice President Dan Quayle and Elizabeth Dole also quit after lagging in the money race.

"Early fund raising shows an ability to organize and capture the energy and excitement behind a candidate and their vision," said Jack Oliver, a senior Bush finance official in 2000 and 2004.

Still, the Clinton camp's million-dollar target dwarfs those used by President Bush in 2000 when he rewrote the campaign financing book by recruiting fund-raising "bundlers," volunteers who raised up to $100,000 by collecting checks of up to $1,000 -- then the legal maximum -- from friends and family. In 2004, Mr. Bush created a new layer of top fund-raisers who each generated $200,000 in campaign donations.

Dozens of people are expected to attend the Clinton fund-raising session on Capitol Hill. In addition to recruiting volunteers, the campaign plans to open fund-raising offices in major cities and name regional directors.

Jonathan Mantz, the campaign's finance director, recently declined to specify his fund-raising target: "It's a huge number. I've seen a lot of different figures, whether it's $80 or $100 [million], it's a huge number."

Mrs. Clinton's steps are increasing pressure on her leading rivals for the Democratic nomination, Mr. Obama and former vice presidential candidate John Edwards.

Mr. Obama is scheduled to attend a Los Angeles fund-raiser hosted by movie magnates David Geffen, Steven Spielberg and Jeffrey Katzenberg later this month. He also is benefiting from a wave of new donors among African-American executives. The Obama camp has attracted some Democratic rainmakers, including Boston Provident Partners LP general partner Orin Kramer, former DNC finance chairman Bob Farmer, and Florida attorney Kirk Wagar.

Despite those gains, Mr. Obama's operation is behind Mrs. Clinton's in terms of organization. Campaign advisers are playing down expectations for Mr. Obama's March report, emphasizing instead the senator's long-term fund-raising potential. But he may have handicapped his campaign by opting not to accept donations from political action committees and banning federal lobbyists from bundling checks for the campaign.

The Edwards campaign probably won't match money for the entire campaign raised by Mrs. Clinton or Mr. Obama, said a campaign insider. Still, the former North Carolina senator is expected to raise enough to compete in next year's primaries. He attended a New York City event hosted by Robert Katz, a senior director at Goldman Sachs Group Inc., and maintains ties to the deep-pocketed trial lawyer bar. But most of the Edwards money-raising events are scattered across the country, generally attracting smaller crowds.

On the Republican side, Mr. Romney and Arizona Sen. John McCain have waged a fierce campaign to recruit Mr. Bush's former fund-raisers as volunteers.

DOJ_NMG_0128912

Next month, Mr. McCain will attend a New York fund-raiser sponsored by NYSE Group Inc. Chief Executive Officer John Thain, J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. Vice Chairman James B. Lee Jr., and New Jersey attorney Larry Bathgate, one of Mr. Bush's most successful fund-raisers. In all, the McCain campaign has recruited more than 40 of the president's former top fund-raisers.

In addition to building a traditional finance operation, the McCain campaign is ramping up its Internet presence, hoping to recapture the grass-roots energy that temporarily sustained the candidate in 2000 after his upset victory over Mr. Bush in the New Hampshire primary.

Mr. Romney has also incorporated Web techniques, including a system that allows his fund-raisers to easily monitor and track the donations they solicit. He opened his exploratory campaign with a fund-raising event that netted $6.5 million in pledges.

The former Massachusetts governor will follow his formal campaign launch Feb. 13 with a Boston fund-raiser two days later.

Former New York City Major Rudy Giuliani's relatively late entry into the race this week puts him somewhat behind. The finance team he announced this week includes veterans of the Bush campaigns, but Mr. Giuliani lacks the lengthy roster of star fund-raisers that Mr. McCain and Mr. Romney have captured.

Still, Mr. Giuliani's deep roots in New York are expected to keep him competitive and his campaign's fund-raising goals include raising more than $100 million by the end of the year.

Clinton Fundraising Goes Full Force (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum And Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton is playing hostess to billionaire Hollywood moguls, millionaire lawyers and venture capitalists here this week as she pushes to raise a record sum for her presidential campaign.

Last night, the New York Democrat invited about 70 top fundraisers from around the country to a reception at her Washington home. The guest list included such major Democratic donors as Haim Saban, a Hollywood studio investor, Alan J. Patricof, a New York financier, and Kevin O'Keefe, a Chicago lawyer.

The high-dollar rainmakers committed to collect at least $250,000 each during the presidential campaign for Clinton, and many have pledged $1 million, participants said. In addition, each agreed to raise $50,000 by the end of this month to bolster the campaign's first-quarter report due at the end of March.

Today, the Clinton campaign plans to host a couple of hundred people at briefings by the senator and her staff at the District's Hyatt Regency hotel. The attendees -- called Hillraisers -- are expected to collect at least $25,000 each for the Clinton drive this year.

This year's money race, which is often referred to as the first presidential primary, has started earlier and with greater intensity than ever. Clinton insiders said the senator hopes to demonstrate her preeminence in the growing field of Democratic contenders by raising $10 million or more in the first quarter and at least $60 million this year.

Both of those numbers, if attained, would represent a record-breaking take for a presidential contest. The gathering last night was the first major step in collecting those totals.

Others competing for the Democratic nomination, including Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.) and former senator John Edwards (N.C.), are also hoping to raise several million dollars in time for their first-quarter reports. They expect the money to help them demonstrate strong candidacies.

Fancy cars lined up last night in front of Clinton's Embassy Row house, and guests were greeted at the door by a man wearing a tuxedo.

The senator's aides began executing a plan to enlist the nation's most effective fundraisers within 24 hours of the announcement of Clinton's presidential bid last month. Her chief recruiters included Patricof, former Democratic Party finance chair Maureen White and literary agent Francis Greenberger.

Clinton adviser Terry McAuliffe was in Los Angeles in late January wooing donors at a dinner at Saban's Beverly Hills estate. His salesmanship appears to have worked: Several of those who attended the Beverly Hills dinner made the trip to Washington yesterday, including Clarence Avant, a former Motown Records executive who heads a music publishing company.

DOJ_NMG_0128913

At the same time, many of the biggest Hollywood donors have so far hedged their bets. For instance, film director Steven Spielberg plans to help Clinton but is also preparing to host an event for Obama next week and was not in Washington last night. Barbra Streisand said in a statement yesterday that she would be sending the maximum allowable to Clinton, Obama and Edwards.

Among those invited to the event last night at Clinton's home were Chris Korge, a Miami lawyer who has been building a Florida network of donors for her, New York investment banker Steven Rattner, Stanley Chesley, a Cincinnati lawyer and major Democratic Party donor, Susie Tompkins Buell, co-founder of Esprit clothing company, and O'Keefe, who befriended the Clintons in college and later worked in the Clinton administration.

Among more than a dozen Washingtonians were Democratic activists Smith and Elizabeth Bagley, former Maryland congressman Tom McMillan, former Federal Communications Commissioner Susan Ness, and DLA Piper partners John Merrigan and Mac Bernstein.

Clinton Helped With $15M (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, February 7, 2007

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) collected at least $15 million for Democratic candidates by participating in more than 100 fundraising events during the 2006 election cycle, thereby cementing relationships with party leaders and colleagues in advance of her presidential campaign.

A rough tally of her campaign's fundraising records show that while her rival for the nomination, Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) gave more money to candidates through his leadership PAC, Clinton appears to have surpassed his total by donating millions from her personal reelection account and attending scores of fundraisers.

Clinton raised the most at a single event for Sens. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.) and Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.), who faced difficult reelections. A Clinton adviser said the event for her fellow Senate women raised "several hundred thousand dollars."

Clinton raised money for the Democratic National Committee, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC). She also raised money for 20 candidates in the Senate and 30 in the House, according to a Clinton campaign spokesman.

The presidential candidate raised all this money for colleagues on top of the $51.3 million that she raised for her own reelection campaign in New York, more than any other federal candidate in 2006. Clinton's fundraising prowess is expected to prove crucial in the 2008 White House campaign, for which experts predict she could raise some $500 million.

Public records also show that she transferred $2.1 million from her Senate campaign to the DSCC and $250,000 to the DCCC. Clinton also transferred $350,000 to state and local candidates.

Candidates who benefited from Clinton attending fundraisers include newly elected Sens. Jim Webb (D-Va.), Jon Tester (D-Mont.), and Sheldon Whitehouse (D-R.I.). Losing House candidates who fattened their coffers because of Clinton include Tammy Duckworth, of Illinois, and Christine Jennings, of Florida.

Obama gave $770,000 from his leadership PAC, Hopefund, to Democratic candidates during the 2006 cycle, more than any Democratic presidential candidate and more than any Democrat in the Senate, according to reports filed with the Federal Election Commission.

He targeted contributions at states scheduled to hold elections early in the presidential primary: Iowa, Nevada, and New Hampshire.

Obama gave $2,500 to Rep. Carol Shea-Porter (D-N.H.) and $5,000 to Paul Hodes (D-N.H.) shortly before the election. He gave two $5,000 contributions to Rep. Leonard Boswell and $5,000 to freshman Rep. Bruce Braley, both Iowa Democrats. Tessa Hafen and Jill Derby, who lost House races in Nevada, also each received $5,000 from Hopefund.

Days before the election, Obama also cut $5,000 checks to the New Hampshire and Nevada state Democratic parties.

Clinton gave more than $200,000 less than Obama to Democratic candidates from her PAC, Hill PAC, which in the past has been the most generous Senate Democratic leadership committee. She stepped up her giving pace in March after contributing relatively little in 2005.

Clinton gave $10,000 to the Iowa Democratic Party, $10,000 to the Nevada Democratic Party and $10,000 to the New Hampshire state party. She gave two $2,500 checks to New Hampshire's Hodes and $2,500 to Shea-Porter, Iowa's Boswell, and Nevada's Hafen.

After Nov. 7, Obama continued to use his leadership PAC aggressively, spreading $5,000 contributions to 10 Senate colleagues up for reelection. Clinton, who has had four more years in the Senate than Obama to build relationships, had not given anything in the month after the election, according to her PAC's latest fundraising report.

But how much influence the largess will have in primary battlegrounds is an open question.

Shea-Porter vowed to stay neutral and to spend time with any visiting White House hopeful who requested it.

"I had support from a good number of presidential candidates," she said. "My role is officially neutral. I'm going to play the part of a good host."

Both Obama and Clinton overlooked newly elected Rep. David Loebsack (D-Iowa), whom few political handicappers expected to beat former Rep. Jim Leach (R), and did not receive any money from either lawmaker's PAC.

Loebsack laughed at the suggestion that he went without contributions because of his long-shot chances of winning and said that he has since gotten Clinton's and Obama's attention.

"I've talked to them about it, don't you worry," he said, declining to offer further comment on pre-primary maneuverings.

Obama's PAC giving ranks well ahead of every Senate Democrat and Democratic presidential contender with registered leadership committees.

Former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.), who ranks with Obama and Clinton as a presidential frontrunner, gave no money to federal candidates from his One America PAC last year despite raising $2.8 million in 2005 and 2006.

Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph Biden (D-Del.), who hurt his White House prospects last week with controversial comments about Obama, gave $215,000 from his leadership PAC to candidates and political committees in the last election cycle.

Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.), an underdog in the race, gave $373,000 to other candidates and political committees through his committee, CHRIS PAC.

Other 2008 hopefuls such as Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio), New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, and Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack do not have federal leadership PACs, according to the Center for Responsive Politics and PoliticalMoneyLine, two organizations that track fundraising.

White House Bid? Giuliani Is Still Undeclared (NYT)

By Sewell Chan

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

Former Senator John Edwards stood in the Ninth Ward of New Orleans and declared, "I'm a candidate for the presidency of the United States." Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton proclaimed on her campaign Web site: "I'm in. And I'm in to win." Former Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts plans to formally announce his White House run in Michigan on Feb. 13.

Rudolph W. Giuliani, the former mayor of New York, took two steps closer to a presidential run on Monday, and yet stopped short, once again, of unequivocally throwing himself in the ring.

After filing a candidate statement with the Federal Election Commission, he appeared on Fox News Channel's "Hannity & Colmes" for an interview, and Sean Hannity asked, "You are then officially running to be the next president of the United States?" Mr. Giuliani's response was cautious: "We still have to formally announce it and do a few more things. But this is about as close as you're going to get."

When asked if he believed he could defeat Mrs. Clinton — if they received their respective parties' nominations — Mr. Giuliani said, "Well, I'm in this to win," but he added, "I have no idea who is going to get the nomination."

A few skeptics have wondered whether Mr. Giuliani, who has been crisscrossing the country over the last few months and signaled his interest in the presidency again and again, may ultimately back out — as he did in 2000, when he contemplated a race for the Senate but withdrew.

DOJ_NMG_0128915

Aides to Mr. Giuliani yesterday dismissed the notion that he was equivocating. "The response across the country has been extremely encouraging, and Rudy has made clear he is moving toward making an official announcement," said Katie Levinson, a spokeswoman for Mr. Giuliani's not-yet-official campaign.

Mr. Giuliani established a federal presidential exploratory committee on Nov. 20 to "test the waters," meaning that he could raise and spend money on polls, focus groups and travel but not declare a candidacy or build a substantial war chest.

On Monday, Mr. Giuliani stopped testing the waters when he filed the statement of candidacy.

"From the F.E.C.'s perspective, he's running for president of the United States," said Karl J. Sandstrom, an election lawyer and a former Democratic member of the Federal Election Commission. Typically, he said, a statement of candidacy and a formal announcement of a run occur around the same time.

Bradley A. Smith, an election lawyer and a former Republican member of the commission, said that filing a candidate statement was not a definitive step. "People in the past have filed that form and then decided not to run," he said. "Filing the form may just mean that he's planning to raise some serious money that would put him outside of what the F.E.C. considers testing the waters."

Mr. Giuliani has recently moved to sell Giuliani Capital Advisors, an investment bank that is part of his consulting business, Giuliani Partners. But a candidacy would not necessarily complicate any sale of his assets.

Candidates for president are required to file personal financial disclosure statements with the federal Office of Government Ethics. Those who declare between Jan. 1 and May 15 must file by May 15. Those who declare their candidacies between May 15 and Dec. 31 must file the statement within 30 days of the declaration, according to Vincent J. Salamone, associate general counsel for the ethics office.

The statements require candidates to disclose financial interests, including sources of income, investment holdings and outstanding loans, going back a year from the filing date. Corporate directorships, partnerships and consulting contracts must be disclosed for the previous two years.

Fred Siegel, a historian at Cooper Union who has written admiringly about Mr. Giuliani, said he thought the former mayor was simply being deliberate. "He moves at his own pace," Mr. Siegel said. "He thinks these things through very carefully, and I think he's playing this out for tactical advantage."

Katon Dawson, chairman of the South Carolina Republican Party, said it was "a lot easier to get in the race than to get out of the race," and called Mr. Giuliani's actions so far "a natural progression of how you would enter a race for president."

Mr. Dawson, who spoke warmly of Mr. Giuliani but has not endorsed any candidate, speculated that the former mayor might simply be choosing the right time and place to make an announcement. "This is not unusual," he said. "Whether it will be at ground zero, or in California or New Hampshire or Iowa or South Carolina, he will announce on his own terms, and pick his own turf."

In his Fox interview, Mr. Giuliani affirmed his support for abortion rights but said he would "appoint judges that interpreted the Constitution rather than invented it." He said he approved of domestic partnership laws, but not same-sex marriage.

He said repeatedly, "We've got to get beyond Iraq," and called for more attention to Iran, Syria, Pakistan and Afghanistan. He called for tightening the country's borders and requiring prospective citizens to learn English, but also said that deporting illegal immigrants in large numbers was impractical.

Hillary And Rudy Could Wrap It Up This Year (HILL)

By Dick Morris

The Hill, February 7, 2007

The nominees for the 2008 presidential race will be selected in 2007. The tempo of the new political process, driven by 24-hour cable news, Internet bloggers, conservative talk radio, and liberal NPR is so rapid that the nomination race cannot exist in stasis waiting for Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire and South Carolina to get around to holding their votes in early 2008. Well before they open their caucuses or polling places, this nomination, in each party, will have been decided by the national media coverage during 2007.

DOJ_NMG_0128916

In 2004, we saw the precursor of this expedited process when Howard Dean upset Kerry's early lead in the fall of 2003, propelled ahead by his Internet fundraising and antiwar positioning. Then, in December 2003, the establishment media unloaded on the former Vermont governor — likely driven by disinformation passed around by other Democratic candidates — and he was gone by Christmas. Kerry's victory in Iowa a few weeks later was no more than a projection on the Iowa screen of the results settled at the national level the previous month.

A recent Gallup poll found that 35 percent of Americans — probably everyone who votes in a caucus or primary — watch cable news stations frequently. The intensity of viewer and voter interest and the ubiquity of the political coverage on these stations force the process to accelerate and to come to an early conclusion.

The role of Iowa, New Hampshire, etc.

What is the role for the early, small caucus/primary states in 2007? They will not have held their primaries or caucuses yet, but the state-by-state polls published regularly in 2007 become the equivalent of virtual primaries in each of these states. But to win these polls, it doesn't matter so much what happens within each small state but what is going on nationally. Hillary, for example, has moved from down in the pack to a lead in New Hampshire, and perhaps in Iowa, by announcing her candidacy nationally. Her perfunctory visits to each state likely had little to do with her surge compared to her national media efforts.

The old model — a Jimmy Carter labors in obscurity in the Iowa vineyards and then is discovered nationally after he wins there and sweeps all remaining primaries — is quaint but obsolete. Now you have to win the American Media Primary of 2007 and then your victory is ratified in the primaries and caucuses of 2008.

The importance of the front-runner

The key for the candidates is to become the early front-runner and hold the position for the first three quarters of 2007. Once that is accomplished, the nomination is probably in the bag. No clear front-runner, except for Rockefeller in 1964, has ever failed to win the nomination since the primary process became pivotal in party nominations in 1960.

Among Democrats, Kennedy in '60, Humphrey, once he entered the race, in '68, McGovern in '72, Carter in '76 and '80, Mondale in '84, Dukakis in '88, Clinton in '92, Gore in '00 and Kerry in '04 were front-runners who held their leads. Mondale, Clinton, Gore, and Kerry were front-runners who were briefly shaken by challengers (Hart, Tsongas, Bradley and Dean) but held on to win their nominations

Among Republicans, Nixon in '60 and '68, Ford in '76, Reagan in '80, Bush in '88, Dole in '96, and Bush in '00 were all front-runners going in and the nominee coming out. Only Goldwater can be said to have pulled off an upset in 1964 by toppling Rockefeller.

So once there is a clear front-runner, he or she is likely to go all the way. This is especially true since he or she will have won front-runner status by intensive national media exposure rather than just insider chatter. With the process giving him or her so much face-time so early, the front-runner is unlikely to fade once the real primaries start.

Rudy and Hillary: tentative leaders

Already the process seems to be congealing around Hillary and Rudy as tentative front-runners.

Hillary re-established the dominance she had back in the spring of 2006 by moving out to a 43 percent vote share among Democrats in the presidential primaries in the Fox News poll of January 30-31. Obama is second at 15 percent, Edwards at 12 percent and Gore at 11 percent. Hillary had been at 43 percent in a previous Fox News poll in March 2006, but slipped to 32 percent in August with most of her previous support going to either Gore or undecided. By December 5-6 of last year, she stayed at 32 percent with Obama at 12 percent, Gore at 11 percent and Edwards at 8 percent. But now, even with Obama and Gore in the trial heat, she has regained her robust 43 percent vote share again. Even though media coverage of her announcement and Iowa tour was mixed, the electorate is obviously thrilled at the prospect of a woman candidate and rallied to her banner last month.

There is still time for Obama to recapture the charisma he seemed to have going for him over Christmas through his book, his articulateness, his moderation and his novelty; or for Edwards's tough antiwar and healthcare positions to eat away at Hillary's base. But they had better get it untracked pretty soon.

Among Republicans, Rudy Giuliani is eclipsing John McCain for front-runner status. In the most recent Fox News poll among GOP voters, Rudy had a convincing 34-22 lead over McCain, with Gingrich in third place at 15 percent. McCain has been hovering in the low 20s all along. In March '06, he was at 22 percent, in August at 25 percent and in December at 23 percent. But Giuliani has shown steady progress from 27 percent of the vote in August to 30 percent in December to 34 percent at the end of January.

DOJ_NMG_0128917

This poll finding — combined with McCain's dismal financial report for the fourth quarter of 2006 ($1.7 million raised and less than $500,000 on hand) — put him in a convincing second place after a year of sharing front-runner status with Giuliani. Do McCain's fundraisers think he is running for Congress or president?

In the battle among second-tier GOP candidates, Gingrich is moving up and Romney is fading badly. The Fox News poll has Newt moving up from 9 percent in December to 15 percent at the end of January while Romney has dropped from 8 percent in December to only 3 percent on Jan. 30-31. In the wake of George Allen's and Bill Frist's withdrawals, conservatives seem to be moving away from the former Massachusetts governor and toward the former Speaker.

Should the right seek a real alternative to Giuliani, Romney's flip-flops will likely disqualify him. Gingrich could develop momentum with his strength and intellect, but he will only become a factor if he declares and runs. If he waits on the sidelines, events will eclipse him.

Beyond Newt and Romney, GOP wannabes like Huckabee, Brownback, Hunter, Tancredo, Gilmore and Thompson deserve some attention. Huckabee, a former client, may be the most interesting of the bunch.

Right now, neither Rudy nor Hillary has a front-runner's lock, but they are clearly the man and woman to beat in their respective parties.

If they hold their leads through Labor Day, my bet is that it will be all over.

Catholics Slam Bloggers Hired By Edwards (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, February 7, 2007

Two bloggers hired recently by Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards were criticized Tuesday by a Catholic group for posts they had written elsewhere on the Internet.

Bill Donohue, president of the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights, demanded that Edwards fire Amanda Marcotte and Melissa McEwan.

"John Edwards is a decent man who has had his campaign tarnished by two anti-Catholic, vulgar, trash-talking bigots," Donohue wrote in a statement. "He has no choice but to fire them immediately."

The Edwards campaign declined to comment. McEwan and Marcotte did not respond to e-mails requesting a response.

Donohue cited posts that the women made on blogs in the past several months in which they criticized the pope and the church for its opposition to homosexuality, abortion and contraception, sometimes using profanity.

"The Catholic church is not about to let something like compassion for girls get in the way of using the state as an instrument to force women to bear more tithing Catholics," Marcotte wrote on the blog Pandagon on Dec. 26, in an excerpt cited by Donohue.

Among the McEwan posts that Donohue listed was one she posted on Feb. 21, 2006, on her site, Shakespeare's Sister. She questioned what religious conservatives don't understand about "keeping your noses out of our britches, our beds and our families?"

Edwards put both bloggers on his payroll last week as part of his outreach to liberal voters and activists on the Internet. Their decision to work for Edwards is part of a broader move among prominent bloggers to jobs with political campaigns and progressive organizations.

The Catholic League counts its membership at nearly 350,000.

Edwards's Bloggers Cross The Line, Critic Says (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0128918

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6 — Two bloggers hired by John Edwards to reach out to liberals in the online world have landed his presidential campaign in hot water for doing what bloggers do — expressing their opinions in provocative and often crude language.

The Catholic League, a conservative religious group, is demanding that Mr. Edwards dismiss the two, Amanda Marcotte of the Pandagon blog site and Melissa McEwan, who writes on her blog, Shakespeare's Sister, for expressing anti-Catholic opinions.

Mr. Edwards, a former North Carolina senator, is among the leading Democratic presidential candidates.

Bill Donohue, president of the Catholic League, said in a statement on Tuesday, "John Edwards is a decent man who has had his campaign tarnished by two anti-Catholic vulgar trash-talking bigots."

Mr. Edwards's spokeswoman, Jennifer Palmieri, said Tuesday night that the campaign was weighing the fate of the two bloggers.

The two women brought to the Edwards campaign long cyber trails in the incendiary language of the blogosphere. Other campaigns are likely to face similar controversies as they try to court voters using the latest techniques of online communication.

Ms. Marcotte wrote in December that the Roman Catholic Church's opposition to the use of contraception forced women "to bear more tithing Catholics." In another posting last year, she used vulgar language to describe the church doctrine of the Immaculate Conception.

She has also written sarcastically about the news media coverage of the three Duke lacrosse players accused of sexual assault, saying: "Can't a few white boys sexually assault a black woman anymore without people getting all wound up about it? So unfair."

Ms. Marcotte joined the Edwards campaign at the end of January in the new post of blogmaster. She has lived in Austin, Tex., for the past 11 years and wrote on her blog that she was planning to move to Chapel Hill, N.C., in February to work full-time on the campaign.

Ms. McEwan referred in her blog to President Bush's "wingnut Christofascist base" and repeatedly used profanity in demanding that religious conservatives stop meddling with women's reproductive and sexual rights. Multiple postings use explicit and inflammatory language on a variety of issues.

Ms. McEwan signed on with Mr. Edwards at the end of January with the title of Netroots coordinator, for campaign activities on the Web.

Romney To Announce Presidential Bid (AP)

By Liz Sidoti, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 7, 2007

Republican Mitt Romney will formally announce his candidacy for president next week in Michigan, his native state and an important early test for the GOP nomination, campaign aides said Tuesday.

The former one-term Massachusetts governor will make his announcement Feb. 13, and then will visit Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina — the first states to hold 2008 contests.

He will return to Boston two days later, where he will hold what his campaign is calling "a unity event" with supporters, aides said. They spoke on the condition of anonymity because the plans were not public.

The announcement had been expected.

Romney, 59, created an exploratory committee in January and then held a major fundraiser that netted $6.5 million in contributions and pledges to show he was a serious contender able to challenge Sen. John McCain and Rudy Giuliani, the other top-tier Republican candidates. Both have created exploratory committees but neither has formally announced a candidacy even though it's all but certain both will run.

For Romney, the initial steps were a formality. It has long been known that he aspired to the presidency. He has spent months building a national campaign organization, hiring top political talent, courting fundraisers and putting support networks in place in key states. His campaign recently opened its headquarters along Boston's waterfront.

DOJ_NMG_0128919

In Dearborn, Mich., Romney will hold what amounts to a made-for-TV coming out event at the Henry Ford Museum in the state where he was born. He has a base of support in the battleground state and deep roots. His father, George Romney, was governor in the 1960s, and served as chief executive of the American Motors Corp. The elder Romney made an unsuccessful bid for the 1968 Republican presidential nomination.

The announcement comes midway through the first fundraising quarter of 2007. The timing could create a burst of momentum to increase donations as Romney seeks to ensure he posts big fundraising numbers on March 31, the end of the first financial reporting period.

Romney is seeking to convince the GOP's conservative flank, whose support is pivotal in GOP presidential nomination contests, that he shares their values and stands with them on social issues, including abortion and gay marriage.

But he's been forced to explain inconsistencies in his record from when he ran as a moderate in his two previous campaigns — a successful bid for Massachusetts governor in 2002 and an unsuccessful challenge to U.S. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, a liberal icon, in 1994.

Romney supported abortion rights until two years ago, when he says he had a change of heart during a legislative debate on stem cell research. He has also taken positions sympathetic to gay rights in the past, although he opposes gay marriage.

A Mormon, Romney's faith also could pose another challenge. No one from his religion has been elected president.

His campaign hopes that his record of accomplishment in both the private and public sectors overrides primary voters' concerns.

Romney made his reputation in the Boston business community, where he helped found a multibillion-dollar venture capital firm after earning degrees from Harvard Business and Law schools. He rose to national prominence when he successfully resurrected the 2002 Olympic Winter Games, which were mired in a bribery scandal.

Mike Huckabee: Can He Fell The Big Guys In '08? (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON

Mike Huckabee, until recently the governor of Arkansas, may be most famous for losing 100 pounds and crusading against obesity in America.

Now he's going after the big guys in a different way. He wants to take out John McCain, Rudolph Giuliani, and Mitt Romney – the top three Republican challengers for their party's presidential nomination in 2008, polls show. He knows it's a long shot, especially when money and celebrity are the early drivers in the campaign. But in a race that Mr. Huckabee likens to a marathon, he sees kitchen-table issues – at the heart of any governor's tenure – growing in importance.

"If it's going to be only about money raised, then I suggest that we just put the whole thing on eBay, put it out for bid, and come November, whoever is still at the high bid when the clock ticks off, they win," Huckabee told reporters at a Monitor breakfast Tuesday. "I don't think ... people are going to allow that to happen."

Four of the last five US presidents were governors first. They balance budgets and solve problems, in healthcare, transportation, education, he says. But what about the war? Huckabee refers to himself as having been commander in chief of a state where 80 percent of its National Guard have been deployed overseas.

"When Ronald Reagan was elected, ... the rub was that he had been an actor and a governor, so what possible skills could he bring to the task?" Huckabee says.

Still, Huckabee knows he must rise in the pack by summer's end. "If by ... September I'm still considered second or third tier, after the Iowa straw poll, then ... I've got a problem," says the former Baptist minister, who formed a presidential exploratory committee last week. He seeks to be the second president from Hope, Ark., after Bill Clinton.

An evangelical Christian, Huckabee hopes his religiosity will win GOP voters who may have qualms about Senator McCain, who is not overtly religious; former Mayor Giuliani, who is liberal on social issues; and Mr. Romney, whose Mormon faith makes some Republicans uneasy.

In Campaign 2008, Candidates Starting Earlier, Spending More (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Starting as early as last June, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) was hiring staffers and consultants in New Hampshire and Iowa and building the foundation for his 2008 presidential bid at a time when those in early battleground states typically get a breather from national politics.

Campaign filings released last week show that he spent more than $375,000 on staffing and consulting, getting an early jump in those states. One campaign cycle earlier, a single candidate -- Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) -- had started hiring in-state advisers at that point, and by the end of 2002 he had spent only $4,200 paying those aides.

The financial reports begin to document the underpinnings of a drive for dollars that is expected to make 2008 the nation's first billion-dollar presidential campaign. Top-tier candidates are hard at work courting wealthy political enthusiasts who can deliver scores of thousand-dollar donors. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) held a gathering for 70 of those "bundlers," as they are known, last night at her Washington home. [Story, A8.]

To understand the impulses behind this fundraising race, look no further than activity in a cluster of early caucus and primary states. Democrats competing for their party's nomination will face a rapid-fire succession of contests in Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina in January. Republicans will compete in Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Michigan. A number of states -- including behemoths such as California and Florida -- are seeking to move up their primaries to early February.

"Everything is so compact," said Tom Rath, a New Hampshire political consultant who is working for former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney (R). "You've got to be competing everywhere across the board, right from the start."

To compete in those states, candidates are already confronting a daunting array of new expenses and demands that is creating a presidential sticker shock.

This year, candidates will need to hire more employees to wage battles in the growing number of early primaries. They will make unprecedented investments in computer technology to unlock clues to voter behavior.

They enter a 2008 field flush with political megastars who have set stratospheric fundraising goals. And the cost of such staples as television commercials will soar as candidates forgo public financing and the accompanying spending quotas.

That has meant candidates have started spending in those states earlier than ever. A full picture of that early activity will emerge more clearly in April, after most candidates have filed their first campaign reports.

But the 2006 expense reports released last week provide a glimpse at how aspirants have started spending their money. By the end of last year, budding contenders in the Democratic field had already written more than $660,000 in checks from their federal accounts to fund activities in key states -- more than twice what their counterparts spent in 2002 in the run-up to the 2004 presidential contest.

Steve Elmendorf, a deputy campaign manager in Kerry's 2004 bid, said campaigns are facing a series of escalating costs, including the "enormous expense" of building robust teams of political workers in four states at once.

"You need a big infrastructure in each one of these states," he said. "You need a press infrastructure, a political infrastructure, a fundraising infrastructure. And that takes people."

Add to that the rising price of travel, Elmendorf said. When McCain first ran for president in 2000, he defrayed some travel costs by flying on corporate jets. Under Federal Election Commission rules at the time, candidates could bill their campaign accounts the cost of a first-class ticket for a corporate flight.

But now, his campaign has said, McCain is abiding by a pledge to stay off corporate jets. In the past year, that has meant spending more than $1.1 million on charter flights, according to filings by his leadership committee.

Candidates will also be trying to reach voters through the Internet and through their mailboxes, and that will mean unprecedented investment in technology, much of which was in its infancy four years ago. This year, nearly all candidates are posting videotaped speeches on their Web sites to speak directly to voters.

When then-Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.) began preparing for his first presidential bid, he made an early investment of nearly $100,000 to build an Internet operation. As he began constructing his 2008 effort, he found the cost to put his stamp on the Web had more than quadrupled, with close to half a million dollars already spent on consultants and technical-support teams.

DOJ_NMG_0128921

Just as Edwards saw Web site production grow more costly, others are finding new ways to modernize campaign techniques that once relied on index cards and shoe leather.

Ken Strasma, a consultant whose firm developed a microtargeting program that uses vast supplies of marketing data to identify and persuade a candidate's likely supporters, said the powerful targeting programs will be more widely used this cycle.

In small states, such as Iowa, a candidate can spend $100,000 to $200,000 to identify every caucus voter within their reach and figure out how best to persuade them. In larger states, those costs will multiply.

Already, Edwards and Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.) have each paid $50,000 to the Iowa Democratic Party for copies of its voter files, and Dodd forked over $50,000 to the New Hampshire Democratic State Committee for its membership list.

Then there's television, which is always one of the largest expenses facing a presidential campaign.

Rath said he expects candidates to be up on television far sooner this time around. If candidates forgo public funding, as many expect, they will no longer be subject to strict spending limits on the amount candidates could invest in each state. Under FEC rules, candidates taking public money would face a spending cap that in 2004 amounted to just $729,000 in New Hampshire, though most candidates found legal ways to circumvent that limit.

Four years ago, only President Bush, Kerry and former Vermont governor Howard Dean opted out of the public system, which meant they could ignore the state-by-state limits altogether.

Steve Murphy, who managed the campaign of then-Rep. Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.) in the 2004 cycle and is now working with New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson (D), said that four years ago spending limits might have left most candidates with no more than a couple of million dollars to spend on television in the early states. Now that number could increase tenfold.

Candidates who may have once bought ads only on local New Hampshire stations will now consider buying time in the far more costly Boston television market, Murphy said.

"I think it will take $40 million to mount a strong campaign on the air and on the ground in the early states, and some candidates will spend far more than that," Murphy said.

Beyond the nuts and bolts of running a campaign, many candidates will feel pressured to keep pace with the quasi-celebrities such as McCain, Clinton and Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.). All three are expected to set a blistering pace of fundraising.

To some, that notion has been too much to stomach. One was Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.), who dropped from the field of 2008 presidential contenders last month.

"It's a fundraiser for breakfast, then call time. A fundraiser for lunch, then call time. Then a fundraising reception. And then you can still call the West Coast," Bayh said.

Not everyone in the field is certain that the path to victory will involve raising a quarter-million dollars a day. A spokeswoman for Edwards said that although some costs may nudge up, the former senator does not see much need to match big-number goals being bandied about for the year ahead.

"We need to raise enough so we can compete in all four early primaries," said the spokeswoman, Jennifer Palmieri. After that, she said, "if you're winning, the money will follow."

That said, Edwards has scheduled 22 fundraisers in 15 states this month.

Research database editor Derek Willis and washingtonpost.com staff writer Chris Cillizza contributed to this report.

Who's Hitting The Right Notes? (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

"Why are we here?" John Edwards asked the members of the Democratic National Committee last Friday -- meaning: What animates us? What is the banner we ask Americans to take up? And, by morning's end, the Democrats had heard three different answers from their party's presidential front-runners.

Edwards and Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama had distinct perspectives on Iraq, but their other differences were, if anything, more revealing. Edwards depicted, in a rising crescendo of emotion, the human cost of manmade disasters: the hotel housekeeper picketing for health coverage; the 8-year-old going to bed hungry; the mother of a soldier in Iraq answering her door to news of her son's death; the orphaned 5-year-old in the Sudanese desert. One of America's best trial lawyers was pleading for the victims of cruel and idiotic policies, offering policies of his own to save the innocents.

DOJ_NMG_0128922

Where Edwards personified problems, Obama abstracted them. In the forthcoming election, he said, "our rivals won't be the other party. Our enemy is cynicism." More particularly, he went on, the enemy was the debasing of the public square.

"It's time to free ourselves from the constraints of politics," he said. Some might want to focus on specifics or plans but, "We've had a lot of plans, Democrats. What we've had is a shortage of hope." Accordingly, though Obama made clear his opposition to the Iraq war, he omitted any mention of his plan to withdraw U.S. forces by March 2008.

Clinton was less all-embracing in her indictments and her remedies -- nothing flowery, all matter-of-fact. Among the Democratic front-runners, she's the reality principle. "In the Senate," she reminded listeners, "we still have to create coalitions to get things accomplished." She also spoke about the erosion of the American social contract, though not with the kind of heartbreaking illustrations Edwards summoned. But Clinton also stated, more clearly than Edwards had, that our economic woes affected the vast middle class. With wages stagnating and health care growing more costly, Clinton said, we've lost the bargain that "if you worked hard and did your part, the country would stand with you. This bargain created the American middle class, our greatest social achievement."

All of which is to say that, because of the absurdly early start of the 2008 presidential campaign, we have already reached that point where the strengths and weaknesses of the candidates' messages are becoming apparent. Beyond question, Edwards is the best positioned to ride the populist wave that is finally and rightly hitting our shores. By his willingness to repeal tax cuts for the rich to pay for universal health care, he is wagering that Americans will favor fairness and functionality over the anti-tax ideology of recent decades.

But Edwards risks sounding like the tribune for a smaller, more marginal group of Americans than he may intend to. Defending unions, he said it was time for Democrats to stand with workers who spent their "whole lives in factories, who worked in the mills." True enough, but Democrats also have to stand with workers who spend their whole lives at their keyboards. The father of Democratic populism, William Jennings Bryan, never made it to the White House, in part because he could never add the backing of industrial workers to his support among farmers. Edwards will do well among industrial workers; it's the post-industrial workers he needs to win over.

For her part, Clinton stressed that engineers as well as mill hands face outsourcing. She articulates the scope of globalization's problems more broadly than Edwards does, even if Edwards is more likely to confront those problems with more aggressively fair-trade proposals. Clinton's grasp of the breadth of our dilemmas is offset by the incrementalism of her solutions -- a disjuncture that may disturb Democrats who feel the time is ripe for bigger things.

And Obama? His broad indictment of contemporary politics has great appeal, I suspect, to young voters in particular. But the cynicism about government that he rightly condemns didn't waft in from nowhere. It's been a tool that the right has used to undermine the bargain Clinton spelled out, creating the desperate Americans Edwards talked about, to the end of distributing more wealth to the rich. The hope Obama personifies can be a powerful force -- but not when he counterposes it to specifics or to political struggle.

Early midcourse recalibrations, anyone?

Ready For Obama Already (NYT)

By Martin Plissner

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

Washington

WITH Barack Obama expected to announce on Saturday that he's running for president, if you enter "America," "ready" and "black president" in a Google search, you'll get around 125,000 hits. When pollsters bring up those words with random samples of voters — and they've done it a lot recently — they get "yes" answers from 62 percent (CNN), 56 percent (Newsweek), 58 percent (Gallup) and 55 percent (CBS).

DOJ_NMG_0128923

Most of these surveys, however, ask people only if the rest of America is ready for it to happen, not about being ready themselves to make it happen. When one poll asked Republicans and Democrats if they would vote for a "qualified" black of their own party, barely 5 percent said no — hardly surprising, as doing so would be a frank acknowledgment of prejudice.

A much better poll would consist of giving an actual set of candidates' names at the end of a real campaign. Fortunately, 10 years ago such a test was actually done.

On Nov. 5, 1996, Voter News Service — the organization hired by the TV networks to do exit polling — asked people at the polls, who had just given Bill Clinton 49 percent of the vote, Bob Dole 41 percent and Ross Perot 8 percent, how they would have voted if the Republican candidate had been Gen. Colin L. Powell. In an exit poll sample of 3,697 (three times the size of a standard high-grade public opinion survey), the result was this:

Powell: 50 percent.

Clinton: 38 percent.

Perot: 9 percent.

This finding, however, was not part of the pooled report shared by all the networks; it was commissioned by CBS News, of which I was then political director. As often happens, however, when there's a lot of big news, this bit of data got buried in an end-of-night roundup and was quickly forgotten. But it does suggest there was a day when Americans, had they been given a choice of major party candidates, one of whom was black, would very likely have chosen the black one.

Most significantly, General Powell would have won the race because of the support of white voters — Bill Clinton outpolled him 2 to 1 among the blacks surveyed. Among white voters, whom Senator Dole had carried very narrowly (too narrowly for him to win), General Powell clobbered the incumbent, 53 percent to 33 percent.

Any poll analysis has to be hedged with qualifications, and this one more than most. Bill Clinton and Bob Dole had just been through bruising year-long campaigns and exposed to more than $100 million of take-no-prisoners advertising. Colin Powell had not. He was still being acclaimed for his role as the country's top soldier in its only clear victory since World War II.

Still, even with these qualifiers, there is a pretty good, if not quite conclusive, case that America has for some time been ready to elect a black president. The question for Barack Obama is whether this time around it will be ready for this one.

Right Candidates, Wrong Question (NYT)

By Gloria Steinem

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

EVEN before Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton threw their exploratory committees into the ring, every reporter seemed to be asking which candidate are Americans more ready for, a white woman or a black man?

With all due respect to the journalistic dilemma of reporting two "firsts" at the same time — two viable presidential candidates who aren't the usual white faces over collars and ties — I think this is a dumb and destructive question.

It's dumb because most Americans are smart enough to figure out that a member of a group may or may not represent its interests. After all, many African-Americans opposed the appointment of Clarence Thomas to the Supreme Court in 1991 because they were aware of his record — and the views of his conservative supporters.

Similarly, most women weren't excited about Elizabeth Dole as a presidential candidate for the 2000 election because she seemed more attached to those in power than those in need of it. Indeed, Elizabeth Dole even got support from people who opposed women making their own reproductive decisions. (If Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice decides to run for president, I imagine that she would face the same fate.)

The question is also destructive because it's divisive. In fact, women of all races and men of color — who together form an underrepresented majority of this country — have often found themselves in coalition. Both opposed the wars in Vietnam and Iraq more and earlier than their white male counterparts. White women have also been more likely than white men to support pro-equality candidates of color, and people of color have been more likely to support pro-equality white women.

It's way too early to know which candidate will earn trust or survive Swift-boating, but forcing a choice between race and sex only conceals what's really going on.

DOJ_NMG_0128924

So far, for example, polls show that about 60 percent of African-American Democrats support Hillary Clinton, while only about 20 percent support Barack Obama. These surprising numbers probably have less to do with Senator Obama himself than with whether people feel he's been around long enough to trust, whether the name "Clinton," with its associations of racial inclusiveness, is a better bet, and whether a member of one's own group — a group that has endured a history of discrimination — could win anyway.

This disease of doubt plays a big role: 81 percent of black voters tell pollsters that a white man will get the Democratic nomination, while only 58 percent of white voters do. Such doubt also helps to explain why women are more likely than men to support Hillary Clinton, but also more likely to say she can't win.

Still, the larger question is: Why compare allies and ignore the opposition? Both Senators Clinton and Obama are civil rights advocates, feminists, environmentalists and critics of the war in Iraq, though she voted early and wrong, and he spoke out early and right. Both have resisted pandering to the right, something that sets them apart from any Republican candidate, including John McCain. Both have Washington and foreign policy experience; George W. Bush did not when he first ran for president.

But the greatest reason for progressives to refuse to be drawn into an irrelevant debate about Senators Clinton and Obama is that it is destructive. We can accomplish much more if we act as a coalition. Think, for instance, of the powerful 19th-century coalition for universal adult suffrage. The parallels between being a chattel slave by race and chattel as a wife, daughter or indentured worker turned abolitionists into suffragists, and vice versa. This coalition against a caste system based on race and sex turned the country on its head — until it was divided by giving the vote to its smallest part, Negro men.

Sojourner Truth famously warned that this division would cripple the movement for decades to come — and it did. Only a half-century later did white and black women get the vote, by then tarnished by the racist rhetoric of some white women and diminished by racist restrictions and violence at polls. And only decades after that, in the 1960s, did the civil rights movement start a new wave of equality that spread into feminism, the Native American movement, the gay and lesbian movement, and much more.

But those activists were reinventing the wheel. They were rediscovering Gunnar Myrdal's verdict of the 1940s that "the parallel between women and Negroes is the deepest truth of American life, for together they form the unpaid or underpaid labor on which America runs."

This time, we could learn from history. We could double our chances by working for one of these candidates, not against the other. For now, I've figured out how to answer reporters when they ask if I'm supporting Hillary Clinton or Barack Obama.

I just say yes.

This One's For You, Joe (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON

It's not double jeopardy exactly, but still, I'd prefer not to kill the same man twice.

And I wanted to follow William Safire's advice on writing about gaffes and graft: Only kick people when they're up, not when they're down.

So I decided to do something completely radical and not pile on.

Having played a role in derailing Joe Biden's '88 presidential bid with stories on his overreliance on the speeches of Neil Kinnock and Bobby Kennedy, I feel compelled, now that the guy has slipped on another presidential banana peel 20 years later, to lend him a hand.

I wanted to give him a chance to wipe the slate clean and articulate his positions — without dredging up any painful memories of the words "clean" and "articulate."

The senator called me between New York fund-raisers last night. After his rough week, he sounded a bit chastened, not at all in the mood for a columnist's probing questions. He needn't have feared.

"So," I asked him sweetly, "why has everyone been so mean to you?"

DOJ_NMG_0128925

"Well," he demurred, "they haven't been mean. The truth is, a lot of people in the African-American community were hurt by what I said. I really feel lousy about it. I got involved in politics because of civil rights." (He said a lot more, but hey, it's a 750-word column.) I had another penetrating question ready: "Is Delaware big enough to launch a president?" "I think it is," he replied.

I had a tough follow-up: "Will your first act as president be to get rid of those tollbooths on I-95?" He laughed. "I get asked that a lot by people. I can't help 'em — they're on their own."

That's the straight talk I like to see. No pandering, like Hillary's telling Iowans she likes ethanol, and John McCain's telling Christian conservatives he likes Christian conservatives.

"People don't seem to appreciate your verbal generosity," I said. "Are you studying Bogie and Steve McQueen movies to become less wordy, or do you just hope people will come to see it as part of your charm?" "We're in a political culture where everything is reduced to bumper stickers and sound bites, and it's a lot more complicated than that," he said. "I'm fairly candid, and sometimes I'll cause controversy and sometimes I won't. It's who I am. I'm not going to change who I am."

That's my man. He stares controversy in the eye and chats with it.

"In one sentence, with no more than two dependent clauses," I instruct, "tell me why you would make a great president."

"I really believe the American people get the fact that with the next president, there's no margin for error. He's going to inherit a world and a nation where this guy is going to leave him in a real deep hole. The next president has to get us out of Iraq without ruining the Middle East, so Americans should be looking for the person with the most experience."

O.K., that's three sentences, but who's counting?

"You've been a truth-teller on Iraq for years, so tell the truth," I said. "Are we cooked?" Citing the soft-partition plan he co-wrote, he noted: "Any country that comes into being as a consequence of the pen of a diplomat has never been able to be stable except by (a) an imperial power dominating it, (b) a dictator or strongman, or (c) a federal system."

Aren't Americans going to be angry at a Senate that's bending itself into a procedural pretzel, rather than seriously tackling the future of Iraq?

"They are going to be angry," he agreed. "Republicans are trying to avoid embarrassing the president. If you took a secret ballot, I'd be dumfounded if 20 senators thought sending 21,500 troops made any sense." He said John McCain wouldn't think it made sense either "because he has called for sending many more."

Do you agree that Dick Cheney is barking mad?

"Cheney is a very smart guy who's kicking the can down the road here," he replied. "He's concluded that this administration's policy can't succeed in Iraq and he's handing it off to the next guy."

Things were getting way too serious. "What's your ideal day?"

"It would be corny," he said. "Just taking off to the beach with Jill."

Trying to boost his dented confidence, I said I was sure he looked better in the Delaware waves than Barack Obama in the Hawaiian surf. The 64-year-old laughed, saying, "Like the Paul McCartney song, 'When I'm 64.' I don't look as good as I once did, but Jill does."

"Who would make the best president?" I coaxed.

"Me," he crowed.

I think his confidence is coming back. Excellent.

Texas Governor Has Funding Idea: Sell The Lottery (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Gov. Rick Perry (R) proposed Tuesday that Texas sell its state lottery for at least $14 billion, with the money dedicated to an endowment for residents without health insurance and a trust fund for cancer research.

No state has sold or leased its lottery, although several are considering it. Last month, Indiana Gov. Mitchell E. Daniels Jr. (R) proposed leasing the state lottery for 30 years to pay for scholarships aimed at keeping Indiana's top college graduates in-state.

In Texas, the lottery reported more than $3.77 billion in sales in the 2006 fiscal year, the highest amount in its 14-year history. The lottery contributes $1 billion a year to public schools.

DOJ_NMG_0128926

"This moment in time is a unique opportunity to address great challenges and build the foundation for a future of unparalleled prosperity," Perry said in his State of the State address.

Several legislative leaders questioned the idea, with some skeptical the lottery would fetch $14 billion and others wondering what it would mean for gambling overall.

"Basically, by privatizing the lottery you legalize private-run gambling operations in Texas," said Republican Sen. Steve Ogden, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee.

Under Perry's plan, money from the sale would be used to establish three trusts: $8.3 billion to replace most of the public-education revenue lost with the sale of the lottery, $3 billion for cancer research, and $2.7 billion to expand health insurance coverage for the working poor.

The interest proceeds from those trusts would fund the programs -- producing annual revenue of $1.26 billion, the governor projects.

On A Wintry Night, The Press And The Politicians Get Cozy (WP)

By Jose Antonio Vargas

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Another year, another black-tie dinner commingling the press and the pols, another way to stay warm on an utterly chilly night. For this one night, we could forget about the forgetful Scooter Libby, domestic budget cuts, the streets of Baghdad.

We could even forget that it's an "American Idol" night.

On this Tuesday night, there was a party to be had and a journalistic legend -- the indefatigable Helen Thomas -- to be honored. And not even the threat of snow could stop the 63rd annual congressional dinner of the Washington Press Club Foundation.

Bob Schieffer, the venerable CBS newsman, played host in a jovial, playful tone. Together with ringers Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) and House Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), he faced the toughest task of all: Make a roomful of journalists and politicians laugh.

In introducing Kennedy and Boehner, Schieffer said: "I've known these men for many years. And they are the cleanest . . ."

Boehner commented on Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi's new no-smoking rule: "We can still smoke out on the balcony. But, Nancy, it was 20 degrees out there. I think I want a seat on your global warming committee."

And Kennedy said of Boehner, "We don't always believe in the same issues, but I believe in his right to make his mistakes."

It was a tough crowd at the Ritz-Carlton. But it worked. Sort of.

And anyway, it was all for a good cause. At $175 a plate and with 850 guests in attendance, last night's fete served as a benefit for the foundation, which provides scholarships for women and minorities. A good and necessary cause, indeed, especially considering the lack of people of color in the crowd.

The foundation's dinner is the kickoff to the annual string of press-plus-pols parties (the Gridiron, Radio-TV, White House correspondents) of the year. Seeing the elected officials and the reporters who cover them getting all chummy is a curious thing. If you're an outsider to all of this, making your way from the VIP room to the ballroom, a glass of merlot in hand, you ponder the separation of newsmaker and journalist. A lyric runs through your head: "The press and the pols, sitting in a tree, K-I-S-S-I-N-G."

Judy Holland, a congressional reporter for Hearst Newspapers and the president of the foundation explained: "On the Hill, all bets are off, the notebooks out. But on a night like this, we're a community, and we're celebrating a coming of age. First woman speaker of the House. A woman as a presidential front-runner. Helen Thomas. I yanked my 13-year-old daughter from her homework so she could be here and see what it all means."

Daryl Hannah was there, seated at the same table as Lauren Nelson, the newly crowned Miss America. And, yes, the actress is Amazonian, all legs. She's not the political schmoozer type, she says, but she was here to talk about global warming ("We're at a crossroads right now") and show her support for the new Democratic Congress.

"Who's your congressman?" you asked her.

A beat later, she replied, "I live in a couple of places simultaneously."

DOJ_NMG_0128927

Arianna Huffington waited in the coat line, at one point dropping $1 and $5 bills from her purse as she greeted Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio) with a kiss on the left cheek. "I was in Davos," she told him. "One of those capitalist gatherings." They laughed.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) whisked on by, followed by "Hardball" host Chris Matthews, then Democratic strategist Donna Brazile, an endless parade of the who's-who of the K Street-Capitol Hill-Washington-press-corps set.

The foundation dates back to 1919, when a handful of journalists formed the Women's National Press Club. They weren't welcome to the all-male National Press and Gridiron clubs. The foundation's annual dinner began in 1944, a kind of a welcoming party to the sociopolitical circuit for freshmen members of Congress.

As always, honors were handed out last night. The David Lynch Memorial Reporting Award went to David Lightman of the Hartford Courant and John E. Mulligan of the Providence Journal. A new scholarship, funded by the New York Times and the foundation, was announced, named after slain Timesman David Rosenbaum.

But no honor meant more than the lifetime achievement award bestowed on veteran White House correspondent Thomas.

"On behalf of the House of Representatives, we salute Helen Thomas," said Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi. "You could have gotten [this award] over and over again, Helen."

"One of the greatest reporters in the history of the republic," Kennedy called her.

Thomas is definitely a perfectionist. Two hours before her speech, she was hunched over on the stage of the VIP room, a red pen in hand, rereading her remarks. ("To the members of Congress, I say, do the right thing. Pass laws that are fair to everyone. . . . To the media, I say, let's follow the truth wherever it leads us, and let the chips fall where they may . . .")

She's been attending these dinners since the late '40s. She was president of the Women's National Press Club in 1959.

"I've picked the greatest profession in the world," Thomas said. "There is nothing more indispensable to a democracy than a free press."

Spoken like an old pro, still idealistic after all these years.

Subprime Politics (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

Mortgage delinquencies are rising, subprime lenders are going belly-up -- another company filed for bankruptcy Monday -- and the Senate Banking Committee is holding hearings today on "predatory lending." All of this can only mean one thing: Congress is looking for someone to blame now that the housing boom is over.

The noted banking expert Jesse Jackson is scheduled to be a featured witness at today's hearing, along with a couple of unfortunate consumers who were sold mortgages they couldn't afford to repay. Senator Chris Dodd, Chairman of the Banking Committee, is in high dudgeon, threatening legislation and talking about the American dream becoming a nightmare for those who can't make their mortgage payments. It's time for a reality check.

No one likes to see anyone lose his home to foreclosure -- and that includes the banks. Banks make money by lending to people who can repay their loans with interest. Lending people money they can't pay back is a lousy business, as the many recent headlines about subprime lenders going bankrupt demonstrate. If rapacious banks really had a goal of lending people more than they could afford to pay back, they wouldn't be swimming in red ink.

Related to this is the contention, made by the same populists on the current "predatory lending" rampage, that banks make money by charging them "excessive" interest. But, if anything, the recent spate of bankruptcy among subprime lenders suggests that they were charging too little interest to compensate for the credit risk they were taking by lending to people with bad credit histories.

This is not to say that there were no mistakes made during the recent housing boom. There always are excesses during asset bubbles. Quickly rising prices made a lot of people giddy on both sides, and it's now clear that loans were offered and taken that should not have been. Both the asset-price increases and the lending risks were also facilitated by a prolonged period of easy money, courtesy of the Alan Greenspan-Ben Bernanke Federal Reserve.

The combination of exceptionally low interest rates over an extended period contributed to booming prices that encouraged lenders and borrowers to overextend themselves. Borrowers figured that if rates rose or things got sticky, they could always sell for a profit. Lenders likewise became accustomed to lending with little or no money down from the buyer, confident that rising prices would soon provide the buyer with an equity cushion. Meanwhile, regulators at the Fed and Comptroller of the Currency waited a long time to question some of the riskier lending practices.

DOJ_NMG_0128928

However, Members of Congress know it's a pain to wrestle with Mr. Bernanke over monetary policy, and the Comptroller's rules for mortgage lending don't make for sexy newspaper copy. It's so much more fun to knock around a couple of prosperous-looking bankers. So in searching for a scapegoat, the politicians are returning to that old chestnut, "predatory lending."

They may want to think twice before stringing up the bankers, though. Whether their borrowing history is good, bad or indifferent, Americans enjoy some of the best access to credit of anyone in the world. Those no-money-down loans are risky for both sides. But for many people, the alternative is no chance to buy that house at all. The politicians arguing for tighter credit standards are some of the same folks who deplore banks for "red-lining" by refusing to lend in poor urban neighborhoods. And the result may be less credit, or no credit at all, for the working poor or newly employed.

Last week the percentage of subprime mortgages that were more than 90 days past due was placed at just over 10% in November, the latest period for which figures are available. That's the highest it's been in years. But, remember, this also means that close to 90% of loans are still being paid off more or less on time. Tightening standards means not only "protecting" the 10% who got caught short but also hurting the 90% who stretched for a mortgage and are still making their payments.

Lenders know that some percentage of marginal loans will go bad. But they can't know in advance which loans will sour -- or presumably they wouldn't make those bets in the first place. The only way to ensure close to 100% loan performance is to restrict lenders to making only the safest loans. This in turn means shutting out of the market a whole lot of people who may be "risky," but still manage to send in their checks every month.

For such borrowers, a lender who makes a risky loan is not a predator, but a gatekeeper to homeownership and the economic opportunity that goes with it. We suspect that the vast majority of those who stretch to afford a home and sacrifice to make their payments don't need the kind of protection Mr. Dodd is offering.

Choice Advances (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

Proving that the best reforms often pass by the slimmest of margins, Utah's house voted 38-37 late last week to create a state-wide voucher program that will allow students to escape failing public schools.

Union opponents can be expected to mount a furious assault in the state senate, and then head to court. But the senate is likely to pass the reform supported by GOP Governor Jon Huntsman Jr., so Utah may soon become the first state with a universal school choice plan. It would offer students who attend private K-12 schools from $500 to $3,000 in tuition reimbursement based on family income.

Meanwhile, South Carolina could be next. Legislation is now being drafted to allow nearly 200,000 poor students to opt out of failing public schools by giving them up to $4,500 a year to spend on private school tuition. Middle class parents would be eligible for a $1,000 tax credit.

Governor Mark Sanford, a Republican, also wants to create more choice within the public system by consolidating school districts so students who can't afford to live in a certain zip code aren't forced into the worst public schools -- a system that now consigns thousands of African-American students to failing schools. In his State of the State Address last month, Mr. Sanford branded the current districts a "throwback to the era of segregation." The comment drew hardly a flutter in the legislature, he told us, because "everyone knows it's true."

Despite a 137% increase in education spending over the past two decades and annual per pupil spending that exceeds $10,000, South Carolina schools trail the nation in performance. The state ranks 50th in SAT scores, only half of its students graduate from high school in four years and only 25% of eighth graders read at grade level. The Governor's budget puts it this way: "The more we expose students to public education, the worse they do."

In last year's elections three legislators paid for their opposition to school choice with their seats. One freshman reformer is Representative Curtis Brantley, an African-American Democrat from rural Jasper County who defeated a white incumbent in a June primary. He told us he supports school choice because something must be done to shake up the status quo.

DOJ_NMG_0128929

Those counting votes say this might be the year that choice legislation passes. Advocates are planning a rally at the state Capitol in Columbia on Tuesday, February 13. Mr. Brantley says he's helping bus people in from his district, and Governor Sanford will address the event. The voucher movement has been declared dead many times, but as Utah and South Carolina show, its promise of better education is keeping hope alive.

Budget Sets High Foreign Policy Targets (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, February 7, 2007

Ambitious foreign policy goals set out in the Bush administration's federal budget for 2008 include the end of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, dismantling North Korea's nuclear weapons programme and the start of comprehensive multilateral negotiations with Iran.

Other targets listed in the foreign assistance component of the budget seem more like Soviet-era quotas, for example a projected 10 per cent increase over the 2006 figure of 769 interviews given by US officials to Arab and other media outlets in the Middle East.

In 2006, 81.7 per cent of participants in exchange programmes with the US, including opinion leaders and media commentators, "agree with democratically oriented principles in politics, work, and societal issues". The 2008 target is 84 per cent.

An official involved in drawing up the budget said the targets represented "what we intend to achieve with the resources we ask for". He added: "They are in many cases intangible goals."

This month Condoleezza Rice, the secretary of state, is due to mediate in the first Israeli-Palestinian talks for six years that will attempt to deal with long-term "final status" issues, even as the Palestinian territories slide into deeper interfactional violence. Yet the 176-page FY 2008 Performance Summary, issued by the State Department on Monday, foresees a "permanent status agreement and the end of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict" and the "development of full normal relations between Arab states and Israel".

On North Korea, where stalled-six party talks are due to resume this week after making almost no progress for nearly 18 months, the State Department projects an agreement within the next eight months and implementation in 2008.

Similarly, Iran is projected to "maintain" a full suspension of its nuclear activities, even though it has yet to begin one. On suspension, "multilateral negotiations commence with Iran toward a long-term settlement of outstanding international concerns".

In contrast to the National Intelligence Estimate released last week, which painted a grim future for Iraq, the State Department performance goal sees 2008 as the year for "consolidating democracy", where "civil liberties provisions remain intact and receive strong support from legal and executive institutions".

Karen Hughes, who heads public diplomacy for the Bush administration, is credited with setting up the "rapid response unit" to generate swift ripostes to "misinformation, negative and misleading reporting".

"On fast-breaking stories on Iraq, for example, we have been able to mobilise Washington officials to appear on the media in the morning rather than at the end of the day, which gets our message out to key Arab TV outlets early enough to make the main evening news," the document says.

Apart from Iraq, which receives the bulk of its funding in a separate supplemental budget, Israel continues to receive the most US assistance, officials said, followed by Egypt.

Winning the "global war on terror" remains an important theme in the foreign assistance budget. This means "winning the war of ideas", which involves $668m for foreign broadcasting, $486m for education and cultural exchanges and $359m for public diplomacy.

But foreign military assistance remains the largest component of the overseas budget, projected to rise slightly to $4.54bn, an official said.

Tom Lantos, the Democratic chairman of the House committee on foreign affairs, accused the administration of "short-changing the United Nations".

DOJ_NMG_0128930

"This is absurd," he said in a statement. "The administration is budgeting for massive new arrears to the UN at a time when we need the organisation to help us in Iraq, Darfur, Lebanon, Haiti and a host of other global hot spots."

InterAction, an alliance of development and humanitarian non-government organisations, expressed concern that presidential initiatives on HIV/Aids, malaria and the Millennium Challenge Account were not accompanied by similar increases for traditional foreign assistance programmes.

Results, an advocacy organisation that seeks to create the political will to end hunger and poverty, criticised the 2008 request for "slashing" funding for the Global Fund to Fight Aids, Tuberculosis and Malaria after the House of Representatives voted last week to increase the amount.

Lebanon Leader Puts Onus On U.S. (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack And Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

BEIRUT — Badgered by Hezbollah and jeered as a puppet of the U.S. government, Lebanon's prime minister on Tuesday blamed American support of Israel for an increasingly violent political crisis that has shredded this country's stability.

His voice rising in frustration during an interview with the Los Angeles Times, Fouad Siniora said the troubles in his nation would subside if U.S. officials were to press Israel to withdraw its soldiers from Shabaa Farms, a small patch of disputed turf that the United Nations has said was part of Syria.

With Shiite Muslim Hezbollah and its allies mounting a hard push for a bigger share of power in Lebanon, many people here believe that the international community should force Hezbollah's hand by depriving the party of any excuse for keeping an armed militia. The lingering occupation of the land has long been cited by Hezbollah as a justification for its armed guerrilla fighters on Israel's border.

But the U.S. has ignored his pleas, Siniora said.

"They're not doing it," he said.

"That's what we're telling them. That's what we disagree with them about."

In Washington, National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe, told of Siniora's comments, said: "We understand the enormous pressure Prime Minister Siniora is under from Hezbollah and Syria and others that want to undermine democracy in Lebanon. We will stand by him to make sure democracy in Lebanon is successful, and we will continue to work for greater peace within the Middle East."

Divided by old sectarian and class tensions and battered by regional instability, Lebanon has reverted to being a battleground for regional and international conflicts. The United States, Iran, Syria, France, Saudi Arabia and other Arab states have pursued geopolitical agendas through local allies and proxies.

By all accounts, Siniora, a Sunni Muslim technocrat and former finance minister of humble birth, is Washington's favorite amid the stable of former warlords and clan patriarchs who jockey for power here. Officials in the Bush administration go out of their way to praise and bolster his government. And during months of angry anti-government protests, he has been cursed in the streets as a stooge of U.S. policy.

When he griped about the United States on Tuesday, it was a striking reminder of how American policy toward Lebanon can in some cases appear to undercut even Siniora, whom the Bush administration has scrambled to shore up in the face of fierce opposition.

Lebanese leaders complain that the United States failed to help Siniora when it mattered most, during last summer's war between Israel and Hezbollah. Israeli bombs pounded this country for weeks. An increasingly desperate Siniora wept on television and implored the Americans to intervene to stop the Israeli onslaught. But Washington refused to ask for a cease-fire.

In the final 36 hours of the war, Israel stepped up its shelling of southern Lebanon and unleashed a torrent of cluster bombs. More than a million bomblets and 380,000 land mines remain on Lebanese land, Siniora said Tuesday.

Israel has also continued to breach the cease-fire agreement with steady violations of Lebanese airspace, he said. According to the United Nations, Israel has engaged in about five or six flyovers each week.

DOJ_NMG_0128931

"In the Arab world there were always a lot of complaints and grievances against the United States.... They've pushed the Arab world toward extremism," Siniora said. The Arabs are "being humiliated every day. [The Americans] can see with their own eyes the Israelis are subjugating the Palestinians."

As for Hezbollah, it has seemed determined to keep its guns — no matter what happens to Shabaa Farms. Hezbollah lawmaker Nawar Sahili said the militia wouldn't even consider disarming until it believed the Lebanese army had been proved capable of defending the country.

"This is a red line for us," Sahili said of disarmament. "When the Lebanese army is strong enough, maybe."

In the nearly six months since a cease-fire stopped the fighting between Israel and Hezbollah, Siniora has come under harsh attack from the Islamic militant group and its allies, who cursed his government as an American puppet and demanded more power. Mass demonstrations outside his office have dragged on for months, sparking street fighting and dredging up dark memories of Lebanon's 15-year civil war, a conflict that finally faded out in the early 1990s.

On Tuesday, Siniora traced Lebanon's perpetual instability back to Israeli occupation, both of southern Lebanon and of the Palestinian territories. It was the repeated Israeli invasions and occupation of southern Lebanon, he said, that created Hezbollah and allowed it to spread.

Pointedly describing Shabaa Farms as Lebanese territory, Siniora insisted that if Israel were forced to relinquish the land, his government and Hezbollah could come to an understanding.

"The Arab-Israeli conflict is the mother of most problems in the Arab world," he said.

For now, Lebanon remains deeply locked in crisis. Gunfights erupted around the country last month between rival Christian factions and between Sunnis and Shiites.

The bloodshed rattled the political leaders, and both sides toned down their rhetoric and struggled to rein in the rage among their followers.

But talks between the government and the opposition remain frozen. Even during the bloodiest days of the civil war, the various sides kept talking, a Western diplomat here pointed out this week. But now, he said, there is no negotiation.

Each side blames the other for the break in talks.

Meanwhile, Iran and Saudi Arabia have begun to negotiate a settlement to Lebanon's impasse. Predominantly Shiite Iran has close ties to Hezbollah, while largely Sunni Saudi Arabia is a staunch supporter of the Siniora government.

As he complained about the Americans, Siniora praised Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah as a "man who believes in his cause and who sacrificed even his son for that cause."

He also said that the Bush administration should engage Syria to pacify the region.

"Syria is a state. You cannot eliminate that state from the map. You've got to engage with Syria … to make it part of the solution, not part of the problem."

Rice Sees Summits With Israeli, Palestinian Leaders (AFP)

AFP, February 7, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice plans a series of three-way meetings with Israeli and Palestinian leaders in a major shift of US efforts to broker a peace deal and establish a Palestinian state, a senior US official said.

Following six years of a virtual hands-off policy toward the Arab-Israeli dispute under President George W. Bush, Rice will bring Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas together for their first three-way meeting on February 19, US and Israeli officials announced.

"Our expectations are that this is an initial opportunity for these two leaders to start a discussion about those issues that would concern the framework of a possible Palestinian state," said Rice's spokesman, Sean McCormack.

"It is their first opportunity to discuss these in more than six years," he said, referring to a breakdown in peace negotiations since a Palestinian uprising against the Israeli occupation erupted in late 2000.

Rice had already announced her intention to host the Abbas-Olmert meeting in the middle of this month.

DOJ_NMG_0128932

But McCormack said she intended to pursue the three-way format in a significant departure from Bush's past practice of remaining aloof from the intricacies of Israeli-Palestinian deal-making while he focused on the conflict in Iraq and the broader "war on terrorism".

"I would expect you would see more of the tripartite format as opposed to just the Israelis and Palestinians" meeting, McCormack said.

"We would hope that the Israelis and Palestinians would take advantage of this particular forum" to reach agreements on everything from the "most mundane" issues of security, economics and trade to the "most politically sensitive" questions of forming a Palestinian state, he said.

The Bush administration has been under growing pressure from Arab and European allies to invest more effort in breaking the Israeli-Palestinian deadlock, seen as fueling a global rise in Islamic radicalism.

Rice has held many fruitless separate meetings with Israelis and Palestinians over the past two years focused primarily on ending attacks on Israel by Islamic radicals.

Last month during her latest tour of the region, she announced a new approach that would deal in parallel with security matters and so-called "final status" issues involving the borders and powers of a future Palestinian state, the status of Jerusalem and the fate of Palestinian refugees.

The US plan was endorsed Friday by the top diplomats from Russia, the European Union and United Nations, who together with the United States make up a group known as the "Quartet" of Middle East mediators.

But the initiative faces serious obstacles, with Abbas locked in a violent power struggle with the Islamic movement Hamas and Olmert severely weakened by his perceived mismanagement of Israel's war against Lebanon's Hezbollah militia last year.

Hamas won control of the Palestinian government in elections a year ago, sparking a diplomatic and aid embargo by Quartet nations.

Abbas has tried to negotiate a power-sharing deal that would create a unity government between Hamas and his secular Fatah party, but Hamas has refused to meet Quartet requirements, notably by recognizing Israel's right to exist.

Tensions between the two sides erupted into deadly violence in December which has left 100 dead, including 50 killed over four days last week.

Abbas and Hamas leaders were meeting in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, this week in another bid to reach an accommodation.

McCormack reaffirmed Tuesday that any agreement between the two sides should include recognition of the Quartet principles.

The Quartet is due to meet again in Berlin after the Rice-Abbas-Olmert summit.

Palestinian Aid Policies 'backfiring' (FT)

By Harvey Morris

Financial Times, February 7, 2007

Concern is mounting in the international aid community that policies aimed at isolating the Palestinian Authority's ruling Hamas movement have backfired by further impoverishing the people of Gaza and the West Bank without seriously undermining the Islamists.

The British charity Oxfam joins the debate on Wednesday with an appeal for Europe to scrap an emergency aid programme that bypasses Hamas and revert to direct funding of the PA government that it controls.

"The way that European aid is currently being delivered is undermining Palestinian basic services and damaging a highly fragile economy," said Barbara Stocking, Oxfam's director.

Her statement followed a report last week by the UK parliament's international development committee that claimed the policies of Israel and international donors towards Hamas were playing into the hands of its Iranian ally.

"The withholding of revenues by Israel and the boycott of the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority by existing donors has led the Hamas government increasingly to look elsewhere for financial support," the report said.

"As a result, Hamas now has closer links to governments like that of Iran than it had two years ago. We doubt whether this is a development that the international community would have intended."

DOJ_NMG_0128933

Israel has released only $100m (€77m, £51m) of an estimated $600m in tax revenues collected on behalf of the PA since Hamas came to power 12 months ago. The PA collects locally about $25m a month in tax.

The controversy erupted as Hamas officials met in Mecca last night with Mahmoud Abbas, PA president and leader of the rival Fatah movement, to try to reach a national unity agreement that could lead to the lifting of what Palestinians describe as an international "siege".

Despite the so-called boycott, tens of millions of dollars are still flooding into the territories. There has been emergency aid from Europe and elsewhere, support from Arab governments – about $260m last year – and an indeterminate amount of cash smuggled by Hamas and others into the Gaza Strip.

One senior western aid official, asked to quantify the total reaching the territories, conceded: "Frankly, we don't have any idea."

Members of the international Quartet – the US, European Union, United Nations and Russia – who with other donors had provided about $1bn a year to the Palestinians, suspended direct aid to the PA after Hamas came to power in January last year.

The Quartet said the boycott of Hamas would remain in force until it recognised Israel, committed itself to non-violence and accepted existing agreements with Israel, a position the four reaffirmed at a meeting in Washington last week.

Officials said the original thinking behind the boycott was to show Palestinians the consequences of electing a Hamas government. With Hamas unable to finance services and public sector salaries, it was assumed its popularity would suffer. Recent polls, however, showed it just a few percentage points behind Fatah.

In June, in an effort to stave off hardship among Palestinians, the Quartet supported the establishment of a European-run Temporary International Mechanism (TIM) to funnel funds to Palestinians through the office of Mr Abbas.

By the turn of the year, the European Commission had contributed €107.5m ($140m, £70m) through the TIM to pay for health services, fuel supplies and allowances to the poor and to public employees who had gone for months without pay.

Oxfam's statement described the mechanism as an "aid fiasco" and lambasted a system under which HSBC bank had received almost €4m in commissions to administer the transfer of allowances to Palestinian recipients.

European officials defended the TIM and played down the significance of commissions of less than 4 per cent, describing them as below normal for such large and complex transactions.

Mario Mariani, who heads TIM's operations from Jerusalem, told the FT: "The idea has been to show we were not prepared to starve people in order to get rid of a government we did not agree with."

Although officials liaise with Mr Abbas's office, TIM payments go directly to beneficiaries such as Israeli fuel suppliers or to the bank accounts of Palestinian employees. Payments to individuals are made on the basis of a database held by HSBC in London to ensure no funds are diverted to terrorism. "No money goes directly to [the] president's office," said Mr Mariani. "There is no blank cheque."

So far, 144,000 heads of poor households and state employees have received financial aid through the TIM, directly benefiting 900,000 people. The allowances have averaged 40 per cent of former salaries. No payments have been made to the 80,000-strong security forces.

Some aid officials and Palestinian officials close to Mr Abbas are concerned Hamas has attempted to claim credit for the fact the economy has not totally collapsed under its watch, while the president has failed to win kudos for acting as a conduit for continued foreign aid.

Mr Mariani acknowledged the problem but said: "People know what they are getting, and they are not getting it from Hamas.

"At the beginning there was some confusion and the government tried to exploit it. Now it is very clear that people can see Hamas has not delivered."

Fatah And Hamas Leaders Meet Saudi King For Peace Talks (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0128934

MECCA, Saudi Arabia, Feb. 6 — Leaders of the two main Palestinian parties, Hamas and Fatah, on Tuesday began a two-day Saudi-brokered effort to agree on a unity government that could end a wave of violence in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank and resume relations with donor countries.

The Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, and two Hamas leaders — Ismail Haniya, the Palestinian prime minister, and Khaled Meshal, the Damascus-based militant leader — met separately with King Abdullah, Saudi officials said.

All of the leaders are expected to perform the pilgrimage at the Grand Mosque in Mecca and meet with other Saudi officials and mediators before deliberations begin in earnest here on Wednesday.

The meeting is intended to yield a government that would include members of both parties and be acceptable to Western governments so that they resume relations with and aid to the Palestinians and restart peace negotiations with the Israelis, which have been stalled since 2003.

The United States and the European Union consider Hamas, which has carried out numerous attacks against Israeli civilians and opposes Israel's existence, to be a terrorist organization. They cut off aid to the Palestinian Authority last spring after Hamas took power as a result of defeating Fatah in elections held in January of last year.

Previous efforts to stem the current bloodshed between the Palestinian factions and find common ground have yielded only temporary cease-fires. But many hope that the high-profile meeting in Islam's holiest city, and the weight and personal prestige invested in it by King Abdullah, will prod the Palestinians to leave here with an agreement in hand.

"Hopefully, in the holy environment in the house of God, this will come clearly as a message to them and they will take their obligations as seriously as they can," the Saudi foreign minister, Prince Saud al-Faisal, said Tuesday in an interview.

Hamas and Fatah have wrangled over a unity government since last summer, when it became clear that with Western aid withheld, Hamas could not govern alone.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel told visiting American Jewish leaders Tuesday that he would meet on Feb. 19 with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Mr. Abbas. Mr. Olmert did not say where the meeting would take place.

The issues separating Hamas and Fatah in the Saudi-sponsored talks are how to divide ministerial portfolios and how the new government will meet the Western criteria of renouncing violence, recognizing Israel and accepting previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

American and Israeli officials said Tuesday that the so-called quartet — the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations — would not compromise on those demands.

If there is a deal in Mecca, Prince Saud said, "you move to the peace process — then you will be able to, with assurance, have the talks between the two sides."

The Saudis, who have traditionally preferred to work quietly behind the scenes, have grown increasingly alarmed at the chaos engulfing the Middle East.

Palestinians Try To Stave Off Civil War (AP)

By Donna Abu-Nasr

AP, February 7, 2007

Palestinian factions on the brink of civil war gathered Tuesday in Mecca, Islam's holiest city, in a last-ditch effort to end their bloody conflict. The Saudi-led push is key to any future peace talks with Israel — and to Arab efforts to blunt Iran's growing power.

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah and Khaled Mashaal, leader of the militant Hamas movement, flew to the Saudi city of Jiddah before heading to Mecca to meet their host, King Abdullah, ahead of the start of talks Wednesday.

The talks are open-ended, a reflection of Saudi Arabia's determination to keep them going until the Palestinians reach a deal for power-sharing in a new coalition government.

The king's mediation and the holding of the talks in Mecca underline the Saudi pressure on the sides to overcome their differences. The Saudis are pointedly convening the talks in a Mecca guest palace overlooking the Kaaba, the cube-shaped shrine toward which all Muslims turn when they pray.

Four days of gunbattles between Fatah and Hamas fighters killed more than 30 people and wounded over 200 others until a cease-fire took hold Sunday.

DOJ_NMG_0128935

Even as Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas left the Gaza Strip Tuesday for the talks, Hamas and Fatah security officials fired at each other for 10 minutes at the Gaza-Egypt crossing terminal. No injuries were reported.

"Nobody wants the battling to continue," Haniyeh told reporters. "The only beneficiary is Israel."

In an interview with the Lebanese paper Al-Akhbar, Abbas warned that failure in Mecca "would mean the deterioration of the internal situation and igniting civil war."

Beyond ending the intra-Palestinian bloodshed, a deal on power-sharing is vital for any resumption of the peace process. Israel has refused any talks since Hamas formed a government following January 2006 elections, and the West imposed a financial blockade on the Palestinian government because of Hamas's refusal to renounce violence and recognize Israel.

Abbas, a moderate who was elected separately, is hoping for an agreement on a coalition government in which Hamas will give some degree of recognition to previous peace agreements with Israel to allow a resumption of talks and an end to the embargo.

The Mecca gathering is also a test of U.S. ally Saudi Arabia.

The kingdom, which normally prefers behind-the-scenes diplomacy, has taken an assertive new role in trying to resolve the Palestinian conflict, as well as two other Mideast conflicts that threaten to erupt into full-fledged civil wars: Iraq and Lebanon.

It has done so in part because it fears that Shiite-Sunni tensions fueled by the turmoil in Iraq and Lebanon could explode, destabilizing the region — and threatening the kingdom itself, which is mainly Sunni but has a significant Shiite minority.

Saudi Arabia also aims to stem the influence of mainly Shiite, Persian Iran, its longtime rival, which has a hand in all three crises. Iran has funneled millions of dollars to Hamas, giving it an unprecedented influence in the Israeli-Arab conflict. As a sign of its concern, Saudi Arabia has even opened contacts with Iran to cooperate in easing tensions in Iraq and Lebanon.

At the same time, Saudi Arabia sees reviving the Israeli-Arab peace process as vital to calming the crises across the Mideast.

King Abdullah underlined the need for a deal as he met with Abbas and Mashaal separately in Mecca.

"What's going on in the land of Palestine serves only the enemies of the Islamic nation," he told Abbas, according to the Saudi News Agency. "If it continues, it will rob the Palestinians of the fruits of their long struggle."

Speaking to Mashaal and Haniyeh, Abdullah warned: "If the dispute between Palestinian brothers goes on, it will bleed away their energy and end all that they have struggled to achieve."

Abdullah also received a message from President Bush ahead of the talks, delivered by Homeland Security and Counterterrorism adviser Frances Townsend, the news agency reported, without giving details.

State-guided Saudi newspapers urged the Palestinians to reconcile and observe the truce that took hold Sunday. "If the Palestinians cannot reach radical solutions at the Mecca meeting, then I believe we have to wait 50 more years for them to, perhaps, get over the (power) complex," commentator Hani Wafa wrote in a column titled "The Last Chance" in Al-Riyadh newspaper.

The Palestinians have been struggling for months over a power-sharing deal, and street battles between gunmen of the two parties have erupted with increasing frequency in Gaza. The differences focused on the program of the proposed coalition and who would control the security forces. In recent months, Egypt, Syria and Qatar have all tried and failed to end the power struggle.

Moussa Abu Marzouk, deputy of Hamas leader Mashaal, was cautious as he and Mashaal left Damascus for the talks. "The disagreements ... have become narrower," Marzouk told The Associated Press, "but we don't know whether an agreement will be reached or not."

Ostensibly, the gaps are small — in the case of the program only a single word. Abbas, a moderate who was elected separately in 2005, has insisted Hamas promise to "commit" to previous agreements, including interim peace deals with Israel. Hamas is only willing to say it "respects" such agreements.

Saudis Offer Counterweight To Resurgent Iran (FT)

By Heba Saleh

Financial Times, February 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0128936

By inviting the leaders of Fatah and Hamas, the two warring Palestinian factions, to reconciliation talks in Mecca, Saudi Arabia has invested its prestige in efforts to ward off a civil war in the occupied territories.

The Saudi-sponsored talks, which opened on Tuesday, come as the conservative kingdom increasingly finds itself at centre stage in diplomatic efforts to prevent the crisis-ridden Arab world sliding into further conflict.

Palestinian infighting is impeding the efforts of pro-US states, such as Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Jordan, to press Washington to revive a meaningful Arab-Israeli peace process leading to the establishment of a Palestinian state – a strategic goal for these countries. But Saudi concerns have gained urgency as Riyadh tries to counter Iranian influence in the region.

Arab officials are alarmed by what they see as Tehran's expanding regional role through its links with the newly resurgent Shia majority in Iraq and through its backing for radical forces such as the Palestinian Hamas government and Hizbollah, the Lebanese Shia group. They also see Iran profiting from the turmoil in Arab trouble spots by appealing directly to Arab public opinion frustrated by the inability of regional governments to stand up to Israel and the US.

Tehran has been cementing its ties with Hamas, Arab officials complain, to the detriment of Egyptian efforts to forge a Palestinian national unity government that could negotiate with Israel.

"The Palestinian issue should be resolved by the Arabs and no one else," said King Abdullah of Saudi -Arabia in remarks published last week.

He also warned Iran that it was "endangering" the Gulf region because of the problems in its international relations – an apparent reference to Tehran's stand-off with the US over its alleged nuclear ambitions.

Analysts say Saudi Arabia is engaged in a difficult balancing act. It wants Tehran's influence checked, but without confrontation. Riyadh, they argue, is trying to use pressure and diplomacy to counter Tehran but is anxious to avoid a US military strike against Iran's nuclear facilities.

Saud al-Feisal, the Saudi foreign minister, announced last week that his country was working with Iran to avert strife between the Sunni and Shia in Iraq and Lebanon. At the same time, however, Riyadh appears to be backing the new US strategy in Iraq, which includes raising the pressure on Tehran.

"The Iranians have a clear understanding of where we stand," said a Saudi analyst close to the government. "We want them to prove that they are a player for ending disputes, not for stirring them up."

Tehran denies it is stirring up trouble and argues it wants stability just as much as the Saudis.

However, even as Saudi and Iranian envoys criss-crossed the region in recent days with the declared aim of avoiding sectarian bloodshed in Lebanon and Iraq, a wave of anti-Iranian and anti-Shia rhetoric has been sweeping the Arab press, threatening to inflame rather than damp down -sectarian tensions.

Newspapers have accused Iran of seeking to win converts to Shia Islam in Sunni Arab countries as far afield as Algeria and of trying to revive its old Safavid empire. Some Saudi clerics have issued statements accusing the Shia of being heretics.

"We are going back to the discourse of the 1980s immediately after Iran's Islamic revolution," said Abdulaziz al-Qassim, a Saudi lawyer. "Even moderates have assumed a virulent anti-Shia tone. There is a sense of threat because of the sectarian massacres in Iraq and a fear that the balance of force in the region will be altered if [Iran acquires] nuclear weapons."

In a country where there is a sizeable Shia minority, estimated at about 2m, the sectarian talk is producing alarm. "The consequences of this incitement . . . will be dangerous," warned Sheikh Hassan al Nimr, a Shia cleric in Saudi Arabia.

However, so far there have been no moves on the part of the Saudi authorities or any other Arab government to curb the sectarian rhetoric.

"In some respects it may be Machiavellian," said -Gregory Gause, a specialist in Gulf politics. "Most people in the Arab world like Iran's support for the Palestinians and they see a nuclear Iran as strengthening the Islamic world. So if you inject a sectarian element you can mobilise opinion against Iran."

Saudi Arabia's Diplomacy (WP)

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

ONE CONSEQUENCE of the Bush administration's recent decision to divide the Middle East between "extremists" and "moderates" was to marginalize U.S. diplomacy in the region. The administration refuses to talk to the "extremists" -- Iran, Syria,

DOJ_NMG_0128937

Hezbollah and Hamas -- but those governments and groups are at the center of every major conflict from Iraq to the Gaza Strip. Now one of the administration's "moderate" allies, Saudi Arabia, has stepped into the vacuum. The result has been a revealing demonstration of how talks with adversaries can sometimes be useful -- and a hint of what may be lost by Mr. Bush's inflexible policy.

In Riyadh yesterday, Saudi King Abdullah was hosting potentially groundbreaking negotiations between Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and senior leaders of Hamas. While Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has been preparing to have her own talks next week with Mr. Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, the intra-Palestinian discussions are considerably more important: They could determine whether a Palestinian administration emerges that is both willing and able to settle with Israel, or whether recent Palestinian factional fighting escalates. Significantly, the Hamas representatives in Riyadh include Khaled Meshal, a militant leader based in Damascus who has blocked previous moves toward a Palestinian accord. Saudi relations with Mr. Meshal's sponsor, Syrian President Bashar al-Assad, may be warming; Mr. Assad will soon be in Riyadh for a Saudi-hosted summit of the Arab League.

Saudi diplomats, including former ambassador to Washington Prince Bandar bin Sultan, are also deeply engaged in talks with Iran. The contacts began with a visit to Saudi Arabia by Ali Larijani, the head of Iran's national security council. Prince Bandar subsequently visited Tehran and, according to a report in the New York Times, King Abdullah received leaders of Hezbollah. Sunni-ruled Saudi Arabia and Shiite Iran back opposite sides in the escalating sectarian conflicts in Iraq and Lebanon, but the talks show that both governments are interested in tamping them down. Though there have been no breakthroughs, the diplomacy seems to have succeeded, at least, in cooling the situation in Lebanon, where a Hezbollah campaign against the Saudi-supported, pro-Western government led to several days of violence last month.

The Bush administration seems to be encouraging the Saudi diplomacy: The State Department praised the king's hosting of the Palestinian talks. In fact the Saudi initiatives, even with so-far-uncertain results, refute the premises of the administration's own policy of sharply dividing enemies from friends. U.S. strategy assumes that nothing can be gained by talks with Iranians such as Mr. Larijani and that nothing can cause militants such as Mr. Meshal to compromise. It's good that Saudi Arabia is testing a contrary theory in practice; even better would be some American diplomatic risk-taking.

U.S. To Create A Single Command For Military Operations In Africa (NYT)

By David Stout

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6 — The Pentagon will establish a new military command to oversee its operations in Africa, President Bush and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates announced Tuesday.

Creation of the United States Africa Command, which had been expected, will “strengthen our security cooperation with Africa and create new opportunities to bolster the capabilities of our partners in Africa,” Mr. Bush said.

The president said he had directed Mr. Gates to establish the command by Sept. 30, 2008. The location of the command will be determined after discussions with Congress and officials of countries on the continent, Mr. Bush said.

Mr. Gates, testifying Tuesday before the Senate Armed Services Committee, said creation of the command would eliminate an “outdated arrangement left over from the cold war.”

Three commands now divide responsibility for operations in Africa: the European Command, which oversees most countries on the continent, except those in the Horn of Africa; the Central Command, which has responsibility for Egypt, Sudan, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Djibouti, Somalia and Kenya; and the Pacific Command, which has responsibility for Madagascar, the Seychelles and the Indian Ocean.

The man who is about to become the head of the Central Command, Adm. William J. Fallon, told the Senate Armed Services Committee on Jan. 30 that he favored establishment of an Africa Command, in light of the humanitarian crises and instability across much of the continent and its strategic importance.

“The Horn of Africa sits astride one of the most critical sea lines of communication in the world,” Admiral Fallon said. On Tuesday, the committee endorsed him to succeed Gen. John P. Abizaid to lead the Central Command and sent the nomination to the full Senate for confirmation.

DOJ_NMG_0128938

US Signals Scope For Ties With N Korea (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, February 7, 2007

Washington would be prepared to start normalising relations with Pyongyang before it completed nuclear disarmament if it helped persuade North Korea to move forward on a previous agreement to denuclearise the Korean peninsula.

A senior Bush administration official said Washington would consider starting the process to remove Pyong-yang from the list of state sponsors of terrorism, and to ease restrictions on American companies dealing with the state, if North Korea moved forward on its commitment to dismantle its nuclear programmes.

US officials will meet their North Korean counterparts tomorrow when the six-party talks, which include China, Japan, South Korea and Russia, resume in Beijing.

In September 2005 North Korea pledged to abandon its nuclear weapons programmes and rejoin the nuclear non-proliferation treaty in return for energy aid and security guarantees. But Pyongyang refused to return to the negotiating table for more than a year after Washington imposed financial sanctions that hurt the regime of Kim Jong-il.

The Bush administration has come under greater pressure to deal with North Korea after it tested a nuc-lear weapon for the first time last year.

But the White House believes Mr Kim is also under pressure to reach an agreement because of the financial sanctions, and also because of increased pressure from China. But David Albright, a US nuclear expert who met government officials in Pyong-yang last week, said North Korea did not appear under pressure.

“North Korea feels the US is making a mistake by putting all their eggs in the Chinese basket,” said Mr Albright.

The US official said South Korea would take the lead in providing energy assistance and food aid, which North Korea badly needs following a bad grain harvest in 2006. In return, Pyongyang would agree to freeze its plutonium reactor as the first stage of a process that, from the US perspective, would have to lead to complete disarmament, including the removal of North Korea’s stockpile of plutonium.

U.S. Expects Intense N.Korea Nuke Talks (AP)

By Carl Freire

AP, February 7, 2007

The U.S. expects "hard bargaining" at upcoming talks aimed at getting North Korea to abandon its nuclear program, Washington's chief negotiator in the talks said Wednesday.

Christopher Hill, speaking to reporters in Tokyo on his way to Beijing where the six-nation talks resume Thursday, said North Korea's willingness to take steps forward was key.

"The big question is whether the North Koreans are really ready to make some progress," Hill said. "We did have some good signs in Berlin, but I think we also know that there is going to be some rather hard bargaining, so we'll see how we do."

North Korea returned to the six-party talks — which also include Japan, China, Russia and South Korea — in December after conducting its first nuclear test in October, but the talks stalled over the North's objections to U.S. financial sanctions.

The North agreed in January to resume the nuclear negotiations after the United States offered unspecified concessions during rare bilateral talks in Berlin.

North Korea is proposing to freeze its main nuclear reactor and allow U.N. monitoring in return for massive energy shipments and normal relations with the United States, according to an American nuclear expert who visited Pyongyang last week.

David Albright, a former U.N. nuclear inspector, said in an interview Tuesday that North Korean officials told him they also wanted the lifting of U.S. financial restrictions imposed for alleged North Korean counterfeiting of U.S. currency and money laundering that have led to about $24 million in North Korean funds being frozen at a Macau bank.

Chief North Korean disarmament negotiator Kim Kye Gwan and other officials told Albright and Joel Wit, a former State Department official, that nothing would happen until the U.S. agreed to the construction of light-water reactors that Washington promised North Korea under a 1994 deal to freeze Pyongyang's nuclear program.

DOJ_NMG_0128939

That deal, which also included an annual supply of half a million tons of heavy fuel oil until the reactors were built, was scrapped in 2002 when North Korea admitted it had restarted its atomic program.

Albright, the head of the Institute for Science and International Security, said the North emphasized that it now wanted either electricity shipments or more heavy fuel oil than was promised in the 1994 deal.

Hill said Tuesday that negotiators from Pyongyang had not raised the issue of heavy fuel oil in return for shutting down its reactor. However, he said there was room to discuss the matter under a September 2005 pledge in which North Korea agreed to give up its nuclear program in exchange for aid and security guarantees.

Northern Exposure (WSJ)

By Gordon G. Chang

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

Tomorrow, China-sponsored six-party talks to disarm North Korea are scheduled to resume in Beijing. This time, there are great expectations that an agreement will be reached. But if there is a deal, it will not be because Chinese diplomats worked behind the scenes. It will be because the Bush administration has made concessions it previously refused to consider -- in particular, releasing frozen North Korean funds, providing aid, and accepting only an interim freeze of the North's production of plutonium. American policy makers apparently think that if the U.S. makes the first moves, China will persuade North Korea in the future to completely give up its nuclear arsenal.

China supplies approximately 90% of the North's oil, 80% of its consumer goods and 45% of its food. It accounts for more than half of Pyongyang's foreign trade, and is the only nation that pledges to defend Kim Jong Il's state with military force. Some North Korean officials are thought to be more loyal to the Chinese leadership than to Kim Jong Il. The little autocrat could "neither bark nor bite" without China's assistance. Beijing can disarm him but has chosen not to exercise its influence.

China's failure to act leads analysts to believe that Beijing keeps the Kimist regime afloat to preserve regional peace, avoid a tide of refugees, maintain a buffer against American forces in South Korea, destabilize Japan and obtain leverage over Washington. Beijing seeks these advantages, but they barely explain recent Chinese policy. Kim Jong Il is the destabilizing force in North Asia, and Korean refugees would move south in a crisis and not north. A unified Korea in Beijing's orbit would serve as a superior buffer, and it is Kim Jong Il who is pushing Japan to rearm and build missile defenses. And Korean issues are beginning to cloud China's relations with America. On balance, North Korea is a growing liability for Beijing as it tars its international standing.

There are two primary reasons why the Chinese haven't solved the Korean crisis. First, China is in the middle of a once-in-a-lifetime transition. Mao Zedong was once the world's arch-proliferator of nuclear weapons technologies. Many in Beijing now realize that the further nuclearization of the region will only result in the reduction of China's relative power. It is not just the potential armament of Japan, South Korea and Taiwan that concerns the Chinese. The nuclear agreement between India and the U.S. -- the world's largest democracy and its most powerful one -- foreshadows a setback of immense proportions for China.

Despite Beijing's recognition that proliferation no longer benefits China in the long term, there is now no accepted strategic vision in the Chinese capital, just competing views and interests that result in directionless policy -- what many mistake as "nuanced" diplomacy. There may be academics and Foreign Ministry officials who want to take constructive steps, but there are also generals who enjoy bedeviling Americans and who maintain close ties with their North Korean counterparts.

The most recent evidence of Beijing's indecisiveness is its flip on the inspection of goods moving in and out of North Korea. On Oct. 14 of last year, Wang Guangya, China's U.N. ambassador, voted in favor of U.N. Security Council Resolution 1718, which calls on nations to inspect such goods. Immediately after the vote, he declared that the inspection provision was unacceptable to China. Then, two days later he said that China would inspect North Korean cargoes after all, but would not intercept or interdict them. This erratic performance is a sign of a government that does not know what to think or do, even on matters of importance.

More generally, Chinese foreign policy has not evolved to the point where Beijing is disposed, by itself, to openly interfere in the affairs of a neighbor in a drastic manner. China's officials still speak of the Five Principles of Peaceful Coexistence -- all of which boil down to noninterference in others' internal affairs -- as the bedrock of their foreign policy. China must complete the process of both shedding the self-image of an outsider and ending its traditional role as an adversary of the existing global order.

DOJ_NMG_0128940

Such a change inevitably occurs when a rising power matures, but it only happens after internal perceptions have shifted over time. The fundamental problem is that China is just not quite ready to act like a great power.

Second, China has priorities that it perceives to be more important -- or at least more immediate. North Korea was pushed to the top of Beijing's agenda only by an unexpected event: Pyongyang's October 2002 admission to an American envoy that it had been pursuing a uranium-weapons program in violation of its existing agreements. Up until then, Chinese leaders were preoccupied by domestic matters. To the extent they were concerned by international ones, they were focused on China's western and southern borders. Today, other matters -- such as securing energy -- are deemed far more urgent than Korea.

China will not disarm North Korea on its own. Beijing has been able to protect Pyongyang because Seoul is doing the same. Stripping Seoul from Beijing should be Washington's most immediate tactical goal. If Washington can help South Korea reverse course -- certainly possible in light of the conservative trend in that nation -- the Chinese will be alone in their support of Pyongyang and will therefore have to take a clear stand. They will have to choose between their future, cooperation with the U.S., and their past, the alliance with North Korea. America can help the Chinese break the deadlock inside their capital and complete their nation's historic transition.

Mr. Chang is the author of "Nuclear Showdown: North Korea Takes On the World" (Random House, 2006).

Bush Approves Plan To Pressure Sudan (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

President Bush has approved a plan for the Treasury Department to aggressively block U.S. commercial bank transactions connected to the government of Sudan, including those involving oil revenues, if Khartoum continues to balk at efforts to bring peace to Sudan's troubled Darfur region, government officials said yesterday.

The Treasury plan is part of a secret three-tiered package of coercive steps -- labeled "Plan B" -- that the administration has repeatedly threatened to unleash if Sudan continues to sponsor a campaign of terror that has left as many as 450,000 dead and 2.5 million homeless. But the administration has held back on any announcement of Plan B, even after setting a Jan. 1 deadline, in hopes of still winning Khartoum's cooperation.

The delays have increased skepticism that the administration is willing to risk potential diplomatic and commercial fallout from targeting Khartoum.

The U.S. plan would put pressure on Darfur rebel leaders who have refused to participate in peace talks or who have targeted humanitarian groups operating in the region, officials said. The information on Plan B was provided by officials in four government agencies on the condition of anonymity because the administration had not planned on releasing details yet.

Some aspects of Plan B have already been stealthily launched, such as stationing four U.S. Army colonels last month as observers on the Sudan-Chad border in full view of Sudanese intelligence. The unannounced move was intended as a signal to Khartoum, which the administration accuses of launching a "quiet war" against Chad's government to widen the Darfur conflict.

"I find this all very dubious. They have talked about Plan B, but they have never explained what Plan B is," said J. Stephen Morrison, director of the Africa program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "The deadlines have come and gone, and the Sudanese have thumbed their noses."

Andrew Natsios, Bush's special envoy to Sudan, tomorrow will testify before the House Foreign Affairs Committee that the administration has set three triggers that would result in the enhanced sanctions: one, renewed attacks on displacement camps or driving nongovernmental organizations from Darfur; two, stonewalling peace negotiations with rebel forces; and three, refusing to implement a plan pushed by then-U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan to expand a poorly equipped 7,000-person African Union force into a hybrid A.U.-U.N. force of 17,000 troops and 3,000 police.

"Treasury's plan to block commercial bank transactions connected to the Khartoum regime, even those involving oil revenues, will be only a minor, short-term inconvenience," said Eric Reeves, a Sudan expert at Smith College, who noted that Khartoum has already violated the three triggers since the start of the year. "This element of Plan B only reveals more fully its vacuous nature."

DOJ_NMG_0128941

The Darfur conflict broke out in 2003, when African rebel groups attacked police stations and military outposts. The United Nations and human rights groups accuse Sudan's government of supporting a militia known as the Janjaweed in an effort to crush the rebellion. About 2,000 villages have been destroyed across Darfur, and the administration more than two years ago accused the government of engaging in genocide. But the United States has made little progress in ending the conflict or the humanitarian crisis.

Buoyed by booming oil wealth and a close relationship with China, Sudan has shrugged off repeated threats of action. Bush, increasingly frustrated by the impasse, approved key aspects of the plan last month, directing Treasury to come up with a menu of options that would directly affect the government in Khartoum, officials said. Sudan's Arab leadership has fought multiple civil wars with regional groups over the country's oil and other resources, and U.S. officials believe Sudan's leaders are fearful of any moves that might threaten their grip on power.

Sudan's economy is largely dollar-based, meaning many commercial transactions flow through the United States and making it especially vulnerable to Treasury actions. Indeed, U.S. intelligence, which has stepped up reporting on Sudan in recent months to prepare for a confrontation, believes Khartoum set up a government committee to explore ways of obtaining oil revenues that did not involve dollars, such as barter deals, one official said. Sudan's government has also unsuccessfully sought new oil contracts that would provide for large upfront payments.

The core of the Treasury plan rests on an executive order issued by President Bill Clinton in 1997 that blocked all Sudanese government assets, including companies connected to it, and curtailed financial dealings with Sudanese entities. Bush last year issued a second executive order that blocked the property of people connected to the conflict in Darfur. The existing orders already result in regular freezes or rejections of some Sudanese transactions, but U.S. officials believe they also give the Treasury the authority for an aggressive crackdown on a much larger group of companies connected to Sudan.

Officials hope a ripple effect of Treasury's actions would extend to other countries and companies doing business with Sudan, forcing them to reconsider whether they want to be tainted or, more troubling, subjected to Treasury's scrutiny. "Anything that is controlled by the government we can go after," a senior administration official said. "But the effectiveness will be driven by the participation of our partners," meaning other countries.

Sudan produces about 500,000 barrels of oil a year, which at current market rates is worth about $10 billion. As much as 200,000 barrels are kept for internal consumption, Morrison said, with about 75 percent of the rest sold to China. Partly because some aspects of the plan are still classified, administration officials yesterday were vague about how the plan would cripple Sudan's oil revenues. One official said Treasury will "have the ability to touch things that touch oil revenues."

The regional government of South Sudan, created through a peace deal two years ago, is supposed to get 50 percent of oil revenues. Officials said they think they had designed the plan so it would harm Khartoum but without impacting the government in the south.

Suicide Bomber Dies At Airport In Pakistan (NYT)

By Salman Masood

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Feb. 6 — A suicide bomber armed with pistols and grenades killed himself and at least one other person after a shootout with security guards at Islamabad's international airport on Tuesday night, in what the police described as a thwarted but brazen terrorist attack.

It was the second suicide bombing in Islamabad in less than a week and appeared intended to inflict major casualties at the airport, which was teeming with passengers and was sealed off by the police for hours. At least five people were wounded, including three security personnel, and were rushed to nearby Rawalpindi General Hospital.

Aftab Ahmed Khan Sherpao, the interior minister, said in an interview that the bomber and an accomplice fled a taxicab at an airport checkpoint near the parking lot. He said the bomber zigzagged, fired at security guards and detonated a grenade as he was hit by an officer's bullet. Another intelligence official said the accomplice was wounded and arrested.

DOJ_NMG_0128942

The identities and motives of the pair were unclear. But Tariq Azeem Khan, the state minister for information, said the attack was evidently a response to President Pervez Musharraf's effort to suppress groups that support Al Qaeda, the Taliban and other Islamic militant extremists, particularly in Pakistan's northwest frontier near the border with Afghanistan.

"It is a backlash against Pakistan's support in the war against terror," Mr. Khan said. '"Pakistan is itself a victim of terror and is being targeted."

The attack followed a Jan. 26 suicide bombing at the Marriott Hotel in an upscale neighborhood of Islamabad and was the sixth militant attack in the past two weeks, most of them near the Afghanistan-Pakistan frontier.

Russia Tycoon May Talk To Police On Poisoning (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 6 — Boris A. Berezovsky, an exiled Russian tycoon and bitter opponent of the Kremlin, said Monday that he was prepared to be interviewed by the Russian police investigating the poisoning in London last November of Alexander V. Litvinenko, a dissident former K.G.B. agent he had advised and financed.

However, in what he called his first newspaper interview since the British police handed a dossier on the case to the Crown Prosecution Service last week, Mr. Berezovsky said that he would talk to Russian investigators only if they met conditions, including being searched for weapons and poisons.

Mr. Berezovsky spoke in a wide-ranging, 50-minute interview in his offices in Mayfair, a wealthy district of central London, offering some new insights into a tantalizing case that has raised many questions but answered few of them since Mr. Litvinenko, 43, died of radiation poisoning caused by a rare isotope, polonium 210, on Nov. 23.

Mr. Berezovsky said he believed that Mr. Litvinenko had been the target of two attempts on his life, the first in mid-October. That attempt failed, he said, because too little poison was used. Mr. Berezovsky also disclosed that the prime suspect identified in British news reports had visited him the day before Mr. Litvinenko was poisoned in November and had left a powerful trace of radiation in Mr. Berezovsky's office.

After the British police started investigating the case, Russian officials announced their own inquiry and said Moscow police officers were awaiting clearance from Britain to come here.

In a softly lighted and sumptuous suite, Mr. Berezovsky, a former mathematician who amassed huge wealth in business during the Russian presidency of Boris N. Yeltsin in the 1990s, said he was prepared to meet Russian investigators if that would help the British police inquiry, which is widely perceived to have stalled over Russia's resistance to extraditing suspects.

But Mr. Berezovsky said he would not meet the investigators in the Russian Embassy and would insist that they be searched beforehand.

"The people from Russia should be investigated for arms and poison," he said, insisting, too, that he would not sign a confidentiality agreement about the discussion. "I don't trust them at all."

Mr. Berezovsky said he blamed President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia for the killing, a charge the Kremlin has labeled absurd. He said the killers had apparently believed that the cause of death would never be known because British investigators would not be able to identify polonium 210 as the poison. Polonium had been discovered in Mr. Litvinenko's body only three hours before he died, Mr. Berezovsky said.

The British inquiry has focused on three Russian men who met with Mr. Litvinenko on Nov. 1 at an expensive hotel where the poison is thought to have been slipped into his tea. One of them is Andrei K. Lugovoi, a former K.G.B. agent who Mr. Berezovsky said worked for him after he acquired control of a major television station in Moscow in the 1990s.

Mr. Berezovsky, 61, fled Russia in 2000 and, after a series of court battles, won political asylum in Britain in 2003. Mr. Litvinenko also left Russia in 2000, and Mr. Berezovsky said he set the former agent up with a house in north London, a salary and school fees for his son.

Before the killing, however, Mr. Berezovsky said, the two men had agreed to go their separate ways and Mr. Litvinenko had started investigating a range of business deals involving prominent Russians. "Alexander touched something very sensitive," Mr. Berezovsky said, without elaborating.

DOJ_NMG_0128943

When Mr. Litvinenko initially became ill in early November, Mr. Berezovsky said, he told hospital visitors that he believed Mr. Lugovoi was "involved" in the poisoning. Mr. Lugovoi has consistently denied any involvement. Until then, Mr. Berezovsky said, he had no reason to mistrust his former bodyguard and had asked him to arrange security for a daughter visiting Russia last year.

Last October, when Mr. Lugovoi called him to say he was visiting London for a soccer game, Mr. Berezovsky said, he invited him to his office. "I wanted to tell him thanks a lot for my daughter," Mr. Berezovsky said. "He came to my office."

But, after Mr. Litvinenko died and the office was scanned for radiation, Mr. Berezovsky said, a chair used by Mr. Lugovoi was found to have high levels of radiation. Mr. Litvinenko also visited Mr. Berezovsky's office, on the day he was poisoned.

The timing of Mr. Berezovsky's interview apparently reflected a desire by Mr. Litvinenko's family and supporters to keep the case firmly in the public eye when they seemed worried it could fizzle if British authorities did not prosecute. "The basic target is not to allow anybody to stop this case," Mr. Berezovsky said.

This week, Mr. Litvinenko's widow, Marina, released an open letter to Mr. Putin urging him to bring her husband's killers to justice.

Russian Justice (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

The wheels of justice in Vladimir Putin's Russia move strangely, but this week all too transparently. Prosecutors brought fresh charges against Mikhail Khodorkovsky that likely ensure that the former Yukos oil magnate and Putin political opponent won't leave his Siberian prison camp before next year's presidential election.

Nothing from his first trial suggests the outcome will be any better for Mr. Khodorkovsky once a Russian court in distant Chita, near the Mongolian border, takes up the new money laundering and embezzlement case. They could add 15 years to his prison term. Mr. Khodorkovsky's initial conviction and eight-year sentence for tax evasion enabled the backroom nationalization of Yukos's plumb assets. He would have been up for parole next year. No more.

Would that Russian investigators were as determined in pursuing the killer of Anna Politkovskaya, who was shot in her apartment building last October. Her case is unsolved. Since the murder of TV personality Vladislav Listyev in 1995, no one has been successfully prosecuted for a high-profile assassination inside Russia. Now the Kremlin is busy making it harder for United Kingdom authorities to bring to justice the murderers of Alexander Litvinenko, who was poisoned with polonium 210 in London last November.

British investigators found traces of the radioactive substance at the hotels, on the plane, even on the football stadium seat that Moscow businessman Andrei Lugovoi used during his trip there. This former KGB agent and another colleague had drinks with Litvinenko the day he was poisoned. Polonium 210 was also discovered at the bar and in a tea pot at the London hotel where they met. Such forensic evidence apparently isn't up to Russian standards. No charges have been filed in Britain, but Russia's chief prosecutor has already preemptively ruled out the extradition of Mr. Lugovoi to the U.K. The Russians also refused to let British police question him directly in Moscow.

You don't have to be a conspiracy theorist to surmise that the Kremlin wants Mr. Khodorkovsky to stay in Siberia and the Politkovskaya and Litvinenko cases to remain unsolved. And so they are.

Blair Wins Cash-for-honours Reprieve (FT)

By Jimmy Burns, James Blitz And Nicholas Timmins

Financial Times, February 7, 2007

Downing Street on Tuesday won a temporary reprieve in the cash-for-honours affair when the Crown Prosecution Service announced that the first person to be arrested by the police last year would not be charged.

Amid signs that Labour pressure on Tony Blair to resign immediately had momentarily eased, the CPS said there was "insufficient evidence" to press charges against Des Smith, a headteacher.

Mr Smith was arrested last April after allegedly suggesting to a Sunday newspaper that sponsors of the government's flagship city academies would receive honours.

DOJ_NMG_0128944

However, giving its first formal decision on the cash-for-honours affair, the CPS said: “Although it is clear that Mr Smith made some indiscreet comments to an undercover journalist, his conversations did not provide evidence that he was trying to obtain funding for city academies in exchange for honours.”

The CPS’s decision to drop the investigation into Mr Smith probably has no implications for the outcome of the rest of the inquiry. However, the CPS’s decision on Mr Smith is the first crack in the Metropolitan police’s investigation into claims that Labour offered peerages in return for secret loans.

Even so, one senior officer not directly involved with the investigation said there was widespread sympathy with John Yates, the head of the investigation team, and his apparent refusal not be derailed by political pressure.

The officer said: “I think what you are seeing is a Blue Revolution – a reminder that everyone is equal before the law, and the police are not bending to pressure from the establishment.”

For the past 11 months police have investigated whether Downing Street offered peerages to a group of business leaders in return for loans and donations to the Labour party. Two close allies of Mr Blair have been arrested in relation to police investigations into a possible Downing Street cover-up. All deny the charges.

Mr Blair’s immediate position was on Tuesday shored up by two other developments. First, Sir Gus O’Donnell, the cabinet secretary, denied media reports that there was a secret e-mail system inside Number 10 that the police had not been told about. Mr Blair’s aides have repeatedly denied the allegation since it emerged in news reports some days ago.

But a denial by Sir Gus, the head of the civil service, carries particular weight.

Second, a new opinion poll showed that the public is less interested than the media and political worlds in the cash-for-honours affair. A Populus survey for The Times, conducted over last weekend, showed support for Labour has firmed to 33 per cent, up one point since early last month, while the Tories are three points down at 36 per cent.

In an appearance before the Commons public administration committee, Sir Gus signalled growing frustration in Whitehall with the way the allegations over cash for honours have been presented by broadcasters and the press. “I find it deeply worrying just how much media coverage there is,” he said. “That’s all I can say.”

Appearing on Tuesday before the Commons liaison committee – made up of all Commons committee chairs – Mr Blair said he would be willing to appear before the group once more before he leaves office. This implies he still plans to be in office in June.

But a decision to charge one of Mr Blair’s close aides might trigger a spasm of uncertainty within the Labour party over whether the prime minister should stay in office until June.

The CPS said that there would be no further charging decisions relating to any other persons arrested or interviewed by the police until Scotland Yard had completed its investigation and submitted its final dossier.

Neither the police nor the CPS would comment on Tuesday night on when the probe would end, although Scotland Yard said the “wider police investigation is ongoing”.

British Prosecutors Clear Blair Ally In 'Cash-for-Honors' Probe (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 6 -- Prosecutors cleared a political ally of Prime Minister Tony Blair on Tuesday in an investigation into whether Blair's Labor Party awarded government honors in exchange for cash.

The Crown Prosecution Service said it had found "insufficient evidence" to bring charges against Des Smith, who was arrested last year in the inquiry, which has caused extensive political damage to Blair's government.

Smith, a former government adviser who helped recruit wealthy sponsors for a key Blair education initiative, told reporters he was relieved that the inquiry regarding him was over and called it "nonsense from the beginning."

Smith was the first of four people arrested in what people here call the "cash-for-honors" investigation, centering on whether potential political donors have been enticed with promises of appointments to the House of Lords, the upper house of Parliament.

DOJ_NMG_0128945

The others arrested were Blair's top fundraiser, Michael Levy; a key adviser, Ruth Turner; and Christopher Evans, an entrepreneur and major Labor Party donor. Police said all four were questioned on suspicion of breaking laws banning the exchange of honors for money. Levy and Turner were also questioned on suspicion of "perverting the course of justice," which has led political opponents to allege a coverup.

No one has been charged with a crime.

Blair has been questioned twice by police, the first time that a sitting British prime minister has been interviewed by police in a criminal probe. Police have said Blair was treated as a potential witness, not as a suspect.

Smith was a key backer of Blair's flagship education program to create public schools with special independence. Smith last year allegedly told an undercover newspaper reporter that major donors to those academies could be recommended for government honors, including seats in the House of Lords.

Smith has denied doing anything improper, including what he said in his conversation with the reporter, who was posing as an assistant to a potential donor. The prosecution service, in a statement, called Smith's comments to the reporter "indiscreet" but said they did not amount to evidence of wrongdoing.

As Inflation Soars, Zimbabwe Economy Plunges (NYT)

By Michael Wines

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

JOHANNESBURG, Feb. 6 — For close to seven years, Zimbabwe's economy and quality of life have been in slow, uninterrupted decline. They are still declining this year, people there say, with one notable difference: the pace is no longer so slow.

Indeed, Zimbabwe's economic descent has picked up so much speed that President Robert G. Mugabe, the nation's leader for 27 years, is starting to lose support from parts of his own party.

In recent weeks, the national power authority has warned of a collapse of electrical service. A breakdown in water treatment has set off a new outbreak of cholera in the capital, Harare. All public services were cut off in Marondera, a regional capital of 50,000 in eastern Zimbabwe, after the city ran out of money to fix broken equipment. In Chitungwiza, just south of Harare, electricity is supplied only four days a week.

The government awarded all civil servants a 300 percent raise two weeks ago. But the increase is only a fraction of the inflation rate, so the nation's 110,000 teachers are staging a work slowdown for more money. Measured by the black-market value of Zimbabwe's ragtag currency, even their new salaries total less than 60 American dollars a month.

Doctors and nurses have been on strike for five weeks, seeking a pay increase of nearly 9,000 percent, and health care is all but nonexistent. Harare's police chief warned in a recently leaked memo that if rank-and-file officers did not get a substantial raise, they might riot.

In the past eight months, "there's been a huge collapse in living standards," Iden Wetherell, the editor of the weekly newspaper Zimbabwe Independent said in a telephone interview, "and also a deterioration in the infrastructure — in standards of health care, in education. There's a sort of sense that things are plunging."

Mr. Mugabe's fortunes appear to have dimmed as well. In December, the ruling party that has traditionally bowed to his will, the Zimbabwe African National Union-Patriotic Front, balked at supporting a constitutional amendment that would have extended his term of office by two years, to 2010. The rebuff exposed a fissure in the party, known as ZANU-PF, between Mr. Mugabe's hard-line backers and others who fear he has brought their nation to the brink of collapse.

The trigger of this crisis — hyperinflation — reached an annual rate of 1,281 percent this month, and has been near or over 1,000 percent since last April. Hyperinflation has bankrupted the government, left 8 in 10 citizens destitute and decimated the country's factories and farms.

Pay increases have so utterly failed to keep pace with price increases that some Harare workers now complain that bus fare to and from work consumes their entire salaries.

Citing a leaked central bank document, [a news agency] reported Tuesday that prices of basic items like meat, cooking oil and clothes had risen 223 percent in the past week alone.

DOJ_NMG_0128946

Soaring costs have made it impossible for both national and local governments to meet budgets and for businesses to afford raw materials, while subsidies for basic commodities have drained the government treasury and promoted corruption.

Seeking to revive farm production, for example, the government sells gasoline to farmers at a bargain rate of 330 Zimbabwe dollars per liter — and farmers promptly resell it on the black market for 10 times that, leaving their fields idle.

Mr. Mugabe, who blames a Western plot against him for Zimbabwe's problems, has rejected all calls for economic reform. The government refuses to devalue Zimbabwe's dollar, which fetches only 5 to 10 percent of its official value on the thriving black market. As a result, foreign exchange to buy crucial imported goods like spare parts and fertilizer has effectively dried up.

Despite acceptable rains, one international aid official said, Zimbabwe's corn crop is currently lagging behind last year's — and that harvest was among the worst in history. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because the assessment had not been made public.

The central bank's latest response to these problems, announced this week, was to declare inflation illegal. From March 1 to June 30, anyone who raises prices or wages will be arrested and punished. Only a "firm social contract" to end corruption and restructure the economy will bring an end to the crisis, said the reserve bank governor, Gideon Gono.

The speech by Mr. Gono, a favorite of Mr. Mugabe, was broadcast nationally. In downtown Harare, the last half was blacked out by a power failure.

Eighty-two years old, wily and physically robust, Mr. Mugabe has survived both international condemnation and domestic upheaval before.

Efforts to suppress dissent are rising: in recent weeks, trade union officials were seriously injured in police beatings, arsonists burned the home of a leading pro-democracy activist and church leaders were arrested while meeting to discuss the economic crisis. Foreign journalists remain barred from the country under threat of imprisonment, and harassment of Zimbabwean journalists has sharply increased.

But hyperinflation is eroding the government's control over every aspect of public life and, by extension, over its own future.

"It's out of control now, and they have to bring it back in control," said John Robertson, a Harare-based economist and a frequent critic of government policies. "We're reaching the steepest slopes of the process. They say they can fix prices, but the things that cause price increases come from so many different directions that the government can't control them all."

That growing loss of control is apparent. The black market, which already flourishes beyond the reach of tax collectors and regulators, is likely to grab an even larger share of the economy when the government freezes prices in March, because stores will be unable to make a profit selling products at government-fixed prices.

Problems with water and power supplies have become acute because of a lack of foreign exchange and salaries for workers; a wave of blackouts hit the nation early last month when 100 electrical workers walked out to protest low pay.

Zimbabwe's political opposition has failed for years to mount an effective work stoppage to protest living conditions. But public workers, the bedrock of government support, this year have begun to walk off the job because there is no longer enough money to pay them a living wage.

The average teacher, for example, earns barely one-fourth of the salary needed to keep a family of six out of poverty. The military, unhappy with January's 300 percent pay hike, is seeking 1,000 percent.

The growing number of strikes also has emboldened the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions, a center of opposition to Mr. Mugabe, to make its own plans for a general work stoppage.

"People in Zimbabwe tend to be resilient," said Jamal Jafari, an analyst for the Washington-based International Crisis Group, which monitors political risks worldwide. "But that having been said, what has to be the scariest statistic for the government is the fact that large sectors of the civil service and the military are far below the poverty line. They simply can't raise salaries fast enough."

Mr. Jafari and some political and economic analysts in southern Africa say they now believe that Zimbabwe faces a political showdown within months, as the governing bodies of ZANU-PF wrangle over whether to grant Mr. Mugabe an extended term or to put less radical members of the ruling party in power.

Few expect a democratic revolution; the one rival party, the Movement for Democratic Change, is riven by splits, systematically suppressed by the government and without an effective leader. Regardless, these experts say, by failing to arrest this accelerating decline, Zimbabwe is edging toward a day of political reckoning that years of diplomatic jawboning and political jockeying have failed to produce.

DOJ_NMG_0128947

For the government, “the big problem about Zimbabwe is that the one thing you can’t rig is the economy,” said one Harare political analyst, who refused to be identified for fear of being persecuted. “When it fails, it fails. And that can have unpredictable effects.”

From Bird To Person (WSJ)

By Peter D. Zimmerman

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

LONDON -- The "deadly" H5N1 avian flu is back on the front pages of newspapers and TV news shows. The British environment minister has pledged quick action to "eradicate" the disease from the U.K., and over 150,000 turkeys on one farm have been culled. "This is," someone said on the BBC's "Breakfast" show Monday, "a disease of birds, not humans." And so it is.

The H5N1 virus has still not made the critical interspecies leap which would make it easy for an infected person to give the disease to another person. That may happen, or it may not; and nobody can predict the outcome or its timing with any degree of confidence. Meanwhile, as of the World Health Organization's compilation on Feb. 3, there had been a total of 271 laboratory-confirmed cases of the virus in humans, and of that number a staggering 165, or 61%, died, making it one of the most lethal pathogens in history, even if not one of the most infectious.

Still, just 18 months ago many experts were predicting a global pandemic in a matter of months, perhaps one that would kill millions. There is historical precedent: The 1918-1919 "Spanish Flu" swept around the world in a matter of weeks, and before the disease burned out, more than 50 million people had died. Today H5N1 is reminiscent only of the Asian "Swine flu," which threatened the U.S. in 1976 but never turned into a serious threat to human life (although the media hype surrounding it helped undermine Gerald Ford's presidency). In 2004, worried people rapidly bought up much of the world's supply of Tamiflu and Relenza, the only two drugs that seemed to have a chance of beating H5N1. Now most of us have forgotten the names of these drugs.

Influenza viruses have eight genes and these mutate rapidly. Two sites on the viral genome, called H and N, are well catalogued, and each of those genes can come in many forms. Those are the markers that trigger the human immune system. If your body has seen a whiff of a particular virus, it will produce large numbers of antibodies if you later become infected with a strain having the same markers. If you have never been exposed to a particular strain, there are no antibodies in your bloodstream, and your body will fight an uphill battle for survival. The more virulent the virus, the less chance you have.

So far as is known, no H5N1 virus has ever circulated on the planet. That means nobody has any natural immunity. Our good fortune last flu season was that the bird flu virus had not yet learned the trick of passing easily from human to human. The few confirmed victims were almost all people who'd worked very closely with infected fowl in extremely unsanitary conditions. One can suppose that they were massively exposed, allowing this "disease of birds, not humans" to develop in their bodies.

Almost all influenza viruses originate in migrating water fowl in South-East Asia, and by and large the birds don't get sick. However, those birds can pass their viruses to domesticated birds. In the great viral mixing pot of China, where people live in close contact with both their birds and their pigs, influenza viruses can readily pass from one species to another, and sometimes to an animal or person already infected with another flu bug.

In this environment, mutations are guaranteed to occur, and from time to time a new pathogen with the ability to pass between people develops. If it carries the same marker combination as one or another previous flu virus, much of the world's population will have a basic immunity. If it does not have familiar markers, much of humanity is at risk once that virus learns to jump from person to person. Each year a panel of experts tries to guess which strains of flu will pose the highest risk in the coming influenza season, and orders up vaccines to give the vulnerable some protection. H5N1 has not been selected, because it still hasn't become contagious in our species. But it could make the jump at any time.

The last year has brought the world a major advantage, should H5N1 become a "disease of humans." The pharmaceutical industry has learned the difficult trick of making and producing a vaccine against a hitherto unknown disease. GlaxoSmithKline recently claimed that it had succeeded in developing a "second generation" bird flu vaccine that could be given in advance, even before knowing the detailed gene structure that would allow this bird flu to infect people. The vaccine could be given before the bug even learns that deadly trick. Other companies have also developed vaccines which appear to produce broad-spectrum antibodies against many strains of the virus, and many governments have ordered large stocks from various producers.

DOJ_NMG_0128948

It is probably worth stockpiling many millions of doses before H5N1 escapes into the human population. Because none of us has any useful immunity, the virus could migrate around the world with the speed of commercial air travel, not the steamships that powered the Spanish Flu. If H5N1 escapes, and if it becomes as virulent as the Spanish Flu (which killed 1% of those who developed the disease), the pessimistic predictions of millions of people dead within months could come true. Only if vaccine bottles were already on the shelf, ready for instant use, could the virus be contained.

However, deadly as it could be, and as harmless as it has so far been, the H5N1 avian flu will not be the last new influenza virus to develop. The process that produced H5N1 is at work every year, and the more intense the agribusiness of raising chickens in China becomes, the more rapidly new viruses can spread and mutate. Even if we may have dodged the H5N1 bullet, another pandemic like the Spanish Flu is inevitable and could break out into the human population so quickly that vaccines cannot be produced in time.

New types of influenza virus must be detected and combated while they are still diseases of birds, not humans. Detection of new viruses will happen where they originate. A global pathogen surveillance system -- as Sen. Joseph Biden suggested almost five years ago -- is necessary because the global first line of defense against influenza is not the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, but the public health agencies of China, Vietnam and other nations in that region. Those agencies need multilateral support and encouragement, and the United States must take the lead. And countries where flu viruses originate need the courage to recognize that reporting a new disease does not reveal weakness, but rather demonstrates the strength of their health systems.

Mr. Zimmerman is professor of science and security at King's College London. He was chief scientist of the U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee staff and science adviser for arms control at the U.S. State Department.

DOJ_NMG_0128949

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

U.S. Declines To Join Accord On Secret Detentions (WP) 4
Feds Want PUC To Put Off Contempt Hearing For Verizon (AP). 5
White House Ceding Legal Ground In Detainee Battle? (ABC) 5
Detained Saudis Described As Democracy Activists (WP) 6

Homeland Response:

GAO Criticizes Homeland Security Lawyers (AP) 7
Thwarted DHS Probes Alleged (WP/AP)..... 8
Incoming Intelligence Chief Plans To Ease Hiring Of Arab Americans (WP)..... 8
New FEMA Emerges From The Wreckage Of Past Disasters (column) (WP)..... 9

War News:

House Democrats May Take Lead On War Resolution Front (LAT) 10
Senate GOP Tries To Shift Message (RC)..... 11
House Democrats Eye Iraq Resolution (WT) 11
House Now The Focus Of Iraq Debate (USAT) 12
Many Voices, No Debate, As Senate Is Stifled On War (NYT) ... 13
Vote Is Sought On Iraq Funding (WSJ) 14
MoveOn Already Attacking Senators Blocking Debate On Surge (POL) 15
It's The War, Senators (NYT)..... 15
Senate Dems To Try Again On The 'surge' (HILL)..... 16
Cloture Vote Does Not Split Warner Group (HILL)..... 17
Yes, We Can Find The Exit (NYT)..... 18
Expect The Worst In Iraq (WP)..... 19
House On Deck In Iraq Debate (RC)..... 19
Senate Leaders Continue Squabbling Over Iraq (WP)..... 21
General Is Front Man For Bush's Iraq Plan (WP)..... 22
Democrats Press Bush To Change Iraq Plan (AP) 23
Surge Is Not 'Last Chance' For Success, Gates Says (LAT) 24
Military Wants More Civilians To Help In Iraq (NYT) 25
French PM Attacks Iraq Troop 'surge' (FT) 26
The Nitty-Gritty About This Particulate Of Speech (WP) 27
House Panel Questions Monitoring Of Cash Shipped To Iraq (NYT) 28
Rusty Democrats Unable To Pin Anything On Bremer (WP) 29
Bremer Admits Errors In Occupying Iraq (USAT)..... 30
Unspent Iraqi Funds Undercut Bush's Push For More (WSJ)..... 30
Billions Given Away In Baghdad Free-for-all (FT) 31
Democrats, Bremer Spar Over Iraq Spending (WP) 32
Waxman Raps Ex-Iraq Chief Over Aid Funds (AP)..... 33
Bremer Defends Spending In Iraq (MCT)..... 34
Waxman Hits 'Waste, Abuse' Of Iraq Funds (WT) 35
U.S. To Pay $5.8B To Expand Iraqi Forces (AP) 36
Iran Accuses US Of Role In Iraqi Kidnap (FT)..... 36
Iran Alleges U.S. Role In Kidnap Of Embassy Official In Baghdad (WP) 37
U.S. Orchestrated Seizure Of Baghdad Envoy, Iran Alleges (LAT) 37
Blair Urges Iran To Change Its Ways (AP)..... 39
Merkel Says Talks With Iran Still Possible (AFP) 39
Israel Sounds Alarm On Iran's Nuclear Efforts (LAT)..... 39
Iran's Economic Conditions Deteriorate (USAT) 41
Challenging The Mullahs, One Signature At A Time (NYT) 43
Iraqi Premier Admits Errors In Introducing Security Plan In Baghdad (NYT)..... 43
Kuwait Court Convicts Iraqi Lawmaker In 1983 Bombings That Killed 5 Americans (NYT) 45
Terror Takes Toll On Market, Vendors (WT)..... 46
U.S. Mulls Iraq Refugees (WT)..... 47
Refugees Are An Overlooked Casualty Of Iraq War (USAT)..... 48
Tape Recounts U.S. Attack That Killed British Soldier (NYT) 49
'I Think They're Rocket Launchers' (WP)..... 49
Abu Ghraib Trial Date Set (WT/AP)..... 50
Afghan Forces Capture Suspected Al-Qaida (WP/AP) 51
Taliban Still Controls South Afghan Town (AP)..... 51
Gates Bracing For More Afghan Violence (AP)..... 52
GOP Lawmakers Press Bush On Afghanistan (LAT)..... 53
Official Hits U.S. For Afghan Missive (WT)..... 54
Problems Stall Pentagon's New Fighting Vehicle (WP)..... 54
Nuclear Officials Seek Approval For Warhead (WP)..... 56

DOJ:

Prosecutor Fired So Ex-Rove Aide Could Get His Job (USAT) .. 57
A U.S. Attorney Was Removed Without Cause, Official Says (NYT) 58
Deputy Attorney General Defends Prosecutor Firings (WP)..... 59
Justice Lawyer Explains Attorney Firings (AP)..... 60
Justice Official Defends Prosecutors' Firings (LAT) 60
Official Denies Prosecutors Were Ousted For Political Reasons (MCT)..... 61
Senate Given No Reason For Prosecutor Firings (CHIT) 62

Lawmakers' Letters Led To Lam's Ouster (SDUT)..... 63
White House Denies Prosecutors Were Sacked In Retaliation (FT) 64
Senators Press Officials On U.S. Attorney Firings (RC)..... 64
Judiciary Panel Questions Removal Of Arkansas U.S. Attorney (MCA)..... 66
Deputy AG Acknowledges Cummins Was Forced Out (NAMN). 66
Congress Probes Departures Of U.S. Attorneys (USNEWS) 68
Playing Politics With Justice (NYT)..... 68
Bush Replaces U.S. Attorneys In Power Play (BSUN) 69

Corporate Scandals:

3 Acquitted In Lengthy AOL Trial (WP)..... 70
Defendants Acquitted In AOL-PurchasePro Trial (FINDLAW/AP)70
Oil Drilling Companies To Pay Record Settlement In Bribery Case (AP) 71
Firms To Pay $26 Million In Nigeria Bribery Case (HC) 71
Allied Records Are Subpoenaed In 'Pretexting' Case (NYT)..... 72
Allied Capital Says Its 'Agent' Got Phone Data (WP) 73
Corporate Guidelines On Pretexting Slow To Develop (NLJ)..... 74
Engineered Support Ex-Excutives Accused (AP)..... 75
SEC Alleges Fraud At DRS Unit (WSJ)..... 76
Nacchio Seeks Trial Delay (AP)..... 77
SEC Boosts Probe For Wall Street Leaks (WSJ)..... 77
S.E.C. Is Looking At Stock Trading (NYT)..... 78
SEC Pores Over Trading Data To See If Hedge Funds Are Being Tipped Off (USAT)..... 80
The Class-Action Market (WSJ) 80

Criminal Law:

NBC Reporter To Testify At CIA Leak Case (NSDY/AP) 82
Court Hears Libby Describe Cheney As 'Upset' At Critic (WP) ... 82
Libby Testimony Details Plot To Discredit Critic (LAT) 83
Libby Speaks On Tape, But May Not In Court (NYT)..... 84
Libby Says He Thought Bush Authorized Unmasking Plame (CNN)..... 86
Powerful Pa. Senator Indicted (NSDY/AP)..... 87
The Case Against Fumo (PHI)..... 87
Indictment Is In The Details (PHI) 90
A FEDERAL CASE (PHI)..... 91
Editorial | Fumo Charged (PHI)..... 93
INDICTED: THE CURRENT CULTURE IN HARRISBURG (PHI)93
Loudoun Land Deals Subject Of U.S. Probe (WP)..... 94
More Indictments From Operation Big Coon Dog Investigation (TRI)..... 95
FBI: 19 Bonano Crime Family Members Busted (WABC)..... 96
Alleged Bonanno Crime Family Under Boss Busted (WNBC) 96
Feds: Top Bonanno Mobsters Busted (NSDY)..... 97
City Briefs (NYDN) 98
BONFIRE OF THE BONANNOS BUSTS 19 (NYPOST)..... 98
Fighting Crime Tops GOP Priorities (WT) 98
GOP Revives ISP-tracking Legislation (CNET)..... 99
Three Plead Guilty To Fraud In Katrina Debris Removal (BSH) 100
U.S. Wants US$309 Million In Katrina Hurricane Aid Returned (FINDLAW/AP) 101
Former Manager Gets 1 1/2 Years For Theft (MIDP)..... 102
Trio Convicted In Bank Robbery Scheme (FWST)..... 103
Government Wants Former Coke Secretary Jailed (AP) 103
Water Deal Exposes Secret Iraq Contracts (AP)..... 103
Wider Death Penalty Sought (USAT) 105
6 City Police Officers Suspended (BSUN)..... 106

Civil Law:

Relatives Sue FBI, Say Club Sting Was Bungled (BERGREC) 106
FBI Sued By Relatives Of Victims In Club Shooting (MH)..... 107
Radio Star's Fatal Air Crash Blamed On Radar Lack (CHIT).... 107
AmeriDebt Founder Accused Of Hiding Funds Meant For Debtors (FINDLAW/AP)..... 108
Two Hospitals Allege RICO Violations By UnitedHealth (AP) ... 109
All Parties In Jet-noise Lawsuits Sent To Mediation (VAPILOT)110

Civil Rights:

Review Lays Out Lags In State Hospital Improvements (AP) ... 110
New Task Force Formed To Fight Human Trafficking (KLAS).. 111
Fellow Inmates Beat An Imprisoned Border Patrol Agent (MCT)112
Former Border Agent Assaulted In Prison (WT)..... 113
Former Border Patrol Agent Convicted Of Shooting Drug Smuggler Beaten By Fellow Prison Inmates, Authorities Say (FINDLAW/AP) 113
Ex-Border Patrol Agent In Prison For Shooting Mexican Drug Runner Assaulted By Inmates (FOX) 114
Appeals Court Sends Wal-Mart Women Bias Case To Trial (FINDLAW/AP) 115
Wal-Mart Loses Bid To Block Group Bias Suit (WP)..... 116
Wal-Mart Faces Sex Bias Lawsuit (FT) 117
Final Teen Gets Probation In Long Beach Hate Crime (LAT) ... 118
Dallas Has 3 Months To Fix Jail (DMN)..... 118
More Than Words (WP) 119

Antitrust:

Deal Raises Concerns About Antitrust Issues (SLPD)..... 120
Senate Panel Probes Gas Trades For Possible Market Manipulation (WSJ) 121
Samsung To Pay $90 Million To Settle 41 State Claims (Update3) (BLOOM) 121
Samsung Settles Price-fixing Suit For $90m (FT) 122
Samsung To Pay $90 Million To Settle Price-fixing Lawsuit (AP)122
Bush Talks About Fiscal Responsibility At Company Accused Of Price-fixing (AP) 123
Apple Calls To End Online Copy Protection (FT) 123
Jobs Pitches Dumping Anti-piracy Software (LAT)..... 124
Jobs's New Tune Raises Pressure On Music Firms (WSJ) 124
Jobs Wants Fewer Download Limits (USAT) 126
Jobs Calls For End To Music Copy Protection (NYT) 127
Jobs Calls For Open Music Sales (WP) 128
In Equity Office Battle, A Matter Of Scale (WSJ)..... 129
Shareholder Vote Today Could Settle Fight For Office REIT (NYT) 130
Advertisement TODAY'S MOST POPULAR 1. Beijing Gets Rid Of Bad Translations 2. A Shoelace Obsession Goes Online 3. Kodak's Printer Strategy: Cheaper Cartridges 4.

Should Bond Investors Watch The Thin Ice? 5. Steve Jobs Raises Pressure On Music Firms MORE C (WSJ) 131
Midwest Flies In The Face Of Takeover Effort (USAT) 131

Environment/Indian Affairs:

US Farmworkers, Environmental Groups Reopen Lawsuit To Quicken Pace Of Pesticide Ban (FINDLAW/AP)..... 133
Gore Says Bush Administration Paying Scientists To Dispute Global Warming (CNN)..... 133
China Says Rich Countries Should Take Lead On Global Warming (NYT)..... 133
Legacy Of Radiation Illness Stirs Objection To Nevada Bomb Test (WP)..... 134
Democrats Rip EPA Chief Over Reforms (AP)..... 136
Senator Grills EPA Chief Over `environmental Rollbacks' (MCT)136
Mining Heat From The Earth? New Technology Shows Promise. (CSM)..... 137
Tax Break With A View (WSJ) 138
House Committee Approves Bill To Combat Indian Meth Use (AP) 140

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Combating Threat Of Cross-border Gangs Discussed (LAT).... 140
Central America's Top Cops In LA For International Gang Summit (MERCN)..... 141
L.A. Exports Gang Terror (LADN)..... 142
21 In Dorchester, Quincy Arrested (BOS) 143
Newton Man Faces Federal Drug Charges (DNT) 144
Former Drug Boss Sent To Prison For Life For Cocaine Ring (DDN)..... 144
Prosecutors Tie Kiel Problems To Gambling (SDUT) 145
3 Plead Guilty In Drug Ring (CP) 145
North Dakota Issues First Hemp Production Licenses To 2 Farmers (AP) 146
Hemp Farming Licensees Have Different Plans (AP) 146
GOP Lawmakers Press Bush On Afghanistan (LAT)..... 147
Venezuela: Nation Doesn't Need U.S. Aid (AP) 148
Troubled U.S. Presence On Ecuador Coast (AP) 149
Ecuador Assails US Antidrug Funding Cuts (FT) 150

Immigration:

Border States' Burden (LAT)..... 150
Next Stop: Underground (WP)..... 151

Tax:

Tax Preparer Barred From Preparing Federal Returns For Others (AP) 152
Deadline Nears For 2006 Health-Care Accounts (WSJ) 152

Congress-Administration:

Cabinet Members Go To Congress To Push The Budget (NYT)153
President Bush Asks Lawmakers To Resist Raising Taxes (NYS/BL)..... 154
Micron Plant Provides Backdrop For Bush (WP)..... 155
Bush Visits Micron's Manassas Plant (PBJ) 155
Bush Touts Fiscal Responsibilityin Speech At Micron Plant In Virginia (AP)..... 156
Budget Talk Venue Carries Baggage (LAT) 156
Paulson: Growth Can Spur Balanced Budget (AP) 157
Hill Democrats Critical Of Bush's Budget Plan (WP) 158
Gleams Of Hope For '08 Budget Deal (CSM)..... 159
Analysis: Budget Deal Seems Unlikely (NSDY/AP) 160
Bush Tax Cuts' Fate Hangs In Balance (WT)..... 161
Still Against Taxes, Bush Embraces User Fees (MCT)..... 162
Bush's Stealth Tax Increase (WP) 163
Dems May Override Bush On Kid Insurance (AP) 163
Funding Fears To Halt Some Cancer Trials (WSJ) 164
Can Bush Reach Ethanol Goal With Proposed Spending Plan? (WSJ) 165
Sweetheart Deal For Airlines (USAT) 166
Rangel Open To Tax Cuts In Wage Measure (AP) 166
Labor Pushes Dems To Deny Bush Extension Of Authority (HILL) 167
Senate GOP Threatens Filibuster Over Budget (RC)..... 168
Democrats Set To Unveil Agenda (RC)..... 169
Members Earmarking Without Earmarks (RC) 170
Pelosi's Push For Jet Remains Up In Air (WT)..... 171
Department Of Peace Bill Off To A Rocky Start — Again (HILL)172
White House Wreath Placed In Honor Of Ronald Reagan's Birthday (LAT/AP)..... 173
The Biggest Secret In Health Care (WSJ) 174
Beyond Health-Care Band-Aids (WP) 175
Hollywood Takes Its Concerns About Piracy And Taxes To Washington (NYT) 176
Mystery Solved (RC) 177
Government Inside Out (NYT) 178

Other News:

Fed Chief Warns Of Widening Inequality (WSJ) 179
Bernanke Suggests Job Skills To Combat Inequality (WT)..... 180
Bernanke: Fixing Income Gap Will Take Education (USAT)..... 180
Markets Quiet While Awaiting Cisco News (USAT)..... 181
DJIA Edges Up To 12666.31, 7.37 Points Shy Of Record (WSJ)182
GOP Views Clinton As Virtually Unbeatable (POL)..... 182
Iraq War And History Favor The Democrats (POL)..... 185
Poll Favors Giuliani In New Hampshire (AP) 186
Clinton Lifts Fund-Raising Stakes (WSJ)..... 187
Clinton Fundraising Goes Full Force (WP) 188
Clinton Helped With $15M (HILL) 189
White House Bid? Giuliani Is Still Undeclared (NYT) 190
Hillary And Rudy Could Wrap It Up This Year (HILL)..... 191
Catholics Slam Bloggers Hired By Edwards (AP) 193
Edwards's Bloggers Cross The Line, Critic Says (NYT)..... 193
Romney To Announce Presidential Bid (AP)..... 194
Mike Huckabee: Can He Fell The Big Guys In '08? (CSM)..... 194
In Campaign 2008, Candidates Starting Earlier, Spending More (WP)..... 195
Who's Hitting The Right Notes? (WP)..... 197
Ready For Obama Already (NYT) 197
Right Candidates, Wrong Question (NYT)..... 198
This One's For You, Joe (NYT)..... 199
Texas Governor Has Funding Idea: Sell The Lottery (WP/AP). 200

DOJ_NMG_0128952

On A Wintry Night, The Press And The Politicians Get Cozy (WP) ... 200
Subprime Politics (WSJ) ... 201
Choice Advances (WSJ) ... 202
Budget Sets High Foreign Policy Targets (FT) ... 203
Lebanon Leader Puts Onus On U.S. (LAT) ... 204
Rice Sees Summits With Israeli, Palestinian Leaders (AFP) ... 205
Palestinian Aid Policies 'backfiring' (FT) ... 206
Fatah And Hamas Leaders Meet Saudi King For Peace Talks (NYT) ... 207
Palestinians Try To Stave Off Civil War (AP) ... 208
Saudis Offer Counterweight To Resurgent Iran (FT) ... 209
Saudi Arabia's Diplomacy (WP) ... 210
U.S. To Create A Single Command For Military Operations In Africa (NYT) ... 210
US Signals Scope For Ties With N Korea (FT) ... 211
U.S. Expects Intense N.Korea Nuke Talks (AP) ... 211
Northern Exposure (WSJ) ... 212
Bush Approves Plan To Pressure Sudan (WP) ... 213
Suicide Bomber Dies At Airport In Pakistan (NYT) ... 214
Russia Tycoon May Talk To Police On Poisoning (NYT) ... 214
Russian Justice (WSJ) ... 215
Blair Wins Cash-for-honours Reprieve (FT) ... 216
British Prosecutors Clear Blair Ally In 'Cash-for-Honors' Probe (WP) ... 216
As Inflation Soars, Zimbabwe Economy Plunges (NYT) ... 217
From Bird To Person (WSJ) ... 219

TERRORISM NEWS:

U.S. Declines To Join Accord On Secret Detentions (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

PARIS, Feb. 6 -- Representatives from 57 countries on Tuesday signed a long-negotiated treaty prohibiting governments from holding people in secret detention. The United States declined to endorse the document, saying its text did not meet U.S. expectations.

Louise Arbour, the U.N. high commissioner for human rights, said the treaty was "a message to all modern-day authorities committed to the fight against terrorism" that some practices are "not acceptable."

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack declined to comment, except to say that the United States helped draft the treaty but that the final wording "did not meet our expectations."

The Associated Press reported that McCormack declined to comment on whether the U.S. stance was influenced by the Bush administration's policy of sending terrorism suspects to CIA-run prisons overseas, which President Bush acknowledged in September.

"Our American friends were naturally invited to this ceremony," French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy said after the signing here. "Unfortunately, they weren't able to join us. That won't prevent them from one day signing on in New York at U.N. headquarters, and I hope they will."

Some U.S. allies in Europe also declined to join, among them Britain, Germany, Spain and Italy.

The convention defines forced disappearance as the arrest, detention or kidnapping of a person by state agents or affiliates and subsequent denials about the detention or location of the individual.

The treaty, adopted by the U.N. General Assembly in December, has been pushed for nearly a quarter-century by rights groups and the families of individuals who have disappeared at the hands of various governments. It also addresses the international debate over the rights of terrorism suspects.

At a separate gathering, a non-binding accord banning the use of child soldiers was signed here Tuesday by representatives of 58 countries, including African nations that have been harshly criticized by the United Nations and human rights groups for arming children. The United States did not participate, saying that it objected to some of the wording of the documents but that it remained committed to its treaty obligations on the issue.

Douste-Blazy, the French foreign minister, described the agreement as having "a great political value" in pressuring national armies, paramilitaries and opposition forces to stop using children as combatants.

"What this conference has shown is that there is a great deal of political commitment to ending the unlawful recruitment of children," said Rima Salah, deputy executive director of UNICEF, the United Nations' advocacy agency for children, which co-sponsored the conference with the French government. "What needs to be done now is to harness this commitment and turn it into concrete action on the ground."

DOJ_NMG_0128953

U.N. and human rights groups estimate that as many as 300,000 children younger than 18 are used worldwide in armed conflicts as soldiers or servants for soldiers. They say girls in particular are often sexually abused and exploited by militaries and armed groups.

The accord calls for an immediate halt to recruitment of children, the release of those now serving in militaries or paramilitaries and the expansion of programs for reintegrating the youngsters into their communities and societies.

Among the countries signing the accord were Congo, Chad, Sudan and Uganda, all of which the United Nations has singled out on the abuse of children by armed factions and militaries. Burma and the Philippines, which the United Nations has also cited, did not take part in the conference or sign the agreement, UNICEF said.

The International Criminal Court in The Hague considers the use of children younger than 15 in armed conflicts a war crime and announced last week that Congolese warlord Thomas Lubanga Dyilo will be tried on charges of recruiting child soldiers as young as 10.

Feds Want PUC To Put Off Contempt Hearing For Verizon (AP)

AP, February 7, 2007

AUGUSTA, Maine — The Justice Department asked a judge Tuesday to bar the Maine Public Utilities Commission from proceeding with a contempt hearing for Verizon that stems from telephone customer complaints related to allegations about domestic surveillance by the National Security Agency.

A multi-customer complaint filed with the Maine PUC last May effectively seeks to force Verizon to say whether it provided telephone call records to the government without a warrant.

The PUC has challenged the adequacy of Verizon responses to date and set a hearing for Friday.

In a federal court filing Tuesday, the Justice Department said PUC officials had been put on notice months ago that the federal government believes the information being sought about an alleged involvement of Verizon with the NSA "cannot be disclosed."

The Justice Department requested a judicial order to keep the Maine PUC from moving forward until a court decides "what is clearly a federal question without the immediate threat of disclosure of the very information that is at issue in this case _ information that, if disclosed, might reveal or tend to reveal highly significant federal classified intelligence activities."

In addition to seeking to block PUC action, the Justice Department said the order it was requesting would bar Verizon from responding to PUC demands "because of the substantial risk of direct or inadvertent disclosure of information that would tend to confirm or deny the existence of foreign intelligence activities."

Justice Department lawyer Alexander Haas said he had no comment. Department spokesman Charles Miller confirmed that the request for a court order was aimed at Friday´s scheduled PUC hearing.

Assistant Maine Attorney General Chris Taub said the state planned to formally respond on Wednesday in advance of a Thursday hearing in U.S. District Court in Bangor before Judge John Woodcock.

"We´re going to oppose the motion and ask the court to permit the PUC hearing to take place as scheduled," Taub said.

Verizon spokesman Peter Reilly said the company had no comment.

Verizon, in answer to last May´s customer complaint, issued a response on May 19, 2006, in which it referred to points made in two press releases, including one that declared the company was not asked for records by the NSA and did not provide such records.

The PUC subsequently ordered Verizon, on Aug. 9, to affirm in writing that its representations to the commission were true.

On Aug. 21, the same day that the U.S. Justice Department originally filed suit against the PUC and Verizon asserting that the PUC was pre-empted by federal law from investigating the alleged spying program, Verizon said it would not submit an affirmation, citing legal action by the federal government.

Since then, the PUC has sought to have the federal suit dismissed and the complaint case has not moved forward.

Ten days ago on Jan. 29, the PUC voted 3-0 to hold a contempt hearing.

White House Ceding Legal Ground In Detainee Battle? (ABC)

By Justin Rood

ABC News, February 7, 2007

A line item buried in the president's budget reveals the Bush administration is gearing up for emboldened legal challenges from Gitmo detainees.

A brief paragraph in President Bush's 2008 budget request shows he plans to hire nearly two dozen new Justice Department lawyers to fight suits brought by Guantanamo detainees challenging their imprisonment.

DOJ_NMG_0128954

The boost is planned despite a new law that should prevent detainees' claims from ever reaching a U.S. court, suggesting the White House may believe that law will be quickly reversed.

The increase in lawyers "signals real concern on the administration's part," said Vincent Warren, president of the New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights, that the new law is unconstitutional and will be struck down. His organization represents over 200 Guantanamo detainees and has helped lawyers representing hundreds of others.

The controversial bill passed through Congress late last year at the urging of President Bush. The Military Commissions Act (MCA), as it's known, stripped Guantanamo detainees of their right to challenge their captivity. President Bush signed the measure into law, despite critics calling the measure unconstitutional.

Currently, just seven Justice Department attorneys defend the government against Gitmo detainees' suits. By removing the threat of such lawsuits, the MCA should theoretically reduce or even eliminate the need for those attorneys -- but instead the White House wants to add 23 lawyers starting this October and arm the group with a $5.5 million budget. This year, the office's budget was $2.3 million.

Click Here for Full Blotter Coverage.

Military legal expert Eugene Fidell agreed with Warren's analysis. The request "presupposes that Congress will overturn the MCA...or tweak it," or the act could be affected by a Supreme Court ruling, said Fidell, president of the National Institute of Military Justice. "Or both," he added.

But Justice Department spokesman Eric Ablin disagreed. "I don't think you can read into [the request] in any way whatsoever," he said. "I think it's reflective of the expense of those Guantanamo cases."

Even so, the government's growth strategy might not be the best move, Fidell cautioned. After all, "you can turn 50 lawyers loose on a legal issue and not necessarily be better off," he said.

Detained Saudis Described As Democracy Activists (WP)

By Faiza Saleh Ambah

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

JIDDAH, Saudi Arabia, Feb. 6 -- Saudi police have arrested 10 men and accused them of collecting donations to fund terrorist acts outside the kingdom, the Interior Ministry said. But a lawyer and a prominent dissident said that at least seven of the men were Saudi democracy activists whose arrest was a government attempt to abort their civic rights work.

Matrouk al-Faleh, who was jailed in 2004 for calling for more democracy in the kingdom, said the seven men, most of them lawyers and professors, had been waiting for government approval to set up a civic rights group. They also had planned to present authorities this week with a list of more than 40 prisoners without legal representation whom they intended to defend.

"The terrorist allegation is a coverup," Faleh said. "It was used against me as well when I was arrested. . . . This is an attempt to abort the civic rights work they were planning."

Police went to the Jiddah beach house of lawyer Essam Basrawi on Friday night and arrested him and five other Saudi men. Saudi businessman Abdul-Aziz al-Khereiji was arrested at a checkpoint as he drove to Jiddah with his wife, said Bassim Alim, an attorney who represents four of the detainees.

Basrawi's Moroccan personal assistant also was detained. There was no information on the identities of the two other men.

An Interior Ministry spokesman told local newspapers that the arrested men had been involved in financing recruiters who sign up young Saudis to go into "turbulent areas," which is generally a reference to Iraq. The spokesman said sizable amounts of cash had been found during searches of the men's homes.

Many young Saudi radicals have crossed the long and porous border between the kingdom and Iraq and joined up with Sunni Muslim insurgents there.

Alim said that the government's accusations were baseless and that his clients were well-known reformists with no connection to terrorism. He said they might have been raising funds for Palestinian or Iraqi refugees. The men had been warned repeatedly by the government not to gather or write petitions because authorities feared the rise of a new political reform movement, he said.

"They don't want any kind of organized reform movement; they're trying to stomp on any organized calls for reform," Alim said.

Alim said police had illegally searched the men's homes without warrants after midnight on Friday and seized files, books and computers. Neither Alim nor family members have been allowed to see the arrested men.

"If they are guilty of any crime, why aren't they allowed lawyers and charged publicly and shown proof or evidence?" Faleh said.

The arrests were the first to target democracy activists since reform-minded King Abdullah took the throne in 2005 and pardoned Faleh and two other leading activists who had spent 18 months in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0128955

A dozen other men arrested with them in March 2004 signed statements pledging to stop lobbying for political freedoms. But Faleh and the two others refused to sign and demanded legal representation and a public trial. Legal defense and public trials are allowed under Saudi law but rarely applied. Most defendants go to court without attorneys.

Saudi Arabia, an absolute monarchy, has a consultative council appointed by the government, and carried out limited municipal elections in 2005. Despite Abdullah's cautious steps toward reform, the kingdom continues to show little tolerance for political opposition. It imposes strict limits on freedom of expression and bans public gatherings and political parties.

One of men arrested Friday, Sulaiman al-Rushoodi, is a lawyer and former judge who had been among the group of activists detained in 2004. He was released several weeks later after pledging to address his demands solely to authorities, and he joined the defense team of the three activists then still behind bars.

Basrawi is a prominent activist who helped draft petitions addressed to the government during a vibrant period of political activism before the 2004 arrests.

The consultative Shura Council recently announced it was considering laws permitting the setting up of civic rights groups, which are currently not allowed in the kingdom. Saudi Arabia has two government-appointed human rights committees but bans independent human rights and civil rights organizations.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

GAO Criticizes Homeland Security Lawyers (AP)

By Beverley Lumpkin

The AP, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON- Government lawyers have hampered investigations into waste and fraud at the Homeland Security Department, officials told Congress on Tuesday.

The head of the Government Accountability Office, the nonpartisan investigative arm of the Congress, and the department's own inspector general said Homeland Security officials, particularly lawyers in the general counsel's office, had delayed probes and demanded inappropriate access to interviews with employees. There was no suggestion of criminality.

Homeland Security Department spokesman Russ Knocke denied the allegations, terming them inaccurate and unfair. He said there are many times that investigators from both offices have interviewed employees without attorneys present and that the general counsel's office is involved only when sensitive information is discussed.

Both investigators told a House subcommittee that numerous inquiries into waste, abuse or management problems had been delayed.

"They're not very responsive. They don't give information quickly," said David Walker, head of the GAO.

"Every document we seek to review has to be reviewed (first) by the general counsel's office," Walker added. He said the department's general counsel wants to "sit in on every interview," which he deemed inappropriate.

Walker said when there are more lawyers than other staff involved, "you've got problems."

"I agree wholeheartedly," said Inspector General Richard Skinner. "It's not a denial of information, but it's very cumbersome to obtain information."

Skinner also said that having a supervisor or attorney present when his office interviews an employee "sets a chilling effect" and tells the employee he's presumed not to be a team player.

Until his resignation last month, the general counsel was Phil Perry, son-in-law of Vice President Dick Cheney.

Walker and Skinner told the House subcommittee that "the tone is set from the top" and that Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff himself needs to address the situation.

"You can be assured that we're hearing you loud and clear," replied the panel's chairman, Rep. David Price, D-N.C. Chertoff is due on Thursday to make his first appearance before the subcommittee since Democrats took control of Congress.

Skinner also complained that he had asked department leaders to send a message to all employees explaining what his office does, and how to contact it. He said the draft letter had been "sitting in the general counsel's office" since last summer.

Knocke said the inspector general has an informative and detailed page on the department's intranet Web page that is available to all employees. Knocke said that is the usual mechanism for communicating with nearly 200,000 employees scattered around the world.

However, Knocke acknowledged that a recent "all hands" message was sent as a letter to all employees by Deputy Secretary Michael Jackson. The Associated Press reported last week that a survey found Homeland Security employees ranking last in job satisfaction of 36 federal agencies. Jackson wrote it was a "clear and jolting message" that department leadership was taking seriously.

DOJ_NMG_0128956

That survey also came up at Tuesday's hearing, with Rep. Jose Serrano, D-N.Y., questioning the two watchdogs on whether such bad morale could have an impact on national security.

Skinner said some morale problems stem from combining 22 disparate agencies when the department was created in 2003. For example, the new agencies born from the old Customs and Immigration agencies have suffered from "very, very severe competition, jealousies, cultural differences, inability to get along with one another, inability or refusal to share information."

The panel also explored management failings recently revealed about two enormous long-term contracts the department has put in the hands of private companies.

The Coast Guard's Deepwater program was severely criticized by Skinner last month. The $24 billion, 25-year program to modernize the agency's fleet is being run by a joint venture of two defense contractors, Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman.

Skinner said he had recently spoken with Coast Guard Commandant Thad Allen, who Skinner said has taken the critique seriously and has reorganized his staff, named a new assistant commandant to oversee the program and rewrite the contract. Skinner quoted Allen as saying he would "put the Coast Guard back in the driver's seat."

There has also been criticism of the new border security program, the Secure Border Initiative, that Skinner has estimated could end up costing between $8 billion and $25 billion.

Walker noted that department officials had learned from their Deepwater problems and are moving more cautiously on the program, which covers both physical fencing and beefing up cameras, sensors and other technology on the border, and have been allocating funds for only small portions at a time.

Thwarted DHS Probes Alleged (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Government lawyers have hampered investigations into suspected waste and fraud at the Department of Homeland Security, officials told a House subcommittee yesterday.

The head of the Government Accountability Office, the nonpartisan investigative arm of Congress, and the department's own inspector general said that Homeland Security officials, particularly lawyers in the general counsel's office, had delayed inquiries and demanded inappropriate access to interviews with employees. There was no suggestion of criminality.

DHS spokesman Russ Knocke denied the allegations, calling them inaccurate and unfair. He said that investigators from both offices have interviewed employees many times without attorneys present and that the general counsel's office is involved only when sensitive information is discussed.

Numerous inquiries into suspected waste, abuse and management problems had been delayed, the investigators said.

Incoming Intelligence Chief Plans To Ease Hiring Of Arab Americans (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

The incoming director of national intelligence, retired Navy Vice Adm. John M. McConnell, plans to change security rules to make it easier for intelligence agencies to hire first-generation Arab Americans for highly sensitive jobs.

These rules, dating from World War II, limit intelligence agencies' ability to employ first-generation Americans "who might have native language capabilities from serving in some of these very sensitive positions in the intelligence community" and hinder efforts to deal with radical Islam, McConnell said during his confirmation hearing Friday before the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence.

The rules McConnell described are in a directive from the director of central intelligence, or DCI. They require citizenship verification for access to the most highly classified data, known as sensitive compartmented information. For the foreign-born, there must be verification of U.S. citizenship and legal status in this country of immediate family members, including "spouse, cohabitant, father, mother, sons, daughters, brothers, sisters," the directive states.

Another element that must be considered when hiring is "foreign influence," according to adjudication guidelines that the White House adopted in December 2005. One section of the guidelines refers to "contact with a foreign family member, business or professional associate, friend, or other person who is a citizen of or resident in a foreign country if that contact creates a heightened risk of foreign exploitation, inducement, manipulation, pressure, or coercion."

An intelligence agency chief can waive these criteria, but McConnell said he wants to change them because they constitute "one of the areas that needs probably the greatest deal of attention and improvement . . . using people who speak the native language, understand the culture and the tribal conditions."

DOJ_NMG_0128957

A spokesman for the Office of the Director of National Intelligence said yesterday that he could not comment directly because McConnell has yet to be confirmed. But, as part of transforming the old DCI directives into the new "intelligence community directives," the spokesman said, "the issue of first-generation access will be addressed."

McConnell is not the first to raise the issue, though his proposal to alter the relevant security rules goes further than did his predecessor's. In his farewell address as national intelligence director on Jan. 19, John D. Negroponte talked about the need to "tap into the great diversity of ethnicities and talents our nation possesses" and "increase training and education in foreign language."

In April 2005, former CIA case officer Lindsay Moran raised concerns about language expertise and security on PBS's "The NewsHour with Jim Lehrer." No one in her initial training class, she said, "spoke any of the languages that the CIA needs to go after terrorist groups, such as Arabic, Pashtu or Urdu."

And, she added, "The agency has completely ignored a whole pool of potential employees of second-generation Americans . . . because there's this inherent distrust of foreigners within the agency, they're unwilling to hire these kinds of people -- exactly the kinds of people that we need in order to gather effective intelligence in the Middle East."

New FEMA Emerges From The Wreckage Of Past Disasters (column) (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

On paper, the coming year should be turnaround time for FEMA.

President Bush's fiscal 2008 budget restructures funding for the Federal Emergency Management Agency, giving the agency's head, R. David Paulison, his first opportunity to lay claim to money that can be used to restore FEMA's luster and professionalism.

Inside the agency, Paulison has urged his executives to look to the future and learn from what went wrong with the federal response to Hurricane Katrina, which devastated Gulf Coast states in 2005.

In public appearances, Paulison describes FEMA as a partner with states and localities when it comes to planning for and responding to natural disasters. He also makes the pitch that FEMA is on the rebound.

After touring storm-damaged central Florida on Saturday, Paulison assured state officials that tractor-trailers loaded with water, meals, tarps and generators were on their way. The promise of relief supplies came a day after storms devastated four counties, a sign of "the new FEMA," he said.

If money and staffing come together as Paulison hopes, the new FEMA will put an end to what the Government Accountability Office calls "considerable flux" and "near-constant organizational change" at FEMA since 2001.

Perhaps the biggest change came in 2003, when FEMA was folded into the new Homeland Security Department. From 2003 through 2005, programs and millions of dollars moved in and out of FEMA, disrupting operations and creating uncertainty, the GAO said in a report released last month.

FEMA also was forced to pay "a disproportionate amount" to help finance the start-up costs of the new department, leaving it with less money for its operating expenses, the GAO found.

After Katrina exposed leadership and management problems in FEMA, Congress conducted hearings and investigations that led to passage of the 2006 Post-Katrina Emergency Reform Act. The law transferred several offices within Homeland Security into FEMA, effective at the end of March.

The evolving FEMA "is very much the subject of attention in our budget," Michael Chertoff, secretary of homeland security, said Monday in discussing the administration's fiscal 2008 priorities.

The president will request $100 million for staffing, equipment, supplies and technology for the new FEMA initiative, Chertoff said. About $48 million will be used to convert FEMA's on-call response and recovery employees, who hold temporary positions, into full-time agency employees, Chertoff said.

That change would add about 1,000 employees to FEMA's full-time staff, which currently numbers about 2,200, agency spokesman Aaron T. Walker said. FEMA also will rely on about 3,240 employees who are paid from the disaster relief fund to work in recovery and relief efforts.

To help create the new FEMA, Paulison commissioned 18 studies aimed at strengthening the agency's business and support systems, such as personnel, finance, procurement and technology. The 18 assessments should be completed by April, and Walker said funding has been set aside to pay for any recommended changes in operations.

Finding the right people and getting them in the right jobs may be one of FEMA's biggest challenges. Investigations into Katrina suggested that FEMA lost too many senior managers during the merger into Homeland Security.

DOJ_NMG_0128958

The American Federation of Government Employees, which represents FEMA workers, has expressed concerns about turnover in the agency. Andrea E. Brooks, the union's vice president, said Paulison "is trying to do the right thing," but added that she puts little stock in the staffing promises, in part because a previous hiring initiative fell short of its goal.

Paulison has made some strides in hiring experienced hands. With one more hire, he will have filled FEMA's 10 regional offices with directors who have lengthy experience in emergency preparedness and disaster relief operations, the first time in years that the majority of those jobs have been filled by seasoned professionals, Walker said.

WAR NEWS:

House Democrats May Take Lead On War Resolution Front (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey And Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON — House Democrats threatened Tuesday to take up a resolution next week to oppose President Bush's controversial troop buildup in Iraq, cranking up the pressure on Republicans who have blocked a vote on the measure in the Senate.

The move would shift the focus of the debate over the four-year-old war to the House, where Democrats have enough votes to pass a measure over Republican opposition. It also may further isolate the White House and its allies in the Senate, who are bucking public opinion that has turned sharply against the Iraq war and the president's plans to expand it.

When congressional Democrats began their campaign to challenge Bush over the unpopular war last month, House leaders decided to defer to the Senate to pass a resolution first.

But on Monday GOP senators derailed consideration of a nonbinding, bipartisan resolution that criticizes the Bush plan by preventing Democrats from getting the 60 votes needed to bring up the measure.

On Tuesday, with few signs that the impasse would end soon in the Senate, House leaders said they might move first on an issue that Americans say is the most pressing one facing the nation.

"We said for a long period of time we would follow the Senate, but we believe it is important for us to make . . . our views known," House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md., said at his weekly briefing with reporters.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., has told her colleagues that a resolution against the president's call for 21,500 additional troops would be just the first of several legislative actions intended to pressure Bush into starting to withdraw American combat forces from Iraq.

Despite the mounting pressure, Senate Republicans continued to insist Tuesday that they simply want a fair debate on the floor of the Senate.

As they did Monday, they complained that they were not being allowed to bring up two alternatives to the resolution crafted by Sen. John Warner, R-Va., that "disagrees" with the president's plan to send more troops into Baghdad to control the sharply escalating sectarian violence.

One of the other resolutions -- sponsored by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., the leading cheerleader for a troop buildup -- backs the new strategy but also expresses the need for the Iraqi government to meet certain benchmarks to prove its commitment to help the American effort.

The other was offered by Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., and is a short resolution that opposes any limit on funds for American troops in the field.

But Senate Democrats hammered Republicans on Monday for ducking a formal debate on the war. And by Tuesday morning, some Republicans worried the public would misunderstand their stance.

"It's very unfortunate that we appear to be blocking," McCain complained. "I hope we can make the American people aware that we're just asking for votes on our amendment, which is the way the Senate works."

By Tuesday afternoon, Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., the minority leader, said he would no longer insist that McCain's measure come up for a vote. He offered no public explanation why Republicans had chosen to champion Gregg's resolution rather than McCain's.

Other GOP lawmakers remained defiant, casting themselves as the most loyal defenders of U.S. troops, a tactic they have employed in previous war debates. "We're not going to yield on this," Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, told reporters in the hallways outside the Senate chamber.

But the Democratic assault continued Tuesday as senators came to the floor to accuse the GOP of seeking to avoid a debate on the president's policy.

DOJ_NMG_0128959

"It is absolutely outrageous. It is immoral," said Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., as she held up a photo of an Iraqi schoolgirl stepping over blood on the stairs of her school after a mortar attack.

MoveOn.org, a leading grass-roots organization opposing the war, announced it is running television ads targeting some Republican lawmakers, accusing them of not having "the courage to face a vote."

Now, House Democrats are also poised to ratchet up the pressure. And House Republicans have started to attack the resolution. "A meaningless, nonbinding resolution from Democrats may score a couple political points here at home, but it will not score any points with our troops," said Kevin Smith, a spokesman for House Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio.

But without rules like those in the Senate that enable the minority to impede legislation, the House is a far less hospitable environment for the Republicans. Hoyer said Tuesday that Democrats would not allow any GOP amendments to the resolution criticizing the White House Iraq plan.

Senate GOP Tries To Shift Message (RC)

By John Stanton And Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, February 7, 2007

Senate Republican leaders struggled Tuesday to shift their focus away from complaints about parliamentary procedure and onto which party is best supporting the troops as Republicans and Democrats continued their high-stakes game of political chicken over the Iraq War.

Following their successful filibuster Monday of a resolution opposing President Bush's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq, Republicans found themselves on the losing end of the public relations fight as they woke up to headlines across the country pinning the blame squarely on them.

"It doesn't matter what's going on the floor. It's all about media," one senior GOP aide said Tuesday, warning that the focus on complaints about how Democrats are conducting the debate mandated by Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) and Minority Whip Trent Lott (R-Miss.) put the GOP on treacherous ground. "We really need to get away from this process stuff," this aide complained, warning that McConnell and Lott could begin to suffer significant defections by rank-and-file members.

Privately, Republican leadership sources acknowledged they failed to effectively spin the Iraq debate and suffered at the hands of this week's headlines. GOP Senators were scrambling Monday night into Tuesday to troubleshoot their message, which many feared had become mired in procedural detail and esoteric arguments over fairness.

"It wasn't good," acknowledged one Republican Senate staffer.

On Tuesday, several leading GOP Senators were trying to refocus the message to one of supporting the troops. They also argued that the flurry of nonbinding resolutions sends confusing messages to the enemy and to the troops in harm's way.

The Senate Republican Conference circulated talking points at their regular Tuesday policy luncheon asking GOP Senators to argue that the Senate should vote on Sen. Judd Gregg's (R-N.H.) resolution expressing support for troops and avoid complaints about process.

"We can win if we focus on Gregg," one GOP source said, arguing that the tried-and-true tactic of using patriotism against Democrats could splinter Majority Leader Harry Reid's (Nev.) Democratic Caucus.

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), the GOP Conference vice chairman, said despite a day of bad press, Republicans are not going "to get excited about headlines and a handful of papers that got it wrong." Cornyn argued that Republicans want to debate the troop surge, and will continue to debate it even as Reid and McConnell engage in a stare-down over how to proceed.

"[Democrats] may enjoy today's headlines and a handful of papers that got it wrong, but they're not going to be able to enjoy that forever," Cornyn said.

Despite those warnings, many Republicans appeared to have difficulty avoiding the process complaints — including McConnell himself. For instance, he and Reid engaged in a lengthy back-and-forth on the chamber floor Tuesday afternoon in which McConnell repeatedly complained that Reid was attempting to dictate to Republicans what resolution they were allowed to bring up even after he had narrowed the Republican list of demands from five to ultimately one — Gregg's troop-support resolution.

Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) also slipped back into arguments over process. While speaking with reporters following the GOP's closed-door luncheon, Stevens argued Republicans are "trying to protect the rights of the minority" and lashed out at Democrats for limiting the number of amendments or proposals Republicans can bring. "The amount of amendments we're going to have is really the issue here," he said.

House Democrats Eye Iraq Resolution (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, February 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0128960

House Democrats next week will take up the resolution condemning President Bush's plan to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq, House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer said yesterday, while the Senate continues negotiations over handling the nonbinding rebuke.

"The reason we're going ahead is not because we don't think the Senate will ever act, but we're not sure when the Senate is going to act," the Maryland Democrat told reporters yesterday.

"I think the resolution will clearly say we do not believe that the president's proposal of an escalation of 21,000 troops is the proper policy to be pursuing," Mr. Hoyer said, adding that the House resolution will also be nonbinding.

House Democrats initially said they would wait until the Senate approved such a measure, but Republicans in the upper chamber managed to block it this week. They have accused Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, of trying to limit the scope of the debate by not allowing two other resolutions expressing support for the war effort to be voted on in a similar fashion.

After the Senate resolution was blocked on a procedural motion Monday evening, Mr. Reid said he expects the resolution will come up again but did not elaborate.

In a letter to supporters yesterday, the Nevada Democrat accused Republicans of dodging a debate on Iraq.

"There are very few men and women in America who believe the Iraq war is not worthy of debate," he wrote. "They are the Republican members of the United States Senate. Yesterday, they did our country a grave disservice."

Republican leader Sen. Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, has said he won't allow a vote on the resolution of no confidence unless a similar vote is allowed on two other resolutions.

One would endorse the "surge" plan but set benchmarks for Iraqi self-governance. A third resolution would promise not to cut funding for the war.

Late yesterday, Mr. McConnell offered to allow the resolution to go forward in exchange for a vote on the "no funding cutoff" resolution only. Mr. Reid declined. Republicans say they want Democrats on the record either favoring or opposing cuts in funding, which many Democratic voters are demanding. But Mr. Reid does not appear likely to allow such a vote to occur.

Rather, he wants a vote on the resolution of condemnation and said last month that he expects it to be painful for Republicans who face re-election in 2008.

"I'll tell you one thing: There are 21 Republicans up for re-election this time," he told reporters on Jan. 26. "If they think this is going to be a soft vote for them, they've got another think coming. They have more than [Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles E.] Schumer to worry about."

Mr. Hoyer, meanwhile, said the resolution will be similarly limited in scope when it arrives on the floor next week.

"I expect this bill be debated for an extended period of time -- maybe over three days," he said, though amendments will not be allowed.

Also yesterday, Sen. John Kerry told reporters he is introducing legislation that would set a firm deadline for the withdrawal of most U.S. troops from Iraq.

The Massachusetts Democrat hopes to kick-start a major diplomatic initiative, enforcing a series of benchmarks for meeting key political objectives, shifting the military mission to training Iraqi security forces and counterterrorism operations, and maintaining an "over-the-horizon" presence to protect U.S. regional interests.

"The only people who believe there is a workable military solution for the conflict in Iraq is the Bush administration," Mr. Kerry said. "We must find a way to force the Iraqi politicians to make the tough compromises necessary to find a sustainable political solution."

House Now The Focus Of Iraq Debate (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON — The intense political maneuvering over how to signal congressional opposition to President Bush's war policy moved Tuesday to the House of Representatives, where Democratic leaders scheduled three days of debate for next week.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., declared "negotiations are over" in the Senate, where Republicans and Democrats failed on Monday to agree on the ground rules for debating competing resolutions on Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq.

Instead, House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md., said the House will spend three days next week debating a resolution expressing "disagreement" with the president's plans. "We do not believe the president's proposal is proper policy," Hoyer said.

The House's action will guarantee that the president's Iraq policy will remain at the top of the national agenda next week, even if procedural disputes prevent the Senate from voting on its own resolution.

DOJ_NMG_0128961

It also moves the Iraq debate into a chamber where House rules give the Democrats, as the majority party, control of the agenda. In the Senate, a handful of members can bring activity to a halt.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., reiterated that he would permit a vote on the measure opposing Bush's plan if Democrats set a 60-vote threshold for passage and also agree to a vote on a separate resolution, authored by Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., that says no funds will be cut for troops in the field. Reid balked because Gregg's resolution could pass overwhelmingly, but the measure opposing Bush could fall short of 60 votes.

"This is a trick play to distract attention from the real issue before the American people," Reid said.

McConnell, meanwhile, blamed Democrats for the impasse: "The only reason negotiations broke down is that they don't want to vote on the Gregg amendment."

The political implications of the Senate stalemate were evident Tuesday.

MoveOn.org, a well-funded liberal group, said it will run ads today through Friday nationally on CNN and locally in four target states: Kansas, New Hampshire, Oregon and Virginia. Republican senators in all of those states all have publicly expressed misgivings about the president's proposed troop increase but sided with McConnell in blocking a vote on the resolution of disapproval.

Although the Democrats will be able to continue the Iraq debate on their own terms in the House, some of the political impact may be lessened, said Norman Ornstein, a congressional scholar at the American Enterprise Institute.

Democratic leaders had hoped for a victory first in the Senate because the resolution being debated there was co-authored by Republican Sen. John Warner, a former Senate Armed Services Committee chairman and former secretary of the Navy.

The House will likely pass a resolution disapproving of the Bush policy with some Republican votes, Ornstein predicted, but he added: "I'm not sure it's the same things in symbolic terms as having the Senate adopt something with the name John Warner on it. Warner is an iconic figure because he has been a supporter of the president."

Hoyer said he hopes the House resolution will have bipartisan sponsorship, as the Senate measure did, when it comes to the floor Tuesday.

The three-day debate is unusual for the House, which generally can complete a bill in a day. The Democrats set the time frame to mirror the October 2002 deliberations that led to a vote to authorize the war, said House Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill.

Many Voices, No Debate, As Senate Is Stifled On War (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6 — At a time when even President Bush acknowledges that the war in Iraq is sapping the nation's spirit, the Senate has tied itself up in procedural knots rather than engage in a debate on Iraq policy.

Given the influence that voter frustration with Iraq had on the November elections, the national unease with the mounting human and financial costs, and the raw passion on all sides, even some lawmakers say they are astounded that the buildup to the Senate fight over Mr. Bush's proposed troop increase has produced such a letdown.

"It just floors me," said Senator Amy Klobuchar, a freshman Democrat from Minnesota who campaigned against the war, as the two parties pointed fingers on Tuesday. The day before, the Senate proved unable to agree on a plan to even begin debate on a bipartisan resolution opposing the administration strategy. "People in Minnesota, when they see a debate we should be having — whatever side they are on — blocked by partisan politics, they don't like it," Ms. Klobuchar said.

The fact that that Democrats could pull together only 49 of the 60 votes needed to break a procedural impasse on the resolution opposing Mr. Bush's plan was a product of many competing agendas.

There was the Democratic desire to avoid getting tied up on any vote that could be perceived as undercutting United States troops or endorsing Mr. Bush's plan. At the same time, a surprising number of Republicans showed they were not yet ready to abandon the president even though many blame him for their November election losses and worry he will hurt them again next year. Then there were the presidential ambitions of several senators who are trying to distinguish themselves from others on the issue, and have little incentive to seek common ground.

By the end of the day on Tuesday, Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the majority leader, said he saw little prospect that Democrats and Republicans could reach agreement on a plan to bring the resolution to the floor. "The negotiations are over," said Mr. Reid, who dismissed Republican efforts to force a separate vote on the war money as a ploy intended to distract the public from the matter of whether senators supported or opposed the president's policy.

Republicans spent the day trying to counter the idea that they had been obstructionists in impeding the debate. It was a label they had successfully hung on Democrats for years, and they did not appreciate the role reversal. They said their main goal had been to ensure that the Senate could guarantee in a separate resolution that Congress would not endanger forces in the field by restricting spending in the future.

DOJ_NMG_0128962

"I can't believe that any parent, any husband, wife, son, daughter of any soldier serving in Iraq doesn't expect the Congress to take that position," said Senator Mitch McConnell, Republican of Kentucky, who had made some retooled overtures to Democrats to try to break the deadlock.

But the lingering impasse forced the hand of House Democrats, who had become increasingly impatient waiting for the Senate to weigh in on the president's troop plan. Unwilling to wait any longer, the Democratic leadership said it would set aside three days next week to deliver its own verdict on the administration strategy.

"The reason we're going ahead is not because we don't think the Senate will ever act," said Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the majority leader, "but we're not sure when the Senate is going to act."

Democrats contend that they foisted off most of the blame for the breakdown on Republicans and were more than happy to have the fight end for now, leaving the opposition trying to explain the complex Senate rules and why Republicans had not been willing to go ahead.

"We have the high ground here," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "We have the high ground substantively. We have the high ground politically. We're not going to give it up."

But some Republicans suggested that the public might grow frustrated with such political crowing. "I think most Americans view this as political theater, that it is more about us than supporting the troops," said Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina.

The Senate fight also exposed a weakness for the Democrats, one that will become more pronounced as the Senate moves from its inability to take up a nonbinding resolution making a statement about administration policy to more consequential votes on war spending.

Republicans had laid a bit of a trap for Democrats, seeking a 60-vote threshold for competing resolutions on the war. They knew that the bipartisan plan by Senators John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia, and Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan, did not have 60 votes. But the plan calling for no reductions in spending, written by Senator Judd Gregg, Republican of New Hampshire, was likely to get at least 60, meaning the only resolution that would have passed would have been one that essentially backed the president.

Most Democrats are not ready to begin the politically charged discussion of restricting war spending. "There isn't a Democrat here that wants to take monies away from the troops," Mr. Reid said.

Democrats said Republicans were simply trying to dodge the chief question at hand and if it was not the financing proposal, they would have found something else to muck up the proceedings. And there is little doubt that some Republicans are determined to save the president an embarrassing loss while others are just as determined to deny the Democrats a symbolic win.

Still, there was some evidence that the debate was moving beyond the bottled-up resolution. Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, a prospective Democratic presidential candidate, renewed his call to begin redeploying troops in May with a complete withdrawal of combat brigades by March 2008. Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts proposed a plan to set a one-year deadline to redeploy American forces from Iraq. And pressure from outside advocacy groups intensified on Democrats to take concrete steps such as capping troop levels or blocking funds for new troops.

Ultimately, one senator said, lawmakers may discover that the rules of engagement for debating Iraq are not fully within their control.

"The reality in Iraq sets it own time limits, sets its own dimensions," said Senator Jack Reed, Democrat of Rhode Island. "If it continues to be chaotic, it will accelerate calls for this vote, and calls for even more."

Vote Is Sought On Iraq Funding (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Anticipating fights over Iraq spending next month, Senate Republicans are pressing for an early vote now to get members on record against withholding funds for the war.

The strategy, which has the quiet backing of the White House, has evolved over a nonbinding resolution sponsored by Sen. Judd Gregg (R., N.H.) to express opposition to Congress taking any action that might endanger U.S. forces, including the "reduction of funds for troops in the field."

DOJ_NMG_0128963

Mr. Gregg said the administration had no part in drafting his resolution but acknowledged it has "taken on a life of its own" and he wasn't surprised the White House saw it as useful in protecting President Bush's $93.4 billion emergency supplemental for the war, which could become a target for the many congressional critics of his Iraq policies.

The stakes were heightened when Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R., Ky.) announced Republicans will insist on a vote on the Gregg resolution before permitting Senate action on a bipartisan resolution challenging Mr. Bush's plans to increase U.S. troop levels by 21,500 over the coming months.

In doing so, Mr. McConnell effectively abandoned an alternative backed by Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.) that was until recently being hailed as a rallying point for Republicans allied with Mr. Bush. Now the party leadership has put its full weight behind Mr. Gregg and appears to be preparing for the next round in the Iraq fight: the $93.4 billion emergency supplemental.

"It's squeezing our Constitutional authority, saying that 'OK, if you're for Gregg, you've just said you're not going to cut back on any resources,' " complained Senate Majority Whip Richard Durbin (D., Ill.). "They don't want an up-and-down vote on escalation. They lose. They have to change the subject."

In skipping ahead to the spending bill, Democrats say Republicans are stifling debate on an Iraq resolution crafted by former Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner (R., Va.). If a vote were to be permitted, Mr. Gregg agreed it would command a majority of the Senate -- a setback for the White House.

The New Hampshire conservative predicted his resolution would receive perhaps 75 votes and aggravate divisions among Democrats. "The activist base of the Democratic Party is so over the top," Mr. Gregg said, that members don't want to be in a position where some would have to cast a vote that their base would be extremely upset with.

Majority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.) dismissed the Gregg proposal as a diversion from the real substance of the debate over troop levels. Until agreement is reached over how to proceed, Senate action on Iraq is stalled, and against this backdrop, the House Democratic leadership said it would bring up its own resolution for a floor vote next week challenging the president's policies.

There too, the political dynamics are focused increasingly on the supplemental spending bill. The House Appropriations Committee is slated to begin consideration March 7, and Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.), who will manage the bill, said again that he will recommend adding restrictions on the funding itself.

MoveOn Already Attacking Senators Blocking Debate On Surge (POL)

By Ryan Grim

The Politico, February 7, 2007

MoveOn.org will begin airing attack ads as early as Wednesday against eight Republican senators who blocked debate on the Bush administration's plan for a troop surge in Iraq.

The liberal organization has already scripted and is now producing the ads to run on CNN. As of Tuesday afternoon, airtime also had been purchased on local television stations in Kansas, New Hampshire, Oregon and Virginia.

The ads specifically target those states' senators: Sam Brownback, John Sununu, Gordon Smith, and John Warner, respectively. Sununu, Smith and Warner face re-election in 2008; Brownback, a presidential candidate, is up again in 2010.

The ads also take aim at Sens. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, John Voinovich of Ohio, Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina and Mitch McConnell of Kentucky. Dole and McConnell both face 2008 challenges.

An ad campaign for a Senate race nearly two years away—when many incumbents don't yet have opponents—would have been unthinkable just years ago. But the extreme interest in '08 and advanced technology have combined to shorten political time frames.

Tom Matzzie, MoveOn.org's Washington director, said a fundraising e-mail went out Tuesday morning and had raised more than $150,000 for the ad campaign by the afternoon. "It went from conceptive to creation in less than 24 hours," he said.

Join The Conversation

You need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

by bigben on 02.06.2007 at 06:34 PM

Force the Republicans to physically filibuster. When was the last time we saw that happen? Shut down the Senate for a few days and let the Republicans talk themselves silly on C-SPAN in FAVOR of the surge plan. The American people would give them the message in quite short order, I assure you.

Before you start composing please note that you will need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

It's The War, Senators (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0128964

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

It is not an inspiring sight to watch the United States Senate turn the most important issue facing America into a political football, and then fumble it. Yet that is what now seems to have come from a once-promising bipartisan effort to finally have the debate about the Iraq war that Americans have been denied for four years.

The Democrats' ultimate goal was to express the Senate's opposition to President Bush's latest escalation. But the Democrats' leaders have made that more difficult — allowing the Republicans to maneuver them into the embarrassing position of blocking a vote on a counterproposal that they feared too many Democrats might vote for.

We oppose that resolution, which is essentially a promise never to cut off funds for this or any future military operation Mr. Bush might undertake in Iraq. But the right way for the Senate to debate Iraq is to debate Iraq, not to bar proposals from the floor because they might be passed. The majority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, needs to call a timeout and regroup. By changing the issue from Iraq to partisan parliamentary tactics, his leadership team threatens to muddy the message of any anti-escalation resolution the Senate may eventually pass.

As it happens, the blocked Republican alternative, proposed by Judd Gregg of New Hampshire, itself represents an end run around the Senate's constitutional responsibilities. The rational way to oppose cuts in funds is to vote against them, if and when any ever come before the Senate. Mr. Reid should not be shy about urging fellow Democrats to vote against this hollow gimmick, which tries to make it look as if the senators support Mr. Bush's failed Iraq policies by playing on their fears of being accused of not supporting the troops.

America went to war without nearly enough public discussion, and it needs more Senate debate about Iraq this time around, not less. The voters who overturned Republican majorities in both houses last November expect, among other things, to see energized Congressional scrutiny of the entire war — not just of the plan for an additional 21,500 troops but also of the future of the 130,000 plus who are already there.

Another Republican resolution, proposed by Sen. John McCain, gives the appearance of moving in that more promising direction by ticking off a series of policy benchmarks and then urging the Iraqi government to meet them. But listing benchmarks is one thing. It is another to spell out real consequences for not meeting them, like the withdrawal of American military support. Instead of doing that, the McCain resolution hands an unwarranted blank check to Mr. Bush's new Iraq commander, Lt. Gen. David Petraeus. It breathtakingly declares that he "should receive from Congress the full support necessary" to carry out America's mission.

Frustrated by the Senate's fumbles, the House plans to move ahead next week with its own resolution on Mr. Bush's troop plan. When the Senate is ready to turn its attention back to substance again, it should go further.

Senators need to acknowledge the reality of four years of failed presidential leadership on Iraq and enact a set of binding benchmarks. These should require the hard steps toward national reconciliation that the Iraqi prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki continues to evade and that the White House refuses to insist on.

Senate Dems To Try Again On The 'surge' (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, February 7, 2007

As Senate Democrats seek votes on capping troop numbers and funding for Iraq, they may use the pending bill on the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission as a vehicle. That would set up a replay of the debate over funding for troops that this week derailed their leadership-backed non-binding resolution on President Bush's "surge" proposal.

Despite the minority's decision to block the start of an Iraq debate, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has vowed to put Republicans on record on the "surge" plan, which has opened GOP fissures over President Bush's unpopular war policy. But any up-or-down vote on the binding restraints backed by the Democrats' more vocal war critics would expose equally potent tensions in their own caucus.

Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) said yesterday that the 9/11 Commission bill, slated for floor debate after the continuing resolution that is next up for the Senate, is a "good opportunity" to bring up his proposal for a binding funding cutoff for future deployments to Iraq.

Feingold said he and Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.), the only other Democrat who indicated he would oppose the Reid-backed non-binding resolution, are amassing consensus among anti-war lawmakers: "We're working very closely together with a number of senators who think we are not going far enough."

Reid told colleagues on the floor after Monday evening's failed cloture vote that the 9/11 bill, which House Democratic leaders trumpeted in their "100 Hours" agenda, will be open to war-related amendments. Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.), who unveiled his own binding troop proposal yesterday, said yesterday that the 9/11 Commission bill is his preference.

DOJ_NMG_0128965

"It's very possible" that binding limits on the war could hitch a ride on the new aviation and port security funding in the 9/11 measure, according to Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), chief sponsor of a troop-ceiling bill that currently sits on the Senate calendar.

"The leader has said we can amend the 9/11 bill," Sen. Jim Webb (D-Va.) said. "I have one [related to Iraq] I'm thinking about."

If the Senate indeed takes up the continuing resolution before it must pass by Feb. 15, Democratic backers of binding limits could see their moment come just after this month's recess. Reid has hinted he will file for cloture on the continuing resolution as soon as today. Meanwhile, the House is looking to finish its debate on a non-binding disapproval of the troop increase even before the recess, Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said yesterday.

Debating binding troop caps and funding limits, however, could play into the hands of Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) and his conference. Republicans continued yesterday to pursue an alternative amendment from Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.). It is aimed at redefining the Iraq debate as whether to fund an ongoing troop presence rather than whether senators support Bush's handling of the war.

"If one of these resolutions actually passed that say [troops should] withdraw by March 31, [2008], do you know what it would take?" asked Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (Texas), Republican Policy Committee chairwoman. "A surge … to protect them as they withdrew."

That March 2008 date has been proposed by Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), whose own troop-redeployment bill picked up a House counterpart yesterday. Rep. Mike Thompson (D-Calif.), a Vietnam veteran, and freshman Rep. Patrick Murphy (D-Pa.), a veteran of the current Iraq war, introduced the companion measure.

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), Vice Chairman of the GOP Conference, wondered why Democrats would resist Republicans' desire to debate war funding this week when similar calls could come from within the majority's ranks during the 9/11 Commission debate.

"The question is, why has [Reid] denied us the opportunity to have that vote now?" Cornyn said. "It's certainly inconsistent."

Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine), an original sponsor of a non-binding resolution with stronger language than the measure Reid ultimately backed, voted with her leadership against starting debate, out of what she described as a desire for open amendments from both sides of the aisle.

Snowe acknowledged that the Democrats' non-binding approach was intended to win over influential GOP centrists like herself but said attempting to limit amendments "taints the whole approach."

Sen. Robert Menendez (D-N.J.), a supporter of Kennedy's troop-cap proposal, said he is unconcerned about any possible risk to his state in delaying the 9/11 Commission bill by linking it to the Iraq debate.

"Iraq is overarching over all of our issues," Menendez said. "So, the 9/11 bill, [much] of which has expenditures attached, is being undermined by Iraq."

Asked whether Democrats would open themselves to Republican criticism by choosing the popular 9/11 Commission bill as a forum to rein in the war, Feingold echoed Menendez's assessment.

"They can try, but the fact is, Iraq is sapping our national security, so the two are linked," he said.

Meanwhile, MoveOn.org will begin airing new TV spots today in the states of eight senators who voted against opening debate on the non-binding Iraq resolution in a bid to amplify voters' frustration. Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) is not a target of the latest anti-surge ad push, having voted with Democrats late Monday, but he said such efforts have little effect on his vote.

"MoveOn.org can put 1,000 things in front of me," Coleman said. "That's not going to move me."

Cloture Vote Does Not Split Warner Group (HILL)

By Klaus Marre

The Hill, February 7, 2007

The three senators who crafted the key resolution rejecting President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq said yesterday they are united despite having gone separate ways on a procedural vote Monday evening.

Sens. John Warner (R-Va.), Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) and Susan Collins (R-Maine) all said they were still united, even though Warner in effect supported a filibuster of the resolution they crafted together. Collins was one of two Republicans who voted with the Democrats on the issue.

Nelson said yesterday he and Warner had spoken about the vote before it happened. "Sen. Collins took a different view and of course I took a different view," Nelson said, adding that despite the split on the procedural vote, the entire group is still behind the resolution.

Collins emphatically stated that the group was "absolutely" still in accordance on the resolution, and Warner concurred.

DOJ_NMG_0128966

Nelson noted that support for the resolution in Congress remains strong, despite the lack of GOP support to cut off debate. Democrats won the vote 49-47 but did not muster even close to the 60 votes necessary to end debate.

Yet the Nebraska lawmaker acknowledged that Monday's vote "didn't help" with regard to fostering bipartisanship on the issue.

Nelson sad he remains hopeful that Senate leaders will find a solution to allow a vote on the resolution, as well as GOP alternatives. He said it was too early to tell what other vehicles the language could be attached to if no agreement can be reached.

Yes, We Can Find The Exit (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

MOSCOW

Listening, from Moscow, to the debate in Congress about Iraq is troubling: it sounds as if the American people are being offered two routes to a dead end: either follow President Bush and have troops surging into a roiling civil war, or go with one of the Congressional resolutions and denounce the surge, but without any alternative strategy for securing U.S. interests.

I believe there is an alternative strategy, but it will take two concrete numbers to implement: a date — Dec. 1 — and a price — $3.50 cents a gallon. Let me explain.

What is the U.S. interest in Iraq right now? It's to quell the civil war enough so the parties may eventually reach a negotiated settlement, and if that proves impossible, to get America out of Iraq with the least damage to our interests.

We will not quell this civil war with a surge of troops alone. The only thing that will do that is a power-sharing, oil-revenue-sharing deal between the parties. The only way we will get serious negotiations going is with leverage that America does not now have: leverage on the parties inside and outside Iraq. Negotiating in the Middle East without leverage is futile. These folks know how to calculate the balance of power down to the last ounce.

So how do we get leverage? The first way to do that is by setting a firm date to leave — Dec. 1. All U.S. military forces are either going to be home for Christmas 2007 or redeployed along the borders of Iraq, away from the civil war.

Right now everyone in Iraq is having their cake and eating it — at our expense. We have to change that.

The Sunnis, who started this whole murderous cycle, participate in the government, negotiate with us and also indulge the suicide bombers and the insurgents. The Shiites collaborate with us, run their own retaliatory death squads and dabble with Iran. The Saudis tell us we can't leave, but their mosques and charities funnel Sunni suicide bombers to Iraq and dollars to insurgents. Iran pushes its Iraqi Shiite allies to grab more power, while helping others kill U.S. troops. Ditto Syria.

O.K., boys, party's over: we're leaving by Dec. 1. From now on, everyone pays retail for their politics. We will no longer play host to a war where we're everyone's protector and target. If you Sunnis want to go on resisting, we'll leave you to the tender mercies of the Shiites, who vastly outnumber you. You Shiites, if you want to run Iraq without compromising with Sunnis, fine, but you'll have to fight them alone and then risk having to live under the thumb of Iran.

You Saudis and other Arabs, if you don't use your influence to delegitimize Sunni suicide bombers and press Iraq's Sunnis to cut a deal, we won't protect you from the consequences. And Iran, you win — yes, if we leave, you win the right to try to manage Iraq's Shiites. Have a nice day.

But at the same time, we have to impose a tax that creates a floor price of $3.50 a gallon for gasoline — forever. This is also about leverage. It says to all the parties: we are going to conserve enough gasoline and spur enough clean alternatives to fossil fuels that no matter what you all do in the Middle East, we will not depend on you for energy.

Today in Iraq, none of the key parties have to make any choices, and we don't have any choices. That is the definition of "stuck." Right now we can win only if all the parties in and around Iraq act in the most farsighted and flexible manner. Otherwise we lose in our attempt to democratize Iraq, and we're left holding the bag. We need to be in a win-win situation that we control.

"I don't think at this stage that the promise of 20,000 more troops will change any minds in Iraq," said Michael Mandelbaum, author of "The Case for Goliath." "But the threat of a lot fewer U.S. troops might conceivably get everyone focused. Right now, the U.S. is the passenger in a car that other countries are driving — and it's not going in the right direction. We have to change that dynamic."

Indeed we do. Once we've set a date to leave by and a gas price to live by, we, for the first time, will have choices in Iraq. We can stay to broker a deal if the parties want to be guided by their better angels or, if they want tribal instincts to reign, we can leave by Dec. 1 and insulate ourselves from Islam's civil war with a new energy policy.

To put it another way, if setting a date to leave miraculously brings them to their senses, our aspirations for the Iraqis will have been achieved, and we'll be stronger. And if it doesn't, but we have set an exit date and a gas price, we'll be out of Iraq and more energy-secure — and we'll also be stronger.

DOJ_NMG_0128967

Expect The Worst In Iraq (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Somehow, after four years, the debate on Iraq is still animated by wishful thinking. The White House talks as if a surge of 20,000 troops is going to stop a civil war. Democrats argue that when America withdraws its troops, Iraqis will finally take responsibility for their own security. But we all need to face the likelihood that this story isn't going to have a happy ending.

That was the underlying message of the National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq, released last week. It warned the administration that if the sectarian conflict continues, as it almost certainly will, "we assess that the overall security situation will continue to deteriorate." The current conflict isn't just a civil war, the analysts noted; it's worse -- with criminal gangs, al-Qaeda terrorists and Shiite internal feuding adding to the anarchic state of the country.

And for critics of the war who favor a quick American withdrawal, the analysts had this stark warning: "If Coalition forces were withdrawn rapidly during [the next 12 to 18 months] . . . we judge that this almost certainly would lead to a significant increase in the scale and scope of sectarian conflict in Iraq." With U.S. troops gone, the analysts forecast, the Iraqi army would collapse and al-Qaeda attacks inside and outside Iraq would surge. "Massive civilian casualties and forced population displacement would be probable."

In this bleak situation -- where, as everyone keeps repeating, "there are no good options" -- what's the right course for U.S. policy? A useful approach may be to start planning, not for the best but for the worst. Congress and the administration should begin thinking about potential catastrophes in Iraq -- and about how to protect the core national interests of the United States and its allies.

In thinking about catastrophic outcomes, I have been guided by a paper that was privately circulated last week by Robert Jervis, a professor of political science at Columbia University. He begins with this assessment: "The U.S. will withdraw its troops from Iraq at some point, and when it does, if not earlier, the situation is likely to deteriorate badly. This could be a truly dreadful time -- it could be a tsunami sweeping over the entire region."

So how to protect vital American interests amid this tsunami of violence? I would offer several basic precepts, drawn from conversations with experts in and out of government:

Â· Contain the sectarian violence. The United States can't stop the Iraqi civil war between Sunnis and Shiites, but it can try to keep this conflict within Iraq's borders. Here lies the great danger of the new strategy of "realignment" that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice outlined in an interview with me last month. In seeking to rally Sunni Arab moderates to combat Iran and its proxies, the United States risks expanding the Sunni-Shiite fault line from Iraq to the region as a whole.

This is a dangerous course. The risks were summed up by Amr Moussa, the head of the Arab League. The war in Iraq "opened the gates of Hell," he told me, and if the conflict expands to Iranian-backed Shiites and Sunni Arabs, "we will enter Hell itself." America should not encourage this descent into the inferno.

Â· Protect the oil. The United States should be planning with its allies how to secure the region's oil supplies. We have done it before: Persian Gulf oil exports continued through eight bloody years of the Iran-Iraq war, thanks in part to U.S. naval escorts and reflagging of tankers. America should help prepare a similar international effort now, including new pipelines that avoid the Gulf altogether.

Â· Shield the Iraqi population. America hasn't been able to stop the civil war, but U.S. troops can reduce the slaughter and help provide humanitarian relief for what's likely to be a growing tide of refugees fleeing the battle zones.

Â· Talk with the neighbors. Facing the prospect of a catastrophic outcome in Iraq, the United States must engage in dialogue with all the regional states, including Syria and Iran. America shouldn't initially offer any deals, much less "grand bargains," but it should talk about mutual security interests and explore where they converge.

Â· Push for Arab-Israeli peace. The one thing everyone in the region seems to agree on -- from Israel to Saudi Arabia -- is the need for a Palestinian state. The Palestinians themselves can't offer Israel a meaningful peace agreement now -- they're too weak, angry and disorganized. But the Arabs, led by Saudi King Abdullah, can. That's the breakthrough Rice should pursue.

These crisis management steps won't stop the catastrophe that is unfolding in Iraq, but they could mitigate its effects, which may be all we can hope for. And the benefit of worst-case thinking is that things occasionally work out better than expected.

House On Deck In Iraq Debate (RC)

By Susan Davis And Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, February 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0128968

With their Senate counterparts unable to move a resolution through the chamber disapproving of President Bush's Iraq War strategy, House Democrats will push ahead with a measure of their own next week designed to put Members on record before they return to their districts for the Presidents Day recess.

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) told reporters Tuesday that he expected up to three days of debate on the resolution, whose language is being crafted by House Foreign Affairs Chairman Tom Lantos (D-Calif.) and Armed Services Chairman Ike Skelton (D-Mo.).

The House Democratic Caucus also is scheduled to hold a closed-door meeting Thursday to build consensus for the resolution vote next week and to assuage some Members' concerns that the resolution does not go far enough.

Hoyer said that resolution will express "disagreement" or "reservation" on Bush's plan to escalate the U.S. military presence in Iraq by 21,500 troops, and House Democratic leadership aides said Tuesday that the chamber's resolution is expected to largely mirror the language in the Senate resolution authored by Sen. John Warner (R-Va.).

Like Warner's, the House resolution also will be nonbinding, and Hoyer said it will come to the floor under a closed rule to limit amendments, arguing that an open rule would prompt too many amendments and unnecessarily extend the debate.

It is unlikely the resolution will go through the regular committee process at Foreign Affairs or Armed Services. Hoyer said next week's time-crunch could make Democratic leaders opt to bypass committee to get the resolution on the floor Tuesday; however, he noted that the president's proposal has already been subject to "extensive" hearings.

"We believe it's important for us to make our views known prior to leaving for the Presidents Day break," Hoyer said.

While GOP leaders have already voiced objection to the process under which the resolution will come to the floor, a number of Republicans are expected to vote for the resolution. "I hope so and expect so," Hoyer said Tuesday.

House Minority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) and Republican Conference Chairman Adam Putnam (Fla.) objected to Democrats' decision to bring the resolution to the floor under a closed rule that forbids amendments.

"If you're not going to really bring all of the ideas out there, the debate is only to score political points," said Blunt.

Putnam went further, stating that when Republicans brought an Iraq War resolution to the House floor in November 2005 regarding troop withdrawal under a similarly restrictive rule, they were wrong and did so for political gain.

"You know what? [Democrats] were right," Putnam said, "It was a game, and we got beat. I mean, did we learn anything from that? It was a resolution that didn't go through committee and it should have, and it would have been a better resolution if it had."

In recent weeks, knowledgeable House GOP sources said they could foresee at least 30 Members voting for the resolution, and possibly significantly more depending on the specific language of the measure. If the resolution does in fact largely resemble Warner's proposal, one House Republican said they could lose up to 50 Members, particularly from the moderate faction of the Conference. House GOP and Democratic leaders have both said they will not whip the vote, allowing Members to vote freely.

Hoyer said he expected Republicans to be allowed to offer an alternative, and one Democratic leadership aide said the GOP likely would be allowed to offer a substitute on the floor.

House Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) has sponsored a leadership-backed resolution to create a bipartisan panel to conduct oversight on the war and set benchmarks for success in Iraq. Rep. Sam Johnson (R-Texas) also has sponsored a bill backed by leadership that would prohibit the House from cutting off funds to troops in the field.

Republicans are waiting to see the specifics of the Democratic resolution before they counter with their substitute.

Originally, House and Senate Democrats sought to have the Senate pass a resolution first before sending the identical language over to the House because any language that could garner majority support in the other chamber would have to be bipartisan, and the intention was to pass the bill with as many votes as possible in the House.

However, Senate parliamentary tactics prevented an up-or-down vote on the resolution Monday when Democrats failed to get the 60 votes necessary to end debate and move to the underlying bill. While Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has vowed to eventually get a vote on the Senate floor, the timetable is uncertain.

"The reason we're going ahead is not because we don't think the Senate will ever act," Hoyer said Tuesday. "But we're not sure when the Senate is going to act."

House Democrats are expected to vote overwhelmingly for the resolution. Democratic aides said that while the resolution is intended to get bipartisan support, some of their rank-and-file Members on the left who advocate more extreme policies, such as immediate troop withdrawal, could oppose the resolution because it does not go far enough.

However, Rep. Jan Schakowsky (D-Ill.), one of the approximately 70 Members in the Out of Iraq Caucus in the House, said that she expected Democrats to be able to reach near unanimity on the resolution. "I think it will be easier to get consensus on this," she said, noting that the resolution is just the first step in a longer term strategy. "Speaker [Nancy] Pelosi (D-Calif.) has made it very clear that our goal is to end this war."

DOJ_NMG_0128969

Democrats who advocate troop withdrawal and a dramatic de-escalation of troops are more likely to make their stand in the near future as the House takes up Bush's war supplemental and the fiscal 2008 budget.

"I think we have to divide the questions," Schakowsky said. "How do you define supporting the troops in terms of how we spend the money?"

Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio), one of the war's most vocal opponents, declined to say how he would vote on the resolution before the language is made public, but he said that even Members who do not believe it goes far enough would be hard-pressed to vote against it because it would appear as though they were voting with Bush.

Kucinich added that the funding is the bigger issue. "The war is binding, the resolution is not," he said, "We've got to get out of there, Congress must cut off the funds."

Senate Leaders Continue Squabbling Over Iraq (WP)

By Shailagh Murray And Paul Kane

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Senate leaders squabbled yesterday over how to consider resolutions opposing President Bush's plan for more troops in Iraq, but the quarrel did not stop lawmakers from launching an informal debate on the chamber floor over the war.

"The only people who believe there is a workable military solution for the conflict in Iraq is the Bush administration," said Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), who advocates requiring Bush to complete the removal of American troops from Iraq within a year.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) called Democrats disingenuous for declaring support for U.S. troops while denouncing their commander in chief's strategy. Troops serving in Iraq "won't buy it," McCain said. "A vote of no confidence is a vote of no confidence."

Senate leaders made little progress yesterday toward agreeing on the terms of votes on a series of nonbinding resolutions, each of which addresses Bush's decision to deploy an additional 21,500 troops.

"This is all a game to divert attention from the fact that we have before us now an issue that the American people want us to address," Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) said on the Senate floor, nodding across the aisle to Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.).

"What we're asking by any standard is reasonable," answered McConnell. "It is not too late to have the debate this week."

Senate Majority Whip Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) disagreed, declaring last night that the Iraq debate was over and that Democrats would move on today to other legislation.

Meanwhile, House Democratic leaders scheduled a war debate to begin next Tuesday, culminating with a vote aimed at repudiating Bush's plan.

House Democrats had intended to work with the resolution offered by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), which Senate Democrats have rallied behind. Instead, after assessing the morass on the other side of the Capitol, they are now considering a more narrow statement of objection to Bush's proposal.

In the three days of debate, Each House member will be given five minutes to state his or her views, Democrats said. That is a considerable amount in the House, where speeches typically run one minute.

"We're going to do what's been missing -- a serious debate on the war," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), a member of the House leadership.

Durbin, saying that the "plug had been pulled" on the nonbinding resolution, urged his Senate colleagues to look ahead to other Iraq-related showdowns as future vehicles for opposing Bush's war proposals.

Reid suggested on the Senate floor last night that the House's nonbinding resolution, assuming it passes, could make its way to the Senate floor.

Republicans remained reluctant to give up on the current debate. At one point yesterday afternoon, upon being told of Reid's refusal to relent to GOP terms, McConnell indicated that talks would resume in the near future. "Stay tuned," he said.

McConnell offered the day's biggest concession, proposing to shelve a resolution written by McCain that would establish tough benchmarks for the Iraqi government without opposing the additional U.S. troops.

But Republicans continued to demand that the two remaining resolutions -- one written by Warner and Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), and a pro-Bush proposal from Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) -- meet a 60-vote threshold to pass.

Republicans are advocating the Gregg resolution because they know, as do Democrats, that only it could garner 60 votes. Gregg's proposal would recognize the power of the president to deploy troops as well as the "responsibility" of Congress to fund them.

Democrats regard the measure as a political stunt but are loath to go on the record opposing it, for fear of giving the impression that they would harm troops in the field. They also recognize that a vote in favor of Gregg would amount to a tacit endorsement of Bush's troop plan.

DOJ_NMG_0128970

"I find it almost incomprehensible that the Democratic leader doesn't want a vote on this language. It is not radical language. It is fairly reasonable language," Gregg insisted to reporters yesterday afternoon.

Speaking later on the Senate floor, Reid questioned why Gregg and his GOP allies were advocating a measure that did not directly address the troop deployment. "You know what he kind of reminds me of?" Reid said of Gregg. "Somebody who comes into the basketball game not to score points, but to kind of rough people up."

Gregg responded sarcastically: "I appreciate the senator's generous comments. I take them as a compliment."

Amid the taunting, serious discussion of the war continued. Testifying yesterday before the Senate Armed Services Committee, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates revealed that the Pentagon, the Joint Chiefs of Staff and other agencies are devising a "sophisticated checklist or matrix" to measure the Iraqi government's performance in meeting various benchmarks linked to Bush's new strategy. Gates added that he is considering alternative courses of action in case the Baghdad security operation fails.

"I would be irresponsible if I weren't thinking about what the alternatives might be if that didn't happen," Gates testified. "But we, at this point, are planning for its success."

Gates said that one alternative he could envision would be pulling U.S. troops away from Iraq's most dangerous areas, presumably major cities. He added that he did not foresee what he called a "precipitous withdrawal."

Asked by Warner whether the current strategy marks the "last chance" in Iraq, Gates replied: "No, it is not the last chance."

General Is Front Man For Bush's Iraq Plan (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Before he flew off to Iraq this week to take command of U.S. forces there, Gen. David H. Petraeus conducted one last counterinsurgency mission here on the home front -- this one on Capitol Hill.

With the Senate about to debate President Bush's troop increase, Petraeus was set up last week in the office of Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky). Senators were approached on the floor and urged to meet with him. And the new Iraq commander then privately outlined his view of the war and what he will do with the 21,500 extra troops.

At a time when the president and most of his top surrogates have lost credibility even among many Republicans in Congress, the administration has turned to the chiseled, widely respected Petraeus to win the day. His name has become the rallying cry for Bush and his allies as they argue that it would be wrong for lawmakers to confirm the four-star general unanimously one moment and then renounce his strategy the next.

"I've been selling Petraeus to anybody who would listen," said Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), who terms the Bush troop increase the "Petraeus Doctrine" and fetched senators off the floor to meet the general in McConnell's office. "He's the General Grant of the surge. He's our last best chance as a military commander to bring about a change on the ground."

And maybe the last best chance for Bush allies to head off a resolution rejecting the troop increase or at least keep many Republicans from supporting it. The Petraeus card is about the only one left to play for a White House confronting low poll numbers, an unpopular war and an opposition Congress. With as many as 11 Senate Republicans against Bush's new Iraq plan, Petraeus has sway that his commander in chief does not. "There's not much the White House could do right now, to be honest with you, to change votes," Graham said.

Yet if invoking Petraeus has been effective for Graham and others trying to rally Republicans, Democrats remain unpersuaded. "He's a capable officer. He's got the talent and skill for the job," said Sen. Jack Reed (R.I.), a member of the Armed Services Committee. But "we're not talking about the Petraeus plan," he added. "We're talking about the president's plan. It's not only appropriate, but I think we have an obligation to point out its shortcomings."

Bush strategists have been surprised by how quickly the politics of the war have shifted in the past few weeks, and they have been grappling for a strategy to contain the political damage. The White House privately believes that a statement of opposition by Congress may be inevitable. "Our goal is to try to cabin off the most egregious" versions, particularly any that would threaten funding, said a senior official who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

Bush has kept a relatively low profile as the issue has dominated Capitol Hill in recent days. Although Vice President Cheney and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates warned that a resolution would embolden terrorists, Bush has generally avoided incendiary language. Rather than inserting himself into the debate, he has been talking about childhood obesity and fiscal discipline. When he met privately with Republican senators Friday, Bush employed a soft sell, the senior official said. He made the case for his decision but told the senators to vote their consciences. "Do what you think is right and I'll be your friend the next day," he told them, according to the official.

DOJ_NMG_0128971

Some advisers have been surprised that Bush has not more aggressively accused Democrats of advocating retreat. "If he wanted to use his megaphone to shout that, it would put the Democrats back on their heels," said Ed Rogers, a Republican lobbyist close to the White House. "But for whatever reasons, I think they're pulling their punches."

Instead, Petraeus has become the front man of sorts. On Jan. 26, the day the Senate voted 81 to 0 to confirm him, Petraeus met with Bush for the cameras. Later that day, the president told House Republicans in a closed-door retreat that he found it "ironic" that senators would support the general but oppose a plan he helped devise, according to Republicans present.

It was a line he later took public. "The Senate overwhelmingly supported his nomination to be the new general in command of Iraq," Bush said on Fox News on Jan. 31. "The fundamental question is: Will they back him up? They voted for him. Will they back him up?" Allies quickly picked up the argument.

But Democrats saw it as a cynical ploy. "The White House seems desperate to avoid a real debate on the merits of the plan they've put forward, so they're trying to use General Petraeus as a shield," said William A. Galston, a Clinton administration aide who is now at the Brookings Institution. "I don't think the Petraeus talking point passes the laugh test because, in fact, I'm sure a lot of the senators who voted for Petraeus but don't like the surge believe he's the best general available to address the situation."

It is common for a nominee like Petraeus to meet with senators before a confirmation, but the general returned to Capitol Hill even after the vote to continue talking to members in both houses. The White House said it did not orchestrate the post-confirmation visits. Petraeus was in transit to Iraq yesterday but a senior defense official said he "met with many others in Congress after the hearings prior to departure."

Graham said he grabbed Petraeus last week and had him wait in McConnell's office while he ushered in senators to see the general. "From my conversation with him, he understands the gravity of the situation," said Sen. Richard C. Shelby (R-Ala.). "He understands it's probably 10 minutes to 12 on the clock. And he believes he can do something about it."

Democrats Press Bush To Change Iraq Plan (AP)

By David Espo

AP, February 7, 2007

Democratic critics of the Iraq war seized the offensive at both ends of the Capitol on Tuesday, disclosing plans for a symbolic rejection by the House of President Bush's decision to deploy additional troops and filing legislation in the Senate to require withdrawal of U.S. military personnel.

"We're going to stand by our soldiers, but we're not going to stand by a failed policy that exposes more of our soldiers to death and suffering," said Sen. Richard Durbin of Illinois, rebutting charges that the war's critics may be undermining the morale or even the safety of U.S. forces.

Democrats pressured Bush to change course as Defense Secretary Robert Gates told lawmakers that U.S. forces might be able to start leaving Iraq before the end of the year — if daunting conditions including subdued violence and political reconciliation are met.

He also said that the buildup in troops is "not the last chance" to succeed in Iraq and added, "I would be irresponsible if I weren't thinking about what the alternatives might be."

The Pentagon is in the midst of implementing Bush's order to raise troop levels by 21,500, part of a plan to help quell sectarian violence in Baghdad.

New checkpoints were in evidence in Iraq's capital city, and there were reports of inspections of increased numbers of vehicles. At the same time, more than 50 people were killed or found dead during the day, and Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said insurgents were responding to the new security measures by killing as many people as possible.

The war has claimed the lives of more than 3,000 U.S. troops so far, and officials announced two more deaths. The casualties included a soldier killed Tuesday at a security post southwest of Baghdad and a Marine who died Monday in Anbar Province.

Bush's decision to dispatch additional troops has become a flashpoint for critics of his Iraq policy in the new, Democratic-controlled Congress, whose lawmakers were elected last fall by a war-weary electorate.

Officials said that House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California and Majority Leader Steny Hoyer of Maryland had both pledged to the Democratic rank and file that the House would vote next week on a nonbinding measure critical of Bush's plan to add 21,500 additional forces. They also reassured lawmakers clamoring for more robust action that the vote would merely be the first attempt to pressure the president to shift course and that future legislation will be binding.

Brendan Daly, a spokesman for Pelosi, said the measure brought to the floor next week would focus on "our opposition to the surge in troops" but has not yet been drafted.

DOJ_NMG_0128972

Pelosi said last month the measure would declare that the troop increase was "not in the national interest," language once included in a Senate measure, but now abandoned.

Democrats intend to allow all lawmakers time to speak on the issue across three days of debate beginning next Tuesday.

Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, the House Republican leader, said in an interview the GOP would prepare an alternative to the Democratic measure. He said it would include a call for a bipartisan committee to oversee the war effort and lay out a series of standards by which officials could judge whether the Iraqi government was living up to its commitments to help end the violence.

"If you're not for victory in Iraq, you're for failure," Boehner told The Associated Press. "The consequences of failure are immense. I think it destabilizes the entire Middle East, encourages Iran and on top of that, it's pretty clear that the terrorists will just follow us home."

Under House rules, Democratic leaders have the authority to advance legislation to the floor for three days of debate, and there is little doubt they will have the votes to prevail.

That stands in contrast to the Senate, where Republicans have so far blocked an attempt by Democrats to hold a full-fledged debate on the war.

Gates and other administration officials have been sharply critical of efforts to pass legislation expressing disapproval of the increase in troops, even in nonbinding form.

That has had no noticeable impact on Democratic critics of the war, though. Some of them argue that Bush's policies have led to a situation in which U.S. troops are thrust into the middle of a civil war in Iraq.

Two bills were unveiled during the day to force the president to move toward a troop withdrawal.

"The only people who believe there is a workable military solution for the conflict in Iraq is the Bush administration," said Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., in announcing legislation that would require Bush to "complete the redeployment" of American troops within a year.

Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, a Democratic presidential hopeful, joined two House members in proposing a measure to block Bush from implementing his planned troop increase, and to begin a withdrawal by May 1, with all combat brigades out by March 31, 2008.

"This is what I think has the best chance of bringing our troops home," said Obama.

Apart from legislation, Democrats have embarked on an effort to undermine public support for the war by holding numerous hearings.

At a daylong session, Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., accused the former U.S. occupation chief in Iraq of haphazardly doling out billions of dollars after the U.S.-led invasion

Waxman said 363 tons of cash was loaded onto airplanes and sent into the war zone in 2003, adding that U.S. officials had "no way of knowing whether the cash would wind up in enemy hands."

L. Paul Bremer III, who was head of the Coalition Provisional Authority, said he had done the best he could to kickstart the Iraqi economy, which he said was "flat on its back" after years of rule by Saddam Hussein followed by the U.S.-led invasion. He said the money belonged to Iraqis and had come from the U.N.-run oil-for-food program and from seized Iraqi assets.

One Republican accused Democrats of trying to embarrass the administration. "It's old news," said Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va.

Surge Is Not 'Last Chance' For Success, Gates Says (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON — Defense Secretary Robert Gates, in testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee today, rejected the widely held view in Washington that the Bush administration's decision to send additional troops to Iraq is the last chance to succeed in that troubled country.

"I would be irresponsible if I weren't thinking about what the alternatives might be," Gates said, arguing that the so-called surge is "not the last chance."

As Gates defended the administration's fiscal 2008 budget request of $481.4 billion -- along with a projected $141.7 billion in supplemental funding in 2008 for Iraq and Afghanistan -- senators expressed doubt about the war.

"How much longer do you think we're going to be in Iraq?" asked Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.).

Gates replied that "if the plan to quiet Baghdad is successful and if the Iraqis step up and accept their responsibilities…I hope we'd be able to begin drawing down our troops later this year."

Byrd said: "Try again…I don't see any end to it."

Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Peter Pace said that the operation to quiet Baghdad and the western Al Anbar region, a stronghold for Sunni insurgents, could require more than the anticipated 21,500 troops.

DOJ_NMG_0128973

"It would not be more than 10% more," said Pace, explaining that an additional 3,000 forces would be largely needed to support the combat troops.

Pressed by lawmakers on equipment shortages for troops in the field, Gates said that a dearth of armored vehicles in one phase of operations will be remedied by July.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) told Gates that committee members were still skeptical about the Pentagon's response "considering the amount of evidence about shortages." She also signaled that the unprecedented outsourcing of contracts by the Pentagon in Iraq would be "a very important issue for this Congress."

Sen. John Warner (R-Va.) asked Gates what happens if the surge plan fails. "I have to believe we're thinking beyond the Baghdad operation," said Warner, who has written one of several Senate resolutions opposing the military gambit.

"It is not the last chance," Gates replied. "We, at this point, are planning for success."

Gates also disclosed that President Bush had given the green light to a Pentagon plan for a new military command for operations in Africa.

Responsibility for Africa is now shared by three commands -- European, Central and Pacific -- which Gates called "an outdated arrangement left over from the Cold War."

The Pentagon hopes a new framework would enable better coordination in a region with growing terrorist and other threats, particularly from countries ravaged from war, such as Somalia.

In other action, the committee voted 14-3 to approve Gen. George Casey as Army chief of staff. Voting against the nomination were Republicans John McCain of Arizona, John Ensign of Nevada and Saxby Chambliss of Georgia.

The panel also voted 16-0 to approve Adm. William Fallon's nomination to become the top U.S. commander for forces in the Middle East.

johanna.neuman@latimes.com

Military Wants More Civilians To Help In Iraq (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And David S. Cloud

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6 — Senior military officers, including members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, have told President Bush and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates that the new Iraq strategy could fail unless more civilian agencies step forward quickly to carry out plans for reconstruction and political development.

The complaints reflect fresh tensions between the Pentagon and the State Department over personnel demands that have fallen most heavily on the military. But they also draw on a deeper reservoir of concerns among officers who have warned that a military buildup alone cannot solve Iraq's problems, and who now fear that the military will bear a disproportionate burden if Mr. Bush's strategy falls short.

Among particular complaints, the officers cited a request from the office of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice that military personnel temporarily fill more than one-third of 350 new State Department jobs in Iraq that are to be created under the new strategy.

At a Senate hearing on Tuesday, Mr. Gates made clear that he shared the officers' concerns, telling senators, "If you were troubled by the memo, that was mild compared to my reaction when I saw it."

To back up his point, Mr. Gates also told senators that Mr. Bush himself had addressed his cabinet at the White House on Monday about the need for civilian agencies to "step up to the task."

At one level, the conflict is a cultural clash between a military that has ordered hundreds of thousands of troops to Iraq in the last four years, and a Foreign Service that offers incentives for civilians to work in war zones but cannot compel diplomats to accept hardship assignments to places like Iraq.

Under Mr. Bush's strategy, the military is pushing more than 20,000 fresh troops to Baghdad to augment the American military force of about 132,000 already in Iraq.

The State Department, leading an interagency effort, has been ordered to expand the provincial reconstruction teams in Baghdad and western Anbar Province to accelerate political and economic development at the local level.

Small teams of American personnel are to be placed inside Iraqi ministries to make sure that $10 billion in Iraqi funds committed to the effort are spent, and spent correctly.

The entire United States Foreign Service numbers only 6,000 people, about the size of a military brigade.

In defense of the diplomats' role, David M. Satterfield, the State Department's Iraq coordinator, told Congress in January that the department's task in Iraq amounted to "the largest presence of the foreign service in any country in the world," including more than 140 Foreign Service officers in Baghdad and over 50 more in the existing provincial reconstruction teams.

DOJ_NMG_0128974

Last month, after Mr. Bush announced his new strategy, Ms. Rice told Congress that the department was "ready to strengthen, indeed to 'surge,' our civilian efforts."

But Mr. Gates said Tuesday that Ms. Rice had told him that her department needed six months to locate and prepare civil servants and contractors to send abroad. "It is illustrative of the difficulty of getting other agencies to provide people on a timely basis," Mr. Gates said.

Members of the Joint Chiefs and commanders in Iraq have been delivering the same message recently to the president and defense secretary about the necessity for other parts of government to join the effort, according to administration and military officials.

"The chiefs have made that point, and repeatedly," said one senior Bush administration official who, like others interviewed for this article, spoke on condition of anonymity to describe internal discussions among the president, defense secretary, commanders in Iraq and members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The officials said the commanders had also been expressing broader frustrations, including that the additional $1 billion in new money for reconstruction requested by the president may not be sufficient.

They also fear that additional contractors may not be readily available to assist, and that a large number of jobs that could be performed by civilians — like engineers, lawyers, veterinarians and accountants — are still conducted by military personnel at a time when the armed services are stretched thin.

The mounting tensions between the Pentagon and other departments are in some ways the mirror image of those that roiled the government before the 2003 invasion. Then, State Department officials grumbled that the Pentagon was usurping its role in planning the postwar civilian occupation; today, the military is eager to see others step in.

State Department officials say they are using both incentives and subtler pressures to induce employees to go to Iraq.

But from the standpoint of personal security, taking those jobs — many of them, by definition, outside the relative safety of the Green Zone — is widely seen as an unattractive career option.

Some Foreign Service officers and other civilians in the national security field spoke privately of their frustration at coming under pressure to serve in Iraq, a mission they view as bungled as the Pentagon rebuffed the involvement of experts in other government agencies.

"This is not at all a finger-pointing exercise," said Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, during his Senate testimony on Tuesday. "This is about the current status of our government to be able to respond, and it goes to the expeditionary nature or a lack thereof of most other departments in the government, understandably, based on the kind of wars we've faced in the past."

General Pace argued that the United States government needed "to be able to get folks over to be able to help with judiciary systems, be able to help with engineering, be able to help with electricity and the like before a country devolves into a state where the terrorists can find a home."

Tasia Scolinos, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, said in a statement that the agency "has devoted substantial resources" to training the Iraqi police and creating a justice system. She provided a fact sheet that showed that the Justice Department had 200 employees and contractors in Iraq as of last August.

"We are committed to working closely with the Defense Department and our law enforcement counterparts in Iraq to assess how we can best continue to support the reconstruction efforts in Iraq," she said.

As evidence of the importance of civilian reconstruction, military officers involved in the internal debate are citing a recent classified study, conducted by the Joint Warfare Analysis Center of the Defense Department, based in Dahlgren, Va., that suggests violence in Baghdad drops significantly when the quality of life improves for Iraqi citizens.

Relying on surveys and other data on those wounded and killed in the violence as compiled by the military, the study found that a 2 percent increase in job satisfaction among Iraqis in Baghdad correlated to a 30 percent decline in attacks on allied forces and a 17 percent decrease in civilian deaths from sectarian violence.

The study did not examine the security benefits of adding troops to Iraq or compare it to the nonmilitary portions of the new strategy, according to those who have been briefed on the classified document.

But its emphasis on the importance of reconstruction is being cited by senior military officers and Pentagon officials as more evidence that Congress and the government's other civilian departments must devote more money and personnel to nonmilitary efforts at improving the economy, industry, agriculture, financial oversight of government spending and the rule of law.

French PM Attacks Iraq Troop 'surge' (FT)

By Martin Arnold And John Thornhill

Financial Times, February 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0128975

Violence in Iraq will continue to worsen until all foreign troops are pulled out, Dominique de Villepin has warned, dismissing as “absurd” the idea that an enlarged US force could bring stability and peace to the country.

In an interview with the Financial Times, France’s prime minister indirectly criticised the decision by US President George W. Bush to boost his country’s military presence in Iraq.

Mr de Villepin, who has just three months left in office, said an occupying force was itself the “founding stone of the crisis” and a clear timetable had to be set for its withdrawal.

“The idea of saying that foreign troops will leave when Iraq is democratic and pacific is absurd. It will never happen,” he said, chopping his desk with the side of his hand in his ornate office at the Hôtel Matignon.

“Whatever the level of foreign troops in Iraq, things will continue to deteriorate.

“We need a clear horizon for the departure of foreign troops and the return of full sovereignty to Iraq. Until this is clearly stated, with the stages and the objective of a total withdrawal, things will not improve. I do not know a single diplomatic subject that can be fixed without a clear schedule.”

His comments will rile the Bush administration as Mr de Villepin is still widely remembered for his impassioned speech at the United Nations in February 2003 opposing the invasion of Iraq. Alluding to this speech, the former foreign minister added: “I said in 2003, we said it strongly with President [Jacques] Chirac, that there is no military solution in Iraq. What we said in 2003 remains true in 2007.”

However, Mr de Villepin said all domestic, regional, and foreign parties in Iraq had a long-term interest in preventing the country’s downward spiral into civil war.

Echoing the recent Baker-Hamilton report in the US, Mr de Villepin said more should be done to rope Iraq’s neighbours Syria and Iran into the stabilisation process.

He also warned the international community was “lacking imagination” in its attempts to stop Iran’s suspected nuclear weapons programme. “Iran with nuclear military capacity is unacceptable,” he said.

“Iran must respect its international engagements, notably the Non-Proliferation Treaty, which it has signed.”

But he said the international community should not ignore the origins of the crisis that lay in Iran’s desire to assert itself as a regional power for reasons of national pride and security.

The Nitty-Gritty About This Particulate Of Speech (WP)

By Linton Weeks

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

There's that word again: granularity.

It's a mouthful of a term used by guys like Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the top U.S. commander in Iraq; retired Gen. Barry McCaffrey; and White House press secretary Tony Snow.

Responding recently to a question about potential sectarian violence in Iraq if U.S. forces withdraw, Petraeus told the Senate Armed Services Committee, "It's hard from this distance . . . to get a real feel, or the real granularity of what's going on."

On "NBC Nightly News," McCaffrey said that sending more troops on a mission to Iraq "to get down to detailed granularity to fight a counterinsurgency battle in a city of 6 million Arabs who are murdering each other . . . is a fool's errand."

And talking about the inability to definitively link Saddam Hussein and Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, Snow said in an autumnal news conference, "We just don't have that kind of granularity in terms of the relationship."

Lately, people have been invoking the word to mean specificity. Certain things, such as the administration's vision for the future of Iraq, lack granularity. Newlyweds' dreams, psychic-network predictions and late-night kitchen-table get-rich-quick schemes also suffer from granularity deprivation.

Mike Mills, writing in Congressional Quarterly about the U.S. health care system's collection of personal medical information, notes that "sometimes the newer standard appears to take granularity to an extreme."

So, specifically, what exactly are we talking about?

"When I wrote that particular column," Mills says in an e-mail, "I remember hesitating before using the word, knowing at least subconsciously that it has now become jargon for 'detail.' "

In other words, "granularity" is a popular word for the "nitty-gritty." But it's not so nitty, not quite as gritty. It's about texture. Concreteness.

The word has migrated from science to business and now to politics and popular parlance. Mills, a journalist who spent several years in the overdrive world of dot-com commerce, says that "its modern origin as a technical term comes from the digital realm of computer graphics -- pixels."

The greater the number of pixels in an image, he points out, the greater the granularity, or clarity. The contemporary "use of this word seems to signal that the digital convergence has now crept into the human mind -- which techies call 'wetware.' "

DOJ_NMG_0128976

When people try to describe abstract concepts, Mills says, they are now thinking and expressing themselves with digital imagery.

People have been using mechanical terms to describe concepts for a long while. For example, in the early 20th century, when Sigmund Freud wrote of pressure in the human brain and mental breakdowns, he used steam-engine metaphors.

Granularity "is a hot word," says Mike Agnes, editor in chief of Webster's New World dictionaries, in Cleveland. "It gives people a word they can use for a new way of looking at things -- whether it be engineering, business, politics -- and a new way of evaluating."

It means depth of detail, he says. "If you were a photographer or an astronomer, speaking of an image, you would use the term 'resolution.' "

All of a sudden, Agnes says, "granularity" is a buzzword.

"It's a very interesting concept, and if we've got a concept we need a word."

It's also a way of speaking about basic things without sounding simplistic.

Businesspeople have been using it for years. Now, like "synergy" and "drilling down," it's creeping into the general consciousness. When Santa Clara, Calif., Assistant City Manager Ron Garratt was asked earlier about a proposal for a new San Francisco 49ers stadium, he replied, "Until we drill down, until we see the granularity of this proposal and what the pieces of this plan are, we won't know from a staff perspective if the definition of 'no impact on general fund' will be met or not."

According to Webopedia, "granularity" is helpful when discussing systems: "The extent to which a system contains separate components (like granules). The more components in a system -- or the greater the granularity -- the more flexible it is."

Without granularity, it's hard to get traction.

Agnes says he would not hesitate to use the word in everyday discourse.

Words and phrases often move from the particular to the general. For instance, he has noticed a surge (ahem) in the use of "event horizon."

"Originally it was used in physics, particularly cosmology," Agnes says. Lately it's been popping up in the business world to denote the moment that marks the beginning of an inevitable process. It's the point of no return. "Once you reach an event horizon, the event itself is sure to follow," he says.

With granularity.

House Panel Questions Monitoring Of Cash Shipped To Iraq (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6 — A House committee report on Tuesday questioned whether some of the billions of dollars in cash shipped to Iraq after the American invasion — mostly in huge, shrink-wrapped stacks of $100 bills — might have ended up with the insurgent groups now battling American troops.

The report was released by the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee at a hearing when Democrats sharply questioned the former American civilian administrator in Iraq, L. Paul Bremer III, about lax management of the nearly $12 billion in cash shipped to Iraq between May 2003 and June 2004.

Mr. Bremer defended his performance as head of the Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq, noting that the United States had to bring tons of American dollars into Iraq because the country had no functioning banking system.

“We had to pay Iraqis in cash,” Mr. Bremer said of the money, most of which came from Iraqi oil sales. “Delay would have been demoralizing and unfair to millions of Iraqi families.”

Government auditors have repeatedly criticized the American and Iraqi governments for failing to monitor the money once it reached Iraq.

Representative Henry A. Waxman, the California Democrat who is the committee’s new chairman, acknowledged that he had no evidence that Iraqi insurgent groups had received any of the cash. But he suggested that it was possible, given how much money was rushed into the country.

“We have no way of knowing if the cash that was shipped into the Green Zone ended up in enemy hands,” he said. “We owe it to the American people to do everything we can to find out where the $12 billion went.”

The hearing was evidence of the turnaround in Mr. Bremer’s standing in Washington.

Hailed by Republicans and Democrats alike when he last testified at a Congressional hearing in 2004, Mr. Bremer found himself the target of sharp criticism from Democrats on Tuesday. They questioned whether his decisions might help to explain the continuing turmoil in Iraq. He stepped down from his Iraq post in June 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0128977

"I acknowledged that I made mistakes," Mr. Bremer said. "And with the benefit of hindsight, I would have made some decisions differently." But he said that given the chaos he found after arriving in Iraq in May 2003, "I think we made great progress under some of the most difficult conditions imaginable."

Mr. Waxman, whose panel is pursuing investigations of fraud and abuse by the federal government and its contractors in Iraq, said he found it remarkable that the Bush administration had decided to send billions of dollars of American currency into Iraq so quickly after the United States occupied the country.

The committee calculated that the $12 billion in cash, most of it in the stacks of $100 bills, weighed 363 tons and had to been flown in on wooden pallets aboard giant C-130 military cargo planes. "Who in their right mind would send 360 tons of cash into a war zone?" Mr. Waxman said. "That's exactly what our government did."

Republican committee members accused the panel's Democratic leaders of rehashing old allegations against Mr. Bremer and the conduct of American forces in Iraq for political gain.

"Self-righteous finger-wagging will not make Iraq any more secure," said Representative Tom Davis of Virginia, the panel's ranking Republican. He said Mr. Bremer was asked to take charge of a "country with, basically, no government."

Rusty Democrats Unable To Pin Anything On Bremer (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Jerry Bremer wore black dress shoes instead of his trademark combat boots yesterday as he testified before the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee. But except for that concession, the former American viceroy of Iraq had lost none of his swagger.

His widely condemned move to disband the Iraqi military? "I stand by the decision."

Billions of dollars potentially wasted on dubious contracts? "I did not have authority over the awarding of contracts."

Incompetent personnel at the Coalition Provisional Authority? "My role in hiring was very limited."

"On the whole," Bremer told the lawmakers, "I think that we made great progress."

It was to have been the grudge match Democrats waited years for: The ferocious Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), newly installed as chairman of the committee, was to flex his new oversight muscles by summoning Bremer to account for his actions while running Iraq in 2003 and 2004.

But Bremer proved unexpectedly agile at shifting blame: to administration planners ("The planning before the war was inadequate"), his superiors in the Bush administration ("We never had sufficient support"), and the Iraqi people ("The country was in chaos -- socially, politically and economically").

And Democrats, after 12 years in the minority, were out of practice. Instead of going after Bremer's greatest vulnerabilities -- his autocratic management style and his "de-Baathification" of Iraq -- Democrats instead chose a strange focus for the hearing: the failure to account for $8 billion of cash payments three years ago. After nearly five hours of questioning, the lawmakers failed to find a smoking gun: It wasn't U.S. taxpayer money, it was a pittance compared with U.S. spending in Iraq, there was no hard evidence of fraud, and the episode had been investigated two years ago.

Waxman, who began the hearing with a broad smile and played frequently with the gavel while sitting on the edge of the chairman's seat, gradually grew more somber and sank back into his chair. The natty Bremer, sporting a pocket handkerchief and a flag lapel pin, grew more confident. As his deflections thwarted the lawmakers, Bremer's wife, unable to contain her delight, reached out from the first row of the audience to pat her husband on the back.

Republicans could hardly believe their luck. "Nobody took him on," exulted Tom Davis (R-Va.), who surrendered the chairman's gavel to Waxman last month. "We thought they'd be all over him for de-Baathification."

For Waxman, the surprises began with the opening gavel. "The committee's Web site will now have a fraud, waste and abuse tip line to make it easier for our constituents to give us information we need," he announced in his statement. "The Web site is www.oversight.house.gov, and we will pursue all credible allegations that are shared with us."

Davis countered that announcement in his own opening statement. "Beginning today, our Republican committee Web site invites whistleblowers and anyone else with information about waste, abuse, fraud or needed reform to provide information anonymously or to e-mail us up at oversight@mail.house.gov," he said.

"We seem to have rival tip-line Web sites," Waxman observed.

Then the new chairman made a crucial error: At the start of the 10 a.m. hearing, he allowed every member of a committee to make an opening statement. By the time Bremer uttered his first word, it was almost noon.

Democrats sounded menacing in their opening statements. "I'm curious about how it was that Mr. Bremer, a man who'd never been to Iraq, never led reconstruction efforts, could have been put in charge of the most important civil reconstruction program since the Marshall Plan," said Rep. Paul Hodes (D-N.H.).

DOJ_NMG_0128978

But Republicans, unexpectedly, were equally dedicated to Bremer's defense. "Our folks that we sent tried to do the best they could," said Rep. John Mica (R-Fla.). When Bremer did speak, his 1,800-word opening statement had but a sentence admitting fault, and that was quickly qualified. "I acknowledge that I made mistakes and that, with the benefit of hindsight, I would have made some decisions differently," he allowed. But he quickly listed the mitigating circumstances.

Waxman tried to direct more of the blame toward Bremer. He showed photos of bricks of American dollars bound for Iraq. "Ambassador Bremer, are you concerned about the possibility that some of this money went to ghost employees?" Waxman asked. "It might be showing up in the hands of the insurgents that are fighting U.S. troops."

"If there were evidence of that, I would certainly be concerned," Bremer deflected.

Other Democrats had no better luck. Rep. William Clay (D-Mo.) tried to elicit a mea culpa about Bremer's banning of prominent Baath Party members from government. "The mistake I made was letting the Iraqi politicians implement it," Bremer replied. "So it was the right policy, poorly implemented."

Rep. Diane Watson (D-Calif.) demanded to know "how can we in good conscience say to our constituents, 'Let's send them more money.' "

"I don't represent the administration," Bremer demurred.

Bremer represented only himself, but he did it ably.

Bremer Admits Errors In Occupying Iraq (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON — The former head of the U.S.-led occupation in Iraq testified at a congressional hearing Tuesday that he and the Bush administration made mistakes, including inadequate planning.

Paul Bremer — former administrator of the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA), which ruled Iraq for 14 months in 2003 and 2004 — said he was wrong to temporarily stop paying salaries and pensions to former Iraqi army officers. He added that Iraqis went too far with his order to purge members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party from the government.

"I acknowledge I made mistakes," Bremer said. "But on the whole, I believe we made great progress under some of the most difficult conditions imaginable."

In his first appearance on Capitol Hill since leaving office in June 2004, Bremer strongly denied accusations by auditors and House Democrats that the CPA was too lax with the billions of dollars in cash it handed out to Iraqi government ministries.

The House Oversight and Government Reform Committee kicked off four days of hearings this week into allegations of wasteful federal spending with Bremer as its first witness. The committee chairman, Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., promised "a two-year effort … to prevent taxpayers' money being wasted."

Some Republicans on the panel complained that the hearing was little more than "self-righteous, arrogant, Monday-morning Bush bashing," as Rep. Mark Souder, R-Ind., put it.

Other Republicans disagreed with that assessment. "Conservative Republicans should feel no obligation to defend waste just because it happened in Iraq," said Rep. John Duncan, R-Tenn.

Bremer said the CPA never had enough funding, materials or employees to properly do its job as the interim government of Iraq. He defended two controversial decisions: the dissolution of the Iraqi military and the removal of former members of Saddam's ruling party from government jobs. Gen. David Petraeus, the new commander of U.S. military forces in Iraq, criticized both actions in Senate testimony before his confirmation last month.

Bremer said the Iraqi army had effectively ceased to exist when the CPA took control of the country. He said it would have been a mistake to keep Saddam's former military intact, however, because Iraq's Kurds would have seceded had the Iraqi army remained.

Accusing Iraqi officials of going too far with ridding the Iraqi government of Baath Party members, Bremer said he intended to remove the top 1% of Baath Party members, not the lower-level bureaucrats who had to join the party to survive under Saddam's rule.

"It was a good policy poorly implemented," Bremer said. An Iraqi committee headed by Ahmad Chalabi carried out the policy. Chalabi, a former exile leader with close ties to the Bush administration, was later accused by U.S. authorities of leaking classified information to Iran.

Unspent Iraqi Funds Undercut Bush's Push For More (WSJ)

By Scot J. Paltrow

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0128979

The Bush administration faces a new obstacle in its quest to get more funds for reconstruction in Iraq: questions about why the Iraqi government has so much unspent money on hand.

Democrats at a House hearing on Iraqi reconstruction noted large sums of reconstruction money are unaccounted for and that the Iraqi government currently has $12 billion in unspent funds in bank accounts. Reps. Henry Waxman (D., Calif.) and William Delahunt (D., Mass.) questioned the president's call for $1.7 billion more for reconstruction.

Mr. Waxman called the hearings to improve oversight of how money is spent in Iraq. He said he also will press for legislation requiring better controls over contractors.

Testimony before the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, where Mr. Waxman is chairman, focused on a January 2005 audit report by Stuart Bowen, the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction. The findings faulted the way the Coalition Provisional Authority, which temporarily ran Iraq after the U.S.-led invasion, hurriedly dispensed more than $8.8 billion to Iraqi ministries to keep the government there running. It also found loose controls of the vast amounts of cash, and the likelihood that much of it had disappeared to pay "ghost employees."

Although the report was issued more than two years ago, Mr. Waxman said testimony was timely because the previous, Republican-controlled Congress declined to hold a hearing on the matter. Records obtained from the Federal Reserve and Defense Department show that from May 2003 to June 2004 the Federal Reserve Bank in New York shipped nearly $12 billion to Iraq, mainly in $100 bills. Much of it was doled out in Iraq from the back of pickup trucks and was only loosely accounted for.

Former CPA head Paul Bremer confirmed that he had overruled lower-level American employees who had warned that money would be siphoned off to ghost workers. He said that if money was withheld for salaries for large numbers of security guards and others, the danger to order in Iraq outweighed the risk that some money would disappear through corruption.

Mr. Bremer, who has been a lightning rod for criticism of the administration's postinvasion handling of Iraq, admitted having made mistakes. He blamed former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein for having destroyed much of the Iraqi economy, and U.S. intelligence agencies for not having detected in advance the dire state of the economy and individual industries.

One source of frustration for the White House and many members of Congress has been the Iraqi government's difficulty spending money it has on hand from oil and gas revenue. The large number of pending corruption investigations by an Iraqi commission established by Mr. Bremer is believed to be deterring government ministries from spending additional money.

Mr. Bush has called on Iraq to commit to spend at least $10 billion of its funds in order for the country to qualify for the additional $1.7 billion he has proposed.

Mr. Waxman faulted the state department for not making available Timothy Carney, recently named to the newly created position of coordinator of Iraq reconstruction. The State Department said he had to depart earlier than expected for Iraq.

Billions Given Away In Baghdad Free-for-all (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, February 7, 2007

The Bush administration went on a $5bn spending spree in Iraq in 2004 just six weeks before returning control of the government to Iraqis, according to a Democratic lawmaker investigating the payments.

Huge sums were doled out, sometimes in dollar bills from the back of pick-up trucks, it was alleged.

In a hearing before the chief House oversight committee, Democrats on Tuesday demanded answers from Paul Bremer, who headed the Coalition Provisional Authority, Iraq's first post-occupation government, and oversaw the disbursement of $12bn in cash in reconstruction funds in the months after the invasion.

In his first appearance before Congress since leaving Iraq, Mr Bremer admitted making mistakes during his 13-month tenure. However, he emphasised that Iraq was in a "desperate situation" in May 2003 and that the CPA could not have waited to install a "modern financial system" before beginning the process of getting the defunct Iraqi government and various ministries reinstated.

The payments in question comprised of Iraqi funds that had been held by the Federal Reserve Bank in New York before the invasion and consisted of a fund that succeeded the United Nations Oil for Food programme and seized Iraqi assets.

"I acknowledge that I made mistakes and that, with the benefit of hindsight, I would have made some decisions differently. But on the whole, we made great progress under some of the most difficult conditions imaginable," Mr Bremer told the committee.

Mr Bremer's remarks did little to quell criticism by Congressman Henry Waxman, chairman of the oversight committee, and others that the lack of accountability raised questions about whether the "cash shipped into the Green Zone ended up in enemy hands".

Mr Waxman took Mr Bremer to task for the manner in which US officials disbursed $20bn (€15.5bn, £10.2bn), including $12bn in cash, in Iraq between March 2003 and June 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0128980

Mr Waxman said that, in a 13-month period, the US government had shipped 360 tonnes of cash to Iraq. “Who in their right minds would send 360 tonnes of cash into a war zone? But that’s exactly what [this government] did.”

One official from the provisional authority described an environment awash with $100 bills, said a memo released by Mr Waxman’s office.

“One contractor received a $2m payment in a duffel bag stuffed with shrink-wrapped bundles of currency.” In some cases, cash was stored in unguarded sacks in Iraqi ministry offices.

Questions about the lack of transparency in how the US spent the Iraqi funds were supported by a January 2005 report by Stuart Bowen, the special inspector-general for Iraq reconstruction, which found that the provisional authority did not implement adequate managerial controls over $8.8bn in funds that were meant to finance various Iraqi ministries.

Many of the critics of the Bush administration’s handling of the war have pointed fingers at Mr Bremer’s tenure at the CPA, asserting that his early missteps, from the de-Ba’athification policies he put in place, to the disbandment of the Iraqi armed forces, set the stage for the turmoil in Iraq today.

Mr Waxman also hinted that he might subpoena Tim Carney, a new State Department official in charge of co-ordinating reconstruction in Iraq.

Mr Carney had been invited to the hearing but the State Department had kept him from testifying, in spite of his willingness to do so, Mr Waxman said.

Democrats, Bremer Spar Over Iraq Spending (WP)

By Rajiv Chandrasekaran

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

House Democrats criticized former Iraq occupation administrator L. Paul Bremer yesterday for disbursing nearly $9 billion in Iraqi oil revenue without instituting accounting systems to track more carefully how Iraqi officials were using that money.

In a five-hour hearing, Democratic members of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee probed whether the money, which was provided to Iraqi government agencies to pay salaries and fund other operations in 2003 and 2004, was spent properly. The Democrats cited an audit conducted two years ago by the special inspector general for Iraq's reconstruction that found that Bremer's Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) engaged in "less than adequate" managerial and financial control of the money.

The funds were provided to the Iraqis in cash, often in shrink-wrapped packages of $100 bills. The committee's chairman, Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), said the U.S. government flew nearly $12 billion in cash into Baghdad on military cargo planes from May 2003 to June 2004.

"Who in their right mind would send 363 tons of cash into a war zone? But that's exactly what our government did," Waxman said. Because of the way the CPA kept track of the payments, Waxman said, "we have no way of knowing whether the cash shipped into the Green Zone ended up in enemy hands."

Bremer responded that he was trying to make the best of a bad situation. Iraqi ministries, he said, lacked modern financial management systems, and the country's banks could not handle electronic fund transfers. Waiting to implement new accounting and banking practices, he insisted, would have resulted in lengthy delays in paying salaries and pensions.

"Delay would have been demoralizing and unfair to the citizens of Iraq," Bremer said. "Delay might well have exacerbated the nascent insurgency and thereby increased the danger to Americans on the ground."

The hearing did not dwell on some of the more controversial aspects of Bremer's time in Iraq, such as his decisions to disband Iraq's army and fire Baath Party members from government jobs. Instead, the disagreement between Democrats and Bremer came down to a rather obscure point: whether Bremer should have required Iraqi ministries to provide a more detailed accounting of the money the CPA gave them.

Democrats asserted that the CPA failed to follow its own basic accounting standards, which Bremer enacted in 2003. Bremer maintained that the authority "met our obligations." He said a team of specialists from the International Monetary Fund "found that the existing Iraqi systems were adequate and recommended we use them while beginning the longer-term process of modernizing them." Distributing cash in a war zone wasn't "a perfect solution," Bremer said. "But there are no perfect solutions in Iraq."

During the 15-month occupation, the United Nations allowed the U.S. government to sell Iraq's oil and keep the proceeds in a trust fund. The $8.8 billion in question was drawn from that fund.

Republicans noted that the inspector general, Stuart W. Bowen Jr., did not provide any evidence to suggest that the $8.8 billion was stolen or fraudulently appropriated. "Limited visibility over payments to Iraqi ministries by itself doesn't establish the [Democratic] majority's alleged $8 billion fraud," said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (Va.).

DOJ_NMG_0128981

Democrats fired back by implying that Bremer and his budget director, David Oliver, who also testified yesterday, adopted a blasÃ© attitude toward the $8.8 billion because it was Iraqi money, not U.S. taxpayer money. Rep. Diane Watson (Calif.) played a tape of an interview Oliver gave to the BBC last year in which he said: "I can't tell you whether or not the money went to the right things or didn't -- nor do I actually think it's important."

She then read from a transcript of a speech Bremer gave at Clark University in Massachusetts in April 2005. "I suggest you not worry because the $9 billion is Iraqi money, not American money," Watson quoted Bremer as saying.

Bremer insisted that he "took seriously" the responsibility to spend Iraqi funds.

Only a few Democrats pressed Bremer on other issues.

Rep. John F. Tierney (Mass.) asked Bremer about reports that many CPA employees were selected on the basis of political loyalty and connections instead of experience with post-conflict reconstruction or expertise in the Middle East. Bremer said that most staff members were hired by the Pentagon and that he was not involved in personnel issues.

Rep. William Lacy Clay (Mo.) asked Bremer whether he regretted disbanding Iraq's army and also whether he would admit that "your de-Baathification program helped to set the stage for the takeover of Iraqi politics by Shiite politicians with close ties to Iran."

Bremer contended that if he had called members of the former Iraqi army into service, it would have angered Shiites and Kurds -- who collectively make up more than 75 percent of Iraq's population -- and it might have led the Kurds to secede from Iraq. He also defended the overall thrust of his "de-Baathification" decree, but he acknowledged it was a mistake to leave the implementation up to Iraqi politicians, who "broadened it."

"It was the right policy, but poorly implemented," Bremer said.

Bremer, who received the Medal of Freedom from President Bush for his service in Iraq, appeared before the committee voluntarily. Waxman had also requested the appearance of Timothy Carney, a retired ambassador who was recently tapped to serve as the reconstruction coordinator in Iraq, but Waxman said the State Department refused.

Waxman said State offered several reasons Carney would not be able to appear, the last of which was insurmountable: He left for Baghdad on Friday.

Waxman Raps Ex-Iraq Chief Over Aid Funds (AP)

By Larry Margasak

AP, February 7, 2007

House Democrats, taking charge of investigations now that they control Congress, grilled the former U.S. occupation chief in Iraq on Tuesday about the way he doled out up to $12 billion of Iraqi dollars without accounting for the money.

L. Paul Bremer III, with support from Republicans, fired back by insisting he did the best he could in the middle of a war and repeating over and over that he was spending Iraqi — not U.S. — money.

The hearing by the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform scrutinized the chaotic days that began after a burning and looted Baghdad fell to U.S. troops four years ago. Bremer ran the country for 14 months.

However, the days of the Coalition Provisional Authority seemed like a distant past compared with a simultaneous Senate hearing — where Defense Secretary Robert Gates spoke of the situation today, including the hope of a U.S. troop withdrawal before year's end.

The significance of the House hearing came when Oversight and Government Reform Committee Chairman Henry Waxman, D-Calif., promised two years of investigations of fraud, waste and abuse on the Bush administration's watch.

Democrats are planning dozens of investigations, many of them in Waxman's committee, which scheduled further hearings this week on homeland security contracts and drug prices.

The hearing presented two divergent views of what financial controls were possible in an Iraqi capital with no functioning national government.

Waxman and a hearing witness, special inspector general for Iraq Stuart Bowen Jr., criticized Bremer for failing to install accounting systems that would have forced Iraqi ministries to account for up to $12 billion in Iraq's funds. The money came from a United Nations oil-for-food program and seized Iraqi assets, but fell under Bremer's control.

"Without strong standards, we have no way of knowing whether the cash could end up in enemy hands," said Waxman.

Bremer countered, "I arrived in Baghdad at a time when much of the city was burning. Looting was still widespread. My responsibilities were to kickstart the economy."

Former committee chairman Tom Davis, R-Va., now the senior minority member, defended Bremer and criticized Waxman.

He said Waxman was rushing to "old judgments" in a hearing that was "old news."

DOJ_NMG_0128982

Bowen, responding to Bremer's assertions that he was operating without a functioning Iraqi government, said, "That situation screams for more oversight, more controls." But the inspector general told the hearing he couldn't say whether insurgents got any of the funds.

Bremer painted the bleakest possible picture of the situation he faced.

Looters were running wild. Buildings were burning. Competent government officials had fled or were on the run. Civil servants had not been paid for months. Banks were closed and only cash would keep the economy from total collapse.

Waxman said up to $12 billion in Iraqi money was converted to dollars, held in the Federal Reserve Bank in New York and shipped in pallets to Baghdad that totaled 363 tons.

"Millions of Iraqi families depended on civil service salaries and pensions," Bremer said. "It was clear we had to get this Iraqi money in the hands of people immediately."

Bremer acknowledged that he and the U.S. government made mistakes. He said he mistakenly described the Iraqi Army as being disbanded — leaving an incorrect impression because "there was not a single unit of the Iraqi army standing in place. "

He said too many government workers were fired because he mistakenly let Iraqis carry out his policy of dismissing only 1 percent of the government officials under Saddam Hussein.

And Bremer said he believed from the start that the best way to provide security was to increase the number of U.S. troops beyond the numbers sent to Iraq.

Bremer Defends Spending In Iraq (MCT)

By Renee Schoof

McClatchy Newspapers, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON - Democrats in the House of Representatives on Tuesday grilled the former U.S. administrator of Iraq, L. Paul Bremer, demanding that he account for billions of dollars distributed in Iraq that no one seems able to trace.

Much of the questioning focused on $12 billion -mostly in $100 bills packed in huge bundles, 363 tons of cash in all - from Iraqi oil sales and frozen assets of Saddam Hussein's regime. The United States shipped the money to Iraq for Bremer's organization to disburse to Iraqi ministries.

A government audit in 2005 found that $8.8 billion was turned over to the ministries without assurance that it would be properly used and accounted for. A House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform staff document issued Tuesday says that much of the money appears to have been lost to corruption and waste.

Oversight committee Chairman Henry Waxman, D-Calif., said that with no clear standards, it was possible that some of the money ended up in enemy hands.

Bremer acknowledged making mistakes, but said that overall - given the violence and the sorry state of Iraq's economy - he did the best he could. It was the first time he'd testified before Congress since he turned over Iraq to an interim government in 2004 after running the Coalition Provisional Authority for 14 months.

"Despite the chaotic situation we found in Iraq, I believe the CPA discharged its responsibilities to manage these Iraqi funds on behalf of the Iraqi people, " Bremer said. "I am proud of what we achieved."

Bremer said he used the money to pay government workers their salaries and pensions. He said the Iraqi ministries didn't have good payroll records but that he had to turn over the money they requested quickly because he didn't want government employees to go without pay.

Rep. John Tierney, D-Mass., asked Bremer about reports that many of the 3,000 CPA staffers were recent American college graduates who got their jobs because of their loyalty to the Bush administration.

Bremer said it was difficult to get qualified people to work in Baghdad and that he wasn't responsible for selecting them.

Since Iraq's spiral downward into a violent insurgency and sectarian civil war, many analysts have blamed Bremer's decisions to disband the Iraqi army and ban members of Saddam's Baath party from public service as key reasons that anarchy emerged.

Bremer defended both decisions. He said the Iraqi army had been a vehicle of Saddam's repression and that the Baath party was modeled on the Nazis - "all right out of Hitler's playbook."

He said he'd suggested that only top Baath members lose their jobs but that Iraqi politicians implemented the plan and "broadened it way out." The chairman of the de-Baathification committee was then-Pentagon favorite Ahmad Chalabi.

Also testifying was Stuart Bowen, the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, who headed the 2005 audit of Iraqi money. Bowen said Bremer had failed to follow CPA rules set to ensure there'd be more transparency about how the Iraqi ministries used the money. But Bowen said he didn't find that the CPA had engaged in any fraud.

Bowen said his office continued to pursue fraud in Iraq and was examining 80 cases.

DOJ_NMG_0128983

Republicans on the committee said Bremer found himself in an extremely difficult job and couldn't be blamed for the U.S. government's lack of planning for post-invasion Iraq.

"We could have been accused of holding their money" if Bremer hadn't disbursed it swiftly, said Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn.

Waxman said he'd asked the Bush administration's new official in charge of Iraq reconstruction, Tim Carney, to testify and Carney was willing, but that the State Department had refused and said he wouldn't be available to appear before the panel for six months. Carney, a former ambassador to Haiti and Sudan and a former peacekeeping official in Somalia, Cambodia and South Africa, worked in Iraq for Bremer's predecessor, Lt. Gen. Jay Garner, for three months beginning in March 2003.

Waxman Hits 'Waste, Abuse' Of Iraq Funds (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, February 7, 2007

Rep. Henry A. Waxman yesterday excoriated the Bush administration for not tracking $12 billion of Iraq reconstruction funds, beginning the first of what he promised would be two years of hearings into "fraud, waste and abuse in federal spending."

"My concern is that without strong standards, we have no way of knowing whether the cash shipped into the Green Zone ended up in enemy hands," said Mr. Waxman, California Democrat and chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee.

L. Paul Bremer III, former administrator of the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA), which governed Iraq immediately after the overthrow of dictator Saddam Hussein, testified that there was no evidence the money went to insurgents or al Qaeda in Iraq.

After the hearing, Mr. Bremer said opponents of the administration's Iraq policy always have been long on criticism and short on new ideas.

"Nobody today and nobody in the past three years come up with an alternative," he told The Washington Times. "Nobody has ever said we could have on an air-tight accounting system. We came in the middle of a war in a devastated economy."

Still, Mr. Bremer said the hearing helped clear up misinformation about the money. The money was Iraqi oil money, not taxpayer dollars, Mr. Bremer told lawmakers, and the funds were used to run the Iraqi government, not to build infrastructure.

During the hearing, Mr. Waxman recounted how from May 2003 to June 2004 the Federal Reserve Bank in New York sent nearly $12 billion in cash aboard C-130 cargo planes to Baghdad.

The currency 281 million individual bills weighing a total of 363 tons came from Iraq oil proceeds and was sent to finance nation-building by the CPA.

"The numbers are so large that it doesn't seem possible that they're true," Mr. Waxman said. "Who in their right mind would send 363 tons of cash into a war zone? But that is exactly what our government did."

Mr. Bremer defended the cash payouts, saying Iraq lacked phone service, electricity and banks after the fall of Saddam's regime in April 2003.

"We had to find a way to get the Iraqi people money quickly so they could start rebuilding their country," Mr. Bremer said. "It was not a perfect solution, Mr. Chairman, but there are no perfect solutions in Iraq."

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III of Virginia, the committee's ranking Republican, faulted the chairman for describing the accounting failures as waste or fraud.

"The majority continues to equate a lack of exquisite accounting in Iraq with massive waste," he said. "Limited visibility over payments to Iraqi ministries, by itself, simply does not establish the majority's alleged $8 billion flood of fraud."

Mr. Bremer conceded the administration's "poor planning" for reconstruction after Iraq fell and said a "business-as-usual approach to contracting and personnel didn't work."

However, he assured the committee that his caretaker government took steps to "combat corruption" within the Iraqi government that he said was a legacy of Saddam's dictatorship.

Mr. Waxman noted reports that millions of dollars went to "ghost employees" in the Iraqi ministries, which Mr. Bremer said was another holdover from the Saddam regime.

The crux of the hearing was a January 2005 audit report that found "the CPA did not establish or implement sufficient managerial, financial and contractual controls to ensure that funds were used in a transparent manner."

The report by Stuart W. Bowen Jr., special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, concluded that the CPA distributed $8.8 billion to the ministries "without assurances the monies were properly used or accounted for."

Mr. Bowen acknowledged the difficulties the CPA faced.

"It was an extremely chaotic situation," he said. "The government was nonexistent. To me, that screams out for more controls."

Democrats pressed Mr. Bowen to speculate on where the money went.

DOJ_NMG_0128984

"We don't know where the money ended up. Do we?" asked Rep. Elijah E. Cummings, Maryland Democrat.

"How it was spent by the Iraqi ministries is something I can't account," Mr. Bowen said. "We have anecdotal evidence that it was used to pay payroll, and we know it was used for overhead."

Mr. Cummings said, "You don't know that it didn't go to insurgents."

Rep. Dan Burton, Indiana Republican, asked Mr. Bowen about whether the audit revealed fraud.

"We found no instances of fraud," said Mr. Bowen, who also said accounting practices within the CPA were adequate, in contrast to practices within the Iraqi ministries.

Waxman

L. Paul Bremer III, the former administrator of the Coalition Provisional Authority, yesterday slammed critics of the Bush administration's Iraq war policy saying that "nobody in the past three years come up with an alternative."

U.S. To Pay $5.8B To Expand Iraqi Forces (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, February 7, 2007

The U.S. government will pay $5.8 billion to help Iraq expand further its army and police force, which are deemed too small for its security needs, senior Pentagon officials said Tuesday.

The expansion, announced Monday as part of President Bush's 2008 budget plan, would increase the Iraqi security forces from 328,000, which was the goal set several years ago and reached last December, to 362,000.

The Bush administration has made the development of competent Iraqi security forces a centerpiece of its strategy for eventually withdrawing U.S. military forces. But the process has been slower than planned.

Tina Jonas, the Pentagon budget chief, told a small group of reporters that Bush's 2008 budget proposal includes $3.8 billion for the expansion and that the other $2 billion is contained in his request for an additional $93.4 billion to cover overall war costs for the remainder of the current budget year, which ends Sept. 30.

The plan to expand the Iraqi army was generated last year while Donald H. Rumsfeld was defense secretary. But it took more months to work out with the Iraqi government how much it would cost and how that would be shared.

Vice Adm. Stephen Stanley, a top budget official on the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said Tuesday that the Iraqis are responsible for the cost of training and equipping 19,000 of the 34,000 additional troops and police. The United States would pay for the other 15,000.

Jonas also said that in the first two months of the current budget year — October through November 2006 — the Pentagon spent about $8.6 billion a month on the Iraq war and about $1.4 billion in Afghanistan. By comparison, the spending rate for Iraq alone during the 2006 budget year, which ended last Sept. 30, was about $6.8 billion per month, according to a Pentagon chart on war costs since 2001.

Stanley said the spending rate in Iraq of $8.6 billion a month so far this budget year is probably the highest since the initial invasion in March 2003.

Jonas noted that war costs usually are higher in the initial months of a budget year because more contracts for services are paid early in the year. Also, overall costs in Iraq have grown because the Pentagon is now using the war budget to pay for repairing, replacing and replenishing equipment lost or damaged in combat.

Iran Accuses US Of Role In Iraqi Kidnap (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, February 7, 2007

The Iranian government on Tuesday accused the US of complicity in the kidnap of one of its diplomats in Iraq, in an incident that might inflame the already tense relations between Washington and Tehran.

The Iranian government said that Jalal Sharafi, second secretary at Tehran's embassy in Baghdad, was seized on Sunday by gunmen who it claimed "operate under the supervision of the American forces in Iraq", the official Islamic Republic News Agency reported.

An Iraqi official was quoted by [a news agency] as saying that Mr Sharafi was snatched in the central Karrada district by 30 gunmen wearing the uniforms of a special Iraqi army unit that often works with US forces in Iraq.

Hasan Kazemi-Qomi, Tehran's ambassador to Baghdad, said on Iranian television the kidnappers had used US vehicles and that the abduction took place "within the framework of the US president's order to step up encounters with Iranians".

"Responsibility for this operation lies with American forces . . . those who kidnapped Jalal Sharafi . . . were not affiliated to [Iraq's] defence ministry, rather this operation was carried out under the supervision of a group connected to the Americans."

DOJ_NMG_0128985

The US military denied any of its units were involved in the incident. The White House last month authorised its forces in Iraq to kill or capture Iranian agents deemed to be a threat.

Diplomats are regularly targeted in Iraq, where armed factions engage in political assassination as well as abduction for ransom. The presence of Iranian diplomats in Iraq is particularly sensitive, thanks largely to the bitter 1980-1988 war fought between the two countries.

In 2004, Iranian diplomat Faridoun Jihani was kidnapped on a highway south of Baghdad by a Sunni insurgent group, who accused him of stirring sectarian conflict. He was released after two months.

Last month US forces detained five Iranians working for an informal consulate in northern Iraq on suspicion of funding militant activity.

It is unlikely that Tehran knows at this stage who abducted Mr Sharafi.

Iran Alleges U.S. Role In Kidnap Of Embassy Official In Baghdad (WP)

By Joshua Partlow And Ernesto Londoã±o

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 6 -- Iranian officials in Iraq on Tuesday accused U.S. forces of collaborating with Iraqi soldiers in what they described as the kidnapping of an Iranian diplomat in downtown Baghdad.

Four Iraqis allegedly involved in the kidnapping Sunday evening of diplomat Jalal Sharafi were arrested and interrogated by Iraqi police, according to two Iranian officials in Baghdad. The detained Iraqis, who wore military uniforms and carried military identification cards, were "not under the Ministry of Defense control, they were directly connected to the American control," said an official at the Iranian Embassy who spoke on condition of anonymity.

A U.S. military spokesman, Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, said Tuesday that the military was not involved in the reported abduction and that he was not aware of any involvement by Iraqi forces.

Iraqi officials declined to comment Tuesday on the Iranian allegations, but Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari scheduled a news conference for Wednesday at which he was expected to address the issue.

The Iranian officials condemned the disappearance of Sharafi, whom they identified as a second secretary at the embassy in Baghdad, and said his abduction was part of the Bush administration's effort to counter Iranian influence in Iraq.

"The Islamic Republic of Iran considers it a responsibility of U.S. forces in Iraq to protect members of the diplomatic community, including Iranian diplomats, and will hold them responsible for obtaining the release of the abducted Iranian diplomat," Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammad-Ali Hosseini told the Islamic Republic News Agency.

Sharafi, who has worked at the embassy for two years, has a wife and children living in Iran, said Abbass Ittry, the embassy's office manager. At the time of the apparent abduction, which was first reported by the New York Times, Sharafi was traveling with two colleagues, the Iranian officials said. They said that Sharafi's colleagues escaped and notified police, and that police and the abductors exchanged gunfire during a brief clash.

Iraqi Defense and Interior Ministry officials are searching for Sharafi, said Brig. Abdul Khaliq Karim, a spokesman for the Interior Ministry.

U.S. officials have accused Iran, a Shiite Muslim theocracy, of exacerbating tensions in Iraq by providing funding, sophisticated explosives and training to Shiite militias. President Bush last fall secretly authorized the killing or capturing of Iranian intelligence operatives or Revolutionary Guard members operating in Iraq. U.S. officials last month detained five Iranians at a liaison office that provided consular services in the northern Iraqi city of Irbil. Iraqi officials said the men were in the process of being certified as diplomats. In December, U.S. forces detained five Iranians in two raids in Baghdad.

The U.S. military, in statements Tuesday, disclosed the deaths of two American service members. A Multinational Division soldier was killed Tuesday after "insurgents targeted a security post" in southwest Baghdad, and a Marine was died Monday in Anbar province "from wounds sustained due to enemy action." Their names will be released after relatives have been notified.

Meanwhile, U.S. officials said they are investigating a report that a member of the Iraqi parliament had been convicted in the 1983 bombing of the U.S. and French embassies in Kuwait.

"We are actively investigating these serious allegations and continue to be in close contact with the government of Iraq to pursue this case," said Lou Fintor, a U.S. Embassy spokesman in Baghdad. He said he had no further details.

Citing "U.S. military intelligence," CNN reported Tuesday that Jamal Jaafar Mohammed, a member of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's Dawa party, was sentenced to death for his alleged role in the bombings, which killed five people and injured more than 80.

Special correspondents Saad al-Izzi and Naseer Nouri contributed to this report.

U.S. Orchestrated Seizure Of Baghdad Envoy, Iran Alleges (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0128986

By Tina Susman

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

BAGHDAD — Iran accused the United States on Tuesday of being behind the abduction of an Iranian diplomat in Baghdad, but U.S. officials refused to confirm that a kidnapping had taken place as the two countries' campaign of finger-pointing was brought up another notch.

Iranian officials said Jalal Sharafi, their embassy's second secretary, had not been seen since gunmen in Iraqi military uniforms intercepted his car Sunday as he left a branch of a state-owned Iranian bank.

"They acted under U.S. supervision," Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammed Ali Hosseini said in a statement released in Tehran. He described the incident as a "terrorist attack."

The Bush administration has accused Iran of fueling the sectarian warfare in Iraq by providing Shiite Muslim extremists with weapons and explosives being used against U.S. troops and Sunni Arab targets. U.S. officials have been holding five Iranians seized last month in a raid in the northern city of Irbil. The Iranian officials are accused of planning attacks on Americans.

The seizure Sunday was another example of U.S. heavy-handedness, an official at the Iranian Embassy in Baghdad said. "They should release our colleague as soon as possible," he said angrily.

Neither U.S. government nor military officials in Baghdad would confirm such an incident, much less the allegation that it had been orchestrated by American forces.

"We have no record of any event that looks remotely like the described abduction," said Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a U.S. military spokesman. The U.S. Embassy said it was "aware of the reports" and was looking into them.

Kidnappings are common in Baghdad, where high-ranking officials and ordinary merchants alike may fall prey to gangs looking to get rich by ransoming hostages. Iranian officials, however, refused to consider that Sharafi's alleged abduction was anything but another attempt by Washington to put the squeeze on Tehran. They cited the detention of the Iranians in Irbil as evidence.

"This is not the first time such a thing has happened," the Iranian Embassy official said of Sharafi's alleged abduction. "Normally, the United States is responsible."

As Iraq's violence has escalated, so too has the tension between the United States and Iran, whose leaders deny bolstering Shiite militias at work in Iraq. The diplomatic snarling has put Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki in an awkward position as he tries to cultivate close relations with Iran while trying to convince American officials that he is serious about quelling violence.

A joint U.S.-Iraqi security plan announced last month has yet to produce tangible results, at least in the view of Iraqis living under constant threat of car bombs, mortar attacks, stray gunfire and street crime.

The bodies of at least 19 men, all shot to death and most showing signs of torture, were found in Baghdad on Tuesday, police and morgue officials said. In addition, at least five people died when a car bomb exploded in the east Baghdad neighborhood of Mashtal.

In the city of Kut, about 100 miles southeast of Baghdad, a roadside bomb targeting a passing U.S. military convoy instead blew up under a civilian minivan, killing a woman.

The U.S. military announced the death of a Marine in Al Anbar province, west of Baghdad, bringing the number of American troops killed since the March 2003 U.S.-led invasion to at least 3,103, according to the website icasualties.org, which tracks casualty figures in the war.

In the Shiite neighborhoods of Ur and Shaab, in northern Baghdad, residents said U.S. and Iraqi forces set up checkpoints Tuesday morning, snarling traffic for hours but doing little to reassure people of the new security plan's effectiveness.

Majid Abdullah, 42, who owns an auto parts shop in Shaab, said that most checkpoints had been dismantled by afternoon and that those remaining were manned by Iraqis, with U.S. troops only passing by occasionally.

"Frankly speaking, there doesn't seem to be anything different in their activities compared to any other days," he said. "In fact, they don't seem that enthusiastic and rarely ever search vehicles and passersby."

Abdullah complained that he had gone through the checkpoint several times in his car and had yet to be searched. "I want to be searched. We want them to be more diligent."

A resident of Ur said about 10 Strykers, hulking U.S. armored vehicles, had made their way through her neighborhood but become stuck on a narrow street. Unable to turn around, she said, the first Stryker rammed down the walls of a school and drove through it, followed by the rest of the convoy.

Maliki acknowledged delays in implementing the security plan he announced early last month and, after meeting with Iraqi military commanders, urged them to disprove skeptics who he said were doubting their ability or determination to stabilize Iraq.

"I address my speech to you, the Iraqi commanders, to prove and to show the world that you are up to the responsibility that is in your hands," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0128987

Abdullah, however, made clear he was not optimistic.

"It's a new security plan every day, and there is all this hype about it when in fact it is not different and therefore will not make any difference," he said. "It's another disappointment."

Blair Urges Iran To Change Its Ways (AP)

By Thomas Wagner

AP, February 7, 2007

Prime Minister Tony Blair told lawmakers Tuesday that no military action is planned against Iran, but that international opinion is hardening against Tehran's nuclear ambitions and what he described as its interference in conflicts across the Middle East.

Iran has been widely criticized for links with Hezbollah in Lebanon, Hamas in the West Bank and Gaza, and Shiite militias fighting coalition forces in Iraq.

Iran "is trying to prevent reconciliation across the region, and I think that is very shortsighted and very foolish," Blair told the House of Commons' Liaison Committee.

"If they were able to play a constructive role in Iraq, it would be of immense help to the international community. It would also actually be of immense help to Iran in the end since they don't want chaos on their borders," Blair said during his biannual appearance before the committee to discuss a wide range of local and international issues.

"You can't take any option off the table, but nobody is talking or planning military intervention. That's not what the international community wants, " Blair said. "It's not what we want."

President Bush has said the U.S. has no plans to invade Iran. But he recently increased the U.S. naval presence in the Persian Gulf to its highest level since 2003 by ordering a second aircraft carrier strike group to the region. Bush also has authorized the U.S. military to kill or capture any Iranian agents plotting attacks in Iraq against American forces.

The United States and several Western allies believe that Iran is using its nuclear program as a cover to produce atomic weapons — a charge Iran denies. Tehran says it seeks only to generate electricity.

Merkel Says Talks With Iran Still Possible (AFP)

AFP, February 7, 2007

German Chancellor Angela Merkel said that the door remains open for negotiations between Iran and the international community over its contested nuclear programme.

"Even if the United Nations has decided on sanctions, the door for negotiations remains open," Merkel said at a joint press conference with Kuwait's Prime Minister Sheikh Nasser Mohammad al-Ahmad al-Sabah.

"I hope that reason will prevail and that we will be able to hold talks again," added Merkel, whose country currently holds the rotating European Union presidency.

The premier of Kuwait, which lies just across the Gulf from Iran, also stressed the importance of going back to negotiations over Tehran's nuclear drive.

"It is important now to have unconditional negotiations. We have to sit down at the negotiating table and talk openly and without conditions," he said. "It is absolutely necessary to have peace in the region."

EU foreign ministers agreed late January to implement the full raft of UN sanctions against Iran to punish Tehran for failing to meet international demands over its nuclear programme.

The UN Security Council in December adopted a resolution imposing sanctions on Iran for its repeated refusal to fully cooperate with the UN atomic energy watchdog or suspend uranium enrichment.

Merkel was in Kuwait after a stop in the United Arab Emirates where she met Emirati President Khalifa bin Zayed al-Nahayan on Monday as part of talks with Gulf leaders on international efforts to revive the Middle East peace process.

Her regional tour has also taken her to Riyadh and Cairo.

Israel Sounds Alarm On Iran's Nuclear Efforts (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

JERUSALEM — Israeli leaders rarely invoke the Holocaust in the face of enemies. The Jewish homeland founded after Adolf Hitler's genocide has, for the last generation, felt secure enough to fight its many battles with little or no help.

But the specter of a nuclear-armed Iran has rattled Israel's self-confidence. Its politicians and generals warn of a "second Holocaust" if, as in the 1930s, the world stands by while a heavily armed nation declares war against the Jews.

DOJ_NMG_0128988

Spelling out that scenario, Israeli officials have begun an unusually open campaign to muster international political and economic pressures against Iran. They warn that time is growing short and hint that they will resort to force if those pressures fail to prevent Iran's development of an atomic weapon.

Israeli leaders fear that an Iranian bomb would undermine their nation's security even if Tehran never detonated it. That Israel has its own nuclear arsenal would not counteract the psychological and strategic blow, they believe.

Israel began secretly preparing in the early 1990s for a possible air raid on Iran's then-nascent nuclear facilities and has been making oblique public statements about such planning for three years.

What is new is Israel's abandonment of quiet diplomacy to rally others to its side. Until a few months ago, Israeli leaders worried that high-profile lobbying would backfire and provoke accusations that they were trying to drag the United States and its allies into a war.

Israel's new activism coincides with a recent drumbeat of U.S. threats against Iran, including President Bush's vow to "seek out and destroy" Iranian and Syrian networks he said were arming and training anti-American forces in Iraq, and his dispatch of a second aircraft carrier group to the Persian Gulf.

Several factors have contributed to Israel's more assertive campaign, Israeli officials and defense analysts said.

Israel's war against Iranian-backed Hezbollah guerrillas in Lebanon last summer brought Tehran's hostility alarmingly close to home. At the same time, the war made relatively moderate Sunni-dominated Arab nations more wary of Shiite Iran, easing Israel's isolation and creating a de facto anti-Iran coalition.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has repeatedly called for Israel's destruction. And while denying any plan to build an atomic weapon, Iran has continued to enrich uranium and acquire long-range missiles.

And Israeli leaders worry that the window is closing on any hope for decisive action by Bush, their most powerful supporter. The head of Mossad, Israel's foreign intelligence agency, told parliament late last year that Iran would be able to produce a nuclear weapon as early as 2009, the year Bush is to leave office. Other analysts have predicted a longer timetable.

Since last summer, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has sounded an alarm against Iran in public and in meetings with the leaders of Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Russia, China, Egypt and Jordan. He has also met twice with Bush.

"The Jewish people, on whom the scars of the Holocaust are deeply etched, cannot allow itself to again face a threat against its very existence," Olmert said last month in a speech reviewing the diplomatic campaign. "In the past, the world remained silent and the results are known. Our role is to prevent the world from repeating this mistake."

Israel strongly prefers that the world keep Iran from developing nuclear weapons through crippling, dissuasive economic sanctions, Olmert said. But he added: "We have the right to full freedom of action in defense of our vital interests. We will not hesitate to use it."

'Force them to reconsider'

Olmert on Tuesday reiterated that economic pressure might be enough to halt Iran.

"I think there is a way to stop the Iranians from moving forward on their nuclear program without violent actions," the prime minister said in a speech to visiting American Jewish leaders.

If wide-ranging sanctions can "cause such damage to the Iranian economy — and we see some signs already — it will force them to reconsider," he said.

Israel's new stance was evident in December as its lobbying contributed to a United Nations Security Council decision to ban the sale to Iran of materials used in uranium enrichment, reprocessing and building ballistic missiles. Enriched uranium can be used to produce electricity or a nuclear bomb.

Despite misgivings about the risk of a backlash, Israel is helping the United States push broader voluntary sanctions to cut Iran's trade credits, oil investments and ties to foreign banks. In that effort, it is helping the U.S. Treasury Department monitor the activities of Iranian banks abroad.

"It might be bad for Israel and bad for American Jews for Israel to be seen as pushing for action on Iran," said Yossi Klein Halevi, a senior fellow at the Shalem Center, a research institute in Jerusalem. "But we don't have the luxury of time anymore."

Iran says it is seeking nuclear technology for civilian purposes. But because it kept its program secret for 18 years and has failed to comply with U.N. nuclear inspections, Iran is presumed by Israel and Western countries to be trying to acquire the technology to make a bomb.

If Iran achieves that threshold, it will radically alter the region, Israeli officials and analysts said.

Emboldened by the bomb, they said, Iran could provide Islamic militant movements Hezbollah and Hamas with longer-range and deadlier rockets to fire at Israel than the current stock of Katyushas and Kassams. It could also veto any Palestinian or other Arab effort to make peace with the Jewish state.

No longer a deterrent

DOJ_NMG_0128989

Israel's possession of nuclear weapons since the late 1960s, though rarely acknowledged by its leaders, has worked as a deterrent until now.

"For decades, the Arab countries … knew they couldn't beat Israel, so there was no coalition forming against us," said Maj. Gen. Amos Gilad, director of the Defense Ministry's Political-Military Bureau.

But soon, he said, "the Iranians could create a belief that they can beat us, and under their umbrella create an axis that will destabilize the Middle East."

Also, Sunni Arab countries — Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Algeria, Jordan and Libya — could strive to build atomic weapons to compete with Shiite Iran, making any regional conflict a potential nuclear tinderbox, he said.

In such an environment, many Israelis might flee. A December poll in the newspaper Maariv found that 27% of Israelis would leave or consider leaving if Iran acquired nuclear weapons. Two-thirds of those surveyed said they believed Iran would drop a nuclear weapon on Israel.

Apocalyptic scenarios involving Iran dominated last month's annual Herzliya conference, Israel's premier gathering of foreign policy, defense and security specialists. Participants pressed several U.S. presidential hopefuls on how they planned to thwart Iran's nuclear ambitions.

"I see a syndrome of America acting late," Sami Friedrich, an Israeli management consultant, lectured Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who joined the conference by video hookup from Washington. "America came in late in the Second World War. Now America accepts the diagnosis that it failed to imagine the worst with Al Qaeda. America has this worrying pattern."

Despite the anxiety, Israeli officials at the conference said they were hopeful that sanctions would force Iran to suspend its enrichment program.

They were encouraged by Ahmadinejad's setback in recent local elections, rising unemployment and inflation in Iran, and reports that domestic criticism of the president was escalating.

Vice Premier Shimon Peres told students in Qatar last week that Israel's problem was with Ahmadinejad, not the Iranian people, and it did not "intend to use military action."

If Ahmadinejad were to fall, "someone else would come to power, someone less hostile, and the question of whether they have nuclear capability will be less important," said Uri Lubrani, a former Israeli ambassador to Iran who advises the Defense Ministry and opposes military action.

That, however, appears to be a minority view in the government and defense establishment. Other officials and analysts argue that voluntary sanctions are unlikely to win full support from European countries and in any case would be undermined by Russia, China and India. They say time is too short and the stakes too high to bet solely on a change in government.

"We cannot sit back and wait for a revolution," said Isaac Ben-Israel, a reserve air force major general who heads Tel Aviv University's Security Studies Program.

Ben-Israel helped plan the 1981 Israeli air raid that destroyed Iraq's Osirak nuclear reactor. He said Israel had the capacity to set back Iran's atomic program by striking a few key targets, such as its uranium conversion facility at Esfahan, its enrichment facility at Natanz and its heavy-water reactor at Arak.

'A new front in Iran'

But Israel lacks the capability for a sustained offensive that might be needed to strike the bulk of Iran's facilities. Because of that, Ben-Israel and other officials say, Israel would prefer to join in an American-led attack on Iran — a scenario Bush has refused to rule out. But they worry that Bush has been so weakened at home by the Iraq war that "opening a new front in Iran may not be feasible for him," Ben-Israel said.

Israelis have been hinting strongly that they are prepared to act on their own. In an article in last week's issue of the New Republic, Halevi and Michael Oren, also a senior fellow at the Shalem Center, wrote that if Israel decided to strike, it would probably do so within 18 months.

Israel would wait long enough to give sanctions a chance to work, the authors predicted, but not so long that Iran's facilities would become radioactive, making the consequences of bombing them far more lethal.

Robert J. Einhorn, the assistant secretary of State for nonproliferation in the Clinton administration, said Israel's threats, coupled with the possibility of U.S. military action, could help bolster the push for sanctions.

"It's important that not only the Iranians believe the military option is credible," said Einhorn, who is a senior advisor at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a Washington think tank. "The more the Europeans believe the use of military force is thinkable in Iran, the more they will be prepared to use economic leverage to avoid that possibility.

"Israel is sounding the alarm with lots of countries, urging them to do all sorts of things," he said. But if those efforts fail, "they are going to have to decide whether to act unilaterally and militarily. That will be a very hard decision."

Iran's Economic Conditions Deteriorate (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0128990

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON — U.S. and Western pressure on Iran is squeezing its economy, feeding the inflation and joblessness that have swelled under its controversial president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Trade figures and other data have begun to reflect deepening economic isolation taking place as a result of U.S.-led efforts to penalize Tehran for what the United States alleges is the pursuit of nuclear weapons and sponsorship of terrorist groups.

For example, Iran's imports from Germany fell 14% in the first eight months of 2006, the German-Iranian Chamber of Commerce says. European Union countries account for 40% of Iran's imports, and Germany is Iran's largest European supplier, providing machinery, steel and electrical equipment, along with other goods.

German government export credits, used to finance trade, also fell by a third last year and are expected to drop again this year, said Ulrich Sante, a spokesman at the German Embassy in Washington.

"People who want to pursue legitimate commerce with the West will see that the policies Ahmadinejad is pursuing are leading to isolation and painting a more bleak economic future for the country," said Stuart Levey, U.S. Treasury undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence.

The United Nations Security Council imposed sanctions on Iran in December after Tehran failed to suspend uranium enrichment. The sanctions block exports that can be used in Iran's nuclear and missile programs and freeze assets of officials linked to those programs.

Separately, the Bush administration has cut off two Iranian banks from access to the U.S. financial system and dollar-based transactions on grounds that terrorists and weapons programs used accounts at those banks.

The United States has had no diplomatic relations with Iran and has restricted trade with Tehran since 1980, when Iran took U.S. Embassy personnel hostage.

Iran's economic challenges include:

·Banking restrictions. A half-dozen European banks have ended or restricted dollar dealings with Tehran to avoid jeopardizing business with the United States. Mohammad Jafar Mojarrad, vice governor of Iran's Central Bank, said most of the lenders continue dealing with Iran in other currencies.

Peter Pietsch, spokesman for giant German bank Commerzbank, said the institution halted dollar transactions with Iran on Jan. 31 but still conducts transactions with Iranians in euros.

Credit Suisse, a major Swiss-based financial services firm, stopped taking new clients in Iran in late 2005 "in light of the developments in the country … as well as to safeguard our reputation," spokeswoman Esther Gerster said.

·Rising import costs. Saeed Laylaz, a Tehran business consultant, said exporters require Iranian buyers to deposit the full amount of a transaction to obtain letters of credit, and that has added 8% to 12% to the cost of imports.

·Declining oil production. Oil Minister Kazem Vaziri-Hamaneh told the Iranian Student News Agency last year that Iran's annual oil output had declined by half a million barrels per day as the country struggled to pump from aging fields. Iran produces 3.9 million barrels per day and exports 2.4 million. Roger Stern, an economist at Johns Hopkins University, has predicted that Iranian oil exports could decline to zero by 2015 without a significant increase in investment or a decline in domestic consumption.

Mojarrad said Iran was taking steps to encourage new investment. He cited a $10 billion deal signed last month by Spain's Repsol and Royal Dutch Shell to develop an offshore Iranian field.

The Iranian economy continues to grow at a rate of more than 5% a year in inflation-adjusted figures, Mojarrad said. He said sanctions will hurt Americans more than Iranians by undermining the use of the dollar as a reserve currency, depressing its value and making U.S. imports more expensive.

Even before the latest sanctions, the Iranian president's rhetoric — calling for Israel to be destroyed — and defiance on the nuclear issue appeared to have a chilling effect on investment and trade.

Iran faced "a cooling off of the business environment in the last year because of the nuclear issue and the rhetoric" of Ahmadinejad, said Adam Pener of the Conflict Securities Advisory Group, a Washington-based consulting firm.

Laylaz said the sanctions have added to problems caused by Ahmadinejad's free-spending policies. Inflation — officially 12%, according to Iran's Central Bank — is likely to rise to 15% this year, Laylaz said.

Unemployment was 11.5% in the year ending in March, 1.2% higher than the previous year, according to the Iran Statistical Center. Food prices rose by a third from March to August, the cost of housing went up 14%, and the cost of medical care increased more than 18%, said Iran's Karafarin Bank, which provides overviews of the Iranian economy to the International Monetary Fund.

DOJ_NMG_0128991

Joblessness rose in spite of a 37% increase in Iran's hard currency earnings, derived mainly from oil. Iran's oil revenue was $50 billion last year. Oil revenue, taxes on oil and other oil-related income financed more than 70% of Iran's government spending, according to Karafarin Bank.

Challenging The Mullahs, One Signature At A Time (NYT)

By Maura J. Casey

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

"Well-behaved women rarely make history," my favorite bumper sticker says. It surely applies to Shirin Ebadi, the Iranian lawyer and 2003 Nobel Peace Prize winner whose relentless campaign against discrimination has enraged the mullahs for more than 25 years.

In a country where the law values a woman's life at only half the price of a man's, Ms. Ebadi will not be quiet, and she is urging other women to find their voices. Her newest effort is to help collect the signatures of one million Iranian women on a petition protesting their lack of legal rights.

The concept is simple and revolutionary, melding education, consciousness-raising and peaceful protest. Starting last year, women armed with petitions began to go to wherever other women gathered: schools, hair salons, doctors' offices and private homes.

Every woman is asked to sign. But whatever a woman decides, she receives a leaflet explaining how Iran's interpretation of Islamic law denies women full rights.

The material explains how Iran's divorce law makes it easy for men, and incredibly difficult for women, to leave a marriage, and how custody laws give divorced fathers sole rights to children above the age of 7.

Ms. Ebadi says the petition drive has already trained "400 young women to educate others" about these injustices. The movement, made up of a network of women's organizations and publications, has no formal leadership, in part to lessen the chances of retaliation. That didn't help three female journalists who were arrested late last month after they wrote articles for feminist publications backing the drive. They have since been released but will face a hearing in two months. Ms. Ebadi will defend them.

It's only natural to wonder how many more women will be arrested as they rebel, one signature at a time. And only natural to marvel about the courage of the 30,000 women who have already signed.

The movement is doing on a grand scale what Ms. Ebadi has done for her entire adult life. When I last spoke with her, eight years ago in her Tehran home, she had emerged as a tenacious human rights campaigner after being forced to step down as a judge by the Islamic revolution. She was blunt about the lack of freedom in Iran and well aware of the price for such outspokenness.

She's been arrested and imprisoned and the target of death threats. In New York in January for meetings at the United Nations, she was just as defiant and just as unafraid as I remembered. Winning the Nobel Prize has not given her immunity.

There's a lot to speak out about. When Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, is not propagating lies about the Holocaust or cheering on Iran's nuclear program, he's having independent journalists arrested. But he is not the only problem. Above him is the hard-line Council of Guardians and above it the supreme religious leader. The Council of Guardians vetoed legislation increasing civil liberties and banned most moderates from running for Parliament in 2004.

Given the breadth of the institutional opposition arrayed against them, the Change for Equality Petition Drive is especially clever. Rather than directly confronting the system, it goes around it. Even women who don't sign the petition will be better informed about their second-class status. The hope is that they will then be less likely to accept injustice indefinitely. And if Iran's women start questioning their lack of rights, perhaps Iran's men will have the courage to speak out, too.

The government certainly understands the implications. Just a few weeks ago, it blocked access to the campaign's Web site. But within hours the women had another Web site up and running.

Ms. Ebadi, the lifelong agitator, does not mask her pride or her belief that women's voices will someday make all the difference. "By getting one million signatures, the world will know we object to these conditions," she said. And I can't help but think that instead of one courageous woman for the government to contend with, it will have reaped a million.

Iraqi Premier Admits Errors In Introducing Security Plan In Baghdad (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 6 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki acknowledged for the first time on Tuesday that his government had stumbled in its efforts to carry out a new security plan in Baghdad and that the delays and mounting violence were hurting its credibility with the Iraqi people.

DOJ_NMG_0128992

"I feel that we are late," he said in an address to his senior military commanders that was broadcast live on Iraqi national television. "This delay is giving a negative impression and has led some people to say that we have already failed."

Pressure is increasing on the Maliki government to show signs of progress on the security plan that was announced more than a month ago, especially after three weeks of bloody violence that has killed 3,000 civilians.

Mr. Maliki made it clear to the commanders that they needed to show results soon. "I call on you to quickly finish the preparations so that we don't disappoint people," he said.

Mr. Maliki offered no reasons for the delay, but Iraqi military officials have expressed frustration over the slow pace and have cited several problems, including the failure of Iraqi troops from other parts of the country to arrive on schedule in Baghdad, the capital.

The choice of top commanders, drawn from the army and the police, has largely been settled, the officials said, but was slowed by sectarian disagreements, with Shiites objecting to Sunnis and Sunnis objecting to Shiites.

Integrating the Iraqi police force with the army, essential to the plan, remains a problem, officers say. Some Sunni neighborhoods remain off limits to the police, because they are thought to be deeply infiltrated by Shiite militias and are widely distrusted by Sunni residents.

The stepped up pace of the violence against Shiites since the plan was announced, which American and Iraqi officials say is part of a strategy by Sunni insurgents to undermine the government, has further convinced many Shiites that the Iraqi security forces are hapless.

Mr. Maliki told his commanders that they needed to be aggressive and to deploy their troops in force soon to combat that impression, and he promised that unspecified elements of the crackdown would start within days.

"We should not be late, because any more delay would raise suspicions about the military and police forces," he said.

Mr. Maliki has sought to put an Iraqi face on the new plan, but people whose lives have been torn apart by the bloodshed here have also blamed the Americans for failing to provide security. American officials have defended the pace of the operation, emphasizing that it involves a rolling buildup of forces that will take time.

On Tuesday, few signs indicated that anything had changed on the streets of Baghdad, aside from some new checkpoints scattered around the city. An aggressive clearing operation began Tuesday night in a Sunni neighborhood in eastern Baghdad. Iraqi officials said it was part of the new crackdown, but similar operations have been under way for weeks.

American military officials said one large event to signal the start of the crackdown was unlikely.

The violence continued Tuesday, though perhaps more slowly than in the past few days. An employee in the prime minister's office who was working on antiterrorism issues was killed, a police official said.

Three car bombs killed at least six people and wounded 17 more, gunmen killed two police officers, and 11 people were kidnapped from a house in the Sadr City section of Baghdad overnight.

Mr. Maliki's aides said that while they were frustrated by the delay, trying to rush the security plan into action before the forces were ready would only compound the problems.

"It could be like an abortion for this operation," said Sadiq al-Rikabi, a political adviser to the prime minister. "Finishing it before it starts."

American officers said the new plan, under which an additional 17,000 American forces are to be deployed in Baghdad, would not necessarily have an official start. They said it would be more accurate to describe the effort as a broader strategy shift that would put American troops in Baghdad neighborhoods in more aggressive ways, living and working with Iraqi troops.

The Americans are arriving in staggered intervals over months, and troops on the ground are beginning to carry out the new strategy, the officers said. In western Baghdad, American forces are living with Iraqi soldiers at new Joint Security Stations in two neighborhoods. More stations are under construction.

From the beginning, American officers have cautioned that the new plan would take time, because any chance of success rests on building trust with a population whose faith has been severely tested by nearly a year of vicious sectarian violence. But they know that time is not on their side.

"There have to be some early successes to establish momentum," said one battlefield commander, who like the others spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not designated to talk with reporters.

Despite the setbacks, the shape of the Iraqi side of the plan is coming into focus.

Last month, Mr. Maliki appointed Lt. Gen. Aboud Qanbar as the overall Iraqi commander for forces in Baghdad. General Qanbar, who had worked in the prime minister's office for six months on security issues, was not Mr. Maliki's first choice; that one was rejected by the Americans as too sectarian. But Mr. Maliki, in turn, rejected the candidate proposed by the Americans, leading to a bitter row that ultimately ended with the Americans accepting General Qanbar, who was largely unknown to them.

DOJ_NMG_0128993

But one of General Qanbar's chief selling points to Iraqi officials was precisely his relative obscurity since the American invasion in 2003. "There are many officers who could do the job better, but appointing them would have caused an uproar among the Sunnis," an Iraqi officer said.

Under the new plan, two other commanders will report directly to General Qanbar, one responsible for eastern Baghdad and the other responsible for western Baghdad. The Iraqis and the Americans have agreed on those appointments.

The plan also calls for Baghdad to be divided into nine security districts, each with a commander. Those choices were completed recently, Iraqi officials said.

Kuwait Court Convicts Iraqi Lawmaker In 1983 Bombings That Killed 5 Americans (NYT)

By James Glanz And Marc Santora

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 5 — A sitting member of Parliament was convicted more than two decades ago of planning the attacks on the American and French Embassies in Kuwait that left five Americans dead in 1983, Iraqi and American officials said Tuesday.

The Parliament member, Jamal Jafaar Mohammed Ali Ebrahimi, was sentenced to death in absentia by a court in Kuwait for the 1983 attacks. He was elected to Parliament in 2005 as a part of the Shiite coalition that now governs Iraq.

"We are actively investigating these serious allegations and continue to be in contact with the government of Iraq to pursue this case," said Lou Fintor, a spokesman for the American Embassy here.

Mr. Jamal, as he is known, served for a while as a security adviser to Iraq's first prime minister after the American invasion, Ibrahim al-Jafaari, officials in Washington said. It was then that they first suspected that he was involved in the 1983 embassy attacks. Their suspicions grew over the past year, and they are almost certain of the connection today.

It was unclear when American officials first raised the issue with the current prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, but one official said there have been discussions for at least several months.

The embassy bombings led to the kidnapping of at least seven Americans in Lebanon and several other terrorist acts aimed at freeing 17 prisoners under death sentences in Kuwait for the attacks. The hostage-taking also led to a scandal in the Reagan administration — famously involving the delivery of a cake in the shape of a key by a presidential envoy — as Washington sought the hostages' freedom with the offer of a secret arms deal to help Iran, which was then at war with Iraq.

Mr. Jamal, who was in Iraq until a week ago, is now in Iran, according to two associates. The presence of a wanted terrorist in the Parliament of Iraq's American-backed government is likely to be an embarrassment for the United States, particularly given Iran's role in sheltering Mr. Jamal.

The United States and Iran are locked in a standoff of sorts in Iraq. The United States has warned Iran against meddling in Iraq and American forces have detained a number of Iranians here on charges of providing assistance to illicit armed groups. Iran, a Shiite state with deep and longstanding ties to Iraq's Shiite political parties, has denied those charges and announced that it plans to expand its ties with Iraq.

Tensions between the rivals rose higher on Tuesday as Iran said it held the United States responsible for the safety of an Iranian diplomat kidnapped in Iraq two days before. Although the diplomat, Jalal Sharafi, was abducted on a Baghdad street by men wearing Iraqi military uniforms and with official identification, Iran has accused the United States of directing the operation. American officials deny any involvement.

"The Islamic Republic of Iran holds U.S. forces responsible for his safety and demands his immediate release," Iran's foreign ministry spokesman, Mohammad Ali Hosseini, told the ISNA news agency on Tuesday.

But Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a spokesman for the American-led forces in Iraq, said: "This specific event we don't have any knowledge of."

There was no news on Mr. Sharafi's fate on Tuesday.

How Mr. Jamal went unnoticed for so long in the Iraqi government was a mystery that Iraqi officials were at a loss to explain.

The story of how he came to power, his close association with many Iraqi officials, and his long association with Iran all underscore the complicated and intertwined nature of the relationship between the two nations.

Mr. Jamal, who also goes by the name Abu Mahdi al-Mohandis, meaning the engineer, was first identified as a wanted terrorist a month ago by Strategic Policy Consulting, an Iranian dissident group in Washington that gets much of its information from the People's Mujahedeen, the largest and most militant group opposed to Tehran.

However, it was only on Tuesday, when CNN confirmed the group's assertion, that American officials acknowledged they were investigating the case. But several Iraqi officials who know Mr. Jamal said there was little doubt that he was involved in the bombing in Kuwait.

Ali al-Timimi, a Shiite politician who met Mr. Jamal in the early 1980s and used to be a member of the same political party, the Supreme Council for Revolution in Iraq, or Sciri, said Mr. Jamal came back to Iraq shortly after the American invasion in 2003. Another Iraqi politician, insisting on anonymity, confirmed that Mr. Jamal worked for a time for Mr. Jafaari as his security adviser.

Mr. Jafaari, like Mr. Jamal and many other leading Iraqi officials, spent years in exile in Iran while Saddam Hussein, a Sunni, was in power. That was where Mr. Timimi got to know both men. His account was supported by one other Iraqi official who was an associate of Mr. Jamal's, but who insisted on anonymity.

Mr. Timimi said Mr. Jamal, who was from the southern city of Basra, left Iraq in 1979, fleeing to the Iranian town of Ahvaz, just across the border.

The Iranians, who were fighting a war with Iraq at the time, had set up a camp there to train Iraqi dissidents, with the ultimate goal of undermining Mr. Hussein. The bombing operation was opposed by some who worried about reprisals against the thousands of Iraqis in Kuwait without official papers. But Mr. Jamal "insisted on this operation and helped plan these attacks," Mr. Timimi said.

But the plotters outsourced the actual bomb making to a Lebanese cell, and among the 17 sentenced to death were three Lebanese, which spurred a series of hostage takings in Lebanon and other terrorist acts, which included the hijacking of a Kuwaiti airliner to Tehran in December 1984, in which two Americans aboard were killed.

The Kuwaiti government steadfastly refused either to free the prisoners or to execute them, but they are believed to have escaped in the confusion attendant with Saddam Hussein's invasion of Kuwait in 1990 and the subsequent American attack that drove the Iraqis out.

Terror Takes Toll On Market, Vendors (WT)

By James Palmer

The Washington Times, February 7, 2007

BAGHDAD -- Along a row of tables that crowd a bustling sidewalk, women in billowing black abayas sift through heaps of newly picked tomatoes, bell peppers, cucumbers, eggplant, carrots, cauliflower and potatoes.

Down the street, a fishmonger watches over a pushcart filled with carp feebly splashing in the cloudy water for their last breaths.

This is the Abu Shujaa Market in the Karrada district of central Baghdad, a nearly century-old mishmash of pushcarts, collapsible stalls and permanent shops.

Such marketplaces have become favorite targets for sectarian attacks, including a horrific suicide truck bombing Saturday that killed at least 135 persons -- the deadliest single assault in the 46 months of the war.

Police, ever on the watch for car bombs, prevent most vehicles from parking at the side of the road, while shop owners often place barricades along the curbs to prevent unfamiliar drivers from stopping in front of their businesses.

This area suffered five terrorist strikes last year, according to local residents and traders. Yesterday, merchants at Abu Shujaa complained that the deteriorating security had hurt their sales, even as their costs continue to climb.

Hamada Mohammed Ali, a 30-year-old produce vendor, said his daily earnings have fallen by half, to just under $100, since he inherited his sprawling stand from his father two years ago.

"Fewer people are coming by because they're afraid," Mr. Ali said, as he sat perched on a plastic crate above a scale and a set of metal measuring weights.

Uday Kasim, 29, who runs the butcher shop his family has owned since 1973, said many of his regular customers have left the country, and today he earns "just enough to live on." All of the lamb and beef Mr. Kasim sells in his shop must be hauled over increasingly dangerous roads from farms outside of the capital.

Rather than pay someone else, produce seller Hussein Gatti, 37, braves some of Iraq's most treacherous roads to secure his fruits and vegetables. The round trip to Mahmoudiya, 11 miles each way, often takes him more than two hours.

Other merchants say they are unable to cut their expenses and are on the verge of going broke.

Hassam Nadim, 37, who peddles housewares from a space approximately 20 feet deep and 5 feet wide, said he is behind on last month's rent of roughly $230.

"My business is down because of the explosions, but the government is doing nothing to protect us," Mr. Nadim complained.

The one sector that appears to be thriving in the market is the pharmaceutical industry. Akram Najy, 69, a pharmacist here for four decades, said prescriptions for sedatives remain steady, and demand for cold medications at this time of year is as high as ever.

DOJ_NMG_0128995

The shoppers, for their part, grumble that rising prices are forcing them to limit their purchases to essential items, and the constant threat of car bombs and mortars deters them from lingering in one place.

Abdul Razak, a 61-year-old clerk in the Agriculture Ministry, said he can afford to spend only little more than $23 a day to feed a household of 12. "I buy vegetables every day, but I can only afford fruit once a week."

Mr. Ali, the produce vendor, said he has raised his prices 10 percent to compensate for his dwindling customer base, so now a pound of potatoes or tomatoes at his stand costs roughly 37 cents.

As a consequence, shoppers have little left to spend with people like 28-year-old fishmonger Raad Ahmed. "I can't sell more than 15,000 dinars ($11.63) a day," Mr. Ahmed said.

For the enterprising, however, there are opportunities created by the chronically faltering infrastructure.

Waleed Khalid now sells 12 kerosene lanterns a day on the sidewalk outside of his brother's hardware shop.

"I came out to sell these things because no one was coming into the shop," said the 26-year-old Mr. Khalid.

U.S. Mulls Iraq Refugees (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, February 7, 2007

The State Department said yesterday it will re-examine U.S. policy on the admission of Iraqi refugees, likely leading to a sharp increase in the number it admits each year.

A task force set up by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice this week also will try to resettle in the United States some Iraqi employees of the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad, whose lives are in danger because of their work for Americans.

The steps follow sharp criticism from humanitarian organizations and members of Congress, who note that Middle Eastern countries are struggling with a flood of Iraqi refugees while the United States has admitted only 466 since the war began in 2003.

"Clearly, there is a need that exists, and there are problems that need to be addressed," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters, saying it was too early to discuss how many Iraqis the United States can absorb.

"We want to do what is appropriate, what is right under our obligations under the U.N. Charter in providing our fair share of relief for those individuals who have been classified as refugees," he said.

Supporters of the existing policy have warned that hostile elements such as al Qaeda terrorists might try to enter the United States posing as refugees. Mr. McCormack did not say what steps might be taken to screen the applicants.

The U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), a Geneva-based agency that determines who qualifies as a refugee, estimates that at least 1.6 million Iraqis are internally displaced and up to 1.8 million have fled to neighboring countries. Those figures include people displaced before 2003.

"Between January and mid-November 2006, an estimated 425,000 Iraqis fled their homes for other areas inside Iraq, most of them following sectarian violence sparked by the bombing of an important Shia mosque in February 2006," the UNHCR said last month.

"At midyear, internal displacement was estimated to be continuing at a rate of some 50,000 a month," it said.

According to UNHCR rules, only those in a foreign country at the time of their application qualify for refugee status. Once the agency grants applicants that status, it starts to look for countries willing to take them in. Most Iraqi refugees are now in Jordan, Syria and Egypt.

Critics of the administration have argued that the United States has a moral responsibility to admit many more Iraqi refugees than the 466 accepted so far because their suffering is directly related to the conditions in Iraq created by the U.S. invasion.

"Washington is spending about $2 billion per week on the war in Iraq, but has barely begun to address the human fallout from the war," Bill Frelick, refugee-policy director at Human Rights Watch, said last month.

The United States admitted almost 1 million Vietnamese in the years before and after the fall of Saigon in 1975. Many who had worked with U.S. forces were brought to America immediately, while tens of thousands more fled as "boat people" and came to the United States after being processed at camps in the Philippines and elsewhere.

There were no large-scale refugee movements after the Persian Gulf War in 1991.

Mr. McCormack did not agree that the United States has a moral obligation in the case of the Iraqis, saying the plight of those fleeing their homes is a "shared global responsibility." He also noted that many Iraqis were displaced by Saddam Hussein's regime before the war.

Congress has mandated that the United States absorb 70,000 refugees this year, and 50,000 of those slots have been allocated among geographic regions. The remaining 20,000 have no specific designation, and the administration plans to use some of those slots to accommodate Iraqis, officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0128996

The new task force, which will be chaired by Paula J. Dobriansky, undersecretary of state for democracy and global affairs, also will try to help Iraqis working for the U.S. government in Iraq, most of whom have either lost family members or had their lives threatened.

Mr. McCormack said those Iraqis would be granted a "special immigrant visa," but it was not clear how that would be worked out legally. There are two main tracks for obtaining such a visa -- through employment or a family reunion.

In rare circumstances, an applicant can receive what is known as a "genius visa" for exceptional abilities in arts or sciences. Even more seldom, Congress can bestow permanent resident status on someone if it determines that it would be in the U.S. national interest.

Mr. McCormack would not say whether the Iraqis would be offered employment with the government. He cited an existing Pentagon program for Iraqis who have worked for the U.S. military.

"It is allowing people to emigrate to the United States based on meeting a certain set of conditions, the most important of which is some length of service working for the United States government," he said.

Refugees Are An Overlooked Casualty Of Iraq War (USAT)

By Behzad Yaghmaian

USA Today, February 7, 2007

Casualties of the war in Iraq are many; among them are the 3.8 million refugees (including some who fled before the U.S. invasion) and internally displaced people. They are the hidden victims of the war in Iraq.

Not long ago, in 1991, the first Gulf War produced another massive refugee crisis in Iraq. Encouraged by the promise of U.S. support, millions of Iraqis responded to President George H.W. Bush's call "to take matters into their own hands and force Saddam Hussein … to step aside." These Iraqis fought the good fight, but U.S. support did not materialize.

Hussein responded by sending troops to quell the rebellion by Kurds in the north and Shiites in the south. Scores of Kurdish refugees were killed by Iraqi soldiers or died on snow-covered slopes. What ended this crisis were the horrific images of stranded Kurdish refugees aired on CNN, which resulted in the declaration of a no-fly zone in Northern Iraq.

Now, the United States and its allies again have caused a refugee crisis in Iraq — "the largest population movement in the Middle East since Palestinians were displaced following the creation of the state of Israel in 1948," according to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR). But this time, CNN's cameras are missing.

Forgotten refugees queue outside foreign embassies and the offices of the UNHCR in Syria and Jordan, pleading for acceptance as refugees by the West. The UNHCR estimates there are between 500,000 and 1 million Iraqi refugees in Syria, 700,000 in Jordan, 40,000 in Lebanon and 20,000-80,000 in Egypt; 1.8 million are internally displaced. But these refugees face closed doors everywhere.

The Iraqis probably could have seen this coming. Afghan refugees faced a similar fate after the fall of the Taliban in 2001. Afghanistan was soon declared a safe country. Western states encouraged refugees to return home to rebuild their country. For most, it didn't work out. Soon scores of Afghans were driven from their places of birth and forced to wander elsewhere in the world for refuge.

This seems to be the future that awaits Iraqi refugees. Only 466 have been granted resettlement in the USA in the past two years. The situation is not much better in Great Britain. Evidently, to allow admission to refugees is to accept failure in establishing democracy in Iraq.

The long-term solution depends on ending the violence, restoring stability and generating jobs. Because peace is highly unlikely anytime soon, Iraqi refugees require immediate attention. But the U.N.'s refugee office is understaffed and underfunded. For example, in Syria, UNHRC's budget last year was less than $1 per Iraqi refugee.

It is critical that Western nations finance a special Iraqi Refugee Fund that would let the U.N. process an increasing number of Iraqi applicants seeking resettlement. A part of the fund could be given to Syria and Jordan to help them provide temporary housing, health care, education and other basic needs to refugees. Western nations should increase the number of Iraqis they accept for temporary or permanent resettlement.

U.S. embassies in Syria and Jordan should run their own resettlement programs, clearing the most vulnerable Iraqis. Using similar resettlement programs, hundreds of thousands of Vietnamese were resettled in the United States after U.S. forces withdrew from Vietnam in 1975; 840 Iraqis were granted admission after the first Gulf War in 1991.

Helping to solve the current crisis is a moral obligation of those who contributed to its creation. The Iraqi refugee crisis and its solution must become an integral part of the public debate about the U.S. involvement in Iraq.

Behzad Yaghmaian is author of Embracing the Infidel: Stories of Muslim Migrants on the Journey West and professor of political economy at New Jersey's Ramapo College.

DOJ_NMG_0128997

Tape Recounts U.S. Attack That Killed British Soldier (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 6 — The videotape is jolting enough, but it is the audio portion — the conversation between two American pilots in Iraq — that is most unnerving.

In the 2003 recording, seconds after the pilots congratulate themselves for having hit enemy armored vehicles, they learn that they have in fact struck their British allies, killing one soldier and wounding others.

They fall apart in a duet of shock, panicked swearing and audible weeping. “I’m going to be sick,” one says. “We’re in jail, dude.”

The material became public on Tuesday when the newspaper The Sun published a leaked transcript of the cockpit conversation and posted the video on its Web site. As a result, the American military announced later in the day that it would permit the videotape to be shown to the British coroner’s court investigating the circumstances surrounding the death of the soldier who had been killed in the incident, Lance Cpl. Matty Hull, a member of the Household Cavalry Regiment.

Four other members of the regiment were wounded in the attack, on March 28, 2003, while the convoy was on a reconnaissance mission near Basra in southern Iraq.

The United States military investigated the incident soon afterward, and no charges were brought against the two pilots, both members of the Idaho National Guard, said Lt. Col. Teresa Connor, a spokeswoman for United States Central Command.

“The incident took place in a complex combat situation, and the pilots followed all the appropriate procedures and processes for engaging targets,” she said in an interview. “They verified with the ground controller, and verified visually, and reverified.”

The transcript shows that the pilots repeatedly asked about the orange panels on the roofs of the tanks below — an indicator, usually, that the vehicles belonged to allied forces — and were repeatedly told that there were no “friendlies,” or allies, in the area. It was not until they had fired twice on the convoy, setting fire to the tanks, that the information changed, and they were told they had instigated a “blue on blue” incident, hitting British troops.

“I don’t think you could find anyone more remorseful than those two pilots,” Colonel Connor said. “If you listen to the words, you hear very much remorse immediately.”

It is standard practice in Britain to hold inquests when soldiers die in combat, and this one, which opened on Jan. 30, has been singular in its implicit criticism of the unwillingness of the authorities — particularly the American authorities — to provide information about Lance Corporal Hull’s death. The Americans gave the British authorities the tape in 2003. Last week, the coroner, Andrew Walker, asked the British Defense Ministry to release the recording and transcript of the cockpit conversation.

But the ministry argued that it had no choice in the matter.

“The U.K. is not authorized to release documents subject to U.S. classification without U.S. authority, and the decision as to whether that authority can be given is being addressed urgently,” a lawyer for the ministry told the court last week.

In a burst of anger, Mr. Walker said: “This is a simple matter, and I simply fail to understand why it is proving so difficult to resolve. At the heart of this matter is a grieving family who have already had to wait far too long for this inquest.”

On Friday, he said he planned to adjourn the inquest until the recording was released.

The release of the material by The Sun — under the headline “Top Secret Video Nails U.S. Friendly Fire Pilots Who Killed Our Matty” — broke the impasse, but put the Americans on the defensive.

“We were working through the issues at the time this story broke,” Colonel Connor said. “The process never had a chance to unfold.”

Asked why no Americans had testified at the inquest, David Johnson, deputy chief of mission at the United States Embassy here, said it was not American policy to bring soldiers into civilian courts to answer questions about combat.

The United States had “cooperated fully with the military authorities,” he said on the Today radio program.

'I Think They're Rocket Launchers' (WP)

By Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 6 -- A dramatic cockpit recording leaked to a British newspaper captures two American pilots reacting in horror and disbelief after one of them mistakenly fired on a convoy of British armored vehicles in Iraq. Told that an allied soldier has died, a pilot is heard saying, "I'm going to be sick" and "We're in jail, dude."

The friendly-fire incident that killed Lance Cpl. Matty Hull, 25, occurred on March 28, 2003, eight days into the Iraq invasion, but the recording was made public only Tuesday by the Sun newspaper. The U.S. government had declined to declassify it. But recently a British coroner investigating the corporal's death demanded that the recording, a cockpit video, be presented as evidence, suspending his proceedings until it was produced.

DOJ_NMG_0128998

In Britain, where the Iraq war is highly unpopular, the video caused an uproar with its vivid depiction of an attack that some people here say could have been avoided. Hull's family has expressed anger over his death.

Hours after the video was posted to the Sun's Web site and clips were aired on British television, the Pentagon said it would release the recording to the coroner and the family. Des Browne, the British defense secretary, welcomed the decision, saying, "The release of classified information, even for the closest of allies, is never straightforward, but this is the right thing to do."

While there have been numerous friendly-fire incidents, the U.S. government rarely releases video and audio recordings related to them. "If you show certain tactics and capabilities, of course your enemy can see it, too," said Air Force Lt. Col. Teresa Connor, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Central Command.

The Sun said there had been a half-million downloads of the recording by late afternoon.

The 15-minute video shows the view forward from the cockpit of an A-10 Thunderbolt attack jet, as well as computerized flight data. Its audio track includes the voices of the jet's pilot, the pilot of another A-10 flying in tandem, the voices of several U.S. ground controllers and the sounds of the attacking aircraft's guns.

The two pilots are heard asking a ground controller if there are any friendly troops in the area near Basra where they are patrolling. The answer comes back: "You are well clear of friendlies."

Because of mistaken attacks in past conflicts, friendly vehicles advancing into Iraq were being marked by orange panels visible from the sky.

One of the U.S. pilots who has spotted a convoy of vehicles remarks: "They got something orange on top of them." Later, he says, "I think they're rocket launchers."

One of the jets strafes the vehicles with rapid-fire cannons, then stages a second attack. Shortly afterward, another ground controller is heard telling the pilots: "You have friendly armor in the area."

The pilots are told to abort the mission and, audibly upset and using profane language, are heard asking for word on the condition of the men on the ground whom they have just attacked.

Connor, the U.S. military spokeswoman, said an investigation had determined that "appropriate procedures for engaging targets" were followed. She said no disciplinary action was taken against the pilots or other U.S. personnel involved in the incident. None has been publicly identified.

She also said that just before this incident, the two pilots, from the 190th Fighter Squadron of the Idaho Air National Guard, had "engaged enemy targets" nearby.

David Johnson, deputy chief of mission at the U.S. Embassy in London, said in an interview that the recording makes clear the pilots' reaction of "revulsion and horror" after "this extraordinary tragedy."

Being attacked by one's own forces or allies has always been a problem in warfare, but it has intensified with the technological advances of the last century. An estimated 75,000 French soldiers were killed by their own artillery during World War I, according to the Oxford Companion to Military History. The advent of air power added to the problem: The highest-ranking U.S. casualty of World War II, Lt. Gen. Leslie J. McNair, was killed by an American bombing in France.

Just five days before Hull was killed, A-10 fire was mistakenly directed against Marines near the Iraqi city of Nasiriyah. A Central Command report a year later said that of the 18 Marines killed, eight were hit by Iraqi fire and it could not be determined conclusively how the others died.

British officials say the mistaken attack near Basra targeted a convoy of five reconnaissance tanks and wounded four soldiers in addition to killing Hull. One soldier in the convoy, Trooper Christopher Finney, was given the British award for gallantry, the George Cross, for pulling a wounded soldier from a burning tank and then, despite being wounded, trying to rescue Hull.

Mike Hull, Matty Hull's grandfather, said in a telephone interview that he believed "some disciplinary action" should have been taken against the U.S. pilots. He said that while it is "disheartening" to watch the video, "it is time the truth came out." The family has said that British officials told them no such video existed.

Matty Hull's wife, Susan, said she was glad the recording was now in the open.

The British Defense Ministry issued a statement Tuesday saying that "there has never been any intention to deliberately deceive or mislead" Hull's family and that it had informed them that "some classified material had been withheld, but we did not specify its exact nature."

Abu Ghraib Trial Date Set (WT/AP)

By David Dishneau

DOJ_NMG_0128999

The Washington Times, February 7, 2007

The only U.S. military officer charged with crimes in the Abu Ghraib prison-abuse scandal would stand trial in July, under a tentative schedule set at a hearing yesterday.

Army Lt. Col. Steven L. Jordan, former director of an interrogation center at the prison in Iraq, would be tried from July 9 to July 20 at Fort Meade in Maryland, according to the schedule set by the judge, Army Col. Stephen R Henley. The judge also ordered a pretrial hearing March 12 at Fort McNair in the District.

Col. Jordan, 50, is seeking dismissal of eight charges, which carry up to 22 years in prison. The judge deferred ruling on Col. Jordan's claim that the government had exceeded a 120-day limit between charging him April 28 and arraigning him Jan. 30. The rules allow for exclusions.

The judge likely will rule within days on the dismissal motion, said Lt. Col. Patricia Lewis, a military justice specialist.

Col. Jordan, a reservist from Northern Virginia, isn't in custody but remains on involuntary, extended active duty at the Intelligence and Security Command at Fort Belvoir, Va.

Col. Jordan directed the interrogation center at Abu Ghraib in fall 2003.

He is accused of failing to exert his authority as prisoners were stripped naked, photographed in humiliating poses and intimidated by military dogs. He also is accused of lying to investigators about abuses he is said to have witnessed.

The charges include cruelty and maltreatment, disobeying a superior officer, dereliction of duty and making false statements.

Col. Jordan's defense at a hearing in October was that he had no operational control over investigations and spent much of his time at Abu Ghraib trying to improve soldiers' living conditions.

Capt. Samuel Spitzberg, the leader of Col. Jordan's three-man defense team, argued that Col. Jordan, a divorced father of three, has suffered ostracism and forced separation from his family as a result of having his active duty extended since the Abu Ghraib investigation began in early 2004.

"It has been years since Lt. Col. Jordan has been waiting and waiting and waiting to find out what happens, and the emotional strain of that cannot be ignored," he said.

The prosecution team yesterday gained a third member, Capt. Stefan Wolfe, an Army lawyer assigned to the Military District of Washington.

The only witness called was Col. Thomas A. Allmon, a garrison commander at Fort Myer, Va., who acknowledged that he had considered recommending in December that Col. Jordan's case be handled as an administrative, rather than criminal, matter.

But Col. Allmon changed his mind and recommended a general court-martial after conferring with both sides and the officer who presided in October at Col. Jordan's Article 32 hearing, the military version of a preliminary hearing.

Afghan Forces Capture Suspected Al-Qaida (WP/AP)

The Washington Post/AP, February 7, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan -- Coalition forces captured two suspected al-Qaida members during an early morning raid in eastern Afghanistan on Wednesday, a military statement said. Afghan officials said soldiers captured six men and killed one person during the raid.

The raid near the town of Hakimabad in Nangarhar province was conducted based on information provided "about an al-Qaida member known to pass correspondence for al-Qaida senior leaders," the U.S.-led coalition said in a statement.

The two Afghan men were taken into custody to determine their association with al-Qaida, the statement said.

Ghafoor Khan, the spokesman for the provincial police chief, said coalition troops shot and killed one person during the raid, and that six people were detained and taken away. He said the raid took place 10 miles south of Jalalabad.

The reason for the discrepancy in the number arrested was not immediately clear.

Several militant groups including al-Qaida, the Taliban, and fighters for warlord Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, operate in eastern Afghanistan. The groups do not always operate together, though they may share the same goals.

The military did not say who executed the raid, but U.S. Special Forces soldiers operate under the banner of "coalition forces" in Afghanistan. Coalition forces work under a separate command structure than NATO's International Security Assistance Force.

In the western province of Herat, meanwhile, three police died and one was injured while attempting to disarm a roadside bomb discovered in Shindand district, said Interior Ministry spokesman Zemeri Bashary.

Taliban Still Controls South Afghan Town (AP)

By Fisnik Abrashi,
AP, February 7, 2007

Taliban militants remain in control of a southern Afghan town nearly a week after capturing it, but NATO expects the Afghan government to soon reassert its authority there, an alliance spokesman said Wednesday.

Some 200 people have fled the southern town of Musa Qala after militants captured it last week, said Col. Tom Collins, a spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force.

The Taliban fighters — whose local leader was killed in a NATO airstrike on Sunday — are operating in the town center but are not reinforcing their presence there, Collins said.

The town was peaceful for four months following an October peace deal between village elders and the Helmand provincial government. The deal prevented NATO, Afghan and Taliban fighters from coming within 3 miles of the town center.

Last Thursday, a group of some 200 militants moved into town, disarmed the local police force, destroyed the district center and temporarily held the local elders hostage.

Collins said NATO troops stand ready to help the government again take control of the town but that there "is no need to rush to action here."

"We are confident that the government of Afghanistan, with ISAF's support, will take back Musa Qala at a time and place that is most advantageous" to them, Collins said.

Coalition forces, meanwhile, captured two suspected al-Qaida members during an early morning raid in eastern Afghanistan on Wednesday, a military statement said. Afghan officials said soldiers captured six men and killed one person during the raid.

The raid near the town of Hakimabad in Nangarhar province was conducted based on information provided "about an al-Qaida member known to pass correspondence for al-Qaida senior leaders," the U.S.-led coalition said in a statement.

The two Afghan men were taken into custody to determine their association with al-Qaida, the statement said.

Ghafoor Khan, the spokesman for the provincial police chief, said coalition troops shot and killed one person during the raid, and that six people were detained and taken away. He said the raid took place 10 miles south of Jalalabad.

The reason for the discrepancy in the number arrested was not immediately clear.

Several militant groups including al-Qaida, the Taliban, and fighters for warlord Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, operate in eastern Afghanistan. The groups do not always operate together, though they may share the same goals.

The military did not say who executed the raid, but U.S. Special Forces soldiers operate under the banner of "coalition forces" in Afghanistan. Coalition forces work under a separate command structure than NATO's International Security Assistance Force.

In Kandahar province, a remote-controlled bomb exploded next to a car carrying Afghan security guards Wednesday, killing two of them and wounding six, said Abdul Khaliq, who was riding in the convoy.

The attack happened in the district of Neven as the convoy was transporting supplies for a NATO base in Helmand, Khaliq said.

In the western province of Herat, meanwhile, three police died and one was injured while attempting to disarm a roadside bomb discovered in Shindand district, said Interior Ministry spokesman Zemeri Bashary.

Gates Bracing For More Afghan Violence (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor
AP, February 7, 2007

Defense Secretary Robert Gates said Tuesday that NATO allies must provide the troops and equipment needed to battle an expected increase in violence by Taliban insurgents in Afghanistan this spring.

Gates, who will meet with other NATO defense ministers Thursday in Seville, Spain, is expected to outline whether the U.S. plans to adjust its troop levels in Afghanistan or extend the deployment of any units already there, said a senior defense official.

The defense official spoke on condition of anonymity because details have not been made public. Currently there are about 27,000 U.S. troops in Afghanistan, the highest number since the start of the war in 2001.

At a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing Tuesday, Gates said the U.S. will hold the NATO countries to promises they offered during a summit in Riga, Latvia, last November, particularly for more trainers.

His comments come about two weeks after the Defense Department said 3,200 soldiers from the New York-based 10th Mountain Division already in Afghanistan would have their tour extended by four months. Defense officials have not ruled out extending other units, but a recent increase of U.S. troops in Iraq for a new push to secure Baghdad is already straining the military.

DOJ_NMG_0129001

The defense official said the U.S. is looking for an increased level of effort by the NATO allies in Afghanistan, and fewer war-fighting restrictions place on forces by their home countries.

About 15,000 of the U.S. troops in Afghanistan are serving in the NATO-led force, which now totals about 36,000 from 37 different countries.

Some of the NATO forces, however, are limited in what they can do. Some, for example, are restricted to specific regions of the country, or — because of training or equipment issues — can't perform certain missions or fight at night. U.S. officials have consistently argued that the restrictions must be lifted in order to successfully fight the insurgency.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., told Gates at the hearing that the U.S. needs to tell its allies "that we need a lot more from them than we're getting, not only in rules of engagement for the troops, but also in various commitments they have made, such as assistance in setting up judiciary."

After the meeting in Seville, Gates will travel to Munich for an annual meeting of the world's top security officials.

GOP Lawmakers Press Bush On Afghanistan (LAT)

By Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON — Four ranking Republican lawmakers on a committee with oversight of U.S. policy in Afghanistan are calling on the Pentagon and State Department to dramatically change their tactics in that country to better contain its growing insurgency and flow of opium to the rest of the world.

In a letter dated today, the GOP House members are urging the Bush administration to act quickly to counter a host of problems in Afghanistan that they say are being made worse by mismanagement and misplaced priorities. They are calling for the appointment of a special coordinator of overall narco-terrorism policy for Afghanistan to prevent losing the fight against insurgents and drug traffickers.

The letter describes in detail how various U.S. agencies such as the Pentagon, State Department and Drug Enforcement Administration are not working together and essentially are fighting separate wars against insurgents and drugs even though they believe that the booming heroin trade is fueling the insurgency and financing terrorist attacks.

"As we will soon face another massive opium harvest in Afghanistan, and a related spring offensive by anti-coalition militants (ACMs), it is time for some new thinking to ensure that Afghanistan does not fall into a failed narco-state status and become, once again, a safe haven for Al Qaeda. We need to act now to prevent that," wrote Reps. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.), Mike Pence (R-Ind.), Elton Gallegly (R-Simi Valley) and Dana Rohrabacher (R-Huntington Beach), all members of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The letter was sent late Tuesday to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, with copies delivered to the White House, DEA, Office of National Drug Control Policy and the British government, said a senior congressional staffer who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the letter.

The four Republicans say they may introduce legislation to enact and fund some of their proposals, but urge the White House to quickly implement other policy changes on its own. Democrats in Congress also have complained about rising drug trafficking and the growing insurgency in Afghanistan.

White House national security spokesman Gordon Johndroe said he had not seen the letter and could not comment on the lawmakers' requests. But he said the administration had been actively reassessing its policies in Afghanistan in recent months as part of a comprehensive "strategic review," which prompted senior officials to call for at least $10.6 billion in additional funding for Afghanistan over the next two years.

The new funding was a recognition "that we needed to make a larger effort … so that we can help the Afghan government succeed and we can defeat the Taliban," Johndroe said. "But obviously our counter-terrorism and counter-narcotics programs in Afghanistan work hand in hand. This is something that our people are coordinating on the ground."

The additional funding, though much needed in Afghanistan, is virtually worthless without a coordinated policy that ensures that all U.S. counter-terrorism and counter-narcotics agencies are working together, and not against each other, the senior congressional official asserted. "We have so many different views of narcotics within our own government and with our allies that somebody has to bang everybody's heads together and get something done on this," the staffer said. "We are out of time, and losing Afghanistan."

The Republican House members also said the United States must resolve a growing dispute with Britain over how to best fight the booming opium trade. British authorities who are now in charge of much of the counter-narcotics effort in Afghanistan are refusing to go along with a controversial U.S. policy to eradicate entire fields of poppy by aerial spraying.

DOJ_NMG_0129002

Britain, as well as the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, which leads the forces battling the insurgency in Afghanistan, believes the U.S. policy is dangerous because it alienates farmers and the population at large and undermines Western efforts to turn them against the narco-traffickers and the Taliban, several U.S. and British counter-terrorism officials said.

The senior congressional staffer said the four lawmakers didn't want to get into the middle of the dispute over whether poppy eradication should be stopped. Instead, they want the U.S. government and its allies to more forcefully go after kingpins who preside over global narcotics trafficking enterprises that together bring in more than $2 billion a year in wholesale drug profits.

They are urging the Bush administration to force the Pentagon to provide more operational assistance to DEA agents operating in Afghanistan and to order the arrests of senior-level drug traffickers under a provision of the Patriot Act passed last year that allows such suspects to be extradited to the United States for prosecution.

A similar campaign has worked well in Colombia and is urgently needed in Afghanistan because that country has no judicial infrastructure to prosecute drug traffickers, the lawmakers say. "We must establish deterrence where none now exists," their letter says.

They also are urging the Pentagon to make good on a promise to provide at least eight Russian-made Mi-17 helicopters to Afghan authorities and their U.S. counter-narcotics advisors for the drug war, along with qualified pilots and maintenance and operational support.

"We have waited long enough to get this vital air lift…," the lawmakers' letter says. "We need someone put in charge of getting this done now, enough time has gone by already."

Official Hits U.S. For Afghan Missive (WT)

By John Phillips

The Washington Times, February 7, 2007

ROME -- Foreign Minister Massimo D'Alema yesterday protested an open letter to a Rome newspaper from U.S. Ambassador Ronald P. Spogli and five other envoys urging Italy to maintain its troop deployment in Afghanistan.

Mr. D'Alema, a former communist who, as prime minister in 1999, won NATO's trust with his support for the bombing of Kosovo, called the letter an "irregular" departure from normal diplomatic procedures. The letter also was signed by the ambassadors of Australia, Britain, Canada, the Netherlands and Romania.

Prime Minister Romano Prodi's center-left government is struggling to maintain its deployment of 1,938 troops in Afghanistan in the face of opposition from Communists and Greens in the Cabinet, three of whom abstained when the Cabinet voted to refinance the mission last month.

Mr. Prodi has withdrawn most Italian troops from Iraq, and his government's razor-thin majority in the Senate could collapse if the dissident coalition members follow through on threats to vote against the Afghan refinancing.

"There are more appropriate bodies in which to discuss Italy's commitment in Afghanistan rather than through open letters from ambassadors to daily newspapers," Mr. D'Alema snorted during a visit to Seoul.

In Washington, the State Department said the letter was "a praiseworthy initiative" by the U.S. envoy.

Mr. D'Alema last night sent his own letter to the six envoys, expressing "surprise and disapproval" at their decision to make their missive public. Gianfranco Fini, a spokesman for the opposition, fired back, telling Mr. D'Alema, "What was irregular was your angry response."

A Canadian Embassy spokesman rejected speculation in the Italian press that Mr. Spogli had pressured his fellow ambassadors to sign the letter.

"It is true that the Americans had a guiding role in the affair, but the letter was born out of exchanges of views between the various ambassadors on the spot," the spokesman said. "It was totally shared by all of us."

Some Italian newspapers speculated that the ambassadors of France, Germany and Spain also had been approached but had declined to sign the letter because their governments were uncomfortable with a NATO appeal for increased troop deployments in Afghanistan.

Foreign Ministry sources said they were aware that Mr. Spogli and his recently arrived British counterpart, Edward Chaplin, planned to ask Italy to assign its troops in Afghanistan to more front-line duties.

Sources said Mr. D'Alema heard nothing more until he received a call in Japan informing him that the letter from the six envoys had been published in the left-leaning newspaper La Repubblica.

Problems Stall Pentagon's New Fighting Vehicle (WP)

By Renae Merle

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0129003

After 10 years and $1.7 billion, this is what the Marines Corps got for its investment in a new amphibious vehicle: A craft that breaks down about an average of once every 4 1/2 hours, leaks and sometimes veers off course.

And for that, the contractor, General Dynamics of Falls Church, received $80 million in bonuses.

The amphibious vehicle, which can be launched from a ship and then driven on land, is so unreliable that the Pentagon is ditching plans to begin building the first of more than 1,000 and wants to start over with seven new prototypes, which will take nearly two years to deliver, at a cost of $22 million each.

The Expeditionary Fighting Vehicle is one of the Pentagon's largest weapons programs and exemplifies the agency's struggle to afford a cadre of new mega-systems that are larger and more complex, but also more trouble, than their predecessors.

Despite reforms meant to rein in costs, it is not unusual for weapons programs to go 20 to 50 percent over budget, the Government Accountability Office recently found. Among the offenders is the Army's sprawling modernization program, which aims to update everything from tanks to drones and is now expected to cost $160 billion, up from $90 billion, and a Lockheed Martin missile-warning satellite program, which is projected to cost more than $10 billion, up from $4 billion.

The Marines' troubled program is on a collision course with critics who are wary of its growing price tag and who wonder about the utility of an amphibious vehicle meant to storm beaches in a way the military hasn't done for decades, at a time when soldiers are consumed with urban warfare in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The Marines, though, have not been dissuaded by the vehicle's poor showing in tests, as such fits and starts are common in military development programs.

"We were disappointed. We weren't shocked," program manager Col. John Bryant said.

The cost of the amphibious vehicle effort has increased 50 percent, to about $12 billion from $8 billion, with another cost bump projected after the program is relaunched.

The overruns are eating away at the Pentagon's buying power but not its appetite. The amount the Pentagon plans to spend on major weapons systems has doubled in the past five years, to $1.4 trillion from $700 billion, according to the GAO.

"I would never state, in an enterprise this large, that we ever have it all under control," Kenneth Krieg, the Pentagon's acquisition chief, said in a December interview. "I think we're on a good path and only performance will prove that, and that's what we got to do."

When it was launched in 1996, the Expeditionary Fighting Vehicle was promoted as an example of acquisition reform as hundreds of General Dynamics and Marine Corps officials moved into the same 62,000-square-foot office building in Woodbridge to run the program, in hopes of saving time and money. The program's efforts to keep maintenance costs low won plaudits from Defense leaders and twice earned the program the Pentagon's highest acquisition award, in 1997 and 1999. In 2001, the program collected an innovation award for developing a system to keep the craft's internal components from overheating, a technology that has been adopted for other weapons.

But the program has struggled with repeated delays, cost increases, budget cuts and dashed expectations, according to military officials and government reports. Problems range from leaks in hydraulics systems to software glitches, according to the reports. Last year, the vehicles completed just two of 14 planned tests.

"They started out really well, and I was really pleased," said Philip Coyle, the Defense Department's former director of operational test and evaluation. "But gradually the complexity of the program has overcome the contractor, so they are years behind schedule."

General Dynamics defends its progress, noting that the vehicle has met many goals, including being able to reach speeds of 30 knots on the water. The vehicle is fast enough to keep up with the Abrams tank on land, it can carry 17 Marines, and its systems can communicate with other ships and tanks, all key performance criteria, the company says.

"I have heard no one in leadership say that they don't need this capability, that they don't want this capability," said Peter Keating, a General Dynamics spokesman.

An independent review released in December by the Navy's acquisition office questioned the company's commitment to solving the development problems that plagued the vehicle. The report said General Dynamics appeared more interested in starting production than trouble-shooting and didn't manage the groups making many of the decisions. The production phase is typically more profitable for a contractor and often marks a point at which a program becomes more difficult to cancel.

General Dynamics "seems to be focused on production rather than on solving significant design and engineering problems," the Navy report said. "This must be changed if the Program is to move ahead successfully."

Noting that the bonuses the company received did not reflect the vehicle's performance, the report recommends that the Defense Contract Management Agency consider recovering some of the award fees. A DCMA spokesman said the agency had not addressed the issue because it was unaware of the recommendation.

DOJ_NMG_0129004

The Marine Corps has tried to deal with some of its development problems by lowering its expectations for the vehicle. The service originally wanted a craft that could operate 70 hours between major breakdowns, but it cut that target to 43.5 hours after tests revealed the vehicles were struggling to meet the higher goal.

But even the lower targets have been hard to hit. Marine Corps officials were distressed to discover that the prototypes encountered an "operational mission failure" on average every 4.5 hours in tests last year. There were 645 failures within the subsystems, overwhelming the three-man maintenance crew, according to a report by the service's testing agency.

"It's a very complex vehicle; when it breaks, it's difficult to repair," said Col. Michael Bohn, director of the Marine Corps testing agency.

General Dynamics has also struggled with the vessel's complicated software. During testing, the software operating the guns didn't always fire on command, for example. Some of the problems date to 2001, when responsibility for software development was given to a General Dynamics division with little track record of running such a complex project, according to the GAO. The Marine Corps gave the company a year to improve the division's capabilities, the report said. When it failed to meet the deadline, the company was granted an extension. Eventually, the Marine Corps turned 70 percent of the work to a government organization.

"From a taxpayer standpoint, I think, 'Gee, didn't we pay GD to do this?,' " said Paul L. Francis, the GAO's director of acquisition and sourcing management. "Are they going to pay us for doing it for them?"

Keating, the General Dynamics spokesman, said the company is confident it can meet the Marine Corps' demands. He noted that the service had asked the firm to establish a new software-development organization and that such organizations often take several years to mature. "We started from ground zero," he said.

Now, the Marine Corps is ready to start over. The service is to present a plan to salvage the program to Defense leaders in March. In addition to buying seven new prototypes, the Marine Corps proposal will probably require at least a two- or three-year delay, adding $200 million in development costs a year, said Bryant, the Marines program manager.

The service will seek to simplify the design, "getting rid of the complexity where we don't need complexity," he said.

Noting that his son was a Navy combat corpsman in a battalion using the aging amphibious vehicles that were supposed to be replaced by now, Bryant added: "I need to fix our reliability and make the EFV a vehicle I'd be proud to hand to my own son."

Nuclear Officials Seek Approval For Warhead (WP)

By Walter Pincus

Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Officials of the National Nuclear Security Administration, which runs the nuclear weapons complex, said yesterday that they hope to receive administration and congressional authorization by the end of 2008 for the development and production of a warhead that could be deployed on submarine-launched intercontinental ballistic missiles.

The NNSA requested $88 million in the fiscal 2008 Energy Department budget -- up from $27 million this year -- to complete detailed planning with the Navy based on a design produced in December by the nation's two nuclear weapons laboratories. The new funds would support design concept testing and could lead to production of the warhead for the Navy's D5 missile, 24 of which are carried on each U.S. Trident submarine.

A key aspect of the Reliable Replacement Warhead program is that the warhead could be certified to enter the U.S. nuclear stockpile without testing, acting NNSA Administrator Thomas D'Agostino and other officials said during a session with reporters.

U.S. moves to develop a new warhead come as the Bush administration is attempting to stop Iran and North Korea from developing nuclear weapons and trying to keep other countries, such as India and Pakistan, from expanding their stockpiles.

Last month, former secretaries of state Henry A. Kissinger and George P. Shultz, former defense secretary William Perry and former senator Sam Nunn (D-Ga.) called for the Bush administration to take the leadership in reversing reliance on nuclear weapons as a step toward preventing proliferation. In a Jan. 6 op-ed in the Wall Street Journal, the four called for ratification of the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty, taking nuclear weapons off alert, further reducing the number of nuclear forces and halting production of fissile materials.

Hans M. Kristensen, director of the Federation of American Scientists' nuclear information project, said yesterday that as a result of the op-ed piece, "There are a lot of new groups in Washington looking at what really low numbers [of U.S. warheads] would look like."

Rep. Ellen O. Tauscher (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Armed Services strategic forces subcommittee, said yesterday that she would hold a hearing next month on the RRW program to review the new design and to determine if it meets military needs and whether it would lead to a smaller and more reliable stockpile with no testing, a smaller nuclear production complex and increased dismantling of older warheads.

DOJ_NMG_0129005

"There are significant questions in Congress about how all this holds together," Tauscher said.

The NNSA officials said that in the past, the nuclear weapons labs held underground nuclear tests at this stage in the development of a new warhead. But they said the new designs, by the Los Alamos and Lawrence Livermore national laboratories, could be certified without testing. Meanwhile, there needs to be detailed planning with the Navy before the NNSA could proceed to the engineering phase.

The warhead is being built to fit into the Mark V reentry vehicle used on the D5, which is commonly known as the Trident II missile. The joint decision last year by the Energy and Defense departments was to try to come up with a warhead that could be used on Navy and Air Force missiles.

NNSA officials said yesterday that production of the new warhead would allow for the Bush administration's plan to reduce the number of deployed nuclear warheads from about 6,000 today to between 1,700 and 2,200 by 2012, and also to lower the number in ready reserve. Critics of the Bush plan, which was set out in the 2001 Nuclear Posture Review, have claimed that far fewer numbers of nuclear warheads will be needed in the future because of the accuracy of precision-guided conventional weapons.

DOJ:

Prosecutor Fired So Ex-Rove Aide Could Get His Job (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Justice Department acknowledged Tuesday that it fired the U.S. government's chief prosecutor in Little Rock for no reason except to replace him with a lawyer who had been an aide to Karl Rove, the Bush administration's chief political strategist.

However, in an appearance before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty rejected criticism that the forced resignations of Bud Cummins and six other U.S. attorneys last year were politically inspired, or amounted to retaliation for the attorneys' involvement in controversial investigations and prosecutions.

McNulty's testimony before the panel, which is investigating the firings of the prosecutors, was part of an exchange with Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y. Schumer said the White House's appointment process for prosecutors was "corrupted with political, rather than prudent, considerations."

"What happened here doesn't sound like business as usual; it appears more reminiscent of a different sort of Saturday night massacre," Schumer said, referring to Watergate-era firings at Justice that were ordered by President Nixon.

"When I hear you talk about a politicization of the (Justice) Department, it is like a knife in my back," McNulty responded.

Schumer and other committee members have questioned the department's action, suggesting the administration was taking advantage of a section of the USA Patriot Act that allows the appointment of interim U.S. attorneys for indefinite periods. The process, Schumer and other critics in Congress have said, could allow federal prosecutors to be appointed without having to face confirmation by the Senate.

McNulty said the administration has no plan to circumvent the confirmation process and will send the Senate nominations for permanent replacements for the prosecutors. He said the six prosecutors dismissed besides Cummins — including San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam, who oversaw the corruption prosecution of former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif. — were let go for performance-related reasons.

Much of Tuesday's hearing focused on Cummins and Lam.

McNulty acknowledged that Cummins had had a successful tenure in Arkansas and that he was asked to step aside last year to allow former White House aide Tim Griffin to take the job.

McNulty said that aside from his political work, Griffin had more prosecutorial experience than Cummins did when he first took the Little Rock job five years ago. The deputy attorney general said Griffin's experience included a stint in Iraq as a military prosecutor.

Before his call to active duty in 2005, Griffin was an aide to Rove at the White House. Griffin's résumé says he "organized and coordinated support for the president's agenda, including the nomination of Judge John Roberts" to be U.S. chief justice.

In Lam's case, McNulty said, the Justice Department considered the political impact of removing her in light of her involvement in the prosecution of Cunningham, who was sentenced to eight years in federal prison last year after pleading guilty to accepting $2.4 million in bribes.

McNulty declined to publicly detail the reasons for her dismissal. But Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., cited letters to the Justice Department and Lam from members of Congress who complained about Lam's alleged inattention to prosecuting smugglers of illegal immigrants.

A U.S. Attorney Was Removed Without Cause, Official Says (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6 — A top Justice Department official said on Tuesday that one of several United States attorneys forced from their jobs last year was dismissed without a specific cause in order to give the job to a lawyer with close political ties to the White House.

But the official, Paul J. McNulty, the deputy attorney general, testified at the Senate Judiciary Committee hearing that none of the forced resignations last year was politically motivated. He said most of the incumbents had been urged to leave because of poor performance.

"We never have and never will seek to remove a United States attorney to interfere with an ongoing investigation or prosecution or in retaliation for a prosecution," Mr. McNulty said.

Democrats have charged that the dismissals of 7 to 10 United States attorneys amounted to an n effort to make room for favorites of the Bush administration by ousting independent-minded prosecutors, all Republicans appointed by President Bush.

One disputed case involves H. E. Cummins III, a United States attorney in Arkansas who was asked to step down last summer although his office had increased drug and firearms prosecutions and he had helped organize a multiagency counterterrorism council.

To temporarily replace Mr. Cummins, the Justice Department named J. Timothy Griffin, a former military and civilian prosecutor who was a political director for the Republican National Committee and who once worked as a deputy to Karl Rove, the senior White House political adviser.

At the hearing, Mr. McNulty was asked by Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, whether it was accurate to say that Mr. Cummins had not done anything wrong to justify his removal. Mr. McNulty replied, "I do not dispute that characterization."

Had Mr. Cummins ever received a poor performance evaluation, Mr. Schumer asked.

Mr. McNulty answered, "I'm not aware of anything negative."

Mr. McNulty said that because the attorneys are presidential appointees, they can be replaced at any time without a specific reason. He said about half of the 93 prosecutors appointed to their jobs by Mr. Bush in his first term had already left voluntarily. Mr. McNulty said the appointment of Mr. Griffin was a chance for "a fresh start with a new person."

At the hearing, Senator Mark Pryor, an Arkansas Democrat who testified as a witness, said he would not support Mr. Griffin if Mr. Bush nominated him to replace Mr. Cummins permanently.

Mr. Pryor, a former state attorney general in Arkansas, said that in a conversation with Mr. Griffin last August "I told him that I know many lawyers in the state, but I knew very little about his legal background."

Mr. McNulty acknowledged that Mr. Griffin did not have an extensive background as a prosecutor, but said he had enough experience to be well qualified. He also said that a number of successful United States attorneys had been engaged in past political activities, and that it should not disqualify an appointee.

Among others who Justice Department officials said had been asked to leave were Carol Lam of San Diego, Kevin V. Ryan of San Francisco, Daniel G. Bogden of Nevada and David C. Iglesias of New Mexico. Others who are said to be departing are Paul K. Charlton of Arizona and John McKay of Washington State.

Ms. Lam's departure, on Feb. 15, has prompted especially strong complaints among Democrats because she headed the investigation that resulted in a guilty plea by former Representative Randy Cunningham, a California Republican who is serving an eight-year prison term for corruption-related offenses.

Mr. McNulty denied that the Cunningham case had anything to do with the ouster of Ms. Lam, who has been criticized by some lawmakers as failing to prosecute immigrant smuggling and gun cases along California's border with Mexico.

"What happened in the prosecution of Cunningham was a good thing for the American people and the Department of Justice to accomplish," Mr. McNulty said, adding, "We're proud of that accomplishment."

Behind the debate about forced dismissals is a dispute over language approved last year as part of legislation renewing the antiterrorism statute known as the USA Patriot Act.

In the past, the law permitted the Justice Department to name an interim United States attorney, but only for 120 days, when a federal judge would name a substitute to serve until a presidential nominee was confirmed.

DOJ_NMG_0129007

The change approved last year permitted the Justice Department to name temporary replacements for an indefinite period. Several senators said Democrats and Republicans were discussing a compromise to return to the earlier procedures.

Deputy Attorney General Defends Prosecutor Firings (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

A senior Justice Department official acknowledged yesterday that a top federal prosecutor in Arkansas was removed to make room for a former aide to presidential adviser Karl Rove, but he said that six other U.S. attorneys were fired for "performance-related" issues.

In often contentious testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty also disputed Democrats' allegations that the firings appeared to be aimed at rewarding Republican allies and at avoiding the Senate's role in confirming U.S. attorney appointments.

"The attorney general's appointment authority has not and will not be used to circumvent the confirmation process," McNulty said. "All accusations in this regard are contrary to the clear factual record."

McNulty's remarks did little to calm the growing political storm over the recent U.S. attorney firings. Top Democrats have condemned the firings, which have led to proposed legislation that would limit the attorney general's powers to appoint interim prosecutors.

McNulty acknowledged that six U.S. attorneys in the West and Southwest were notified in December that they would be asked to step aside, including the lead prosecutor in San Diego, whose office oversaw the bribery conviction of a former Republican congressman.

A seventh former U.S. attorney, Ed Cummins of Little Rock, has said that he was asked to leave last year to open the job for J. Timothy Griffin, who previously worked for Rove and for the Republican National Committee. McNulty did not dispute that characterization yesterday.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) said the firings "reek of politics" and warned McNulty that the panel would consider issuing subpoenas for job evaluations of the fired prosecutors unless the Justice Department agrees to hand them over. Justice officials said they will work to accommodate the request.

"What happened here doesn't sound like business as usual," Schumer said. "Even the hiring and firing of our top federal prosecutors has become infused and corrupted with political, rather than prudent, considerations."

McNulty responded later: "When I hear you talk about the politicizing of the Department of Justice, it's like a knife in my heart. . . . Your perspective is completely contrary to my daily experience."

Several top lawmakers, including Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), have been particularly angered by a little-noticed provision slipped into USA Patriot Act legislation last year that allows Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to appoint replacement prosecutors, such as Griffin, on an indefinite basis.

Feinstein and other Democrats in the House and Senate have proposed legislation to return to the old selection process, which allowed district courts to appoint interim U.S. attorneys after 120 days until a final candidate was confirmed by the Senate. Sen. Arlen Specter (Pa.), the Judiciary Committee's ranking Republican, said yesterday he will join Democrats in pushing for a return to the previous arrangement.

But McNulty said the Justice Department is in "strong opposition" to that proposal because it puts the judicial branch in the position of hiring people in the executive branch.

Gonzales told the committee last month that the forced resignations were not politically motivated, but he declined to comment on details of the cases. McNulty went further in some of his testimony yesterday, talking at length about the Arkansas case and defending Griffin's record as a military and civilian prosecutor, in addition to his role as a prominent GOP operative.

In an unusual appearance as a committee witness, Sen. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.) complained that Justice Department officials had initially misled him about Cummins's dismissal and said he could not support Griffin's nomination as U.S. attorney.

Griffin declined to comment yesterday.

The other case that has drawn significant ire from Democrats is in San Diego, where prosecutor Carol S. Lam was fired about a year after overseeing the guilty plea by former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) for taking $2.4 million in bribes. McNulty declined to comment on why Lam was removed, but he said the Cunningham case was "a very good thing for the American people and the Department of Justice to accomplish."

Justice Department officials say Lam presided over a drop in prosecutions of firearms and smuggling cases, and point to complaints from many lawmakers -- including Feinstein -- about lax immigration enforcement in the San Diego area.

Feinstein said in an interview that her concerns about border enforcement are "unrelated" to the question of whether the prosecutors were dismissed appropriately. "The issues are being confused," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0129008

In addition to Cummins and Lam, those forced to resign include Kevin Ryan in San Francisco, John McKay in Seattle, David C. Iglesias in New Mexico, Daniel G. Bogden in Nevada and Paul K. Charlton in Arizona.

Mary Jo White, who was appointed U.S. attorney general for the Southern District of New York during the Clinton administration and then retained for a while under President Bush, told the committee that the firings were "unprecedented" and "troubling."

"The appearance . . . tends to undermine the importance of the office of the United States attorney," White said.

Justice Lawyer Explains Attorney Firings (AP)

By Laurie Kellman, The Associated Press

AP, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON - A top Justice Department official acknowledged Tuesday that more than a half-dozen U.S. attorneys were fired in the last year, in some cases without cause, but denied Democrats' allegations that they were dismissed and replaced for political reasons.

In testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty defended the department's firing of seven U.S. attorneys since March, for reasons he would not divulge.

McNulty reminded the panel that federal prosecutors serve at the pleasure of the president. And he repeated Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' promise to submit the name of every replacement to the Senate for confirmation.

"The attorney general's appointment authority has not and will not be used to circumvent the confirmation process," McNulty told the Democrat-led panel. We never have and never will seek to remove a United States attorney to interfere with an ongoing investigation or prosecution or in retaliation for a prosecution."

McNulty spoke after weeks of Democrats' accusations that the forced resignations of prosecutors in Arkansas and California in particular were moves to reward Republican allies.

Democrats and Republicans blamed the situation on that fact that without their knowledge a little-known provision was slipped into the Patriot Act reauthorization that took effect in March letting the attorney general replace prosecutors indefinitely. They now are seeking legislation to give interim appointment authority to District Court judges, with a deadline by which the prosecutor must be confirmed by the Senate.

Judges often are not qualified to make those appointments, Gonzales told The Associated Press last month.

The hearing, chaired by Sen. Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., gave lawmakers a new chance to insist the Justice Department has used that provision to appoint political allies to U.S. attorney offices.

In Arkansas, H.E. Bud Cummins received a call from a Justice Department official last year telling him to resign and assuring him there was no cause for the firing, a fact McNulty confirmed Tuesday. Cummins' replacement was to be J. Timothy Griffin, a former aide to presidential counselor Karl Rove and a former military prosecutor.

Also riling Democrats is the case of former San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam, whose pursuit of public corruption cases included the government's case against Randy "Duke" Cunningham, the former Republican congressman who pleaded guilty to taking $2.4 million in bribes.

McNulty denied Lam was fired in retaliation for Cunningham's conviction, calling Lam's pursuit of the case "a very good thing for the American people and the Department of Justice to accomplish."

"We are proud of that accomplishment," McNulty said.

Justice Official Defends Prosecutors' Firings (LAT)

By Adam Schreck, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

Deputy Atty. Gen. McNulty tells a Senate panel that they were forced out over performance, not politics. Democrats are skeptical.

WASHINGTON — The recent forced resignations of six top federal prosecutors, including two in California, were based on "performance-related" concerns and were not politically motivated, a Justice Department official testified Tuesday on Capitol Hill.

Appearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Deputy Atty. Gen. Paul J. McNulty defended the dismissals.

"The indisputable fact is that United States attorneys serve at the pleasure of the president," he said. "They come and they go for lots of reasons."

McNulty also expressed strong opposition to a plan by Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) to strip the Justice Department of authority it received last year to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for indefinite periods without Senate confirmation.

That power, added to the USA Patriot Act when it was reauthorized in March, has worried some lawmakers. At issue is the amount of oversight that Congress — now in the hands of Democrats — has over the appointment of federal prosecutors.

DOJ_NMG_0129009

Seven U.S. attorneys, including Carol Lam in San Diego and Kevin Ryan in San Francisco, have been asked to leave. Some Democrats have suggested that the firings are an attempt by the Bush administration to reward political allies and get rid of otherwise capable prosecutors who may be at odds with the White House.

"I have never seen the department more politicized and pushed further away from its mission," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.). "And now it appears even the hiring and firing of our top federal prosecutors has become infused and corrupted with political, rather than prudent, considerations — or at least there is a very strong appearance that this is so."

McNulty dismissed suggestions that the firing of the seven prosecutors was politically motivated. The Justice Department, he said, has not and will not "remove a United States attorney to interfere with an ongoing investigation or prosecution or in retaliation for prosecution."

"When I hear you talk about the politicizing of the Department of Justice, it's like a knife in my heart," he told Schumer.

Some legal experts have said that the moves, while legal, are unorthodox and could have harmful repercussions.

"There's at least a strong perception by those in and outside of the United States attorney's office that this is not business as usual," said Loyola Law School professor Laurie Levenson during her testimony Tuesday.

Much of Tuesday's hearing focused on the dismissals of Lam, who plans to step down Feb. 15, and of H.E. "Bud" Cummins, a prosecutor in Little Rock, Ark., who was replaced by a former aide to Karl Rove, President Bush's longtime political strategist.

Lam, who declined to comment about McNulty's remarks Tuesday, headed an investigation that led to the guilty plea, on bribery charges, of Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham of Rancho Santa Fe. She has been criticized as not being tough enough on smugglers of illegal immigrants.

In a written statement, Ryan, who has not announced a departure date, said only that his resignation was the result of "a mutually agreeable decision with Washington."

McNulty would not publicly discuss why individual prosecutors were asked to step down, other than to say six of the seven were replaced because of "performance-related" issues. The decision to replace the seventh, Cummins, was an "opportunity to provide a fresh start with a new person in that position," he said.

adam.schreck@latimes.com

Official Denies Prosecutors Were Ousted For Political Reasons (MCT)

By Marisa Taylor

McClatchy Newspapers, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON - The No. 2 Justice Department official acknowledged Tuesday that at least seven U.S. attorneys were asked to resign, but he denied that the administration ousted them for political reasons.

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told the Senate Judiciary Committee that six U.S. attorneys were asked to step down in December because of "performance-related" issues.

However, McNulty said H.E. "Bud" Cummins, the former U.S. attorney in Arkansas, wasn't fired because of how he handled his job. Rather, McNulty said, administration officials wanted to make room for Timothy Griffin, a former aide of presidential adviser Karl Rove.

McNulty emphasized that the administration has the power to fire U.S. attorneys from the politically appointed positions - even without any apparent cause. But he denied that politics played any role in the firings of other U.S. attorneys, including Carol Lam, who was asked to step down in San Diego. In 2005, Lam's office won a bribery conviction against then-Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif. That investigation is continuing.

McNulty said his department had been "proud" of the Cunningham prosecution, but he declined to elaborate on Lam's or any other U.S. attorney's firing during the hearing. He agreed instead to brief senators privately on the matter.

"We never have and never will seek to remove a United States attorney to interfere with an ongoing investigation or prosecution, or in retaliation for prosecution," he said. "Such an act is contrary to the most basic values of our system of justice."

The decision to fire the U.S. attorneys came under scrutiny late last month after Senate Democrats discovered that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales could use a little-noticed change in the Patriot Act to fill the vacancies with appointees.

The legal change last March allowed Gonzales to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for indefinite terms.

Last month, McClatchy Newspapers analyzed many of those interim appointments and found that Gonzales had been appointing conservative loyalists from the Bush administration's inner circle to fill the vacancies.

The new U.S. attorneys all have impressive legal credentials, but most of them have few ties to the communities they've been appointed to serve, and some have little experience as prosecutors.

Several have become permanent U.S. attorneys after Senate confirmation.

Traditionally, the top assistant U.S. attorney in each local office fills any vacancy while home-state senators search for preferred candidates to present to the White House for consideration. If it takes more than four months to find a permanent successor, a judge can extend the temporary appointment or name another acting U.S. attorney. Ultimately, the candidates must be confirmed by the Senate.

Senate Democrats said they were concerned that the administration is attempting to bypass the Senate confirmation process under the new Patriot Act provision.

Administration officials argue that the change was necessary to ensure that judges didn't appoint interim U.S. attorneys who were hostile to the administration.

McNulty said that the Justice Department is committed to giving home-state senators of the president's party their traditional say in submitting the names of preferred candidates for White House consideration.

Mary Jo White, who was appointed U.S. attorney for the southern district of New York by President Clinton in 1993, told the committee that any firings of U.S. attorneys in the middle of an administration "without significant cause," such as serious misconduct, would be unprecedented.

If U.S. attorneys had been removed because of controversy over cases or "just to give another person the opportunity to serve," the actions would "pose a threat to the independence of the U.S. attorneys," she said.

Laurie Levenson, a former assistant U.S. attorney who's now a professor at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles, said the revelation about Cummins being removed to give someone else a chance to be U.S. attorney "was precisely the problem."

"The job of U.S. attorney should not be a political prize," she said. "There's too much at stake for the district and the people who work in that office."

Despite Griffin's relative inexperience as a prosecutor, McNulty described the former Rove aide as "well qualified" to run the office in Little Rock.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., contended that the appointment didn't "pass the smell test."

"I can't even see how Mr. Griffin would be better qualified in any way than Bud Cummins, who had done a good job, who was well respected, who had now had years of experience," he said.

Bills are now pending in the House of Representatives and the Senate that would restore the traditional interim appointment process to judges.

Senate Given No Reason For Prosecutor Firings (CHIT)

By Karoun Demirjian

Chicago Tribune, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A year ago, Carol Lam, the U.S. attorney in San Diego, was fielding accolades for her successful prosecution of Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, the California congressman who pleaded guilty to tax evasion and corruption and was sent to prison for more than eight years.

Now, however, she is one of seven federal prosecutors that the Bush administration has removed from office in recent weeks, most for unspecified reasons, as was the case with Lam. The dismissals are unusual and that has prompted several Democratic senators to accuse the White House of taking undue aim at U.S. prosecutors, either to make way for up-and-coming Republicans or even to punish those who aggressively prosecuted friends of the administration.

The Department of Justice has strongly denied the allegations, but also has refused to publicly give any reasons for the dismissals.

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty defended the firings Tuesday at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing, saying, "U.S. attorneys serve at the pleasure of the President {ndash} they come and go for lots of reasons…. We don't really believe we are obligated to set forth a reason or cause."

The nation's 94 U.S. attorneys, the chief federal prosecutors in their respective cities or geographic regions, are generally appointed at the beginning of a president's term, and barring serious misconduct, serve until the end of his tenure or until they choose to leave voluntarily.

The current round of removals has attracted Democratic attention because of a little-noticed measure that was slipped into the Patriot Act Reauthorization last year allowing the White House to circumvent the Senate approval process for U.S. attorneys by making open-ended interim appointments.

Since President Bush signed the bill, about a dozen U.S. attorneys have resigned. McNulty said at least seven of the resignations were sought by Justice. But he said only the resignation of H.E. Cummins III of Little Rock, Ark. was sought without a specific job performance-related cause. Cummins was replaced by J. Timothy Griffin, a military prosecutor and former assistant to White House political operative Karl Rove.

DOJ_NMG_0129011

McNulty told the committee that the administration is still consulting senators to identify the best candidates in their respective states and fully intends to send the prosecutors' replacements to the Senate for confirmation. But suspicious Judiciary Committee members said they plan to vote Thursday to rescind the Patriot Act provision that allows the administration to appoint interim U.S. attorneys indefinitely without Senate confirmation.

Sen. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.) told the committee, "I am convinced that the administration and future administrations will bypass the Senate if the law isn't changed." He said he doubted that in the seven months since Cummins had first been asked to step down that the administration couldn't send an official nominee to the Senate for confirmation. "This is larger than any party affiliation or any single appointment."

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) bristled at allegations that he had played any part in crafting the clause on interim appointments in the Patriot Act and agreed to cooperate to revert the law on U.S. attorney appointments back to its pre-2006 state. In the earlier law, interim terms expire after 120 days, and if no replacement can be nominated and confirmed in that time, the local federal court names a replacement.

But McNulty said that arrangement has caused problems in the past, such as in South Dakota in 2005, when a U.S. district judge's appointee for interim U.S. attorney was overruled by the Justice Department in favor of a candidate it selected, precipitating a legal dispute.

But several senators said that the alternative in the Patriot Act, possibly cutting them entirely out of the appointment process, is unacceptable.

"The Patriot Act should not have been amended," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), who sponsored the measure to revise the law. "I do not believe anyone in this committee knew it was in the law—no Republican, no Democrat."

Not all members of the Judiciary Committee voiced concern about the firings. Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.), said, "For seven out of 94 to be asked to step down is not that big a deal to me. My personal opinion is that the Department of Justice is far too reticent in reviewing U.S. attorneys that do not perform."

Lawmakers' Letters Led To Lam's Ouster (SDUT)

By Joe Cantlupe, Copley News Service

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 7, 2007

A top Justice Department official said yesterday that San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam was being targeted for dismissal because of “performance-related” issues after his office received letters from several members of Congress complaining about her handling of immigration enforcement cases.

Questioned by Senate Judiciary Committee members, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty repeatedly declined to spell out what Lam's performance shortcomings were, other than to note the complaints.

“What about Carol Lam? Why was she terminated?” committee member Rep. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., asked McNulty.

“I respectfully decline to go into specific reasons,” McNulty said.

“I think the committee needs to know why she was terminated,” Specter responded.

But all McNulty would say is that “the phone calls made in December were performance-related.” He was referring to calls made to Lam and five other prosecutors demanding their resignations. A seventh U.S. attorney, based in Arkansas, was dismissed earlier last year to make way for a former aide to White House adviser Karl Rove, McNulty said.

The forced resignations and secrecy surrounding them have triggered concerns among Democrats that the Bush administration is trying to circumvent the Senate's right to approve or disapprove U.S. attorney appointments.

Democrats, including California Sen. Dianne Feinstein, have objected to a provision slipped into the USA Patriot Act last year allowing U.S. attorney replacements to be appointed and serve indefinitely without Senate approval. Democrats are preparing legislation to overturn the new presidential power.

“I have observed, with increasing alarm, how politicized the Department of Justice has become,” Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said at the start of the hearing. “I have watched, with growing worry, as the department has increasingly based hiring on political affiliation.”

McNulty vigorously denied the allegation: “When I hear you talk about the politicizing of the Department of Justice, it's like a knife in my heart.”

Separately, he added: “The attorney general's appointment authority has not and will not be used to circumvent the confirmation process.”

Schumer noted that Lam “was in the midst of a sweeping public investigation,” referring to the probe of former Rep. Randy “Duke” Cunningham, R-Rancho Santa Fe, and others. Cunningham is in prison after pleading guilty to conspiracy and tax evasion charges, but investigations are pending for several co-conspirators.

DOJ_NMG_0129012

“Was her firing political retaliation? There's no way to know that,” Schumer said. But he said he assumed that “politics is involved. The appearance is plain awful.”

McNulty denied the assertion.

When questioned about the continued Cunningham-related investigations, McNulty said, “We never have and never will seek to remove a United States attorney to interfere with an ongoing investigation or prosecution or in retaliation for a prosecution.”

Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., who supports Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' right to remove the prosecutors, referred to a series of critical letters about Lam from members of Congress who questioned her lack of aggressiveness in immigration-related cases.

Lam had been “subject to a number of complaints,” Sessions said.

Last June, Feinstein wrote to Gonzales regarding her concerns about immigration-related prosecutions in Southern California. On July 30, 2004, a group of 14 California representatives wrote to the Attorney General also to express their “concern” about immigration-related cases.

In October 2005, Rep. Darrell Isla, R-Vista, wrote to Lam complaining about “non-prosecution of criminal illegal aliens,” and a year later criticized her office about its failure to carry out immigrant-related smuggling cases.

The Attorney General's office was familiar with all the letters, McNulty said. “We received letters from members of Congress,” McNulty acknowledged. “I don't want to go into the substance of them.

“We take them seriously,” he said. “We give them consideration.”

Lam, 47, who has been the top prosecutor in San Diego for more than four years, announced she is resigning Feb. 15. She has declined to comment on reasons for her resignation, but sources said they were linked to Justice Department officials who were concerned about her handling of immigration-related prosecutions.

Lam's office said she had no comment about yesterday's proceedings.

White House Denies Prosecutors Were Sacked In Retaliation (FT)

By Alim Remtulla Inwashington Andbrooke Masters In New York

Financial Times, February 7, 2007

The Bush administration had no complaints about the performance of the US attorney from eastern Arkansas who it forced out late last year to make room for a protege of Karl Rove, a Justice Department official yesterday acknowledged.

But Paul McNulty, the deputy attorney-general, told the Senate judiciary committee that his department had performance-related "reasons" for calling six other top prosecutors in December and ordering them to resign.

Senate Democrats are probing the recent departure of 13 of the 93 US attorneys, asking whether the Bush administration is "politicising" the administration of justice and using the posts to reward political allies.

The Democrats have been particularly concerned about the removal of Carol Lam, the former US attorney for San Diego, who prosecuted Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a former Republican congressman.

Mr McNulty said Ms Lam's departure was unrelated to the bribery case but he said she was among the group removed for performance-related reasons.

"In this administration, US attorneys are never, repeat, never, removed in an effort to retaliate against them," Mr McNulty testified. He also said Timothy Griffin, Mr Cummins' replacement in Arkansas, was well qualified for his new position.

Democrats are also seething about a 2006 law change that allows the attorney-general to name "interim" US attorneys who can serve indefinitely without Senate confirmation. Until last year, temporary replacements could serve only 120 days before they needed approval from a state's district judges.

Chuck Schumer, the New York senator who chaired the hearing, warned that he might subpoena the performance records of the fired prosecutors if the Justice Department did not turn them over.

"I have never seen the department more politicised and pushed further away from its mission as an apolitical enforcer of the rule of law," he said

Mr McNulty insisted the executive branch was better positioned to appoint temporary prosecutors than judges would be but he also pledged that the administration would fill all the open jobs with nominees who were confirmed by the Senate.

Senators Press Officials On U.S. Attorney Firings (RC)

By Rachel Van Dongen

Roll Call, February 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0129013

Turning up the heat on the Bush administration on an increasingly touchy issue, Republican and Democratic members of the Senate Judiciary Committee grilled Deputy U.S. Attorney General Paul McNulty on Tuesday over why and how as many as seven U.S. attorneys around the country were dismissed from their posts since June.

Led by Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), the lawmakers aggressively questioned the Justice Department's motives in firing up to six prosecutors in December, including San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam, who is credited with producing the 2005 guilty plea of former Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) to accepting more than $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors. Lam is leaving office Feb. 15, but the probe into Cunningham's activities continues.

"I have observed, with increasing alarm, how politicized the Department of Justice has become," Schumer said in his opening statement. "And now, it appears, even the hiring and firing of our top federal prosecutors has become infused and corrupted with political, rather than prudent, considerations."

Schumer repeatedly pressed McNulty, a former chief Hill counsel during former President Bill Clinton's impeachment proceedings and ex-House ethics committee lawyer, to provide documentation, such as written evaluations of each U.S. attorney's job performance, that would substantiate why the attorneys were fired. If that information is not provided quickly, the Democrat threatened to subpoena that information from Justice. "For six years, there has been little or no oversight of the Department of Justice. Those days are over," Schumer vowed.

In a strong opening statement putting Justice on the defensive, Schumer's comments were echoed by the panel's ranking member, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), a former Pennsylvania assistant attorney general.

"If a U.S. attorney general was fired in retaliation for what was done on the prosecution of former Congressman Cunningham, that's wrong," Specter stated. "And that's wrong even though the president has the power to terminate U.S. attorneys. U.S. attorneys can't function if they're going to be afraid of the consequences of a vigorous prosecution."

Arguing that the executive branch has created an atmosphere of "high-level suspicion" in Congress, Specter said that Senate oversight on the U.S. attorneys issue should move full-steam ahead. "I want to see this inquiry pursued ... I want it pursued in each one of these cases and see what actually went on because there are very serious accusations that are made that, if they're true, there ought to be very, very substantial action taken in our oversight function."

McNulty strenuously denied any political motivation for the dismissal of the prosecutors, explaining that it was part of normal staff turnover. "The indisputable fact is that U.S. attorneys serve at the pleasure of the president," he said. While he refused to confirm the exact number of prosecutors dismissed recently, McNulty did say that several were let go for "performance-based" reasons in phone calls during December 2006. McNulty declined, however, to provide a specific reason for Lam's dismissal, arguing that it would be "unfair" to individual prosecutors to discuss their private personnel records in public.

"What happened in the prosecution of Congressman Cunningham was a very good thing," McNulty said, describing Justice as "proud" of that outcome. "Any investigation that falls from that has to run its full course."

"Public corruption is a top priority for the president," McNulty added.

McNulty, however, did not dispute Schumer's assertion that another U.S. attorney — Bud Cummins III, the former U.S. attorney for Eastern Arkansas — was dismissed without any specific cause. Democrats allege that Cummins was asked to step aside in order to install Tim Griffin, a former aide to White House adviser Karl Rove.

Sen. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.), a former Arkansas attorney general who testified before the committee, praised Cummins' record and said he did not believe he could support Griffin if his nomination was ultimately sent to the Senate for confirmation.

"As more light was shed on the situation in Arkansas, it became clear that Bud Cummins was asked to resign without cause so that the White House could reward the Arkansas post to Mr. Griffin," Pryor testified.

Led by Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), Democrats have been slamming the administration over the U.S. attorneys issue for several weeks now. Besides arguing that the dismissals are politically motivated, they also charge that the Justice Department is attempting to circumvent the Senate confirmation process by installing interim U.S. attorneys whom it has no intention of ever formally nominating. The Justice Department fiercely denies that charge and says it intends to send all U.S. attorney candidates for nomination to the Hill.

Feinstein lists seven U.S. attorneys recently asked to step aside by Justice: Lam, Cummins, Kevin Ryan of San Francisco, David Iglesias of New Mexico, Daniel Bogden of Nevada, John McKay of Washington and Paul Charlton of Arizona. Besides Lam, none of the prosecutors is involved in identified Congressional cases.

Feinstein and Specter appear to have agreed on compromise legislation to reverse a 2006 amendment to the USA PATRIOT Act that allowed Justice to indefinitely appoint interim U.S. attorneys. The legislation, which is slated to be marked up on Thursday, would allow Justice to install a replacement attorney for 120 days; after that, the authority would be transferred to a district court judge until a permanent replacement was found.

DOJ_NMG_0129014

Committee Republicans largely defended the administration while noting that political interference in prosecutions was a serious matter if it were proved true. “U.S. attorneys serve at the pleasure of the president,” said Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah). “The president can remove them for any reason ... that’s the the law.”

Alabama GOP Sen. Jeff Sessions raised the fact that several House Members, including California GOP Rep. Darrell Issa, had complained about Lam’s record on prosecuting smuggling and other crimes along the California border. “I think we need to look at these appointments maybe in the future more carefully,” Sessions said.

Judiciary Panel Questions Removal Of Arkansas U.S. Attorney (MCA)

By Bartholomew Sullivan, The Commercial Appeal

Memphis Commercial Appeal, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Members of the Senate Judiciary Committee asked Tuesday why the federal prosecutor who oversaw undercover operations that exposed corruption in the West Memphis Police and Crittenden County Sheriff's departments in 2002 was fired last year by the Justice Department.

Sen. Mark Pryor, D-Ark., told the committee that 49 days after H.E. "Bud" Cummins "was ousted without cause," and replaced by interim U.S. Attorney J. Timothy Griffin, he still doesn't know the grounds for the removal. Griffin, a protégé of presidential advisor Karl Rove and a former Republican Party opposition researcher, has not been nominated by the president and has therefore not been subject to the Senate's advise and consent oversight.

"The failure to acknowledge that Bud Cummins was told to leave for a purely political reason is a great disservice to someone who was loyal to the Administration and who performed his work admirably," Pryor testified.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has said that Cummins and six other U.S. attorneys, including the one in San Diego pursuing high-level corruption stemming from the U.S. Rep. Duke Cunningham scandal, were not removed for political reasons.

"I think I would never, ever, make a change in a United States Attorney position for political reasons or if it would in any way jeopardize an ongoing, serious investigation," Gonzales said last month.

Cummins, a Republican, has said that he understands he serves at the will of the president, and appreciated the opportunity to serve for five years. "I don't have any hard feelings," he told the Arkansas Democrat Gazette last month.

But in Sunday's Washington Post, he elaborated: "I don't think many of us were aware that the administration might want to ask someone to step aside just to give someone else an opportunity," said Cummins. "The precedent was that once you were appointed, assuming you were successful in office, you were there until there was a change in the White House."

Cummins, who successfully prosecuted corrupt West Memphis and Crittenden County sheriff's deputies involved in a drug task force shortly after taking office, could not be reached Tuesday.

Skeptical Democrats on the committee Tuesday hinted they aren't buying it that the removal decisions weren't political. They will be considering legislation to re-establish Senate confirmation of prospective U.S. attorneys within 120 days of an interim appointment. The change permitting indefinite interim appointments was inserted in last year's Patriot Act reauthorization.

When Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., asked Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty whether the Justice Department would support the change, McNulty said it would consider it. McNulty said the department takes the position that a U.S. attorney can be removed for any reason or for no reason at all.

Cummins has said he was told last June that he was being removed to give Griffin the kind of high-profile exposure such a political appointment brings. The U.S. attorney prosecutes federal crimes within all of eastern Arkansas, based in Little Rock.

Cummins found out he was being replaced when he received a phone call while hiking in the woods with his son. Pryor testified Tuesday that he and others intervened to keep him in place until the end of the year. He left office Dec. 15, the day Griffin's appointment became official.

In his testimony, Pryor said Gonzales asked if he would support Griffin for the job, and Pryor said he could not without first seeing him go through the confirmation process. Pryor, a former Arkansas attorney general, said Griffin would not be his nominee for the post "because I just know too many other lawyers who are more qualified, more experienced and more respected by the Arkansas bar."

He continued: "After a thorough review by this committee, I hope that you will reach the same conclusion I have, which is this: No administration should be able to appoint U.S. attorneys without proper checks and balances. This is larger than party affiliation or any single appointment. This touches our solemn responsibilities as senators."

Deputy AG Acknowledges Cummins Was Forced Out (NAMN)

By Aaron Sadler, The Morning News

Northwest Arkansas Morning News, February 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0129015

WASHINGTON -- A Justice Department official acknowledged for the first time Tuesday that H.E. "Bud" Cummins was fired last year as federal prosecutor in Little Rock to make room for a former White House aide.

He denied, however, that politics played a role in that or other U.S. attorney firings across the country.

At least seven prosecutors were forced out by the Bush administration late last year, including Cummins, U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas.

The Justice Department named Timothy Griffin as an interim replacement. Griffin, 38, is a former deputy to White House political adviser Karl Rove and former director of opposition research for the Republican National Committee.

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told the Senate Judiciary Committee that Cummins was informed in a June phone call that he was being asked to resign without cause. At that point, Griffin had already been identified as an interim successor, he said.

Other removals were "performance-related," according to McNulty.

Sen. Mark Pryor, D-Ark., said the Justice Department changed its story regarding Cummins' departure.

"First they said that initially Bud Cummins decided to leave on his own," Pryor said. "It's taken many weeks to get here, but today the Justice Department admitted he was told to leave."

Cummins said in a telephone interview Tuesday that he appreciated Pryor's defense of his service, but that he remained a Bush loyalist who had considered leaving his post regardless.

"In my case, it's fair to say it was handled poorly, because they could just have easily called me and said 'You haven't done anything wrong. You're a champ. You've been a great performer for the president, and we'd like you to cooperate with us and give this other guy a job for two years,'" Cummins said.

Democrats criticized the spate of firings as ways to build the resumes of up-and-coming Republicans by placing them in prosecutor jobs for the final two years of President Bush's term.

Pryor testified at Tuesday's hearing that the Justice Department should acknowledge Cummins was fired for "purely political reasons."

Democrats grilled McNulty extensively about Griffin's appointment, skeptical that the choice was unrelated to his GOP connections.

"It sure doesn't smell too good," Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said "You know that and I know that, but maybe there's a more plausible explanation than the one that seems to be obvious to everybody."

Schumer described Griffin as an "ambitious acolyte" of Rove.

The administration should be allowed to make personnel changes at will without facing attacks from Democrats, unless it is proved the administration is abusing its power, said Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee.

"The atmosphere in Washington, D.C., is one of high-level suspicion," Specter said. "I want to see what actually went on, because there are very serious accusations that have been made."

Among questions Schumer raised was whether Carol Lam was ousted as U.S. attorney in San Diego in retaliation for prosecuting former Rep. Randy Cunningham, R-Calif., and whether Rove pushed to install Griffin in Arkansas.

McNulty said Griffin represented a "fresh start" for the Little Rock office, and that he brought more prosecutorial experience to the job than Cummins when he took the job in 2001.

"The fact that he has political activities in his background does not speak to his qualifications for being the United States attorney in that district," McNulty said of Griffin.

Griffin, of Magnolia, had been a special assistant prosecutor in Cummins' office and prosecuted cases in the Judge Advocate General's corps during a deployment in Iraq last year.

McNulty sidestepped questions about other fired prosecutors, including Lam, saying he would not speak publicly about reasons for the terminations.

Three Democratic senators, including Pryor, are sponsoring legislation to change a provision of the Patriot Act that gives the Justice Department authority to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for indefinite time periods.

Pryor said such appointments would circumvent the Senate's constitutional responsibility to confirm judicial appointments.

In a hearing last month, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the Justice Department intends to put every new U.S. attorney through the nomination process.

But Pryor said the administration has taken the position that prosecutors do not need to be confirmed, citing a recent Justice Department filing in a complaint filed by Little Rock attorney John Wesley Hall.

Hall contends Griffin does not have authority to serve as U.S. attorney without Senate confirmation.

"They have changed their story on a couple points," Pryor said of the Justice Department.

"They've been saying publicly that their intention is to nominate all these U.S. attorneys, however ... they take the position they don't have to have U.S. attorneys confirmed."

Specter and Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., said they support returning to the law as written before last year, setting a 120-day time limit for interim appointments.

Congress Probes Departures Of U.S. Attorneys (USNEWS)

By Chitra Ragavan

U.S. News and World Report, February 7, 2007

The departure of nearly a dozen U.S. attorneys–including some overseeing high-profile politically charged criminal investigations–has sparked congressional inquiries as to whether the Justice Department is politicizing the hiring and firing of federal prosecutors. Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty was in the hot seat today answering just that very question before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

One of the U.S. attorney departures that is raising the most eyebrows is that of Carol Lam, who has been overseeing the massive federal corruption probe of former Rep. Randall "Duke" Cunningham. The eight-term Republican congressman is currently serving a long prison term for accepting more than $2.4 million in bribes in exchange for inserting lucrative "earmarks" into defense appropriations and intelligence appropriations budgets on behalf of two defense contractors, including a San Diego-based contractor named Brent Wilkes and two unindicted co-conspirators.

But federal investigators are continuing to investigate Wilkes's ties to Cunningham and to a senior Central Intelligence Agency official named Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, who has since resigned from his post after being named in the corruption probe. The government alleges that Wilkes gave Cunningham more than $630,000 in bribes, gifts, and favors. They also are probing whether Wilkes obtained lucrative CIA contracts from Foggo, a former high school buddy who became the No. 3 official at the CIA. That investigation is still ongoing and could result in further indictments.

Both Wilkes and Foggo have said they are innocent.

To some veteran former Justice Department officials, the departure of Lam before the Cunningham probe is completed harks back to a similar case involving a CIA asset more than 25 years ago, in which the U.S. attorney was fired because of pressure from the agency. In 1982, the feds arrested the former chief of the Federal Security Directorate (Mexico's secret police), Miguel Nazar Haro, after he was indicted by a federal grand jury in San Diego for his involvement in an $8 million car-theft ring that had smuggled about 600 stolen American luxury cars and vans from Southern California to Mexico.

The U.S. attorney in San Diego, William Kennedy, had uncovered the car-theft ring and pushed the Justice Department to indict Haro. Kennedy charged that the CIA was blocking the indictment because Haro was a CIA asset in Mexico City and that the Justice Department was dragging its feet. Kennedy was reprimanded in no uncertain terms–President Ronald Reagan fired the prosecutor, a former Justice official says, after the CIA brought pressure to bear. But Haro–who was forced to resign as the secret police chief because of the car-smuggling allegations– was subsequently indicted and arrested. He posted $200,000 bail and fled, becoming a fugitive. And so he remained, until he was again arrested in February 2004, this time on charges that he had kidnapped a leftist leader nearly three decades earlier during Mexico's "dirty war," against the left.

After Kennedy was fired, Justice sources say, CIA officials used it as a "warning" to other Justice officials not to challenge the agency. Kennedy later became a superior court judge in San Diego.

Fast forward to the Cunningham probe. Former Justice officials say it's ironic that the U.S. attorney's office that the CIA challenged so aggressively in the 1980s is the same office that is now targeting an allegedly corrupt CIA official. The CIA, Justice sources say, has blocked efforts to obtain documents in connection with the Wilkes-Foggo case.

Lam has declined to comment on her imminent departure. McNulty told the Judiciary Committee today that the turnover of U.S. attorneys is not unusual and won't cause any problems.

"The indisputable fact is that [U.S. attorneys] serve at the pleasure of the president," said McNulty. "They come and they go for lots of reasons."

But one former senior justice official says he's skeptical of official explanations.

"If you say there's an innocent reason for the change in San Diego," he says, "I have a bridge to sell in Brooklyn."

Playing Politics With Justice (NYT)

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

The Bush administration has pushed out at least seven United States attorneys recently for what appear to be purely political reasons. Senator Charles Schumer, Democrat of New York, has opened an investigation, and not a moment too soon. The American justice system would be seriously damaged if United States attorneys were stripped of their independence.

DOJ_NMG_0129017

United States attorneys, the federal prosecutors who work in the states, are supposed to be respected, independent members of the bar. They have extraordinary power: they can file criminal charges and conduct investigations that can destroy reputations. They are supposed to be confirmed by the Senate, and there is a long tradition that they are not removed during the term of the president who appointed them, except for serious cause.

The Bush administration has broken with that tradition in a way that reeks of politics. One of the dismissed United States attorneys, H. E. Cummins III of Arkansas, has been replaced by a former Republican National Committee opposition researcher who worked for Karl Rove. Another, Carol Lam of San Diego, is in the middle of a sensitive public corruption inquiry that has already brought down one Republican congressman, Randy Cunningham, and is looking at other possible wrongdoers. The White House is taking advantage of a little-noticed provision in the Patriot Act that allows the president to appoint interim United States attorneys without Senate approval.

At a Judiciary Committee hearing yesterday on the dismissals, the deputy attorney general who represented the Bush administration failed to explain convincingly why the United States attorneys had been removed, or to dispel the suspicion that politics was the driving force. Mr. Schumer says he may subpoena the dismissed federal attorneys' performance evaluations if he doesn't get a better explanation. The Senate should keep pushing for answers — and for nonpartisan prosecutors to be placed and kept in these important positions.

Bush Replaces U.S. Attorneys In Power Play (BSUN)

By George W. Liebmann

The Baltimore Sun, February 7, 2007

The news that the Bush administration has replaced seven U.S. attorneys, none charged with or guilty of wrongdoing, with people fairly describable as Washington apparatchiks should give pause to all those concerned with America's working Constitution.

This was made possible by a provision of the Patriot Act allowing the president to make interim appointments of U.S. attorneys, a function previously confined to the federal district courts.

The office of U.S. attorney is far more powerful than it was at the time of the ratification of the Constitution. Its functions are no longer limited to federal specialties such as customs and revenue offenses, but extend to virtually the entire range of criminal offenses. Stringent federal sentencing guidelines have rendered federal prosecutions the prosecutions of first resort, even for certain street crimes. During the tenures of Attorneys General Janet Reno, John Ashcroft and Alberto R. Gonzales, the number of federal prosecutors has greatly increased.

As contemplated by Alexander Hamilton in the Federalist Papers, the requirement of Senate confirmation has operated to prevent the staffing of these positions with pliant presidential cronies. The local senators, particularly those of the president's party, in practice have nominated U.S. attorneys and normally have been concerned not to outrage the local bar. Although the appointees have always served at the president's pleasure, it has been possible to guard against politically motivated removals by vesting the power of interim appointment in federal judges, drawn from both parties. These judges have generally appointed senior career officials pending Senate approval of a new nominee.

The enthusiasts for unlimited executive power and a compliant Congress have changed this. But Article II, Section 2 of the Constitution expressly allows judicial appointing powers. Cases allow Congress to limit presidential removal powers on Justice Louis D. Brandeis' premise that the function of the Constitution was "not to promote efficiency but to preclude the exercise of arbitrary power."

In the wake of Watergate, Congress, at the urging of Attorney General Edward H. Levi, provided the FBI director with a 10-year fixed term to insulate him from presidential whims.

As the sweep of federal criminal jurisdiction widens, it is imperative that Congress thoroughly review the provisions for appointment and removal of all important federal law enforcement officials - not merely U.S. attorneys. The dispersion of police and prosecutorial power is the bedrock of American civil liberty. In all but two or three states, prosecutors are elected for short terms.

We do not want prosecutors to be laws unto themselves, and we do not want an elective dictatorship. Geographic dispersion of prosecutorial power, of which Congress has lately grown careless with its expansions of federal jurisdiction, has historically been the American answer to this problem. The growth of the central office of the Justice Department renders it imperative that old controls be reinstated and new ones devised.

The residents of the seven judicial districts affected by the new appointments do not yet have reason to remonstrate against an executive who has, in the language of the Declaration of Independence, "sent hither swarms of officers to harass our people and eat out their substance," but the new appointments - and the statute authorizing them - impair the influence of locally elected senators and overly aggrandize the federal executive.

DOJ_NMG_0129018

George W. Liebmann, a Baltimore lawyer, is executive director of the Calvert Institute for Policy Research and the author of "The Common Law Tradition: A Collective Portrait of Five Legal Scholars."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

3 Acquitted In Lengthy AOL Trial (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

An Alexandria jury acquitted two former AOL executives on all the conspiracy and fraud charges against them yesterday, dealing a blow to prosecutors and marking a decisive end to one of the longest trials in the federal courthouse.

Jurors spent slightly more than three full days in deliberation before clearing Kent D. Wakeford and John P. Tuli of charges that they helped a Las Vegas software client post fictitious revenue in early 2001. As the court clerk read the verdict, Tuli wept while his mother and his wife gasped with delight. Wakeford trembled, clapped his hands twice and hugged his lawyers.

The six-man, six-woman jury also acquitted Christopher J. Benyo, a former vice president at the Las Vegas company, PurchasePro.com. Defense lawyer Terrance Reed last week appealed to the jury to "set yourselves and Mr. Benyo free" from a case that stretched into a fourth month, a rarity in a courthouse known for dispensing speedy justice.

"You're free to go, gentlemen," U.S. District Judge Walter D. Kelley Jr. told the jubilant defendants. Wakeford and Tuli clasped in a tearful embrace as prosecutors filed out of the eighth-floor courtroom without a word to spectators or opponents.

The case marks the second defeat for the government in its five-year-old investigation into accounting misdeeds at PurchasePro and AOL in the early days of the Internet bust. The same judge acquitted a former top lawyer for PurchasePro in December 2005 after a two-week trial. Once the focus of intense government scrutiny, high-ranking AOL sales and marketing officials ultimately avoided criminal charges, an issue that defense lawyers for their subordinates seized on as scapegoating during the trial.

Chuck Rosenberg, the U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia who joined the office last year, issued a statement praising the government team and concluding: "Sometimes, jurors see things in a different way. We respect their decision."

In the course of the trial, which began in October, Tuli's defense lawyer Mark J. Hulkower assailed nearly every aspect of the prosecution, from the integrity of former PurchasePro employees who pleaded guilty and testified in exchange for leniency to the tactics of the investigators.

The defense teams also heaped blame on Charles E. Johnson Jr., PurchasePro's former chief executive who was severed from the case last fall for reasons that remain secret. Johnson will be retried in August. Defense lawyers stressed that Wakeford and Tuli had not received payments or other direct financial benefits for entering into deals with PurchasePro, and asked jurors to consider whether they had a motive to engage in the alleged fraud.

"We're pleased with the verdict," said Hulkower, who spent a week in the hospital after his appendix burst but returned to deliver an impassioned three-hour closing argument last week. "It's been five years in coming, and now John Tuli can reclaim his life."

Tuli's wife, his brother, his mother and other relatives relocated from the Boston area to occupy a nearby town house for the duration of the trial. Wakeford's parents and friends appeared in the courtroom to support him.

Alone among the three, Wakeford took the witness stand in his defense, testifying emotionally in January -- a move that his attorney, Henry W. Asbill, said followed a gut feeling. "All's well that ends well," Asbill said yesterday.

After the verdict, Wakeford told reporters that the experience had been "hell," and in a telephone interview hours later spoke out against government tactics that he labeled "grossly unfair."

"At what point do the questionable tactics become so unfair that a government body should step in to make sure that innocent people are not wrongly convicted?" he asked.

AOL and parent company Time Warner paid more than $500 million two years ago to settle related charges over accounting practices. Spokesman Andrew Weinstein declined to comment on the jury's decision. AOL, which had been paying millions of dollars in attorney fees for Wakeford and Tuli, may have a difficult time recovering the money in light of the acquittals.

All three men continue to face civil fraud charges lodged by the Securities and Exchange Commission, which delayed its case while the criminal proceedings moved forward.

Defendants Acquitted In AOL-PurchasePro Trial (FINDLAW/AP)

By Matthew Barakat, Ap Business Writer

AP, February 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0129019

(AP) - ALEXANDRIA, Virginia-Two former midlevel executives at America Online were acquitted Tuesday on all counts of charges that they conspired with a now-defunct Las Vegas software firm to inflate its revenue with secret side deals and backdated contracts.

A third defendant, a senior executive at the Las Vegas company, also was found not guilty on all counts.

The verdicts brought to a close one of the longest trials in the history of the federal courthouse in Alexandria. The trial lasted more than three months; the jury deliberated three full days before reaching its verdict.

All three defendants wept with relief when the verdicts were read.

John Tuli, a former vice president in AOL's NetBusiness unit; Kent Wakeford, a former executive director at AOL's business affairs unit; and Christopher Benyo, a former senior vice president of marketing at PurchasePro, had been accused of deceiving PurchasePro stockholders about the company's revenue in the first quarter of 2001 as the dot-com economy collapsed.

The alleged ringleader of the scheme, PurchasePro founder Charles "Junior" Johnson, is scheduled to go on trial in August.

Several PurchasePro executives had struck plea deals and testified at the trial.

AOL is the online access unit of Time Warner Inc.

Oil Drilling Companies To Pay Record Settlement In Bribery Case (AP)

By JUAN A. LOZANO

AP, February 7, 2007

HOUSTON - Three oil drilling companies - subsidiaries of a British firm - have agreed to pay a $26 million fine for bribing Nigerian officials in order to get preferential customs treatment, Justice Department officials announced Tuesday.

The fine by the companies, subsidiaries of London-based Vetco International Ltd., is the largest criminal settlement of foreign corruption charges, said Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty.

"This case ... confirms our commitment to root out corruption," McNulty said. "The Department of Justice will continue its efforts to assure a level playing field for businesses operating abroad."

During a closed hearing in a Houston federal court Tuesday, the companies - Vetco Gray UK Ltd., Vetco Gray Controls Inc., and Vetco Gray Controls Ltd. - pleaded guilty to violating the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act.

